Gentleman wishes to extend the system of Provisional Orders, so do I. It is a cheap system of carrying out many of these works. Then I must also notice for a moment what was said by the hon. Member for South Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce). He called to our assistance the example of America and especially of New York. Do hon. Members recollect the story of the Elevated Railway of New York, which was carried through the streets at the level of the drawing-room windows of gentlemen's houses, within a few feet of those windows, without any compensation being paid for the injury done? The hon. Member's proposals seem to me to have something about them which ought to be, and I hope always will be, foreign to this country. Now we advocate local inquiry on the spot, because we believe that local inquiry is the best method of ascertaining facts. It is not a chance tribunal, but one chosen with special reference to the particular case which is to be investigated. It is one that will be better able to judge upon the spot on many disputed questions than any Committee sitting upstairs, however able and industrious that Committee may be. The Commission will get through its work quicker because it will sit longer than our Committees, and will sit de die in diem. It will not tolerate waste of time. Thirdly, I advocate a local inquiry because I am confident that it will be a cheaper inquiry. From some of the speeches made by hon. Members it is almost made to appear that the Scotch people prefer an expensive tribunal. It is said the great railway companies do not object to the present system. I am not surprised at that, but are the Railway Companies necessarily the best judges of what is the cheapest and best system? Is not the private suitor to be consulted? Under the present system the promoter of a Private Bill may bring a host of witnesses and keep them waiting week after week at great cost, and after all the Committee may be satisfied with one witness and all the remainder will go back without being called at all. But the unfortunate individual who desires to protect his rights has to go on paying his counsel through the whole period.

Mr. E. Stanhope

The real fact is that the present tribunal is a costly one, and, above all, it is costly to the private individual who wants to protect his rights. The present tribunal is no doubt incorruptible and pure, but what can be said of the system which crams into one short month all the most important inquiries of a Session, with the result that counsel who particularly want to attend are engaged up to the hilt, and anyone who wants to obtain them has exceeding difficulty in obtaining their services. I do not say that the fees paid to eminent counsel are too high; they cannot be, because an eminent counsel will always command his price. But I do say, that the fees paid to junior counsel, which depend upon the custom of Parliament, are ludicrously unjust to private suitors. As regards one question asked by the Member for Aberdeen. It is not proposed to abolish Instructions, and I see no difficulty in giving similar Instructions to the Commission as those now given to Committees. A good deal of objection has been taken to the form of the Commission. The Government are open to conviction on this portion of the Bill, but I have the satisfaction of observing that our opponents are by no means agreed as to what is to be substituted for the proposals of the Government. Objection has been taken to the Scotch Judges nominating a Member, but I think a more impartial body could not be found. It seems to be assumed that it is an unheard-of thing for Parliament to delegate a nomination. That duty has often been delegated to Judges—aye, even to County Court Judges. It might be found better that this Member should be nominated by the Crown, but I think if we had proposed that we should probably have laid ourselves open to a greater attack. I understand the proposal is that a panel of gentlemen suited for the position shall be nominated, and that from that panel the man best qualified for the work of the year shall be chosen. Some objection has been taken to the fact that we are to have a Member of Parliament on the Committee because he is to be the only unpaid member. We have had experience of that in the case of the Court of Referees. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) says he is afraid the Court will not be peripatetic. If the Court were to sit in Edinburgh and refuse to sit in the localities, it would be acting entirely contrary to the spirit and even the letter of the Bill. Now, I come to the last point, and that is, Will the House accept the recommendations of the Committee? The hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) does not disguise what he thinks about that. He says the opportunity would be taken by obstructives in the House to make every use of the Forms of the House to discuss over and over again a Private Bill that had been before the Committee. I do not think they would do anything of the kind. I believe in the common-sense of Parliament. We always used to hear at the time of the constitution of the Court for the trial of Election Petitions that the same result would follow. What has been the case? This House, without exception, accepts the decisions of the Judges.

MR. HUNTER: They have no power to refuse it.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: That is so now, but it was said that the House would never allow the decisions of the Judges to remain unchallenged, but I never heard a single protest against the decision in an election case. So I believe it will be with this tribunal. We invoke the assistance of the House to make this tribunal thoroughly efficient and strong. If it is made strong and efficient I am confident the House will accept its decisions. I hope I have shown that the present system cannot continue and ought not to continue. It is one we ought to change without delay. We do not pretend that our scheme is absolutely complete in all respects, and may not be amended in Committee, but still it is a workable scheme we are holding out, and we are confident that it will be a great assistance to Parliament and a great benefit to the people of Scotland.

*(8.1.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): If the Debate had proceeded on the same lines on which it has progressed since 4 o'clock, perhaps it would not have been necessary for an English Member to intervene. A very great part of the Debate has been purely of a Scottish character, carried on by Scotch Members from a Scotch point of view, and to this all I should have been disposed to say would have been this: that if our Scotch friends are desirous of trying the experiment let them do so, but the cost will be more than under the present system. But the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War has thrown quite a new colour over the Debate, suggesting, as it did, the introduction of the scheme under discussion into England. The right hon. Gentleman practically advocated the surrender by the House of its control over private legislation; and English Members are justified in intervening in a purely Scotch Debate in order to avoid being committed to any such proposal. I think, before the House is called upon to make changes in a system which has been in force for many years, and which on the whole has worked remarkably well, some good reasons for the change ought to be advanced. Now, the first reason was given in the course of this evening by the hon. Member for Roxburgh (Mr. A. Elliot), and which I am glad to find the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War did not endorse. My hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh maintained that a Select Committee of the House of Commons is a tribunal unsatisfactory to the suitors who come before it, and that, if for no other reason, we were bound to alter it because of its unsatisfactory qualifications. Now, if I may venture upon personal allusions, I may say that before I became a Member of this House I had the honour of practising before its Committees, and since becoming a Member, I have had the honour of serving on these Committees, and the conclusion to which I have arrived, and which I have often expressed, is that, of all the tribunals with which I have ever been associated, I know none so competent or so fair, and none which have given such satisfaction to suitors, as the Select Committees of the House of Commons. The hon. Member for Roxburgh alluded to the inferiority—he did not use the word, but he conveyed the idea—the inferiority of the Committee to the Bar practising before it. I would call attention in this connection to the evidence of the greatest living man who has practised at the Parliamentary Bar—Lord Grimthorpe. He was a leading practitioner at the Parliamentary Bar for nearly 40 years, and Lord Grimthorpe never hesitates to express his opinions even if they are disagreeable, and Lord Grimthorpe's opinions are not likely to be founded on a favourable exaggeration of the merits of these tribunals. Lord Grimthorpe stated to the Committee which sat on the subject that he believed that the decisions of Select Committees generally gave satisfaction to the public; that a good Chairman was often better able to control the admission of evidence than even a Judge; and that the Bar practising before the Committees recognised the general competence of the Committees. Another eminent counsel, Mr. Pope, endorsed that opinion. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stanhope) urged the necessity of change, on the ground that it was becoming impossible for the House to carry on its own business, and quoted in support of his argument the decision of Lord Hartington's Committee and the evidence of my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee of Selection (Sir J. Mowbray). But the right hon. Gentleman did not tell the House the whole of the proposal made by Lord Hartington's Committee, which was that the whole House should be divided into a panel, and that every Member should sit on a Standing Committee. That involves a great constitutional change; and if Her Majesty's Government propose it, I do not know that they will meet with much opposition here; but that is not the proposal now before the House. If every Member of the House is a Member of a Standing Committee sitting constantly, and having charge of the regular business of the House, it is self-evident that the present system of Private Bill Committees cannot be carried out. It was upon that theory alone that Lord Hartington's Committee recommended the change which the right hon. Gentleman has referred to. In passing, I may call attention to another inaccuracy into which the right hon. Gentleman quite unintentionally fell. The right hon. Gentleman was inaccurate in saying that the Committee of both Houses was unanimously, with one exception, in favour of the proposal now put forward. The Committee was, in fact, with the exception of the Postmaster General, unanimous in preferring to discuss his scheme in preference to that of the Chairman of Committees; but the Committee voted four to six against the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman. The four Members of the Joint Committee who voted against the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman were the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland, Lord Stalbridge, Lord Balfour, and another Peer. The Report of the Joint Committee was a compromise proposal. The evident feeling of the Joint Committee, as shown in its Report, was in favour of an extension of the scheme for Provisional Orders, subject to the difficulty that it would only afford a partial relief to Members of the House of Commons. The Secretary of State for War also argued that the labours of hon. Members need lightening; but it is my opinion that the facts do not point to such a conclusion. The year 1887 was an exceptional light year; and in that Session 102 Members of the House of Commons were employed upon Select Committees to consider opposed Bills, the average service of each Member amounting to less than eight days. Is this too great an imposition on hon. Members? Does this represent an intolerable pressure? I know the difficulty of getting Members to serve on Committees, but that is one of the evils of the system. When a Member is asked to serve, of course it is never convenient; it is very irksome to Members not fond of the duty; but allowing for all exceptions, there would, under an automatic system of service, always be 300 or 400 Members available for Committees, and the service required from each would be very small during a Session. Then, too, when we talk of increasing burdens, let us recollect that the Sittings of the House have been considerably abbreviated. In my earlier days of Membership, it was considered a comparatively early hour if we rose before 2 o'clock, and now we usually adjourn soon after midnight. I do not believe there is anything in the difficulty of finding Members to serve on Committees which could not be met by some alteration in the present system. With regard to the argument of the enormous cost of witnesses, that cost has been shown to be only 11 per cent. of the entire expenses. I agree that a large number of unnecessary witnesses are brought to London, but that is not the fault of the system, but of the parties themselves. The House of Commons Committees examine witnesses more rapidly than an ordinary Court of Law, and if a fact is clearly proved by one witness it is not their habit to call more upon that point. The real expense is in the fees of the House and the fees to counsel, and I do not believe that this Bill is going to diminish those expenses. The fees paid to counsel under the present system of Election Petitions are far greater than those which were paid before. People will not have local talent, and I venture to say that in an important question, say of water supply to Edinburgh, before the new tribunal the Corporation would get down London counsel and London experts at a far greater cost than would be entailed on the Corporation if they had to bring up local witnesses to London. I am not arguing against trying the experiment of local inquiry. I am not opposed to local inquiry; but I will venture to say the idea is an absurdity so far as railways are concerned. As an illustration, take the scheme which I understand is proposed, and will be opposed, to form a new connection between London and Manchester and the North. Would you have a local inquiry for that? Where should it be held? A great question of policy will have to be decided upon which Parliament alone can judge. I deny that in our constitutional system any Judges can be appointed to decide questions of policy. They are to decide questions of law. They apply the law to facts, and I hope we shall never depart from this admirable practice. The fact of a man being a good Judge does not fit him to decide cases of public policy such as are brought before Committees of this House. Take, for instance, the case of the Manchester Ship Canal, than which I do not know a greater proof of the way in which our present system works. In the first instance, the Bill was passed by a Committee of the House of Commons, and was thrown out in the Committee of the House of Lords; next year the reverse was the case, and the next year it passed both Houses. In all that time difficulties were being threshed out and the scheme matured and ripened, until, by a Committee on which Mr. Forster as Chairman rendered one of his last great public services, the scheme passed, and the undertaking is now being carried through. Now, if this scheme had been referred to a Commission of Judges for the second time, that tribunal would have rejected it as a matter already disposed of. With regard to the question of Provisional Orders, we do not propose that the Municipality of A should be allowed to buy the gasworks of A at its own price, but upon certain terms—for instance, under the Lands Clauses Act. Where would be the injustice of that? The matter would then be subject to Parliamentary control. No branch of the work of the Local Government Board is more beneficial than its administration of Provisional Orders, and I do not see why the work done for England by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) should not be done for Scotland by the Secretary for Scotland, who there is no reason to suppose is an overworked official. The Local Government system is, in fact, one of local inquiry carried out by the Inspector at a very small cost indeed, and the same may be said of Board of Trade Provisional Orders. I do not remember any other arguments in favour of this scheme unless it is, as the Lord Advocate said, a homœopathic dose of Home Rule for the people of Scotland. If the people of Scotland wish to have it, I do not wish to stand in their way, but I object to the patronage which this measure will give to the Judges. Of all patronage judicial patronage is the worst, because the Judges are irresponsible. If it were the patronage of the Crown, the Minister would exercise it with the full knowledge that he would be responsible to the House of Commons. I remember an incident related that Lord Palmerston once said that every person he met in Parliament Street was laughing at the extraordinary mode of electing the Indian Council which was proposed by Mr. Disraeli's India Councils Bill. I think if anything could excite the risible faculties of the people of Scotland it would be this proposal that the Judges sitting in Parliament House should appoint the fourth Member of the Committee. Then the Bill makes no provision for dealing with cases of unopposed measures, and I do not see what is to be the position of the House in cases where the Commissioners reject a Bill. A Bill, let us say, is brought in which raises some grave question of public policy. Members of this House object to its provisions, and raise a Debate on the Second Reading. The House practically affirms the principle and the Preamble by passing the Second Reading, and says in effect it approves of the scheme on the ground of public policy subject to the details being settled. Is the Commission to have the power under such circumstances of reversing the decision of the House? A Committee upstairs would say at once: "The House has practically settled the Preamble of this Bill." [Ministerial cries of "No!"] I have been on Committees upstairs when it has been said: "The principle is a question which the House has practically decided, and we are here to settle the details." But of course this is only a question of detail. I say with reference to the whole question, if this is to be introduced as a general scheme, you will be depriving the public of this country of a most valuable tribunal for the determination of this class of questions; you will be introducing a new element into questions of public policy and setting up a co-ordinate jurisdiction with Parliament, to be exercised side by side with Parliament, in such a way that it will assuredly create friction. Parliament will never treat the decisions of an outside body in the same way as it treats the decisions of its own Committees. Under these circumstances, I think you would be making a change which would not secure the advantages which the right hon. Gentleman expects. I, for one, Sir, knowing the objections that may be urged against the present system, and believing that a great many of those objections might be removed by reducing the fees that have now to be paid, and making the proceedings more simple by doing away with all those advertisements and notices and deposits which have come down to us as relics of bygone times, and are totally inapplicable to the present day, am of opinion that we shall still find the Parliamentary system the most practicable and satisfactory we can employ for dealing with this class of cases, and I prefer to bear the evils we have than fly to others that we know not of.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

Mr. H. H. Fowler

(10.34.) MR. M. J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): This question has been treated to night in a spirit very adverse to the provisions of the Bill. In view of the fact that for many years it has occupied a prominent place in political discussions, and that it has figured largely in many Addresses for at least 10 or 15 years, I am rather surprised at the tone adopted by hon. Members opposite. This is the first time we have had a regular discussion on a Government measure respecting Private Bill legislation, and I am bound to say the Government have received little encouragement from hon. Members in the task they have imposed upon themselves. There can be no doubt that the feeling in Scotland in favour of some such measure as this is a very strong one. There is not in the North such satisfaction with the composition and decisions of the Parliamentary tribunals upstairs as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler) has described as existing here. We are well aware that there are many competent Members who serve upon the Committees upstairs, but at the same time there are many who do not pay much attention to the questions that come before them, and the public are consequently led to think that their interests are carelessly dealt with. The right hon. Gentleman quoted Lord Grimthorpe as a great authority on this subject. No doubt Lord Grimthorpe had an immense practice at the Parliamentary Bar, but I question whether one who was as fortunate as he was in his practice at the Bar for so many years is the best witness to call on the question. He would be, perhaps, the last man to say a word against the Committees. We find that Mr. Pope and others are cited, but these gentlemen bear the same relation to Committees now that Lord Grimthorpe did in his day. It is said that Election Petitions nowadays cost more than they did formerly. That is not the case in Scotland. The cost in Scotland is much less than it would be if witnesses had to be brought up to London and to be kept here a long time in waiting; and I think, in the same way, the cost of holding a Private Bill inquiry would be less in Scotland than in London. We are told that the expense of bringing counsel to Scotland would be greater than that of bringing witnesses to London; but in Scotland we are not in the habit of sending to London for counsel to advocate our causes. There is a strong opinion in Scotland that something of this sort should be done, and as the Bill is to be sent to a Select Committee I cannot conceive how many Scotch Members can be found to vote against the Second Reading. What we have to consider is, are we prepared to make any change in the system of Private Committees by delegating some of the powers to a Commission sitting in Scotland? In my opinion, Scotland is justified in making the first claim in this matter, for the late Mr. Craig Sellar was active in pressing his views upon the House, and his representations were very favourably received. No agitation has, so far as I know, ever taken place in England, and if Scotland wants this new system I think the House ought not to deny it to her. It is a principle we have been endeavouring to secure for some years past, and I am sure there are a large number of Members who would be willing to see some of the powers they at present possess delegated to some other authority. I can understand suitors, whether promoters or petitioners, finding fault with a tribunal of an untried character. They may say that these four or five gentlemen got together to adjudicate on their differences have not had the experience to warrant their coming to a right opinion. As to the appointment of a Judge as President of the Court, such a person would be conversant with all legal forms, and would be well qualified to assist in these inquiries, and I think if we had more Members of that kind on the tribunal it would secure greater confidence in the country. You would get gentlemen of wider experience to adjudicate, and probably views less narrow would be found to prevail. There is the objection as to a tribunal with finality to its decisions. I can conceive a Bill being brought a second time before the Commission; I can conceive the Bill being sent from House to House at Westminster, and this occurring more than once. That would necessitate a considerable amount of expense. Witnesses would have to be sent down to the locality from time to time, and the present ruinous expenditure would be repeated. But there is a danger that private enterprise might be injuriously affected. If you had the same tribunal going to a locality from year to year you would know what their views were likely to be, and, therefore, though the schemes for which powers were sought might be of great value to the public, the promoters might be restrained from persevering with them. There is no finality at present, and the result is that if a scheme is rejected one year it can be brought up again and again, and frequently is adopted in the end, greatly to the advantage of the public. One blot in the Bill is that there is no appeal to the House of Lords. I do not know if hon. Members agree with me, but I believe that a double inquiry is of great value. There are sometimes points in an inquiry which, owing to the pressure in the House of Commons, are not thrashed out there, and these are more fully gone into in the House of Lords. There is some objection to Edinburgh being the centre for the Commission. We know there is a great amount of jealousy in Scotland between the West and East—though that is not a matter for discussion here. But those prejudices are prejudices that will wear out, and we must not entertain feelings of that kind in trying to legislate for Scotland. There is this to be said in regard to conferring these powers on Municipalities and County Councils—namely, that these bodies represent the ratepayers, and if you make the inquiry too local you do not represent the feeling of the wider district in which the particular undertaking is situated, and it might be necessary that a much wider view than that which would be taken by a Town Council should be secured. There has been some experience in this direction in Glasgow, where railway, and tramway, and other schemes of great value to the general public have been, for a long time, strenuously resisted by the Local Authorities. If the wider localities had had their way, some enterprises of great national interest might not have been stifled in their infancy. But with this tribunal in the Bill you would not have that local prejudice at work, and would have a much wider view taken of these matters. I do hope the principle of the Bill will be affirmed tonight.

* (10.45.) MR. LENG (Dundee): At the first blush I was rather taken by the Bill, especially considering the quarter from which it comes. As an advanced Liberal I was somewhat surprised to find a kind of posy or nosegay of advanced Liberal principles presented by the Lord Advocate, for there is the principle of devolution, there is the principle of Home Rule, and there is — what must have delighted the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere)—the proposal to abolish the House of Lords so far as Scotch Private Bills legislation by this Commission is concerned. The principle of devolution is rather captivating as relieving Members from attendance on Committees and setting them free to attend Grand Committees dealing with Imperial questions. I was particularly interested in the evolution of the Home Rule principle in this Bill, because by bringing the preliminary process of legislation home to the people we shall do something to remove the fetish that the only sacred place for legislation is Westminster, forgetting that in ancient times Parliament assembled in different large cities in the Kingdom. It has long been contended that justice should be brought home to the people. We shall

Mr. M. J. Stewart

now have from the introduction of this Bill by a Conservative Government the admission that the time has arrived when legislation also should be brought home to the people. Forgetting that the House is really composed of representative Members from all parts of the country, it has been thought there is something sacred in this place for the purpose of legislation, and that Members receive a baptism of wisdom when they come to the banks of the Thames which they do not possess in their own cities and counties. I would point out to Members opposite that when they are going to have this system of peripatetic Committees or Commissions with regard to Private Bills in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, and Aberdeen, the suggestion naturally follows that what might be good for Private Bills might not be bad also for Public Bills. I, therefore, congratulate the Government on this additional step they are taking in the direction of Home Rule. There are many who would be willing to receive Home Rule by instalments. Nor do I despair of seeing in the course of time a Conservative Government propose to establish a Scottish Representative Assembly for the discussion of strictly Scottish affairs. There is, I admit, one valuable proposal, and I think it is the only valuable proposal in the Bill; that is, the replacement of the double inquiry by an inquiry before a single Committee. In the last Session of Parliament there were three separate instances connected with Scotland in which decisions of Committees of the House of Commons were reversed by Committees of the House of Lords. In one of these cases the House of Commons sat for 29 days, and the House of Lords, sitting upon the case for nine days, reversed the decision of the first Committee. It is understood that the entire expenses of these two inquiries to the various companies was not less than £50,000. With regard to these expenses, there is no doubt great weight in the statement that they arise chiefly through the employment of experts, and if these are brought to Scotland the cost will not be diminished. We have had experience of that in the city I represent. We have more than once had arbitrations, and experts have been brought from London to give evidence, and the cost in each has been enormous, not to say appalling. I may remind the House with regard to this question of one Committee instead of two, that in 1858, in the Commons Committee of that year Mr. Lowe moved that the House of Lords should be invited to concur in some arrangement by which a Private Bill might be investigated at the same time and placed before a Committee of the two Houses, or by which one general tribunal may be formed for both Houses. This plan was supported by Mr. Gladstone, Lord Robert Cecil, and Mr. Stuart-Wortley; but was opposed by Sir James Graham, Mr. Candwell, and Mr. Bouverie, and the numbers being equal, the Chairman declared himself with the "Nees." In 1869 a Joint Committee of Lords and Commons was appointed "to consider whether any facilities could be given for the despatch of business in Parliament." This Committee considered it expedient that opposed Private Bills should be referred to a Joint Committee consisting of three Members of each House, and were of opinion "that this change would introduce greater simplicity and rapidity of proceeding and a corresponding economy." Had the recommendation been given effect to in the present Bill it would have been free from many of the objections stated. There is a certain vague general feeling and desire amongst the public in Scotland for some change; but I undertake to say there is no feeling whatever for this mode of making it, and there is a strong feeling against the proposed constitution of the Commission. It is a peculiarity of a Conservative Government that while great sticklers for the Constitution, they bring forward most unconstitutional proposals. Unaccustomed naturally to the path of reform, when they enter upon it they stagger and stumble. The present system is a constitutional system, it recognises both branches of the Legislature; but the Bill, so far as the constitution of the Commission is concerned, goes on the assumption that there is no House of Lords. Is it not strange that a Conservative Government is the first to propose to abolish the share of the House of Lords in Private Bill legislation? If such a proposal as that in the Bill had been made by Liberals, we could easily have conceived what Tories would have said respecting it. Numerous Committees have taken evidence and reported on the subject, and many passages might be quoted. I may remind the House that in 1860 Lord Brougham proposed that—

"It is inexpedient in a constitutional view for Parliament, or either of the Houses thereof, to abdicate its functions and privileges in respect of private legislation, but, on the contrary, that both Houses ought jealously to retain their undoubted power to decide upon every proposed enactment and of assenting to or dissenting from such proposals."

Mr. Frederick Clifford, in his admirable work on Private Bill legislation, which is so careful, complete, and impartial, says—

"The House of Lords has shown no wish to rid itself of its share in private legislation, and has always discharged this duty with great care for public and private interests. From the earliest period both Houses have treated Private Bills as part of the necessary business of legislation which the nation expected them to transact."

Mr. Robert Baxter, an acute and experienced solicitor said the House of Lords were quicker in the despatch of business than even the Lower House. Then there is another point, which I think has been referred to before. It is that by having only one Member of Parliament on this proposed Commission you cannot have the power of defending and explaining and vindicating the decision of the Committee when it is reported to this House. On various occasions during the short time I have been in this House I have seen several Members of Parliament rise to vindicate the decision of the Committee. The more it is looked into, the more, I am convinced, will it be found that the constitution of this Commission is objectionable. There is no doubt whatever, may be said, that there is too much of the legal and judicial element in its constitution. This proposal to have a meeting of the Judges in Edinburgh to nominate a list of persons from whom the Supreme Judge is to make a selection, really has nothing whatever to recommend it. It is curious to see a Conservative Lord Advocate treating the Peers of the House of Lords practically as non-existent, and regarding what are called in Scotland the paper lords as all in all, and giving to them the selection of this tribunal. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side have spoken as though the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling had advocated the exclusion of Railway Bills. I did not understand him in that sense at all. He pointed out that under your own Bill it must necessarily take place, and, if it does take place, it is quite obvious that there would not be sufficient employment for any such Commission. Mr. Clifford says—

“If Railway Bills are reserved for the decision of Parliament the justification for a new tribunal disappears. It would relieve Parliament from little work, and it would only add another stage of litigation and expense.”

That is a quotation from a work written and published some years before this Bill was introduced, so that it is quite impartial. Then Lord Monk Bretton is also of opinion that there is not sufficient work in Scotland or in Ireland to justify the creation of separate tribunals. I am certainly of opinion that a far better system is that both Houses should be represented on a Joint Committee. At the same time, I believe it is the opinion of a considerable number of persons in Scotland, that the real reason of the Bill is set forth in Clause 19, which creates new offices, new places, lucrative appointments for a number of gentlemen to whom they will be very acceptable. It has been said that a great number of Chambers of Commerce and Corporations have passed resolutions in favour of this Bill, but those who have the most intimate acquaintance with the cost of Private Bill procedure are satisfied that the proposals of the Bill will add to rather than diminish that cost. There is no gentleman in Scotland who has had a larger or longer acquaintance with procedure in these Committees than Mr. Thornton, Clerk of the Police Commission of Dundee, who has promoted numerous Private Bills during the last 40 years. He says—

“(c) Consider for a moment what would take place if a special tribunal for Scotland, sitting in Edinburgh or elsewhere in Scotland, were appointed as proposed. In all important Bills the best talent will always be sought on the side of the promoters, as well as on the part of the objectors. It may be that some Scotch lawyers would sooner or later devote themselves to Parliamentary business, and that, therefore, so far as advocacy is concerned, you might have as good advocacy in Scotland as you can at present secure at Westminster, but in that case you will not secure it one penny cheaper; on the contrary, it will be dearer. Scotch lawyers who practically withdraw themselves from general practice will require large fees, just as the barristers who presently practise at Westminster do, and if you take them away from Edinburgh to Dundee or Aberdeen or Glasgow, they will require heavier fees. A barrister at Westminster can attend half a dozen Committee Rooms—in other words, half a dozen cases a day—but in Edinburgh, while the advocate might be able to attend to his general chamber business, he could only attend to one case, because the Commissioners could only take up one case at a time, and if he were taken away to Glasgow, Dundee, or Inverness, he could not attend even to his chamber business, and so would require still greater remuneration. Advocacy, however, is only a part, and sometimes a small part, of the expense attending opposed Bills. Experts of the highest standing are often necessarily employed, and these experts are at present almost exclusively found in London, and will continue to be found there. If you bring these experts to Scotland you must pay them enormous fees. At present their offices are at Westminster, where they do a general business, and they may be able to attend a number of Committee Rooms in a single day; but if you take them down to Edinburgh, they can only attend on one case, and they are away from all their general business, and you must, in consequence, pay them large and exorbitant fees.”

Mr. Leng

Then it would be far better that there should be a joint tribunal of the two Houses, whatever it may be. The now venerable Town Clerk of the City of Dundee, who has been also engaged for nearly half a century in such work, entirely agrees with Mr. Thornton in this matter. Therefore, from various points of view, Mr. Speaker, it seems that while at the first blush there is much which is captivating in the aspect of the Bill, yet, when it comes to be examined, and especially when this most objectionable feature of the constitution of the Committee is considered, I think the great majority, at all events, of Liberal Members, must support the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling.

*(11.8.) SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): Mr. Speaker, this matter appears to me to be absolutely non-political in its character, and, therefore,

I will not refer to the earlier observations of the hon. Member who has just spoken. The principle of the Bill concerns England and Ireland just as much as Scotland, because that which is adopted for Scotland, if successful, will ultimately be adopted for England and Ireland also. I think it is the duty of those Members who have had experience of Private Bill Committees upstairs, to state their experience with a view to contributing to a sound decision. As I understand, this plan is proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, in consequence of a demand which is more general and more varied in Scotland than in any other part of the United Kingdom. To those who are not satisfied with the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman says that he is willing, if it is read a second time, that the whole matter shall be threshed out in Committee upstairs. Of that I entirely approve, considering the importance of the private interests of suitors who have hitherto appeared before the Parliamentary Committees. I think it is right that every consideration should be given to the subject. I myself have had a varied experience of Committees upstairs. I have heard it said that it is a great tax upon Members to serve upon Private Bill Committees. I was endeavouring to calculate the other day on how many Private Bill Committees I have sat. I broke down in the calculations; I think it was something between 30 and 40. Therefore, my experience has been worth something. As a rule, I have found, amongst Members of all Parties, not only willingness to serve on Committees, but anxiety to do their duty. Only in one instance have I known objections raised by a private Member, who said he was unfairly placed on the Committee, and that he had more important business elsewhere. It was my duty as Chairman to point out that I was not responsible for his being placed on the Committee, and that he could have no business more important than that of the country. As far as Members of Parliament are concerned, I do not think that it is a very great burden to them to serve on Private Bill Committees, and the cry that the burden is too great is an exaggerated one, which ought not to be listened to. I should just like to say a word upon the reduced number of Members who serve on each Private Bill Committee. The number was formerly five; it is now four—and four Members are few enough to consider the important questions which are constantly brought before Private Bill Committees, especially with regard to railway matters. Of course, on the Report of the Committee the House forms a decision. But my object is principally to point out that one of the advantages of the present Parliamentary tribunal is its variety. Under this system you can never have stereotyped decisions. One Chairman may lay down what he deems to be the law, and he may believe that his decision is a perfectly safe one; but after all he may have been mistaken, and the parties to future proceedings will not necessarily be bound by the view he has taken. Consequently, I say that the advantage of variety rests with the present tribunal, whereas in the case of a judicial tribunal, unless the greatest possible care is exercised, the decisions may become stereotyped. The disadvantage of stereotyping in the case of a judicial tribunal is that where certain decisions have been pronounced you always have a large number of astute persons practising before that tribunal ready to accommodate themselves to the ideas entertained and expressed by it. So far, therefore, I cannot say that from the point of view of hon. Members the decisions of the present tribunal have been unsatisfactory. But the real question to be considered is—is the demand for a new tribunal justified, and if so, how far can we best meet it? I maintain that the work has so far been well done; but if the country wants it done in another way, it is our duty to endeavour to provide the best possible means. This being so, I do not quarrel with the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman that this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee in order that the whole subject may be thoroughly threshed out. But I think it desirable that a few words should be said on another matter. We have heard a good deal as to the cost of bringing witnesses from a distance. I remember that I had to sit with a very able Committee on a great Scotch scheme which was referred to just now—I allude to that of the Central Glasgow Railway. On that occasion there was an extensive amount of evidence prepared on both sides, showing that those who were in charge of the Bill and those opposed to it had endeavoured somewhat to overburden each case by bringing up too many witnesses. But this was speedily checked by the Committee, and there were some 20 or 30 witnesses who were absolutely useless. All this, of course, involves a considerable amount of cost. But then if you change the tribunal, and go to the locality, you have to meet the heavy costs of the professional witnesses and experts who have to be called in every case, an example of which may be found in the case of Mr. Barry, who appears before a great many Committees, especially in reference to underground railways. The fee which such a witness would charge in a case heard in London would be quite another thing if he were called upon to go down to Dundee or Edinburgh to give similar evidence. Consequently, I cannot help thinking that money would not be saved by going to the localities because of the extra expense attending the employment of experts and counsel. It is also said that large numbers of counsel would be called on to go to Scotland and practise before the new tribunal. I do not believe that the number would be large, because the fees would be found too heavy, and our Scotch friends are sufficiently astute to be able to find men within their own borders able to discharge the duties now required of counsel in London. With regard to the constitution of the new tribunal, I, for one, had hoped that a Joint Committee of both Houses would have sufficed to get over the present difficulty. This is a plan which has been approved by many Members of great distinction on both sides of politics, and as it has never yet been tried, I should have liked to have seen the experiment made; but, at the same time, if Her Majesty's Government think, and the House thinks, that the demand for a new tribunal is so great that it ought to be met, I do not say the Government have done wrong in bringing in this Bill, although I trust that when in Committee the

Sir Julian Goldsmid

Government will duly consider the various points that have been raised. I would, however, offer them one suggestion, and that is, that whatever we do should be of a merely tentative character. I say this because we have been told by a Representative of Her Majesty's Government that if this Bill succeeds in Scotland, its principle will in all probability be extended to England and Ireland. I would, therefore, suggest to the Government that it may be well to limit the duration of the Bill, so as to render it terminable at the expiration of three or five years. In that case, the House of Commons and the country would have time to see whether the plan of this Bill met with general approval, or whether it would be better either to revert to the old system or accept the new one with modifications. I make this suggestion with no ill-will against their proposal, but in the hope that the Government will give it due consideration.

(11.23.) MR. J. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): It occurs to me that this Bill is objectionable from a Unionist point of view. The policy of the Unionist Party has been to treat the United Kingdom as a whole; but, unfortunately, this is not the only occasion on which they have been prepared to detach certain national questions, and have shown a disposition to deal with them differently to the rest of the United Kingdom. I think there is an advantage in having matters of this kind determined imperially. There are many matters dealt with by Municipal and County Authorities in England on which English opinion might be of great use in Scotland. If there is to be a Commission for England and Ireland, why not have one Commission for the United Kingdom? If you are going to have a Commission for England, there is no reason why it should not be applied to Scotland. We are told that we are going to make an experiment, and, in so doing, we are bringing about a great constitutional change. The Lord Advocate has made reference to local feeling in Scotland on this subject. I say that the local feeling in Scotland extends no further than this: that, whatever inquiries are necessary should be conducted in the localities. That is the only point on which Scottish opinion exists, because it is believed that it would be of advantage to the suitors to have local inquiries, and would prove a great saving of expense. No opinion, however, has been expressed in favour of this Bill. Scotch opinion is certainly not in favour of an irresponsible Commission, not amenable to public opinion, and not representative of the people. They would reject such a body, and would infinitely prefer a Committee of the two Houses to conduct inquiries on the spot. There is no doubt that Private Bill legislation is of great importance to every country. Such legislation deals with numerous matters that are of material importance to the prosperity of the country—such, for instance, as railways, sanitary matters, police administration, water, gas, and many other things. When measures affecting these matters are remitted to Committees of this House, those Committees are appointed through a Committee of Selection consisting of men who are in touch with public feeling, and at the same time, with the general policy of Parliament. In the majority of cases dealt with by these Committees the judgment given is not interfered with. And, if any such attempt be made, the Members of the Committee have the opportunity of stating the reasons on which their judgment was founded. But in this case there will be only one Member of the House of Commons on the Commission, and it might so happen that he would be absent when the scheme came before the House for discussion, so that a decision would have to be come to without hon. Members having the benefit of his experience. Now this Commission must be intended to be either effective or non-effective. If the former, then we shall have legislation practically conducted by authorities outside this House. If, on the other hand, the decision and judgment of the Commissioners is to be liable to be reversed, then the whole matter will necessarily come up for discussion in this House. The first objection I take to this Bill, then, is that it is a delegation of legislative powers to a Commission not selected by, nor in any way answerable to, the people; and, secondly, that the House will have no control over Private Bill legislation. There are in a year but few opposed Private Bills relating to Scotland. If, however, Parliament is unable to cope with this legislation, why not constitute a Council to deal with private legislation, giving it power to prepare measures in the same way as the Charity Commissioners prepare their schemes? A body of that kind would be amenable to local feeling in Scotland, and it would not be absolutely independent, as it would have to submit its Bills for approval to the Imperial Parliament. In that way you would practically have local legislation along with the retention of the supremacy of Parliament.

(11.34.) The House divided:—Ayes 150; Noes 86.—(Div. List, No. 12.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee."—(The Lord Advocate.)

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I must ask the Government not to take that Motion to-night. I intend to move an Instruction to the Committee, and so I believe do some of my hon. Friends. We also ought to know something as to the constitution of the Committee. I do not think the Government will lose any time by putting this Motion off.

*(11.50.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I should be very sorry to offer any opposition to the right hon. Gentleman, but I may remind him that it would be quite open to him to move an Instruction after the Bill is referred to a Committee. He will be able to do so on the nomination of the Committee.

(11.51.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): There should be a clear understanding that an opportunity of moving Instructions to the Committee will be afforded to hon. Members.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think that is very reasonable, and I am quite willing to give an undertaking that an opportunity shall be given for moving any Instructions to the Committee that hon. Members opposite may desire to move.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill referred to a Select Committee.

SOLICITORS MAGISTRACY BILL.

(No. 80.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [4th December], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

(11.52.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I hope this Bill will not be read a second time at this late hour, and I entertain that hope for many reasons. It has now been before the House for two Sessions, and in the whole of that time we have never been able to get an explicit explanation of its principles from the hon. Member in charge of it. I have again and again tried to find out why it was that the hon. Gentleman was so persistent in trying to push the Bill through at a late hour of the night, and as I have been unsuccessful I have had my distrust of the measure intensified. I venture to raise a protest against the Second Reading of this Bill being moved by a Member merely rising in his place, and not attempting to give any explanation of its principles. There are many points in it which require discussing. I submit it would be a very dangerous thing to admit solicitors to act as Justices of the Peace. You might, as I have on a previous occasion pointed out, have one member of a firm of solicitors sitting on the Bench listening to the pleadings of his partner in one of the cases being tried. Now that would be manifestly dangerous, and surely it is in itself a sufficient reason why the Bill should not be pressed forward at this late hour of the night. I appeal to the hon. Member—for there is still time for him to repent—

to withdraw the Bill, at any rate, for to-night, and on some future occasion to state to the House of Commons the reasons he has for asking that it be adopted.

(11.57.) MR. MACLURE (Lancashire, S.E.): There is not time now to describe at length the proposals of the Bill, or to deal with the objections which have been raised by the hon. Member. But I may point out that those objections have been already met by one of the clauses in the Bill, which provides that no member of a firm of solicitors, which in any way practise before a Court, to adjudicate in such Court. I think the general feeling of the Bar, and of the profession, is in favour of this Bill being read a second time.

(11.59.) MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I object to this Bill being read a second time without some explanation or some expression of opinion being given by the Law Officers of the Crown. I fear that if it is passed we shall have in our Courts of Justice a spectacle something similar to that we have witnessed in Ireland, where Engineer A has been allowed to sit in judgment upon Engineer B's plans, and Engineer B has been allowed to approve the plans of Engineer A in some other county. What on earth is the reason for pressing forward this Bill? I am astonished that the Law Officers of the Crown have refrained from giving us their opinion upon it.

It being midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

MOTION.

REGISTRATION OF FIRMS BILL.

On Motion of Sir Albert Rollit, Bill for the Registration of Firms, ordered to be brought in by Sir Albert Rollit and Mr. Byron Reed.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 164.]

House adjourned at five minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 23rd January, 1891.

SAT FIRST.

The Lord Southampton after the death of his father.

METROPOLITAN HOSPITALS, &c.

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to continue the inquiry with regard to all hospitals and provident and other public dispensaries and charitable institutions within the Metropolitan area for the care and treatment of the sick poor which possess real property or invested personal property, in the nature of endowment, of a permanent or temporary nature; and to receive, if the Committee think fit, evidence tendered by the authorities of voluntary institutions for like purposes, or with their consent, in relation to such institutions, and further, to continue the inquiry as to what amount of accommodation for the sick is provided by rate, and as to the management thereof, and to report to the House; and that the witnesses before the said Select Committee be examined on oath."—(The Lord Sandhurst.)

Motion agreed to.

Then the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

L. Abp. of Canterbury.	L. Saye and Sele.
E. Calogan (L. Privy Seal.)	L. Clifford of Chudleigh.
E. Winchelsea and Nottingham.	L. Sandhurst.
E. Lauderdale.	L. Fermanagh. (E. Erne.)
E. Spencer.	L. Lamington.
E. Cathcart.	L. Sudley (E. Arran.)
E. Kimberley.	L. Monkswell.
L. Zouche of Haryngworth.	L. Thring.

The Committee to meet on Monday next at Twelve o'clock; and to appoint their own Chairman.

CHILDREN'S LIFE INSURANCE
BILL—[H.L.]

Select Committee on: The Lords following were named of the Committee:

L. Chancellor.	L. Ker. (M. Lothian.)
E. Derby.	L. Poltimore.
E. Spencer.	L. Brougham and Vaux.
E. Harrowby.	L. Kinnaird.
E. Beauchamp.	L. Norton.
E. Selborne.	L. Herschell.
L. Bp. Peterborough.	L. Thring.
L. Bp. Ripon.
L. Clifford of Chudleigh.

The Committee to appoint their own Chairman.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 23rd January, 1891.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

THE CRIMES ACT (IRELAND).

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to give notice, on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), that on this day four weeks he will call attention to the administration of the Crimes Act (Ireland) and will move a Resolution.

QUESTIONS.

EVICTIONS UNDER THE MIDLAND
RAILWAY ACT, 1890.

MR. THOMAS HENRY BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Midland Railway Company have laid before him any scheme for rehousing of the working class population at Somers Town, evicted, or in course of eviction (to the number of 2,300), under "The Midland Railway Act, 1890;" and, if so, whether he will supply particulars of such scheme to the Vestry of St. Pancras, representing the public in the locality, and whether he will take care that the Company, in acquiring the property with vacant possession, do not evade the obligation imposed on them by Parliament of erecting as many new working class dwellings in the locality as the number of like dwellings pulled down for railway traffic requirements?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have not yet received such a scheme, but I am informed by the directors of the Company that they have given instructions for the preparation of a scheme in accordance with the 33rd section of the Act quoted, which will in due course be submitted for my approval. The intervention of the Local Authority is not contemplated by the Statute, but I shall be happy to receive any observations from the Vestry which they may think material. I have no reason whatever to believe that the Company intend to evade their obligations, and the hon. Member may rest assured that the duties imposed on me by Statute will not be disregarded; but I may point out that the Statute does not make obligatory the erection of the same number of dwellings as are pulled down. The number of dwellings to be erected is governed by various considerations mentioned in the Statute.

SINGLE POST LETTERS BY RAILWAY.

MR. THOMAS HENRY BOLTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in connection with the conveyance of single post letters by railway, he will permit stationmasters (on request) to arrange for messengers to carry the letters from the stations of address to the parties to whom such letters are addressed, provided such letters have on them a memorandum that they are "to be forwarded by messenger?"

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that all the arrangements with respect to the conveyance of single letters by railway have received most careful and protracted consideration, and it would not be possible to alter them without reopening the negotiations with the Railway Companies, which have already occupied much time. It will, I think, be best to give the experiment as now arranged a fair trial before attempting to develop it further.

THE SCOTCH RAILWAY STRIKE.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a recent decision—

"That the Act of 1854 compelling Railway Companies, whether it paid them or not, within reasonable limits, to afford facilities for the conveyance of all classes of traffic;"

and whether, in view of the entire suspension for some time past of certain services in Scotland, which has entailed enormous losses on traders, he has taken steps to enforce on the Railway Companies their statutory obligations?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to a newspaper report of the decision of the Railway Commissioners to which the hon. Member refers. Parliament has not given the Board of Trade any statutory authority to intervene in the manner suggested in the question, which is one to be decided—as the case referred to was—by the proper legal tribunal, at the instance of those interested in the matter.

Mr. Matthews

GOVERNMENT ASSISTED EDUCATION BILL.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he can inform the House on what day he proposes to introduce the Government Assisted Education Bill?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DIKE, Kent, Dartford): In answer to the question of my hon. Friend, as the Assisted Education Bill involves financial considerations affecting the Budget, it will not be introduced before the Financial Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been made.

TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANK BILL.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will introduce the Trustee Savings Bank Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I should not like to pledge myself to any particular day, but I am almost ready with the Bill, and I hope shortly to be able to introduce it.

IRELAND—DISTRESS IN TUAM AND GLANAMADDY.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to resolutions by the Tuam and the Glanamaddy Boards of Guardians pointing out the want of employment and the consequent distress to be apprehended from the shortness of last year's potato crop in those districts; and if he will soon institute in these districts local works of the character described in the Relief of Distress Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I must ask the hon. and gallant Member to defer the question. I have called for a Report.

COLONEL NOLAN: I will repeat the question on Monday next.

TORY ISLAND — TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a continuous service on the land telegraphic railway lines has been, or will be, established in connection with the continuous or 24-hour service of "Lloyds," between the lighthouses on Tory Island and the mainland of Ireland, in protection of shipping, life, and property; and, if not, would he explain what are the impediments?

*MR. RAIKES: As the hon. Baronet is aware, the cable provided by "Lloyds" between Tory Island and the mainland is connected with the sub-post office at Dunfanaghy, which is open for public telegraphic business between the usual hours of 8 a.m. and 8 p.m. The Committee of Lloyds pay the Post Office for working the cable during those hours, and the Department has offered to work it during the night on certain terms which are now under the consideration of the Committee. The Committee have also been informed that it has been arranged to place Dunfanaghy in direct communication with the Post Office at Londonderry, and that the latter office will be kept open continuously.

THE LATE DUKE OF BEDFORD.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is truly stated in the London Press that a Coroner's inquiry was held relating to the death of the late Duke of Bedford; whether it is the custom to give notice to the police of the holding of a Coroner's inquiry, and if such notice was given in this case; whether it is the custom to make out a list of the inquests which are about to be held, to allow the representatives of the Press to inspect such list at the Coroner's Office, and whether the case of the Duke of Bedford was omitted from any such list, although other cases were included in it; and whether the Home Office will obtain full information from the Coroner as to the causes which have led to this case being treated differently from ordinary cases, and as to the secret nature of the inquiry?

MR. MORTON (Peterborough) had also the following question on the Paper: To ask the Secretary of State whether his attention has been drawn to the statements in the Press as to the absence of the public and the reporters from the inquest on the body of the late Duke of Bedford; whether the District Coroner was within his legal right in conducting the inquest in private, and without the usual notices; and, if so, whether any such right has been exercised in recent times; and whether he will consider the desirability of making such procedure in private illegal in future, in view of the practice of cremation, which destroys the evidence of the cause of death?

MR. MATTHEWS: I will answer this question and that of the hon. Member for Peterborough at the same time. I am informed by the Coroner that an inquest was held, that notice was given to the police, and that an Inspector of Police was present. It is customary, though not obligatory, for the Coroner to place a list of inquests (not always a complete list) in his outer office. The Coroner gave no directions to omit the case of the Duke of Bedford from the list, and, as a matter of fact, the case was included in the list. No difference whatever from the usual practice was made in the treatment of this case, and the Coroner reports to me that the family of the deceased were informed that this was an open inquiry in a Public Court, which anyone might attend. The Coroner knows no reason why the public and reporters were absent. They were not excluded at his instance. As the Coroner did not conduct this inquest in private, the question as to his legal right does not arise.

MR. COBB: I should like to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that in the same paper containing the short paragraph announcing, six days late, that there had been an inquest, there was a full report of an inquest held before the same Coroner on the widow of a sculptor, and also before another Coroner of an inquest, also held the previous day, on a sign painter, who likewise committed suicide; whether he can find out or can account in any way for the difference made between the cases of these comparatively humble individuals and the case of the late Duke of Bedford? I also wish to ask whether the Coroner means to allege that, the Press having had full information of the inquest in the usual manner, no reporters attended it?

MR. MATTHEWS: I can only answer at this moment the last part of the hon. Member's long question. I understand the Coroner's information to amount to this—that the Press had the usual means of information in the list. If they did not choose to avail themselves of it, it was not the Coroner's fault.

THE IRISH MAILS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with reference to the question of a mail service by the Larne and Stranraer route, and the suggestions laid before him by a deputation from Ulster last June, whether he will now state what offer has been made by the companies concerned, and at what decision, if any, he has arrived; and whether he will lay upon the Table a Copy of the Correspondence and a Return showing how often and to what extent the mails to Belfast and the North of Ireland were delivered late during the half year ended the 31st ultimo?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that it is only within the last few days that I have been able to procure full information as to the relative advantages and cost of the Larne and Holyhead routes. I have arranged to receive next week a deputation from the Corporation of Londonderry on the subject, and, as the hon. Gentleman will see, I cannot come to any conclusion until after the deputation have stated their views. I hope, however, to be able to place my views before the Treasury as soon as I have been able to consider any suggestions which the deputation may make. It is not customary to lay on the Table correspondence relating to a matter which is still receiving consideration.

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR).

MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars, &c.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has yet received any answer from the Railway Association to his letter written to them about two months ago in reference to the long hours worked by railway servants?

Mr. Cobb

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir; I have received a reply, and I propose to lay the Papers upon the Table at once.

THE CROFTERS' COMMISSION.

MR. PROVAND: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate when the next Report of the Crofters' Commission will be laid upon the Table?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The Commissioners are now at work on their Report, but some weeks must elapse before it can be laid on the Table of the House.

THE EASTERN HOSPITAL AT HOMERTON.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the President of the [Local Government Board whether inquiry has been made, as requested in November last by the Hackney Guardians, into serious allegations proposed against the management of the Eastern Hospital at Homerton; and, if so, by whom, in what manner, and with what result?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): In November last the Local Government Board received a statement containing serious allegations as regards the management of the Eastern Hospital of the Metropolitan Asylum Board at Homerton. The Board furnished the managers with a copy and asked for their observations. A further statement was received from the Guardians of the Hackney Union, on the 6th December, and that also was communicated to the managers. The Board not having received the reply of the managers, wrote to them on the 16th January, drawing attention to the communication referred to, and asking for their observations as early as possible. I understand that the Eastern Hospital Committee have had the subject under their consideration, and that they will submit a Report to the managers to-morrow.

THE LAND PURCHASE ACTS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the Returns ordered 28th November, 1890, of applications from purchasers under Land Purchase

Acts, for variations in terms of purchase, and on 5th December, respecting default of instalments under Land Purchase Acts, will be distributed?

MR. MADDEN: The Irish Land Commission have been requested to state on what date the Return ordered on the 28th of November may be expected. With regard to the Return ordered on the 5th of December, I may say that it was received yesterday.

PORTUGAL AND SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what information Her Majesty's Government have received regarding the collision between certain Portuguese officers and certain representatives of the British South Africa Company in Manica Land, South East Africa; and whether he can make any statement regarding the progress of the negotiations which have been carried on with the Portuguese Government on the subject of the area of Portuguese influence in East Africa?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government have received information of certain places having been taken and re-taken by Portuguese officers and by representatives of the South Africa Company. The merits of the cases have not yet been ascertained, because they depend partly upon geographical facts. The Governor and the Premier of the Cape Colony are on their way to this country to confer with Her Majesty's Government. Negotiations with Portugal on the subject of the area of British and Portuguese influence are not terminated. In the meantime both Governments have enjoined upon their subjects the observance of the status quo founded on the limits under the late unratified Convention.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): When does the modus vivendi cease?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is still existing.

DR. CLARK: For how long will it last—for six months?

[No answer was returned.]

THE BEHRING SEA FISHERIES.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any information regarding the present position of the negotiations between Her Majesty and the Government of the United States of America regarding the seal fisheries in Behring Sea; whether, in particular, he can state what is the nature of the proceedings reported to have been recently taken in the Supreme Court of the United States in connection with the seizure of a sealing vessel which was sailing under the British flag; and when it is intended to present to Parliament Papers relating to this subject?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Negotiations regarding the seal fisheries in the North Pacific Ocean are proceeding in ordinary diplomatic course. A long Note was addressed by the United States Government to Her Majesty's Minister at Washington on the 17th December, to which a reply has not yet been made. The proceedings taken in the Supreme Court of the United States are a motion for a writ of prohibition to the District Court of Alaska in respect of alleged excess of jurisdiction by that Court in condemning a Canadian vessel which was engaged in seal fishery in the open sea. That application has not yet been heard. This course was taken at the instance of the Canadian Government with the approval of Her Majesty's Government and upon the advice of American lawyers. Its object is to bring the case before the highest tribunal in the United States in the fullest manner. It is desirable to point out that in this course there is no interference in any sense with the diplomatic question. Diplomatic negotiations have reference to a wrong which we say has been committed against International Law, and can only be redressed by diplomacy. The legal proceedings, on the other hand, before the Supreme Court, have reference to a wrong committed, as we believe, on British subjects against the Municipal Law of the United States; and redress for that wrong can only be maintained, at least in the first instance, from the Supreme Tribunal of the United States. At present I am unable to say anything as to the presentation of further Papers.

MR. BRYCE: When does the right hon. Gentleman think that any Papers bearing on the question of the application to the Supreme Court will be presented?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Gentleman will see that as the application has not yet been heard it is impossible to make any promise about it.

YIELD OF CROPS IN INDIA.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether a reply has been received from the Government of India to the suggestion made to them by the Secretary of State for India that a table showing the average yield of the principal crops in the various districts should be prepared?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (SIR J. GORST, Chatham): No, Sir; no reply has yet been received.

SKATING IN HYDE PARK.

MR. KEAY: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is aware that a person, said to be the chair contractor for Hyde Park, is using the chairs as a barrier whereby he has enclosed part of the surface of the Serpentine, and is charging 6d. to each person for admission thereto for the purpose of skating, and is exhibiting a printed notice with the heading "Authorised Skating Enclosure," and stating that the above charge is levied upon each person; and whether he will state under whose authority a private person is thus railing off and charging for the use of any part of one of the public parks?

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I am afraid that the question of the hon. Member has now only an historical interest, but, for the hon. Member's information, I may state that the matter complained of by him was done under my authority. I was informed from various quarters, through the Press and otherwise, that the fine sheets of water in Hyde Park and the other Royal Parks in London were greatly injured for skating purposes for want of being properly cleaned. It would cost a great deal of money—between £100 and £200 a day—to keep them properly cleaned, and, unfortunately, I had no funds applicable for the purpose. I thought I would try the experiment of how far the public would approve of having a small part of the ice railed off by chairs for those persons who were willing to pay for having it swept. There was only an acre and a half out of the 35 acres of the Serpentine so taken. No sooner had I made arrangements to try my great experiment than the thaw set in! but as far as it went I have reason to believe that it was rather popular, and, as long as it lasted, it had the advantage of giving a certain amount of employment.

INTIMIDATION AT PLYMOUTH— "REGINA V. CURRAN AND OTHERS."

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he will lay upon the Table, as an unopposed Return, a Report of the trial and the Recorder's decision in the case of the appeal of Peter Curran and others against the Magistrate's decision at Plymouth, on the charge of intimidating a coal merchant, with the view of inducing him not to employ non-Union workmen?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Subject to the approval of the Secretary to the Treasury, but so far as the Recorder's Judgment is concerned, I see no reason why, if any general desire is expressed, it should not be printed for the information of Members of the House. I am not aware whether an accurate report of the trial can be obtained, but having regard to the terms of the Judgment, which states all the facts, in all probability a copy of the Judgment would be sufficient for the hon. Member's purpose. I shall be pleased to show him a copy, corrected by the Recorder himself, should he desire to see it.

THE CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether a promise made by a Parliamentary candidate in the course of a Parliamentary Election that he will in future employ only Trades Union workmen when he has previously employed non-Unionists is contrary to the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Upon the facts stated in the question, and assuming that the promise was made in order to influence voters, I am of opinion that such promise is contrary to the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I wish to ask the Attorney General whether he is prepared, on any day, to furnish an answer to every general or abstract question put by any Member of the House, or are we to consider this as an exceptional occasion?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: My conduct in the past is, of course, in the recollection of the House. I am not aware of any case in which an hon. Member has put a question on an assumed state of facts in which I have declined to give him my opinion.

MR. JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street): May I ask whether the Attorney General has taken any steps to make himself acquainted as to whether any such promise was ever given?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I have absolutely no knowledge of the matter except what appears on the Paper. If the hon. Member had kindly listened to my answer he would have heard that I said distinctly "upon the assumption of the facts stated in the question."

MR. COBB: May I ask the Attorney General whether the assumption that the promise was made with the view of influencing voters is not the main reason for the answer he has given?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Member has entirely misunderstood my answer. If he were as well acquainted with the Corrupt Practices Act as I am obliged to be, he would remember that in order to constitute a corrupt practice there must be something which will influence voters. I made no assumption of my own. I used the words "assuming that the promise was made in order to influence voters," which is the condition laid down by the Statute constituting the offence. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite know that the Election Judge, if any such question were raised, would have to try that question, and to find it as a question of fact. Therefore I was bound to make the assumption.

LABOURERS' ALLOTMENTS.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkington): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the statement that in a communication from the Commissioners of Woods and Forests the people of Billingham were informed that Sir Nigel Kingscote as

"At present advised would not be disposed to grant to labourers allotments which, either in themselves or with other allotments now held by them, would exceed half an acre,

whilst, under the Allotments Acts of 1882 and 1887, Charity Trustees and Sanitary Authorities may be called upon to provide allotments of an acre; and whether it is in the power of any department to evade the intention of the law by declaring that where the land in a particular district is under the control of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests the labourers shall have only half an acre each instead of the acre they might have demanded had the ownership been invested in Charity Trustees or private individuals?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question until Monday. I have not yet had time to make inquiry.

THE TITHE RENT-CHARGE COMMISSION.

MR. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I wish to put a question to the First Lord of the Treasury of which I have given him private notice. I wish to know when the proposed Commission on Tithe Rent-Charge Redemption will be nominated, the names of the Commissioners, and the terms of Reference? I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Bill is to be taken on Monday.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The question is not one which refers to the points raised by the Bill. I hope that it will be in the power of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade to state the terms of the Reference and the names of the Commissioners in a few days.

THE RAILWAY STRIKE IN SCOTLAND.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I wish to ask the President of the Board of Trade a question of which I have not given him notice, namely, whether he has received any information as to the present condition of the disputes in Scotland between the Railway Companies and their servants?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: A great deal of information which may or may not be true on the subject of the dispute between the Scotch Railway Companies and their servants has appeared in the public Press, but I have received no official information in reference to the matter.

ARMY (RIFLES).

Address for—

"Return giving—1. A comparative statement of the number and names of the various parts of the Martini-Henry and New Magazine Rifles, and the number of processes necessary in the manufacture of each several part; 2. A comparative statement of the number of workmen and the number of hours work required to turn out 1,000 rifles in the case of the Martini-Henry and New Magazine Rifles; 3. The number and particulars of the patents taken out by Mr. Speed in connection with processes of the manufacture of the New Magazine Rifle, or with its parts, and the amount of the royalty payable to him in respect of each several patent."—(Mr. Marjoribanks.)

MOTIONS.

AGRICULTURAL TENANTS' IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Seale-Hayne, Bill to compensate Agricultural Tenants for improvements, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Seale-Hayne, Mr. Channing, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Thomas Ellis, Sir Bernhard Samuelson, and Mr. Halley Stewart.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 166.]

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Seale-Hayne, Bill to amend the Law in regard to the appointment, qualification, and removal of Justices of the Peace, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Seale-Hayne, Mr. Bernard Coleridge, Mr. Howell, Mr. Stuart Rendel, Mr. Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Arthur Williams, and Sir Walter Foster.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 167.]

RAILWAY SERVANTS (TENURE OF HOUSES AND HOURS OF LABOUR) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Crawford, Bill to make provision with regard to the Tenure of Houses owned by Railway Companies, and occupied by their servants, and to confer on the Board of Trade certain powers of regulating the Hours of Labour of Railway Servants, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Crawford, Mr. Arthur Acland, Mr. Sydney Buxton, Mr. Channing, and Mr. Philipps.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 168.]

VOTERS' SUCCESSIVE OCCUPATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. James Stuart, Bill to provide for the Registration of Voters for Successive Occupation in the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Stuart, Mr. Causton, Mr. James Rowlands, Mr. Cremer, Mr. Howell, and Mr. Pickersgill.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 169.]

OCCUPIERS AND LODGERS (METROPOLIS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. James Stuart, Bill to provide for the registration of Occupiers and Lodgers in the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Stuart, Mr. Causton, Mr. Howell, Mr. Cremer, Mr. James Rowlands, and Mr. Pickersgill.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 170.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR).

*(4.5.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): When I put upon the Paper the Resolution I am about to move, I was not prepared for the wonderful object lesson which has since been afforded by the great railway strike in Scotland, and which gives a forcible illustration of the necessity of asking the House of Commons to assent to a proposition something like that which I lay before it to-day. The motive for putting the Motion upon the Paper was contained in the words of one of the Board of Trades' Inspectors last autumn. At that time Major Marindin, one of the Inspectors of the Board of Trade, reporting upon a fatal accident on the South Western Railway, in which a driver and a fireman had failed to observe a signal, had said—

"It is not difficult to account for the conduct of these men, who, I feel convinced, must have been asleep, or nearly so, upon the engine, for they had at the time been on duty for nearly 16½ hours. It hardly needed this accident to show the enormous risk which attaches to the employment of drivers for these inordinately long hours, for it has often been pointed out in previous similar cases, and apart from this, it should be patent to all that there is a limit to human endurance, and that a driver cannot be considered to be in a fit and proper state to perform his very responsible duties after working for such a length of time."

At that time also we were expecting the Returns of overtime work during the months of September, 1889, and March, 1890; and that Return has since been issued. Whilst my action was entirely independent of the struggle between the employers of labour and those they employ north of the Tweed, still that struggle affords a remarkable illustration of the real position of the workers on the railways, particularly as it affects the safety of the travelling public. The struggle illustrates the nature of the services that railway men render to the community, the impotence of Trade Unions to effect a prompt and satisfactory settlement, and the duty of the State to see that railways are worked reasonably in order to obviate serious danger and enormous inconvenience to the public. The House has a right to know the facts, and to deal with these questions as well as the general question which I propose to bring before it. I may say, at the outset, that so far as my immediate object is concerned, I desire it to be understood that I am not advocating a statutory limitation of the hours of railway workmen. I wish rather to obtain, indirectly, the relief of railway workmen from those excessive hours which Directors feel are unjust, by a reasonable extension of the powers of the Board of Trade to enable them to make the conditions of railway work compatible with the interests of the public and of the men themselves. The figures in the Return for the months of September, 1889, and March, 1890, prove that excessive hours of labour are not an abnormal incident, but that they are part of a system; in fact, that the railway lines are undermanned, and this involves the constant recurrence to overtime work which produces the astounding figures we have in the Return. Now, it must be noted that the Returns are not for anything like the period the men demand. Railway men have asked, again and again, for a ten hours day for drivers, and for an eight hours day for signalmen; but this is a Return of overtime worked beyond 12 hours a day; and if 10 hours had been taken as a normal day the figures would have been still more astounding. Taking the 12 chief English and Welsh lines, and the Caledonian and North British lines, the total number of men employed is 55,278. Of these 33,179 worked over 12 hours in September, 1889. This is a proportion of three to five. Of drivers and firemen, 22,592 worked over 12 hours; the number of instances in which they did so was 219,791; and this is at the rate of about 10 per man, or once in every three days. The number of instances in which men worked 15 hours and over was 69,825, or more than three per man. The number of instances in which the men worked 18 hours and over was 7,341, or one in every three. The case of goods guards is nearly as bad, and, indeed, on some lines it is worse. There is another column in the Return which deals with the case of men who, after having worked for over 12 hours, have been called on to return to work without having had an interval of at least eight hours' rest. The cases in which the men have been called upon to return to work without an interval of eight hours were 4,366 in England, and 327 in Scotland. As compared with 1887-88 these figures show a slight diminution in England, and an enormous increase on the Scotch lines, to which I have referred. The Return does not give the cases of men who returned at short intervals after working, say, 11½ hours; and in many cases in which men had worked about 12 hours they may be called upon to resume work after two or three hours' rest, and of these there is no record. On some of the minor railways the figures are still worse. The goods guards, engine drivers, and firemen, and, in some instances, signalmen also, were employed over 12 hours in both months of the Return on the Great Eastern and Midland Railways, the Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway, the Rhondda and Swansea Bay Railway, the North Staffordshire Railway, the Colne Valley Line, the Neath and Brecon, the Hull and Barnsley, the Furness Railway, the Cleator and Workington Junction Railway, and the Brecon and Merthyr Line. The minor lines in Scotland contrast favourably with those in England and Wales. The resumption of work after insufficient rest is also abnormally frequent. On the Eastern and Midland the cases were over 57 per cent., on the Rhymney 77 per cent., and on the Wrexham and Mold 76 per cent. Some of the longer railways do not come out much better. For instance, the cases on the Brighton line were 52 per cent., on the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire 55 per cent., and on the South-Eastern 52 per cent.

For all-round overtime the Lancashire and Yorkshire Return was the most discreditable. I am glad to compliment the South-Western, which has made nearly a clean sweep of overtime, and the North-Western has made a considerable reduction in the number of cases of excessive hours over 15 and 18, and of resumption of work without sufficient rest. The Caledonian Returns compare favourably with those of two years ago, as regards long hours over 18 and 15, but I cannot say the same with regard to the North British, whose Returns are deplorable and discreditable. Their Returns show a marked increase in the number of men employed over 12, over 15, and over 18 hours. It is notorious that matters are worse now. Since the opening of the Forth Bridge there has been an enormous increase of labour and strain put upon the staff of the North British Railway Company. It is equally notorious that that company has made no effort to increase its staff so as to meet the strain adequately, and there has consequently been a large increase of overtime labour. The Return shows that in regard to engine drivers working for 18 hours and upwards, as compared with the Return for 1887-8, the increase was from 554 in September, 1887, to 927 hours in September, 1889, and from 514 in March, 1888, to 1,016 in March, 1890. This increase of overtime work on the North British goes very far to justify the present strike of the railway servants, who have been provoked to revolt against what I must call a form of white slavery. The cases of overtime among signalmen, shunters, and platelayers are not so numerous, but such cases do occur. One case has been mentioned to me of a signalman on the Great Western having been on duty 10 hours, and then going on duty at the end of that time for 10 hours more as fog signaller. Besides the hours these men have to work, many of them have to walk long distances between their homes and the places where they carry on their duties. On parts of the North-Western line they are practically 14 hours away from their homes on a 12 hours' shift. The case of shunters is also a case which deserves consideration from the right hon. Gentleman and the House. There have been for years a great number of fatalities among shunters, and these are largely owing to the stupefying and exhausting effects of long hours of labour. The Report of the Royal Commission of 1877 stated that in the opinion of the Commissioners—

Mr. Channing

"If, in any action, civil or criminal, in which the proof of negligence on the part of a railway company is essential, the mere fact that a servant whose act or neglect was in question had been at his duty for an excessive period were itself accepted as prima facie evidence of such negligence, the general motives to regularity would be strengthened."

As an instance of the hours worked on the North British Railway I may refer to the case of a driver who between April and December, 1890, worked in successive fortnights from 152 to 203 hours, which is from 14 to 20 hours a working day. These facts are simply appalling, and quite unjustifiable. Some of the facts proved before the Royal Commission in 1876 were quite as startling. A goods guard on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway worked 248 hours in a fortnight, and days as long as 23, 27, and even 34 hours were worked on the Great Eastern Railway Company, while a driver on the North British Railway worked 108 hours in six days, leaving only an average of six hours a day for rest. A witness was asked whether there was no limitation of time by the rules of the company. He replied that no man ought to go on duty again until he had had eight hours' rest, but he admitted that in the instance just given the rule had been broken almost every day. According to Mr. Galt, of the 16 classified causes of railway accidents, excessive hours of labour is the most easily preventable. Mr. Findlay, of the London and North Western, admitted that 10 hours a day was enough for a working day; and Sir James Allport, of the Midland, stated that the conditions of railway work constituted a tremendous strain both upon drivers and signalmen. He stated in 1876 that drivers and signalmen had often to keep in their minds the relative positions of three or four trains and signals at the same moment. If that was so in 1876, any one acquainted with railways would know how much the difficulties of working them had increased since then. I think any hunting man in the House would infinitely prefer taking a young horse over the stiffest of unknown countries to taking an express engine down from Euston to Perth with only the few days' coaching which some of the "blacklegs" had had, who had been trusted to drive engines within the last few weeks. They have had to undertake most responsible duties without the slightest knowledge of the signals, and only a general knowledge of the engines they have to drive. There have been several lamentable accidents on the Scotch lines during the strike, and a great risk of many more. I think the travelling public are much indebted for their safety to the admirable skill, patience, and loyalty with which the men have carried on their duties. Attention has been repeatedly drawn to the question of excessive hours by the Inspectors of the Board of Trade. In his Report on an accident at Wortley East Junction, on the Great Northern Railway, by which 35 persons were injured on the 29th of December, Major Marindin said—

"The driver and fireman of the Great Northern engine had at the time of the collision been on duty 18½ hours, which is far longer than any driver should be allowed to work either for his own sake or that of the travelling public. It is true that these hours were, owing to the fog, abnormal, but even his regular hours, 13, are too long."

In the last few days a large number of these Reports have been issued, in which similar comments are made on the long hours of railway servants. General Hutchinson, reporting upon a collision near East Croydon on the Brighton Line, on December 10, where 18 passengers were injured, calls attention to the fact that the booked hours of four of the servants concerned in the collision (from 12 to 14½) are objectionably long, and are liable to be constantly exceeded. Two Reports of Major Marindin show how the Companies neglect repeated recommendations. A collision occurred at Preston in July, 1889, on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, and in that case he reported that the hours worked by the driver were a great deal too long, and added, "No man can keep his attention up, so as to be an efficient driver, for a period of 15 hours." In a case at York, two months later, in which 13 people were injured, the driver had been on duty for 15½ hours. Major Marindin urged that—

"In the last accident upon the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway, which I investigated, I had to call attention to the excessive hours of duty of a driver, who had been on duty over 15 hours; and as such long hours are neither fair to the men, nor safe for the travelling public, it is high time they were put a stop to."

You will find that many of the Reports show that the signal men or drivers have only been on duty for four or five hours when an accident occurred. That means that the men were exhausted before they commenced work by previous overwork. It is said that men are anxious to take overtime, and no doubt that is, in some cases, true. A case has occurred of a man volunteering after 12 hours' signal duty, to go on for 12 hours more, in order to relieve a comrade whose child had died. Three or four hours later an accident occurred, and the signalman was blamed for it. What we complain of is that when recommendations have, in a great number of instances, been made by the Board of Trade, there has been no real recognition of those recommendations. On nearly all the great railways of the country it is still the practice of the companies to book men on or book men off, for a period of time which the Railway Companies know perfectly well by their experience will be exceeded by two or three or four or five or six hours. This is going on all over the country, and I venture to condemn those concerned in railway management, expressly on the ground that by booking men for hours, which they know will be exceeded, they are causing great risks to the public, and are earning their dividends by saving the wages of the few extra men who ought to be employed, if the lines were worked on a system tolerable to human nature. And the Returns for one month show that there were no less than 70,000 such instances of over 15 hours consecutive work. There is one case to which I draw attention, and which led to a correspondence between the Board of Trade and the Brighton Railway Company. Two years ago an unfortunate man was employed in fog-signalling on that Company's line. He was nearly 60 years of age, and had been long in the service of the Company. He was engaged in fog-signalling for no less than 21½ hours out of the 24. This was on the last day of 1888, in bitterly cold and foggy weather. He had six hours' rest, was then put on again, and two hours later was cut down by a passing train. The Board of Trade most properly drew the attention of the Company to this fatality. Mr. Sarle, in reply, said the men were willing to undertake the work, and it was difficult to obtain men of adequate knowledge for such responsible and difficult work as that of fog-signalling in crowded parts of the line near the Metropolis. The Secretary to the Board of Trade made a very proper reply to Mr. Sarle.

"There could be no doubt that the hours during which the man was on duty were excessive, and the Board of Trade admitted the difficulty of conducting the traffic during the prevalence of dense fogs. He pointed out, however, that such a condition of the atmosphere was now so common that it should be provided against by a permanent increase in the staff of Railway Companies rather than by exceptional overtime."

He added—

"That an excessive desire on the part of the railway servants to increase their earnings should not be indulged in so as to become a source of danger either to themselves or to the public."

The remedy there laid down is exactly what I ask the Board of Trade to take powers to apply to night. I say it is a shame that the companies should not train more engine-drivers, firemen, fog-signalmen, and other railway servants, with the object of preventing this undue strain on their staff. I would next urge that the men have put forward their demands for shorter hours in a reasonable way. The President of the Board of Trade may remember, though he was not in Office at the time, that one of the first actions of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants 15 years ago was to lay before the Board of Trade a memorial in which they ascribed many accidents to excessive hours and insufficient staffs. They suggested that the Board of Trade should take power to direct the Companies to adopt safer modes of working their lines. This I am heartily glad to be able to thank the President of the Board of Trade for having done the year before last. These men also asked the Board of Trade to make of the Railway Commission a sort of Board of Arbitration or Conciliation for dealing with such disputes as that which is now convulsing Scotland. I do not attach exclusive importance to the wording of the Motion I have laid before the House. On the contrary, if the President of the Board of Trade would agree to set up a Board of Conciliation which might be absolutely impartial in dealing with these questions, I would not oppose that as a solution of the matter till the further question of hours became riper for solution. I wish to point out that these men have not been animated by a desire to make a sudden and malicious pounce on the increased earnings of the companies, but that for the last 20 years they have consistently urged the claim that their hours of labour should be shortened. I do not think it comes well for the Railway Companies to sneer at the men and say the only thing they have in view is to get a few shillings more pay. The men are asking what the Board of Trade have told them repeatedly they ought to have, and what Mr. Findlay, of the North Western Railway Company, told them years ago was the basis of a fair day's work. Their claims are reasonable, and ought to be considered in a reasonable spirit. The North Eastern and the Taff Vale Companies have practically assented to the claims made by the men. It is a striking fact that no one in Scotland has been put forward by the Directors to challenge the men's demands. What the Directors have said is that they will not treat with the Trades' Unions, and that the men must return to work and trust them to treat them with justice. What has occurred in Scotland is simply this: The Scottish lines, and especially the North British, have been carrying out great improvements which are likely to result in an increase of profits to the companies, and they have very largely done so by pinching and starving their staffs and undermanning their lines, thus paying for the improvements at the expense of the men. Deputations of the men have gone to the Directors, and the result has been that the leaders of the deputations have been cashiered on the first pretext. Mr. Galt, in his separate Report as a Royal Commissioner, drew attention to the case of a guard who had given evidence of long hours before the Commission, and who was in consequence turned off his line. I feel that the spirit of tyranny which animated that company in 1876 is the same spirit that is animating the North British Company now, and I shall continue to hold that opinion unless they give some better evidence of being fairer and juster in their treatment of their men. The men have had recourse to their Trades' Union, and have put forward spokesmen who are in an independent position, and cannot, therefore, be interfered with by the Railway Companies. The action of the Company has even roused the indignation of the Solicitor General (Sir E. Clarke), who said recently that the Scottish lines were acting contrary to common sense and the spirit of the times in not recognising the existence of Trades' Unions as representing working men. After that remark of the Solicitor General I do hope that Members on both sides may deal with this question in no Party spirit. The Railway Companies have insisted that their men should act the part of slaves, instead of rational men, who could and would discuss the conditions of labour. The position of the Trades' Unions in this struggle constitutes the strongest argument for saying that, when the shareholders have been fined to the amount of £150,000, and the trading public to an almost incalculable amount, the State should intervene and bring such a state of affairs to an end. Such a strike is a great crime. Who are the criminals? Ask yourselves what is the fundamental question on which the strike has turned. Does any one dispute that the men ought to work 10 hours or less instead of the enormous number of hours they have worked? No representative of the North British or the Caledonian Companies will, I think, stand up in this House and challenge the substantial justice of the men's demands for a reduction of hours. Then the question arises, "Can the companies afford to grant that demand?" The gross receipts for the last year on the principal lines were £75,500,000, as against about £66,000,000 in 1884, so that there has been an increase of about £9,500,000, or 15 per cent. In the first half of the year 1890 the gross increase on the main lines was £1,492,000, and in the second half it was £1,175,000. Twenty-one companies show an increase of £801,000 earned by an increase in working expenses of only £356,000. Thus the extra money has gone largely to reproductive works, and hours and wages have remained the same. I should like to compare the positions of the London and North-Western and Midland lines with those of the Caledonian and North British lines on this point. I find that in 1884 the net revenue of the North-Western and Midland lines was considerably less than the working expenses, whereas on the Caledonian and North British the net revenue was slightly greater in that year than the working expenditure. In 1890 the net revenue of the North Western and Midland lines was still considerably lower than the working expenses, though representing an increase in the profits of those lines, whilst in the case of the Caledonian and North British there was a very considerable surplus of net revenue over working expenses. The amount of wages paid per train mile is an important consideration to bear in mind. On the North Western and Midland the wages per train mile were about 3d. in 1884. In 1890 they had risen to practically 3½d. On the two Scotch lines the wages per train mile were practically 2½d., both in 1884 and 1890. This means that the latter lines—and the same observation applies to some of the English lines—are persistently undermanned. In the days of depression they have starved the staffs, and now that the time of prosperity has come they have not increased the number of their men sufficiently to meet the increase of work, and the greater complication and difficulty of the work. I say there is money enough to do justice to these men, and when it is shown, on good authority, that they ought not to work more than a certain number of hours in a day, and that they have to work, in many instances, 15 or 20 hours a day; some authority ought to be able to say that a system which wears the men out in body and soul should be put an end to. I think it is marvellous that the North British Company should not have considered that it would be wiser to make some fair concession to their men on this question of hours before they arrived at the present condition of affairs. Is it not insensate folly, on the eve of the 20th century, to treat men as if they were children or slaves?

Mr. Channing

What are the two features of the times? Now at last education has gained a hold upon the working classes, and for the first time the working classes have almost universally had power placed in their hands by the Parliamentary vote. Education has, at the same time, enormously multiplied the wants and desires of the working classes, and has enormously diminished the amount of crime. That is a tremendous fact. It means that the wants and desires developed in the new generation, are legitimate aspirations for higher and more refined conditions of life and labour. These facts must lead to a considerable change in the relations of capital and labour. And I say it will be the height of un wisdom in any body of employers, in any political party, and in any Ministry to turn a deaf ear to these demands. The Board of Trade is the protector of the public, and it is the protector of these men. Railways are monopolies granted by the State under strict conditions of service being rendered to the travelling public. The Board of Trade has the responsible duty of seeing that service rightly and properly carried out, and I ask them by my Motion to deal with the question from the point of view of their responsibility in regard to railway safety and to the fair and just carrying out of the State monopoly granted under the supervision, and in some sense under the control, of the Board of Trade. I do not wish to say a word to disparage the administration of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir M. Hicks Beach), the greater part of which I admire, but I think the right hon. Gentleman has incurred grave responsibility in not acting on the provisions of the Railway Regulations Act. It is notorious that every provision relating to the safety of the public—such as those referring to block-signalling, and so forth—has been violated again and again. The Board of Trade has on this point incurred a very serious responsibility, and a vaster responsibility would have rested on them if, during the past few weeks, some ghastly catastrophe had occurred in Scotland. They have had memorials laid before them by Scotch authorities begging them to deal with this question. The Board of Trade now had power to issue orders for the safe working of railways. [Sir M. Hicks

Mr. Channing

BEACH: No.] They could, at any rate, issue orders as to the use of the block system, inter-locking of signals, and things of that kind, and at any time, by using the powers of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1889, they could have brought matters to a head in Scotland. I think the House is entitled to have an answer now to the issues I have raised. What I ask the Board to do is to take power, when evidence has been afforded that these excessive hours are continually being worked on railways, to issue an Order limiting the times at which men can be booked on and off. I would say, for myself, that if a suggestion as to the establishment of a Board of Conciliation were made, I should not be inclined to press the question of State interference too far; but, still, I think that when you have figures as striking as those I have laid before the House, a strong case has been made out for interference of some kind, with the object of bringing the present state of things to a conclusion. I beg to move the Motion that stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the excessive hours of labour imposed on railway servants by the existing arrangements of the Railway Companies of the United Kingdom constitute a grave social injustice, and are a constant source of danger both to the men themselves and to the travelling public; and that it is expedient that the Board of Trade should obtain powers by legislation to issue orders where necessary directing Railway Companies to limit the hours of work of special classes of their servants, or to make such a reasonable increase in any class of their servants, as will obviate the necessity for overtime work,"—(Mr. Channing.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(4.58.) MR. JOHN WILSON (Durham, Mid): I rise to second the Motion of my hon. Friend. I am very thankful that he has put the question forward, and I am only sorry there is not some one in the House of Commons who can speak directly on behalf of the workmen who are employed on the various railways of the country, as it will, I think, be admitted that there are plenty of gentlemen in the House who can speak on behalf of the shareholders of the Railway Companies. My hon. Friend has found himself in strict harmony with a great authority on railways, and one who, while he sits in this House, is at the head of large railway undertakings. I refer to Sir E. Watkin, who has said—

"Railway strikes ought not to be allowed at all, but should be put down with the strong arm of the law or the stronger arm of public opinion."

I might say, by way of interjection, that if those who manage the Scottish Railways had been amenable to public opinion, the strike that has been prevailing there would have been finished ere this. We all acknowledge that public opinion is on the side of the workmen. Public opinion recognises and fully admits that the demands of the workmen in Scotland are reasonable, not only as regards the hours of labour, but in the request made that negotiations should be opened with representatives of the employers, that these should meet the spokesmen acquainted with the work on railways in the various grades, and that in a mutually reasonable and manly way they should together settle the grievances that now exist. It is unnecessary for me or any hon. Member to get up and offer in any way to supplement what has been said by my hon. Friend who moved this Resolution, nor do I think it would be very easy for any hon. Gentleman to minimise my hon. Friend's statement as to the long hours of hard labour these men have to go through; but there is one reference I should like to make to a remark of my hon. Friend, in which he used an expression which we in Trades Unions understand as a technical term—the expression "black-legs," as describing a certain section of workmen, and I noticed that hon. Members on the other side received the expression with indications of disapproval. My hon. Friend was remarking upon the serious danger to those who travel on Scottish railways through the employment of inexperienced hands in the train service, and I infer from the signs of dissent that hon. Gentlemen do not recognise that danger. [Cries of "No, no!"] Then I apologise for my misapprehension, and hon. Gentlemen have no contention with us on the point. We are agreed on both sides; those who represent capital and those who represent labour are agreed that the hours the men work are excessive and unjust. Then, if employers will not enter into negotiations with those who show proper credentials as representing the men, I say there should be some authority—some Board—to step in and say these things shall be settled in a reasonable and amicable manner; and if this were the case, there would be no need for any hon. Gentleman here to interfere in the question. I wish to make myself understood. I approve of the Resolution simply because it does not contain a proposition that legislation should fix the hours of work. If this Resolution contained a legal definition of the hours a man should work in all or any special trades, I should not stand in the position I now occupy. What I recognise in the Motion is a proposition that the Board of Trade should have power to interfere, and I assume that the Board would only exercise that power in cases where employers and employed were not agreed. There would be no occasion to interfere if companies took a course similar to that followed by the North-Eastern, which company, in consultation with their employés, came to an arrangement as to the hours of work at Christmas time. The intervention of the Board would only arise in urgent cases, and there would be no legal fixing of a number of hours. My hon. Friend remarked that the only opposition that could come would be from those who fear a reduction in their dividends. Well, it is the safety of the public and the welfare of thousands of men who work on the railways, and the opportunity of leisure and improvement, on the one side, with the claims of capitalists and demand for dividends on the other; and as in some measure representing the men, I do not hesitate to say which scale ought to kick the beam. This is certain, that railway profits come from the public, and I am quite sure that people will not object to some extra charge in order that the men who work the trains may be employed at reasonable hours and for proper pay. My hon. Friend has stated that there are 248 gentlemen in this House who are interested in railways; and if that be the case, may I offer this rough suggestion: that a man is not a machine, and that he cannot work beyond his strength, and that if a capitalist tries so to work him, then the value of his services will be lessened. For capitalist and worker it is far better that the hours of labour should be reasonable; for if a capitalist strains his powers against the workman, he will lose by the work he gets. These long hours are imposed upon the workmen. There are some who object to the word "imposed," and say the men are not compelled to accept the conditions. Why is there this strike in Scotland? Because the Directors refuse to meet the demand of the men for shorter hours. We know the weapons that are drawn and used in these struggles, and oftentimes the logic of poverty and distress defeats the cause of right. In the present case the weapon upon which employers depend is the cupboard—they hope to starve the men into submission. I speak the voice of labour, and I appeal to every hon. Gentleman who will ere long have to appear on an election platform, where he will say the welfare of the working classes is a cause he has at heart, and I ask him what answer he can return to electors if he assists in imposing further burdens on the railway servants. These men on the Scotch railways are demanding no more than their right. They supply, as my hon. Friend has said, an object lesson for the debate, and all we ask is that such men shall be saved from a cruel and unjust imposition, it having been made clear that their cause is right. It has been said the men are perfectly content to work overtime for extra pay. The strike in Scotland belies that statement. The demand of the men is that a week's work should consist of 60 hours. Will any hon. Gentleman here say that a man on a locomotive with a train, peering into the darkness, anxiously watching the signals, every nerve on the stretch, all his energies taxed, is not long enough employed with a day of ten hours? I think there can be but one opinion upon that. We are trying to step in and save these men from a cruel and scandalous injustice imposed upon them. This Resolution would save us from that contortion of justice so often shown in the verdicts arrived at after fatal railway accidents. A man is kept in a signal box for 14 or 16 hours; or a driver is on duty for 17 or 18 hours; an accident occurs; evidence is taken; the man is indicted, and often a verdict of manslaughter is returned against him. I speak now with all the moderation I can use; but I say it is not the man who should be indicted, but those who force him to work so many hours together upon duties that require all his energy and attention. I have nothing further to say. I take on myself, in the name of railway servants and in the name of large bodies of labourers, to speak as in a united voice. I should hail the time when a Representative of railway servants could stand here and describe to the House the actual situation; but while there is no such direct Representative here, it is incumbent upon us to speak as the advocates of the cause of labour, and thus I second the Motion of my hon. Friend.

Mr. John Wilson

*(5.14.) MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): My hon. Friends the Mover and Secondor have put us under an obligation by the temperate and discriminating manner in which they have introduced this Motion, and for myself I may say that I could not help responding somewhat to the unsophisticated and earnest eloquence with which the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Wilson) put the case before us just now. Both hon. Gentlemen must have felt that a large portion of their case met with a sympathetic echo from this side of the House. I very much regret one expression, however, which fell from the Mover, and which was out of harmony with the general tenour of his speech. The hon. Member used the term "black-leg" in describing a man who sells his labour in the open market and who is in a perfectly legal position. Such language may possibly be excused in the heat and turmoil of a labour contest among excited men; but it ought not to have been used in this House. It is unfair and unjust. Apart from this phrase, I am bound to say I agree with a very large portion of the hon. Member's speech. Of course, he stated the case ex parte, but there are few of us who cannot confirm more or less the facts and testimony he has given. Further, I would say that if it can be proved—and I think it can be abundantly proved—that there are grievances, very serious grievances, from which the men suffer, it is a very unfortunate thing that in the present state of general excitement, in the present state of the labour market, that great employers of labour, and especially great companies, should not forestall these great agitations by meeting the men somewhat with reasonable concessions before matters reach an acute stage. I know that some of the great lines in this country long ago met their men upon these questions equitably and fairly, and that there are now no disputes in England like many of those in Scotland. A very serious responsibility rests on capitalists who allow disputes to reach a stage which makes it difficult for us to justify them. I would go farther, though I may not be altogether supported by Members on this side, and say I could never understand how it is that either single capitalists or a corporation of capitalists should refuse to meet representatives who enjoy the confidence of the men. The great body of working men have not the art or the knowledge which would enable them to put their case in a clear and satisfactory way before their employers. There is also a very considerable danger that any of the men who should take it upon themselves to represent the views of their fellows might involve themselves in personal peril. Therefore, it is not unreasonable to urge that the great employers of labour should put aside some of that prestige which has hitherto attached to them, and receive and consult with in a conciliatory manner the acknowledged envoys of the men. Having made these admissions, I am bound to say that there is one portion of my hon. Friend's speech in which I cannot agree. I am extremely jealous of all cases of interference by outsiders between the capitalist and his men. I feel we are verging upon enormous difficulties when we permit philanthropists to intervene in questions which, after all, are fiscal questions, and can only be solved in accordance with the laws of supply and demand. Labour is only a commodity bought and sold in all the markets of the world, and if you attempt to fix its price by limiting its amount, you must eventually do mischief to the employé and also to the capitalist. This used to be an old-fashioned truth of political economy, to which some of us are still attached. We have consented to legislate for the helpless, and that the Board of Trade should intervene in certain cases, but that is for the protection not of the individual, but of the public. It is only on such grounds that the Board of Trade is justified in interfering. I feel that the less we whet the appetite of the Board of Trade for interfering in the disputes between workmen and masters, the more wisely we shall act. I agree with the observation quoted from the hon. Member for Hythe (Sir E. Watkin), that the one thing needed in all these cases is to let in the floodlight of public opinion upon the conditions on which the workmen are employed, and that must ultimately have its effect. When a Royal Commission sat in 1872, a number of English lines, in accordance with its Report, changed the rules for the employment of their servants, and at this moment the regulations are exceedingly rational and are most satisfactory to the men themselves. I would suggest, as an alternative to Boards of Arbitration—a proposal to which I see all kinds of objections, and which does not commend itself to my judgment—that we should converge public opinion, and bring it to bear on this subject. I would suggest to the Government—otherwise some of us with the views we entertain will not be able to oppose the Resolution of my hon. Friend—that they would do wisely to allow some form of Committee of this House, or Royal Commission, to take evidence, not ex parte, such as the hon. Member for Northamptonshire made use of—

*MR. CHANNING: Returns.

*MR. HOWORTH: No doubt a portion of the statement was founded on Returns, but a large portion of it was from ex parte evidence.

*MR. CHANNING: The whole argument of my speech was based on the Returns of the Board of Trade and the Reports of its Inspectors.

*MR. HOWORTH: Of course, I accept the hon. Member's statement. I was under a misapprehension, for I supposed that a portion of the hon. Member's argument was based upon other than official evidence. In any circumstances, there would be brought before the Commission an amount of evidence such as must necessarily affect the opinions of the large mass of the Railway Directors in this country without endangering a position which this House would not like to see endangered—namely, that trade disputes should be managed by the parties to the dispute rather than by the intervention of this House or any Department of Her Majesty's Government. My right hon. Friend would meet the wishes of many Members of the House if he could see his way to the appointment of such a Royal Commission.

* (5.25.) Mr. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): After the speech we have just heard I desire to say a few words. The substance of the speech of the hon. Member for Salford comes to this: that we should leave a settlement of the difficulties as much as possible to the force of public opinion, or, as he said, we should endeavour to get public opinion to converge as strongly as possible on the parties to these trade disputes, with a view to bring about better arrangements of hours and conditions of employment. Now, I think if there is any course of events which can illustrate the carrying into practice the theory of the hon. Gentleman and the policy he recommends, we find it in relation to the railway strike in Scotland. Though public opinion has been brought to bear upon the dispute in the strongest possible way, yet is there very little effect to show from it. Before dwelling upon that, let me say we have in the Motion of my hon. Friend a statement of grievances, and a remedy suggested. I will not weary the House by referring to any further facts or figures; sufficient have already been given, and we have had the case put strongly, carefully, and eloquently by the hon. Member for Durham in the interest of the men. As soon as the Motion appeared on the Paper we foresaw that the remedy suggested by my hon. Friend would be met by the argument brought forward by the hon. Member for Salford—"Why not leave this to the force of public opinion?" Now, what has been taking place in Scotland during the last four or five weeks? My hon. Friend has pointed out from the Returns how the Scottish Railway Companies, and particularly the North British among the larger companies, show among the worst as regards excessive hours of labour, and he also showed, I think, that this was not an occasional excess, but a continued and persistent imposition of excessive labour upon the men. I have had some acquaintance with this question for the last seven or eight years, and I know that during this time this question of excessive hours of labour on Scottish railways, and particularly upon the North British, has been a continual grievance. Over and over again deputations have come to us from our constituents urging this matter upon our consideration. I and my friends have attended meetings on the subject, and generally our advice has been to the men, "Urge your demands upon the Directors temperately, moderately, firmly, and if they are reasonable men, you are sure to obtain some satisfaction for your demands." Well, the men continued to do this every year, yet they received very little satisfaction. Within the last four or five weeks they have taken the matter into their own hands, and have gone on strike. How have we endeavoured in Scotland to converge public opinion upon this question? Such opinion has been evoked from all kinds of sources, not merely representative of the Unions of the workmen and of Trade Councils, but of other Public Bodies throughout the country. These bodies have summoned special meetings, and have passed resolutions on the subject, and I think I am perfectly within the mark when I say that there has been an absolutely unanimous judgment with regard to the substantial nature of the grievances of these railway men. There has been no hesitation on the part of the general public upon this matter. The public have been furnished not only with Returns presented to this House, but also with statements by the men themselves. They know that the men are compelled to work at least 12 hours a day, and are paid by the fortnight of 144 hours, and that as a result there is a system of continuously working for excessive hours. Now, at Edinburgh we have had at least two large public meetings on the subject. The Town Council have memorialised the Board of Trade upon it, and the Trades Council, which represents the general body of working men, have adopted a similar course. Public meetings have likewise been held in Glasgow, Perth, Aberdeen, Dundee, and Motherwell, and other places where the railway population is large, and all have agreed that the grievances of the men are real and their demands moderate. What is it they ask? First, they asked that which has, I believe, always been conceded on some of the English railways—namely, a 10 hours day. But when they saw they would not probably be able to get that, they made a concession, and through the hon. Member for Haddingtonshire they asked the Directors for a 60 hours week and overtime beyond those hours. The Directors, however, told my hon. Friend that the men must return to their employment before their request could be considered. Then the matter was taken up by the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, and next by the representatives of a large public meeting at Glasgow, but in each case the Directors gave the stereotyped reply that the men must first return to their work. Lastly, as showing the moderation of the men, they secured the intervention of a distinguished and popular nobleman, who is also a Railway Director—Lord Aberdeen—and the Executive of the two large representative Unions of the men passed a resolution setting forth a statement of the men's case and of their demands, and asking him to see the managers of the railway. If he (Lord Aberdeen) were satisfied that the promise of the companies to redress the grievances of the men would be substantially carried out, then the men would accept his simple assurance to that effect, and immediately return to their duties. They put the matter wholly in Lord Aberdeen's hands. Those who have followed up the different phases of this dispute know that a point was made against the railway servants because they left their work without due notice. Well, the men in the resolution they sent to Lord Aberdeen stated it was only fair he should be put in possession of the full facts, and they therefore acknowledged that a grave error was committed in leaving work without legal notice. The men having thus made another conciliatory proposal, what has been the result of putting the matter in Lord Aberdeen's hands? The resolution was conveyed to Lord Aberdeen last Monday, and the answer appears in to day's newspapers. His lordship in that reply says he is highly honoured by the confidence reposed in him, and fully understands the terms submitted. He interpreted the document in a reasonable rather than in a rigid spirit, and he goes on—

Mr. Howorth

"It is with sincere regret that I have to inform you that after negotiations and careful inquiry and consultation, I do not find myself in a position to offer—on the basis of your resolution—the advice which is therein contained."

Thus attempts at mediation have failed. Every one knows that Lord Aberdeen is an eminently suitable man to be chosen to conduct such negotiations as these, and as a result of his intervention we find that the statements made over and over again by the Scotch railway managers to the public, that they are willing to redress the grievances of the men is, in his judgment, not to be relied on, and that they have no real intentions to give substantial satisfaction to the demands of the men. Thus the mere act of converging public opinion on this dispute has had no definite result. The men in urging their claims have shown conspicuous moderation—a conspicuous desire to be conciliatory. They have also given way upon points of form; they have been ready to waive their demand that the Unions should directly negotiate with the Directors; they have agreed to waive all questions of personal dignity, and they have entrusted their case to various public men. Surely if public opinion could have brought about a settlement, it would have done so, for no effort has been spared to secure that end. I therefore think that the case of my hon. Friend in favour of something like direct legislative interference—or at least intervention by a Government Department—is greatly strengthened by this statement of facts. I will only urge one subsidiary argument on the subject. In the course of the past few years railway legislation has been progressive in the direction my hon. Friend desires. The Bill passed two years ago imposed certain duties and restrictions on Railway Companies in the interests of public safety, and we now ask the Board of Trade to go a step further. We want it to be placed in possession of a power to step in, and, in the name and interest of the public, compel the two parties in a dispute such as is now going on in Scotland to come to some amicable and reasonable arrangement. We ask this in the interests not only of the men but of trade generally, for during the past few weeks the trade of Scotland has been paralysed and the safety of the travelling public greatly endangered. We do not desire to limit the discretion of the Board of Trade as to the means by which it shall act upon the Railway Companies. We do not wish to limit its discretion as to the legislation it may see fit to introduce, but we are declaring the existence of a very great grievance for which no substantial remedy is at present provided, and we ask the Government in the interest of the public to provide such a remedy.

*(5.45.) MR. C. T. MURDOCH (Reading): The spirit of the Resolution is one with which I am sure many Members of this House are in accord, but still its terms are not such as can be accepted. We cannot, for instance, admit that the Railway Companies impose excessive hours of labour upon their men, for we contend that where the railway servants work overtime it is generally by reason of circumstances over which the Railway Directors have no control. If the Returns as to overtime which are furnished to the Board of Trade are analysed it will be found that in a great majority of cases in which goods drivers, firemen, and guards have worked over 12 hours has been due to the prevalence of fog or to interruption of traffic by special trains, or to other similar causes. Again, the House should not forget that the hours furnished to the Board of Trade do not represent the actual hours of which the men are at work. Take the case of a goods driver. He goes to the engine shed where his engine is, and finds the fire alight, but he is required to be at the shed at least half an hour before the actual commencement of his work, and that time is counted as part of the time he is at work. There is also half an hour at the end of the journey counted in the time of his run. Again, goods drivers, firemen, and guards always have nine hours' interval before undertaking the return journey, by the rules of the service. Frequently, however, it is found that where a driver living in the country runs a train to London, he prefers to shorten the interval and get home as quickly as possible, and thus it is that the interval is shortened. Again, with regard to signalmen. You will find, from the Returns presented to the Board of Trade, that the instances in which signalmen are kept at work beyond 12 hours are comparatively rare. During the past 18 months three classes of signal boxes have been established on most of the lines. When a signalman's duty is continuous and exacting, it is in an eight hours box; when it is less exacting, it is in a 10 hours box, and in the 12 hours boxes the number of trains dealt with is very small. There are very few signal boxes in which the men do over 12 hours' consecutive duty. I think the hon. Member for Northamptonshire ignored the fact that within the last 12 months a very considerable amount has been added to the working expenses of railways in consequence of the increased wages paid to the men. Again, if he will examine the Returns, he will see that on the great lines there has been a large increase in the number of signalmen as well as of goods guards and firemen. Passenger guards do not work long hours, and it does not necessarily follow that they are at work all the time returned. There is generally an interval between the up and down journeys of the trains of which they have charge, but the interval is always counted in the hours of work. The hon. Member for Northampton seemed to think that the Railway Companies had not taken any notice of the recommendations of the Board of Trade. But let me call attention to a Report made by Colonel Rich with regard to the deplorable accident on the Great Western line at Norton Fitzwarren. That Report showed that the signalman, who was the principal cause of the accident, had only been on duty a short time before it occurred; but it was pointed out that the regulations of the company with regard to shunting had not been complied with. Sir Henry Calcraft, in forwarding the Report to the Great Western Directors, called attention to the cause of the accident, and urged the necessity of providing refuge sidings at all stations where trains were likely to be shunted in order to allow other trains to pass. He also recommended the company to consider whether a simple signalling contrivance suggested by the Inspector could not be advantageously adopted. The Great Western Company almost immediately on the receipt of that Report set aside a considerable sum for making refuge sidings on the section of the line between Bristol and Exeter. They have since also had before them many contrivances whereby when a signalman has once shunted a train temporarily on the main line his attention cannot be withdrawn from the fact it is there. I would also point out, as Colonel Rich remarked in his Report, that on the Great Western Railway there is at the present moment an enormous amount being expended in securing the greater safety of passengers. And other railways in the United Kingdom are adopting a similar policy. Now, we cannot accept the Resolution moved by the Member for Northamptonshire. The terms of it are not at all in accordance with the facts; but I do say this, on behalf of the Railway Companies, that they have not the slightest objection to an inquiry into the working of the lines or into the duties imposed on the men. I think that if such an inquiry did take place it would be found that many of the figures which have been brought before this House by the hon. Member for Northampton will bear explanation, and that the case for the Railway Companies will be considerably better than he has made it. I should like to say one word with regard to the Board of Trade's recent requirements on various railway lines. In accordance with the powers granted under the Act of 1889 Railway Companies have been called upon to provide within a specified time most important alterations in their systems, including locked telegraphs, interlocking signals, continuous brakes, and a reduction in the number of mixed trains—trains partly goods and partially passenger. Seeing that the alterations could not be carried out without a considerable expenditure of time and money, a fixed period has been allowed for the work. The time has not yet expired, but the companies are rapidly pressing forward the changes, and no doubt they will be completed by the time fixed. I regret very much that hon. Members who have taken part in this discussion have not confined their attention to the principal part of the Resolution, but have imported into the debate the question of strikes. This is most unfortunate. The House and the public generally have at heart the interests of railway servants, and I believe that amongst the commercial classes it is felt where unfortunately a strike does take place upon a line, it is far wiser to let the men and the Directors come to an arrangement rather than allow outsiders to interfere. Upon most of the great lines, the relations between the Boards of Directors and their servants are extremely amicable, and only a short time ago a number of Great Western drivers at a meeting passed a resolution expressing a hope that the Directors would negotiate with nobody but their own servants. I am perfectly certain of this: that unless the amicable relations now prevailing are interrupted by outsiders, they will continue, and the public will be infinitely better served. I hope the hon. Member for Northamptonshire will withdraw his Resolution. It will be a great pity if he does not, because the inquiry to which we are quite willing to consent, would have far better results than the adoption of the Resolution.

Mr. Buchanan

*(6.0.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanarkshire, N.E.): The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken has shown an anxiety that the railway strike in Scotland should be eliminated from this discussion. Not only has he deprecated any allusion to it, but he would seem desirous of persuading the House that it is altogether foreign to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Channing). I do not at all complain of the moderate way in which the hon. Member opposite has just presented his own views to the House, but I venture to think that, if he represented, as I have the honour to do, a district in which the strike, and according to our view, the misguided conduct of the Railway Companies has spread misery and disaster among a large industrial population, he would not regard the strike with so much calmness and indifference as he has evinced, but would be glad, as I am sure the House is, to join my hon. Friends on this side of the House in an endeavour to draw from it some light on the subject dealt with by the Motion now under discussion. I am quite sure that the House and, I may add, the country generally look with a good deal of anxiety for the answer Her Majesty's Government are about to give to the demand made by this Motion for some action on the part of the Board of Trade. The case for such intervention has already been put pretty fully before the House by my hon. Friends, and therefore I do not intend to detain the House long on the subject. But I think the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down may fancy that he has partly persuaded the House of the truth of his contention that there is in reality no grievance on the part of the Railway servants, and that the complaints that have been made about the effects of long hours are founded upon no substantial fact. The Mover of the Resolution has adduced statistics from the authentic Returns which have been laid before the House, and I will only supplement the figures by giving a few illustrations of the hours that have been worked by railway employes in my own constituency, and that within the last month. I find that one man, an engine driver, worked 84 hours in six days, or an average of 14 hours per day; another worked an average of nearly 14½ hours; another averaged 13 hours and 50 minutes; another 15 hours and 35 minutes; another 14 hours and 30 minutes; another 14 hours and 10 minutes; and another 15 hours and 6 minutes, I venture to think that these simple figures will be convincing. I could give stronger ones in individual instances, as I have had cases furnished to me in which men have worked for 48 hours out of 60; but I prefer to take the more moderate instances I have given of excessive over-work as average samples, and I maintain that those hours are such as call for some expression of opinion on the part of this House, and for some consideration as to whether a remedy cannot be applied. It has been said in the course of this Debate, that that the Scotch strike is not the result of a genuine demand for shorter hours, but under that cover it is in reality a demand for more money—that the men are willing to work long hours and that all they want is increased pay, I may state that I have been acquainted with this question for many years in my own constituency, and I have no hesitation in giving a most emphatic denial to this cruel aspersion. I say it is cruel, because, when men are found to be working an average of 14 or 15 hours a day for a week, we do not require to look for any greedy or unworthy motive for the demand they make for the shortening of those hours. I think that the common instincts of humanity are sufficient to guide us, without looking for any avaricious motive. I will go further, and say from my own knowledge and experience of these intelligent and respectable men, who stand high in the ranks of the industrial classes, that the motive which actuates them in making this demand is the desire for further opportunities of improving their education, the desire for home life and for increased facilities for communion with their families. Well, the question is, what remedy ought to be applied? The hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Howarth), in his fair and courteous speech, observed that this is not a case for the philanthropist, but that it is one for the influence of public opinion. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) has, I think, shown that every machinery which public opinion could apply has already been brought to bear on the Scotch Railway Directors. It is not to philanthropy that we apply. We appeal to the President of the Board of Trade, not as a philanthropist, but as the representative of a Public Department. We appeal to the right hon. Gentleman as the head of the Board of Trade, and we give intelligible reasons for doing so. The Railway Companies occupy a very exceptional position. They are constituted by Acts of Parliament, and are in the enjoyment of peculiar powers and privileges, which give them practically a monopoly of the traffic of the country. In return for these exclusive privileges, and in the interests of the welfare and safety of the public, we are, I hold, entitled to hold and retain in our hands certain powers of control, and it is on this ground, and on the ground of the semi-public nature of the service which is rendered, that I say my hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire is entitled to ask that the Board of Trade should possess some sort of control over the hours of labour. I for one do not expect too much from the intervention of the Board of Trade; but I do expect something. If the men were free to treat through their unions face to face with their employers, I do not think that any intervention on the part of the Board of Trade would be required. But the employers refuse to recognise the union on a point of punctilio, which is highly unbecoming at a moment when misery and disaster are spreading through the land. Only to-day I received a letter from a respected constituent of mine telling me how the railway strike was causing hunger and destitution in quite a different trade. It is grievous in such a state of things to contemplate the attitude of the directors in refusing to discuss terms with the men. At any rate, whether the men were right or not in making the concession, they showed a spirit of great concession and conciliation in consenting to treat with the employers on any other basis than that of the union. In the long run, I contend, these unions will be found absolutely necessary for the men's protection, and I trust they will never be induced to give them up. If strong unions were established, the men on the one hand and the masters on the other, from the unions I feel assured that we might obtain Boards of Conciliation or Arbitration, which would render the intervention of the Board of Trade unnecessary. But as it is, notwithstanding the clear voice of public opinion, the employers decline to adopt any such course. Even after the large concessions which were offered through Lord Aberdeen they decline to come to terms; and when they take such an attitude we say it would be a good thing if the Board of Trade had power to step in and say, "We cannot tolerate these things any longer; we can no longer allow the employment of the men for these excessive hours to the danger of the public." Such a control would have the effect of making it compulsory on the Companies to treat with the men in a reasonable manner as to the hours of labour. I will not further detain the House, but I have felt impelled to say these few words, because my own constituency is so deeply affected by what is going on; and now that the matter is before them, I trust that we shall receive an answer to-night that may satisfy the reasonable expectations of the public.

Mr. D. Crawford

*(6.12.) THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I propose to engage the attention of the House for a short time only, and I need hardly say not as claiming to speak on behalf of the Government. I desire merely to speak for myself, leaving it to my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade to represent the views which the Government entertain on this subject. But as I happen to be connected as a director with one of the great railways—the London and North Western Railway—incriminated by this Motion, I should like to be permitted to say how the case stands with us in regard to overtime, and I venture to think that if the House will allow me, I shall be able to present the case in a different aspect from that which has been sketched out in the Resolution and painted in the speech of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, and of those hon. Members who have supported his Motion. What I principally complain of in this Resolution is its wide and sweeping character. This is not a Resolution directed against the action of the North British or any other Railway Company of whose action any hon. Member may disapprove; it is directed to the whole of the railway systems of the United Kingdom. It is composed of two parts, the first part insisting that—

"The excessive hours of labour which are imposed on railway servants by the existing arrangements of the Railway Companies of the United Kingdom constitute a grave scandal."

*MR. CHANNING: A grave social injustice.

*MR. PLUNKET: It is printed in the paper as I read it. The second part of the Resolution deals with the allegation that these excessive hours cause great danger to the railway servants and to the public. As to the first of these charges, I will only ask leave to deal with it very briefly. So far as it is a general accusation, it is apparently intended to stir up discord between the Railway Companies and their servants. I hope to show that so far as the great Railway Companies of the country are concerned, they are utterly without foundation. As regards the Railway Company with which I have the honour to be connected, there has never been and there is not now the smallest difference between the Company and its servants. The most cordial relations have always prevailed between them, and I can join cordially in all the praises justly bestowed on the admirable character and conduct of the men. I think the only definite charge made against the London and North-Western Railway Company by the hon. Member who introduced the Motion was the great hardships imposed on the servants of the Company, by their having to walk long distances to the signal boxes. I can inform him that that charge is a most unfortunate one, and is exceedingly uncalled for. For it happens that the London and North-Western Company have built a greater number of cottages for their employés than any other Company, for the express purpose of locating them near their work, and they are still engaged in such building. That is the only specific charge, I think, which the hon. Member has made against the London and North-Western Company. But what is the first of his general charges? It is that the hours of overtime, which are imposed upon railway servants, are a grave social injustice. What is the meaning of the words "imposed upon the servants of the Companies?" The fact is this: that it is a contract entered into voluntarily and freely by the men, for a week of 60 hours, well paid, and with extra pay for any overtime which exceptional circumstances may render necessary. I say that any person who who really knows what eagerness there is amongst the workmen of this country to enter the railway service, anyone who knows the liberal terms on which those railway servants are engaged, the constant work they obtain, and the opportunities of advancement which they have, will see that it is perfectly absurd, that it is a misuse of language to speak of these terms, which are willingly accepted as part of the contract, as being "imposed" on the servants of the Company. Where, then, is this great social injustice? What are the facts with regard to overtime? I can assure the House that the only difficulty we have in the matter is not any complaint on the part of the men about overtime, even in individual cases, not even reluctance to accept overtime, our only trouble is to prevent the over-zealous servants of the Company indulging in occasional overtime against the regulations which we have made in the most stringent way that we can, to prevent the occurrence of overtime, except in certain exceptional cases. I am not going into the question of the present unfortunate conflict in Scotland, nor into the general question of Trades Unions. I shall, on this occasion, express no opinion upon these questions. I will merely say that I believe there is no kind of employment in the country into which Trade Unions have been introduced to such a small extent as in that of railway servants. I dare say for very good reason, because hardly in any instance has any necessity been felt for recourse to such action. But the really important part of this Resolution is the latter part, and if the insinuations are generally well founded, it is a matter not only for indignation on the part of the House, but one for very grave apprehension. A great deal has been said about the Returns which have been presented to Parliament by the Railway Companies in obedience to the Act of Parliament. It is an old saying that it is easy to twist figures in any direction to make out a case, and especially when the figures dealt with are so complicated and so numerous as they are in this voluminous Return. I shall only ask on behalf of the London and North Western Company, with which I am connected, to deal with the question of overtime, but I believe a similar, or nearly similar, case can be made out for all, or nearly all, the great railways. In fairly arguing this question it does not do to say that there are 70,000 cases of overtime. The importance of the 70,000 cases depends upon the number of men employed, and the number of hours they were engaged, as covered by this Return. I am going to quote a few figures, on which I can assure the House they may rely absolutely, to show the case of the London and North Western as to the average amount of overtime which is worked by their servants. Of course, the figures of these Returns appear very large in the aggregate, but when you take the total number of men employed, and the number of working days, the average of overtime is very small, indeed, having regard to the nature of the employment. The total number of instances of overtime has been reduced to a daily average by dividing it by 26—26 days being taken as the working days of a month—and this daily average, divided between the total number of men employed, shows the daily percentage of men employed more than 12 hours a day. With reference to passenger guards on the London and North-Western Railway, the total number employed in March, 1890, is set out at 449. For that month only three of these were employed beyond the 12 hours, or a daily percentage upon the total number of men employed of .025. Perhaps the House would like to know how this calculation will compare with the Returns presented to the Board of Trade. I will compare as I go along. I have said that the percentage was .025; three years ago the figures were 3.18. That shows a considerable diminution of overtime effected by careful rules in that period. I take the case of the brakesmen for the same month. The total number is 1,373, and the number of instances of overtime is 783, or 2.19 against 8.17, three years ago. Next, engine drivers and firemen. The total is 5,652, and the number of instances of overtime is 30,457, or 20.72, as against 29.16 three years ago. As to signalmen the figures are 2,293, number of instances 180, or .3, as against 64. Examined: Total, 636; number of instances 176, or 1.06 as against 3.46. These figures show that there is really a very small percentage of individuals who are engaged in working overtime on that railway. And to summarise my remarks, I may say that practically the only class of railway servants who are subject to irregular hours of working, or to what may seem to be excessive hours, are engine drivers, firemen, and guards. But it must be remembered that these men are in many cases not working with the trains during the whole of the time they are represented to be, that they have considerable intervals of rest, and the hours of working given include the time they are in attendance before the starting of the trains. But one must go a little further in order to realise how shadowy is the charge that is made. There is really no excessive use of overtime. I have here a few statements which I shall ask the leave of the House to read from a memorandum which has been very carefully drawn up by the officers of the North-Western Railway. They will give the House a practical insight into how this overtime is worked on the railway of which I am speaking, and they will show that the officers of that company have done everything that it is possible for them to do in order to comply with the policy adopted by Parliament and to reduce overtime to its minimum. I hope the House will be a little patient with me while I read some sentences from this document, because if the House is to come to a conclusion upon so serious a matter as altering its deliberately adopted policy as regards the relations of railway employers and railway workmen, it ought, at least, to understand thoroughly what is the practical working of the machine with which they propose to interfere. I think that these extracts will show that, so far at least as the London and North-Western Company is concerned, the company through its officers has done, and is doing, all that is humanly possible to minimise the risks of overtime, and also will prove the absolute necessity of overtime in certain cases; that, is if the public require a company with but one railway to conduct both a rapid passenger traffic and a vast amount of slow goods traffic. Let me first of all take the case of signalmen—

Mr. Plunket

“At busy stations and junctions, and stations such as Euston, Watford, Bletchley, Wolverton, &c., there are three signalmen appointed for each cabin, which results in shifts of eight hours for each man—the first man usually coming on duty at 6 a.m., the second at 2 p.m., and the third at 10 p.m. At posts of secondary importance, but on the main line, as, for example, Sudbury, Pinner, King’s Langley, Atherstone, &c., there are five men for two cabins, so that by utilising the fifth man for the relief of the four others the whole five get 10 hours duty each. On branch lines and at places which, although on main lines, are merely intermediate posts, and not in themselves very busy or of great importance, the majority of the cabins are twelve-hours posts—that is, there are two men for each cabin, one coming on duty at 6 a.m., and the other at 6 p.m., the men taking day and night duty in alternate weeks. On lines which, while they are not trunk lines, cannot by reason of their importance be called branch lines (as, for instance, the Liverpool and Manchester, Rugby and Birmingham, and Liverpool and Wigan) the cabins are eight, ten, or twelve hour posts, according to the varying circumstances of each case. On what is called the southern division, extending from London to Stafford (exclusive of branches), there are in all 112 signal cabins. Of these 39 are eight-hour posts, 31 are ten-hour posts, 42 are twelve-hour posts. There are practically no signal cabins on the London and North-Western Railway, where the men work more than 12 hours. It should be borne in mind that at many of the places where the men are on duty 12 hours the work is light, and comparatively few trains are passing. In addition to the regular staff of signalmen filling the regular posts of duty, who number 2,293, the company have 125 men continually employed for relief purposes in case of sickness or of men requiring special leave of absence, besides which upwards of 350 men ordinarily employed as porters or in other capacities have been trained in signalmen's duties, so as to be competent to relieve the regular men in any case of emergency which may arise."

Now, I contend it would not be possible, unless you establish with a lavish hand an utterly useless staff of servants, to contrive a system which would more carefully guard against the necessity of overtime arising for signalmen in the cases I have taken. Then let us take the case of passenger guards—

"The hours of passenger guards are regulated by what is known as a 'roster'—that is to say, that, supposing there are 10 guards attached to a certain station, a table is drawn up which practically divides the day's work into 10 portions, each day's work for one man being numbered from 1 to 10. The men take these portions consecutively, changing once a week, so that each man will work through the 'roster' in 10 weeks, and will be No. 1 the first week, No. 2 the second week, and so on. The 'rosters' for the main line or through guards are so drawn up as to provide for each man working as nearly as possible 10½ hours a day, including half an hour before the departure of their trains; but in some cases, owing to the exigencies of the train service, the men have to work more than 10 hours, and as much as 12, 12½, and even 13 hours, but in such cases they get a rest day, and so only work practically only work five days in the week, or a total of from 60 to 70 hours per week. The hours of the local guards are arranged on the same principal by means of 'rosters,' but they are on the average longer than those of the through guards, and vary from 12 to 13½ hours, including certain intervals between the arrival of one train and the departure of another, which they are at liberty to utilise for meals and for resting. These intervals are often very considerable, and in a great number of cases, although 12½ or 13 hours may elapse between a man leaving home in the morning and returning at night, he has intervals of rest during the day amounting in the aggregate to three or four hours, and his actual time of working is thus reduced to about 7½ or 8 hours."

I know this is rather a dull statement, but really these are circumstances on which we must base our judgment on this practical and most important question. I think the figures I have read to the House must have satisfied all hon. Gentlemen present that every possible precaution has been taken to equalise the work of the men and to impose as little excessive work on each man as possible. Here is the way that overtime comes in, especially in the case of brakesmen and engine-drivers—

Mr. Plunket

"For about seven or eight months in the year the goods trains run fairly well to time-table time, and it is an exceptional circumstance for them to be as much as an hour late, but no doubt during the worst months of the winter—say, from November to March—late running is frequent and unavoidable, and it is in view of this fact that the greatest difficulty in regulating the hours of the brakesmen arises. The men are instructed in every case where they find they are likely to be on duty by reason of the delay of their trains an unduly long time, to report the fact to the station-master at the next station they stop at, in order that the latter may telegraph forward to the nearest place on the journey at which a substitute can be provided, and the man be relieved. No doubt, in spite of all precautions, cases do sometimes arise, and in the nature of things will always do so, in which the hours of the men are unduly prolonged; but the company use every means in their power to minimise these cases, and the men are exhorted to co-operate with those in authority over them in effecting this object. Brakesmen are not allowed any regular meal hours, as they have ample facilities for getting their meals while on the journey, and groves are provided in the brake-vans to enable them to cook or warm their food. At the principal centre comfortable lodging-houses are provided for the men free of charge, so that they need lose no time in obtaining refreshment and repose at the end of the journey."

Not only are they exhorted to co-operate with those in authority, but if they break through the rule thus laid down, and do indulge in excessive overtime, they are punished, and unless they are able to give a satisfactory account of the delay, the men are actually fined by the company. Now this is almost the last quotation I desire to make, but as it refers to engine-men I am sure the House would like to know how and under what circumstances their employment is regulated—

"The hours of duty of engine-drivers are fixed by a 'roster' and on the 'link' system in the same way as the hours of the guards and brakesmen. The principle upon which the 'rosters' for the passenger service are made up is that of restricting the hours of each man to a maximum duty of 12 hours per day, in addition to which he must be on duty with his engine an hour before the train starts and half-an-hour after finishing. This makes a maximum of 13½ hours for a day's work; but in cases where the maximum is reached a rest day is allowed, so as to restrict the total hours for the week to not more than 60. It must be borne in mind, moreover, that the men are not in all cases actually working during the whole of the time that elapses between their leaving home and returning, as it frequently occurs that there are considerable intervals of rest between the arrival of one train and the departure of another. In the case of goods drivers the time fixed by the 'rosters' is restricted to 10 hours time-table time, which, with the addition of one hour before starting and half-an-hour after finishing, makes up a maximum day of 11½ hours, but, as in the case of the passenger drivers, the total hours for the week are restricted to 60. The object of keeping the maximum lower in the case of the goods men than in that of the passenger men is that goods trains are more subject to delay than passenger trains, and therefore the time fixed is more liable to be exceeded. The limits of 13½ hours for passenger drivers and 11½ hours for goods 'drivers are treated as maximums, and the drosters' are compiled so as to restrict the working day as far as practicable to 10 hours. It is to the company's interest to do so, as all overtime made after 10 hours have been worked is paid for at the rate of time and a quarter."

Then the Memorandum goes on—

"Of course the great difficulty in dealing with engine men's hours of duty, especially of goods drivers, is the same which arises in the case of the brakesmen—namely, that whatever arrangements may be made beforehand, they are liable to be upset by delays to the trains arising from bad weather, fogs, engine failures, breakdown, or other unforeseen circumstances. To meet this contingency the most careful arrangements are made for providing relief men to take the places of those who may have been detained on duty for a number of hours reaching to or exceeding the maximum of 13 hours, and the men, like the brakesmen, are instructed in such cases to put themselves in communication with the station-masters and co-operate in the arrangements for their own relief."

I have a similar Memorandum with regard to shunters, but as the most important part of this case turns on the employment of brakesmen of goods trains and engine drivers, I will not trespass further on the patience of the House with regard to the shunters. There is no doubt that in the Return which has been presented to Parliament some very striking figures occur even in the column relating to the London and North-Western Railway Company. But the percentage set opposite to those figures in the Return—one in a thousand—proved how entirely exceptional they are. There do appear some instances in which men have worked hours which would really have been a most unconscionable strain upon the endurance of the men, and which would render them quite unfit for work if it was a thing that happened frequently. Certainly it would be a scandalous thing if such instances were allowed to occur where they could possibly be avoided. But the contention all through this Debate has been that the railway companies force their men to this extreme strain upon their strength. The very opposite is the case. Not only do justice and humanity dictate to the company that they should abstain from doing so, but their direct pecuniary interest also. Every instance of overtime is an additional burden on the Railway Company. The truth is that the isolated instances to which I have referred, in which men are worked for very long hours are caused by circumstances which it is perfectly impossible to foresee or to control. Take, for example, a case where a railway engine runs off the line at a certain distance from any station. The engine driver must stick by his engine: it may be for many hours beyond the time contemplated in the duty entrusted to him. But every hour, every minute, of that time will be set down as overtime, and will appear in the Return as part of the overtime, worked on the London and North Western Railway. I should like to give the House one or two instances of how this overtime is really worked out. Here is one:—On the 6th of October a brakesman, of Manchester, was in charge of a train from Rochdale to Accrington, and was on duty—it seems a very long time—15 hours and 15 minutes in consequence of a delay which occurred to his train through the line being blocked by an engine which left the rails. The lines over which the train ran belongs to the Lancashire and Yorkshire, and there was, therefore, no possible chance of the man obtaining relief until he got back to Manchester. In another case a driver and fireman from Crewe were on duty owing to an error of judgment for 21 hours and 40 minutes. On the matter being reported and investigated the driver was fined. How is it possible for any Railway Company to make provision against a case of that kind. But down goes this case in the Return as a case of a man working for 21 hours, and we are told that the company has committed an act of great social injustice to its servants, and that it has apparently most guiltily caused danger to its servants and the public. The real truth is that cases of overtime are not normal, they are exceptional and they are deplored by the companies when they occur. I think I have shown that the companies have taken every possible precaution to prevent their occurrence. They have even gone so far as to punish their servants when they break through the regulations and work overtime, and I say that under these circumstances it is absurd and most unjust to the great Railway Companies of the Kingdom to charge upon them such cases as I have spoken of, as either unjust to the men or guiltily dangerous to the public. I shall not comment upon the proposal which is made at the end of the resolution. I do not very clearly understand the hon. Member to adhere to his original proposition.

*MR. CHANNING: I said I adhered to the proposal, but added that I thought it would meet my view and that of other Members, if something in the form of arbitration was arranged, something similar to what the railway servants asked for 15 years ago, namely, the reference of disputes to some body like the Railway Commission.

*MR. PLUNKET: Well then, is it not a very strange thing to come to this House with such charges as are levelled against the Railway Companies in this Resolution and conclude in such a vague way as the hon. Member has done? If this Resolution is carried, we shall place on the records of this House most calumnious statements as regards the management of the great railways of this country in their dealings with their men, and we shall create a feeling against the companies as regards their measures of protection for the public. I do not think the House ought to be called upon in this off-hand way, and upon such slight evidence as has been adduced, to reverse the policy long ago deliberately adopted by Parliament of not interfering beyond what is absolutely necessary between employers and their servants, but of leaving the responsibility and the risk to rest with those who are invested with the power.

Mr. Plunket

(6.53). MR. LOCKWOOD (York): I, in company with others, have listened with a great amount of pleasure to the extremely interesting Paper which the right hon. Gentleman has read to us on the subject of the working of the London and North Western Railway Company. The right hon. Gentleman has given us his reasons for selecting this Company for the eulogium he passed upon it. He has told us he is nearly connected with the interests of the Company, and therefore, no doubt, the House in accordance with its usual custom listened with great interest to the observations of the right hon. Gentlemen as to the position of the venture with which he is so nearly and closely connected. But when we remember that the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Channing), in introducing his Motion, alluded to the case of the London and North Western as one which in the main was an example to be followed by other Railway Companies, it does appear to me that the right hon. Gentleman has been engaged in a work of supererogation in defending a Company with which he is so intimately connected.

*MR. PLUNKET: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. and learned Gentleman, but the hon. Member who introduced this Resolution said that all the companies in England and Scotland were equally bad. [Cries of "No, no!"]

*MR. CHANNING: What I said about the London and North Western Railway Company was that it had made very important reductions in the overtime work, for 15 or 18 hours and upwards.

MR. LOCKWOOD: I think I am right in saying that so far from wishing to point the finger of scorn at the London and North Western, my hon. Friend called attention to it for the purpose of showing that the Company has lately been behaving a great deal better than formerly. And what is the kind of case the right hon. Gentleman establishes by the voluminous figures he has given us? It is how well a company can be made if it only tries. What we complain of is that often Railway Companies have not followed the example of the London and North Western in the matter of the time during which their employees are engaged in the work of the company, and also in the question of overtime. The right hon. Gentleman has figures which are not at the disposal of the rest of the Members of the House, and for some time, I at any rate, did not appreciate the source from which he drew the figures. The figures with which we have to deal are contained in the latest return, which is dated 1890. The right hon. Gentleman has said there may be instances of overtime, but that they only occur in the cases of engines going off the line, or of some unforeseen circumstance or error of judgment. What was the state of things in 1890? 91.45 per cent. of the engine drivers and firemen were employed for 12 hours and upwards. There were 19,098 cases in which men worked 13 hours. Did 19,098 engines go off the line? Were there 19,000 errors of judgment? If the right hon. Gentleman would take the trouble to compare the position of his company in 1890 with its position at present, I do not think he would use such hard words as he did of my hon. Friend. What stronger argument could my hon. Friend adduce on behalf of this Motion than the condition of things which has been deposed to by the authority to which we have just listened? Had there been on the Scotch railway lines a condition of things similar to that which exists on the great and prosperous line, the London and North Western, the present terrible strike with all its terrible accompaniments would never have taken place. To what conclusion then are we driven? That there are instances in which other Railway Companies refuse to follow the good example we have heard of to-night. All my hon. Friend asks is that in such cases there should be power given to the Board of Trade to intervene. For my part I trust the House is not going to let the matter be shuffled off on a Commission, and I hope my hon. Friend will pursue the matter to a Division.

*(72.) MR A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY (Sussex, East Grinstead): I do not wish to intervene for more than a few minutes. I had not intended to speak at all, and I do so now only because I think I can show that the hon. and learned Member for York (Mr. Lockwood) is under a grave misapprehension with regard to the speech just delivered. He seems to think that the right hon. Gentleman on the Bench below (Mr. Plunket) gave figures different from those he himself has taken from the Return. As a matter of fact, the figures given by the right hon. Gentleman were nothing more nor less than an analysis of the official figures giving a daily instead of a monthly average. If you declare that there are 91.45 men employed for more than 12 hours a day, and then say, "Look how many engines that means running off the lines, and how many errors of judgment," and so forth, no doubt it sounds plausible; but when you take the figures and analyse them, and find that in the case of each individual they mean the small percentage that the right hon. Gentleman specified, it raises a very different question. I confess that I, for my part, am not partial to an inquiry, whether it be by a Royal Commission or whether it be by a Parliamentary Committee, into the management of railways; but I cannot help thinking that the speech we have just listened to, and a great many of the arguments used by Members on either side of the House, are a proof that something of the kind is in this particular instance necessary. I cannot help thinking that it is demonstrated to every one who is not led away by mere rhetoric, but who deals with the figures and with the speeches of those who argue the question that there is a great misapprehension as to this matter. Take the remarks that fell from both the Mover of the Motion and the hon. Member who seconded it. Both said, and rightly, that if the safety of the public demanded some sacrifice of the dividends of shareholders, the shareholders should give way, and the safety of the public should be considered. As a matter of fact, this point of overtime is far from being a saving to railways, and is beyond all doubt a very great source of expense to them, and one which they would give a great deal to get rid of. Take, for instance, the normal case of brakemen, drivers, and firemen, on a goods train—and the great majority of the cases that have been alluded to are derived from these particular sources. With regard to the signalmen, I think I could show that overtime does not often arise in regard to them if I cared to go into the question, especially by referring to certain railways with which I am intimately acquainted. As to the other cases, there is no doubt that from time to time men do work possibly as much as 15, and occasionally even a larger number of hours. But how is that time made up? It is made up in this way: Owing to the precautions taken for the safety of the public, the goods trains men are shunted into sidings, and yet, although they are not then engaged in arduous duties, and though their time is lost to the Railway Companies, they are paid overtime or time and a quarter for all the time so occupied. So far from this being a saving to the companies or the shareholders, they lose by it. It is impossible, I maintain, to lay down with regard to these hours of railway servants a Procrustean rule. There are many cases in which eight hours might be too much; there are certain signal boxes where men ought not to work that length of time, and there are others where men might work 12 hours and yet the labour would not be excessive. You cannot compare the position of a signalman at Cannon Street or Doncaster Stations, for instance, with that of a small branch line where, perhaps, there are only three trains running a day, and those very well known. You cannot treat the labour of men in small signal boxes like that of the other class, as being continuous. Without wishing to throw ridicule on anyone, I should like to mention a case which shows the absurdity of the inferences which some people draw from the figures. I wish to draw attention to a case in which a man is put down as working 15 hours a day. I happen to have analysed this case. It is that of a man who ran an excursion train down to the seaside in the morning. It took three hours to run down. He spent nine hours at the seaside, and ran the same train back in the evening. He appears on the list as one of the men who is overworked to the extent of a 15 hours stretch in the day, and this is one of the cases referred to which go to make up this indictment of hardship and upon which a great deal of stress has been laid. If I believed it was possible for any regulation of the Board of Trade to do away with this working overtime, I, as representing one of the railways in this country, would very gladly assent. Everyone who has anything to do with the running of a line must know very well that one accident must cost a railway more than the employment of a larger number of extra men. But the difficulty we have in regard to goods trains is that no amount of consideration that I can see would enable us to lay down a hard-and-fast line as to how the men are to be worked for any particular time. Naturally, if passenger traffic is going wrong, goods trains have to be shunted in preference, and have to wait a considerable time. All the Railway Companies that I know are incurring a capital expenditure for the purpose of making additional sidings and bringing into use appliances so as to bring this source of difficulty as far as possible to a minimum. I say it is impossible, by laying down any such regulation, or asking the Board of Trade to lay it down, to put an end to working overtime. Believe me, the manager of every Railway Company in the country is quite as much alive as any Member in the House to the desirability of making all possible effort in this direction. I will not be led into discussing the question of the present attitude of the North British Railway Company, because I think it has drawn away the attention of the House from the real question it has to decide. I believe myself that the effect of the evident misapprehension which prevails in the House is the reason why, in this particular instance, there ought to be some sort of inquiry. With regard to the question of Boards of Arbitration and Conciliation, so far as I can see there is nothing touching upon them in the four corners of this Resolution, and I cannot myself see how that question is to be dealt with. If the House were to interfere in labour disputes in the interest of the safety of the public, then I say it would have to interfere not merely with the action of the employers, but with the action of the employés. If it is a dangerous thing, both to the men and the public, that men should be worked overtime, then how much more dangerous is it, at any rate to the public, that railway servants should leave their employment without notice, leaving the trains and the signals at the mercy of the resources of the company. I know that every Member who advocates the case of the companies is taking up an unpopular position, but I believe if it be a right position, no one on either side of the House will shrink from his views; and I trust that when hon. Members have expressed their views, those who differ from them will at least give them credit for sincerity.

Mr. A. E. Gathorne-Hardy

*(7.15.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): I would give full credit to the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down for doing what he thinks his duty in representing the side—and there are always two sides to a question—of the Railway Companies. We have had the advantage to-night, and I say it sincerely, of hearing the case of the Great Western Railway Company from an hon. Gentleman who represents them, and the case of the London and North-Western Railway from the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and now that of some smaller railway from the hon. Member who has just sat down. I only regret that he should have devoted so much of his speech to attacking what is not in the Resolution. He insisted with considerable emphasis that it is impossible as to hours of labour to lay down a hard-and-fast line. The hon. Member who brings forward the Motion entirely agrees with him as to that, and for that very reason he does not propose a Procrustean rule. He does not propose, even, that the Board of Trade should lay down hard-and-fast lines; but what is proposed in the Resolution, if it indicates anything, is that the Board of Trade should obtain powers by legislation to issue Orders to Railway Companies where necessary, directing that the hours worked by their men should be reduced wherever there are bad cases. That is what is proposed, and for that I intend to vote. There exists in the Act of 1889 a section under which the Returns are made, which have been so useful to-night, and it is due to the hon. Mover (Mr. Channing) to observe that it was he who first obtained those Returns. He wished them to have been fuller, and they were only given by the Government in their present form as a compromise. Such as they are, they have furnished ample material for argument, and his whole case is founded on them; but the facts are only laid down in large figures, and it is necessary to have an analysis before their meaning can be surely ascertained. I do not think much has been gained by two hon. Members who are interested in railways drawing attention to exceptional cases in which the men gain by overtime; the question must be regarded broadly. I believe the men as a body are opposed to working long hours in spite of the increased amount they make in wages. We have been told that the practice of long hours and overtime is not systematic; but there is a phase of overtime work in connection with my own constituency of Perth against which the men loudly complain, and which is carried on systematically. The system is, that the men who are worked for one week 15 hours a day and more are given very short hours in the next week, the object being that the company may not have to pay for overtime, which is calculated upon the fortnight. Many days the men are left at home all day, or had out only for a few hours. I think this House will feel that human nature is not so constituted that it is a sound principle to work men one week for 15 hours a day or so, and the next week let them remain idle—the object being to pay as little overtime as possible.

*MR. A. GATHORNE-HARDY: I may say I know of no such case as that to which the hon. Member alludes. There may be such a case in Scotland, but our men are all paid by the week.

*MR. C. S. PARKER: It is the case, I believe, on one or two Scotch railways, and I am glad to have called attention to it. I think the House and the country may be congratulated on the opportuneness of the Motion. It has not been brought forward in connection with the Scotch strike, the notice of Motion having been given before the strike took place. But this is an opportune time for expressing the sentiments that naturally arise in discussing the question. All the expressions of feeling in this Debate have been such as will, I think, be well received by public opinion. The House may safely accept the principle of the Resolution, because we are not dealing with an ordinary case of employer and employed—we are not interfering in the conditions of labour generally, but are dealing with an altogether exceptional case. We are justified in interfering on the ground that the Railway Companies have obtained certain powers from Parliament in the public interest—and Parliament will always be jealous as to the use of powers so granted, especially when, as happens in most cases, they savour very much of the nature of monopolies. Most railways have—what was not anticipated when the railway system was first instituted—a monopoly of traffic, both as to goods and passengers. Their rates are fixed by Parliament, and I think it was intended to be stipulated that the service should be good. If the service, on the contrary, breaks down, it is time for Parliament to revise the terms. I think a strong prima facie case has been made out to-night, not against all the Railway Companies, but against many of them, that the hours worked are so long as to be dangerous to the public, and that, at all events in extreme cases, there should be some limit to the powers of the companies to expose the public or the men themselves to the risk of accident by overstraining their servants. I think it will be sound policy in the case of these Public Companies to arm the Board of Trade with power to interfere.

*(7.26.) MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I have not the fortune to be a Director of any Railway Company, but for a great many years I have taken a great interest in this question. As a boy, in order to qualify myself for the work of an engineer, I served as fireman for a long time, and, in addition, I performed the still harder duties of a cleaner and a lighter. I certainly think that if the London and North Western and the Great Western Companies can manage to work its engine-men and signalmen for reasonable hours, other companies can do the same. The difficulty that is felt by Directors of Railway Companies in regard to overtime has not been very fairly put before the House. The men, I know very well, are willing at times to work overtime. We are dealing with an exceptionally intelligent and willing class of men, who are ready, knowing perfectly as they do the importance of the work they are engaged in, to do that work. But because Directors may say it is difficult to prevent men working, I say it is the duty of someone, whether Directors or others, to prevent the men working the extraordinary hours. The average hours, as shown by the Returns, are very excessive indeed, and the causes of those long hours are not exclusively accidents and breakdowns. It is well known to superintendents and others before a train starts whether the men employed on it will be at work an excessive number of hours or not. The case of the engine-driver who was sent to the seaside for a day is spoken of as being one of no great hardship. That may be so; but it is quite possible that the engine-driver did not want to be at the seaside, and that he wished to spend his leisure hours in doing other work at home. I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade what notice is taken by the Department of the Reports of Inspectors? Inspectors are called on from time to time to hold inquiries into accidents, many of which, no doubt, though not all, result from the over-working of officials. I should like to know how far the Department has taken action upon the Reports of its Inspectors in these cases. I know very well that the right hon. Gentleman keeps a watchful eye over his Department; but I should like to know what is the use of these costly inquiries if they do not lead to remedying of the evils so plainly put forward by the Inspectors. With regard to the number of hours, it is repeatedly said the men ask for overtime; but I doubt whether this is the case. I know it is on one, where the week consists of seven working days, the men being called upon to work on Sundays and receiving no extra pay for work on that day, because at the time of entering the service they agreed to seven days' work in the week. Though the subject is not always put forward in that way, really the demand of the men is less for an increase of pay than a reduction of hours. It is impossible for men to get away at the end of a normal day of 12½ hours. It may be said there is an allowance of time for meals, but it is often the case that men cannot get away for meals; a man may get half an hour from 9.30 to 10, and again an hour between 3 and 4. Over and over again men cannot get away for meals, because they have to wait for an overdue train. I hope hon. Members will not allow the matter to be prejudiced by the introduction of circumstances connected with the Scotch strike. I think it has been clearly shown that the grievance lies in the question of overtime—the men cannot get away to their homes. Whatever you pay a man, if you keep him at work from 6 in the morning until 7.30 in the evening, he cannot have the advantages other men enjoy—home-life, rest, or recreation; he sees little of his children; he cannot have the recreation afforded by clubs and reading-rooms if he works 13 or more hours a day. I sincerely hope the President of the Board of Trade may see his way to giving a reply that will be satisfactory to us. I think the terms of the Motion are sufficiently vague, if I may say so, sufficiently wide to admit of such an answer, though not for a moment conveying official support to the eight hours movement. Here is an exceptional case, and if a Department of State having sufficient powers does not exist, it ought to exist, for the regulation of this question, and I fully believe the Department over which the right hon. Gentleman presides could bring such pressure to bear upon Railway Directors that would put an end to the evils complained of.

Mr. C. S. Parker

(7.34.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): Much has been brought into this discussion with which this Motion has nothing to do. Serious as the strike in Scotland is, I do not see how it affects the question of excessive work which is imposed upon railway servants all over the Kingdom. I venture, for a few minutes, to recall the attention of hon. Members to the real point under discussion. We are not concerned with the exceptional position of men employed on certain branch lines, and what an hon. Gentleman said just now, in interesting detail, of the man who was able to enjoy a few hours at the seaside, and so on, is really not germane to the subject before us. A great deal of time, too, was, I venture to say, wasted by the right hon. Gentleman who defended the London and North Western Railway Company in telling us what alterations the company are making in their works, the arrangements for sidings, and so on. These matters have nothing to do with the question, which is simply whether or not men working on railways—guards, signalmen, firemen, drivers, and others—work excessively long hours, and are compelled by Railway Companies to do so. The facts, I maintain, have been established. As to the figures given, by which the right hon. Gentleman opposite brought out his interesting decimal calculations, nobody knows better than the right hon. Gentleman who read them from his prepared brief that they are utterly and entirely fallacious, because if you spread the amount of overwork over a number of men, some of whom did the work and some did not, you may bring down the individual percentage, but convey altogether a wrong impression. The figures, carefully prepared, as I have no doubt they were, have not the slightest bearing on the subject. This is not a question of overtime in the sense the word is constantly used. It may mean that you are getting from a man as regards his booked time a longer number of hours than he ought to give, part of which ought to be regarded as overtime, but which is not overtime, but regularly-demanded work. Then the term has been used in another fashion, extra work for which extra payment is made; and we have heard credit taken by Railway Companies for so many hours' work obtained beyond the long hours of regular service for which time and a half has been paid. The demand is that a man's work should be 10 hours gross; but you are working men 13 hours, and you do not call the three hours overtime, you call them part of the regular time, and then take credit because you work them another hour and a half, and pay as time and a half. We complain of both. It is unfair to the railway servant that his regular booked time is much too long, and then you allow him to work longer still, offering to the already tired man the inducement of extra pay. So you work a system which is injurious to the railway servants and dangerous to the public. Then we have had a learned dissertation on the law of supply and demand, which was wholly irrelevant. Unfortunately, we have at this moment more men seeking employment than there is employment to be had, and, as the result, the Railway Companies know that, though the terms they offer are harsh, they can get men to accept them, and do work we say they should not be allowed to undertake. The Railway Companies can get men who are not competent for the work, and though the law of supply and demand may control these matters as between the employers and those men they employ, we maintain—and I do not think I need argue it at length—that as between the companies and their staff and the public, you must not allow the companies to imperil the safety and lives of Her Majesty's subjects because the laws of supply and demand allow the companies to get an article they ought not to get at a price they ought not to pay. Now, these men dare not speak out until they can do so in unison by means of such a strike as we now have in Scotland. I can show from a document—the name of the author I will not disclose except to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, in whom I have perfect confidence—a letter sent to me as the result of an interview with certain men during my long vacation. I do not wish to give the slightest indication as to who the writer is, but I mention some of the facts referred to as describing not an exceptional state of things, as in the case of the man who had leisure for visits to the seaside, and so on. I take the record of work at three periods of the year, and not a time of exceptional pressure—in spring, summer, and winter. These entries are copied from the man's time book, which shows the exact hours of his work. There is a late and an early time for beginning work. I do not know the technical term used, and I take the entries over a fortnight as they come. The man began work at 8 in the morning, and these are the times he left work:—6 min. past 10; 20 min. past 10; 22 min. past 10; 4 min. past 10; and then comes an entry half-past 1 in the morning. Then comes a comparatively very short day in which, starting at 8.15, he finished at 9.20. But I find this is followed by days beginning at 6 in the morning, and finishing at 7.31, 7.27, and so on. Then, in the month of January, work commenced at 8 in the morning, and finished at 9.45 on three occasions, 9.52, and again at 5 min. past 2 in the morning; after which he was at it again at 8 o'clock, and finished at 7 min. past 9. Now I give entries for the spring season. Work began at 8 o'clock, and the times for knocking off work were: 10.7, 9.50, 1.0, 10.3, 11.32, 11.25, and 9.29.

Mr. Waddy

Now, I say deliberately this records a state of things nothing more nor less than scandalous. If anybody will take the trouble to reckon the hours of daily labour, he will find this man worked 14 h. 7 min., 13 h. 50 min., 14 hours, 14 h. 3 min., 15 h. 32 min., 15 h. 32 min., 15 h. 25 min., 13 h. 29 min., and so on. These are not exceptional times picked out for the purpose. I take the entries as they come. This is the way this poor man was worked, and his Sunday rest came once a fortnight. Every alternate Sunday he had to be at work usually from 8.15 a.m. to 9.15 p.m. This is a state of things which ought not to exist, and should not be allowed to exist. I have been waiting and expecting that long before this some occupant of the Treasury Bench would rise and tell us what the Government propose to do, not prefacing his speech by telling us he speaks not as a Member of the Government, but as a Railway Director. Willing as we are to listen to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) this is not what we want. We do not want to hear what the Directors can do, or think they ought to do, or are doing, to relieve the pressure of overwork. We know, as a matter of fact, from these Returns, and others I could mention, what has long been going on unchecked, and the men have no power of redressing their grievances, can bring no influence to bear to set matters right, except by a gigantic strike. It is exactly a question in which this House ought to intervene, first, for the protection of the men, and next, to protect the public from the mischief that must and does arise. If it is suggested that the men like this overtime, let me read what my correspondent says—

“On the detached sheet you will find how we are worked, with little or no rest, and you will see that after finishing work there is on time left for recreation, for visiting friends, for attending meetings or places of worship, or anything else. We work every alternate Sunday, from 8.15 a.m. to 9.15 p.m., but it is generally 9.30 before we can get away.”

I find it is not desirable to read the whole of the letter; it might indicate the spot from which it comes, and be prejudicial to the writer. He goes on to say—

“We get a Sunday off every fortnight and are then too tired and worn-out to go anywhere. We have to be in bed half the day on our off Sunday to get rested for the next day.”

This letter tells a tale, piteous and pathetic to the last degree. I do not want to go over the general question, which has been well argued. We have been told that long hours are exceptional and not the regular thing, and that there is a desire on the part of the men for overtime, and here I have given from this man's timebook the hours he has to work, and before he can count overtime he must, in the early period, work 13 hours—that is, from 6 a.m. to 7 p.m.; and in the late period from 8 a.m. to 9.45 p.m., or 13½ hours. This is a state of things that demands our consideration, and we wait with some little curiosity and anxiety to know what is going to be said by the Government. I am confident the facts cannot be disputed, nor can I believe any attempt will be made by the right hon. Gentleman to get away from them. Are you going to give the remedy suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire, or any remedy; or are you going to ride off on some technical objection to the exact words of the Resolution? Surely the time has come for indicating the course the Government propose to adopt, and Member after Member need not go on beating the air with arguments to which there is no reply.

(7.43.) MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): I speak as one who is generally favourable to the eight hours movement, but I cannot vote for the Resolution, because it has been fairly urged that that Resolution as framed contains a vote of censure upon the conduct of Railway Companies, who, so far as I know, manage their business with satisfaction to those they employ. Cases of hardship exist, but they are no greater than cases which exist in almost every organised system of production in the country. I have risen to express a hope that Her Majesty's Government will make some proposal to-night which will obviate the necessity of our voting either way. For the proposition as it stands I cannot vote. I have no interest in the management of any Railway Company, but I have considerable acquaintance with railway officials, and I know there is an universal feeling among them that the hours of labour are too long, and that overtime is worked in a way that is a great drawback to the comfort and domestic happiness we all desire the working classes should enjoy. The Resolution does not define what legislative powers the Board of Trade should acquire, and how a remedy should be applied; but if a Commission were appointed with full powers of inquiry into the whole of the subject, how far the State would be justified in regulating hours of labour, the result might give considerable satisfaction to the community. In no case should railway servants be away from their homes for more than 12 hours. It is a matter that requires no discussion that a man habitually away from home six days a week for 15 hours cannot lead a comfortable or even a humane life. We require an examination of the question, whether there should be some limitation of the hours of labour for persons engaged in what may be called dangerous, unhealthy, abnormal occupations, and where men work not as independent units, but as servants of a great organisation or institution. There is no question that in the case of railway servants accidents do sometimes occur through the undue strain placed upon men, but nobody is so unjust as to suppose that Railway Companies do not take every possible care to prevent the recurrence of an accident. I am sure nobody is more anxious to prevent accidents, nobody more interested in preventing them than Railway Directors. But the complaint is that the system under which they engage their men to work is radically wrong. The law of supply and demand does not apply for the regulation of this question. The old Tory theory of Protection—good or bad—was based on the idea that the State should protect the labour of the country, and under present circumstances, when throughout the country there are more men than labour can be found for, and the Railway Companies have too much labour for the men they employ, it may well form the subject of inquiry how far legislative action should compel the companies to employ more men at more rational hours. We may anticipate a distinct public gain from such an inquiry on public, moral, and social considerations. I hope we shall not have to vote upon this Motion at all, but that the Government will consent to an inquiry into the whole subject, including the eight hours question. It is sometimes assumed that hon. Members on the other side alone represent the interests of the labouring classes, though that is not the case; and certainly, as regards my own constituency, I have willingly pledged myself to do what I can to amend the conditions of life for the labouring classes. The inquiry I speak of would be a step in that direction. I have great sympathy with much that was said by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Channing), who brought forward the Motion, but it was with great regret I heard him make use of the term "black-leg." Nothing is more unfortunate, nothing is more injurious to a good cause in controversies of this kind, than to affix an offensive nick-name to men who are doing simply what they have a perfect legal right to do. I hope that before long the Government will bring before us some practical measure, which will put an end to the cruel system by which men are practically compelled to work such hours that their health is bound to be impaired, and they cannot get the amount of recreation necessary to a comfortable and a civilised life. (8.2.)

*(8.30.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): The hon. Member for Northamptonshire must, I think, congratulate himself on the measure of support he has received from the opposite side of the House; for I think the House will have seen that if no one has yet actually promised to vote with him, pretty nearly every one who has spoken on the other side has shown no disposition to vote against him. The hon. Member for the East Grinstead Division of Sussex (Mr. A. Gathorne-Hardy) has spoken of object lessons; and I must say that the object lesson we have received from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Plunket), in reference to the London and North Western Railway, is hardly so much to the point as the other object lesson put before us with regard to the North British Railway. Certainly, the London and North Western Railway constitutes a very important object lesson, as given in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works. If this Debate had been initiated for the purpose of drawing a modest statement from a model director as to a model railway, I for one should have taken no part whatever in it, nor even in the Division which seems likely to follow. But if the case of Scotland be set aside,

Mr. de Lisle

as is done by the right hon. Gentleman, then I think one of the best arguments that can be used in support of this Resolution would fall to the ground. Now, what is the case in Scotland? The Railway Companies there do amongst them a very considerable business. I do not know whether it is so great as that carried on by the London and North Western Railway, but, nevertheless, it is on a large scale. Now, what do we find has taken place? We find that the whole trade of the country has been paralysed, simply and solely because no arrangement can be come to as to the terms on which the Directors on the one hand and the strikers on the other can meet. I believe that had it been possible to suggest some means of compromise in a manner that would have been acceptable to both sides, the dispute which has now lasted so long and caused so much inconvenience and disaster would not have gone on for more than a day or two. I think, therefore, that we cannot in discussing this question leave the situation in Scotland altogether out of sight. We cannot be placed behind the object lesson afforded by the London and North Western Railway Company, even although there may be a few holes in the mantle which the right hon. Gentleman has endeavoured to throw over that company. Exception has been taken to the terms of this Resolution, and especially with regard to that clause of it which says—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the excessive hours of labour imposed on railway servants by the existing arrangements of the Railway Companies of the United Kingdom constitute a grave scandal on justice."

No, Sir. I maintain that those hours of labour are more or less imposed on all railway servants as may enter the service of the different companies under their contracts. Unfortunately, those railway servants are not represented before the Board of Directors, and consequently have no means of expressing their grievances to the Railway Boards through their recognised representatives. In view of this fact, I do not think the language of the Resolution is at all too strong when it says that those hours "are imposed" upon the men. For my part, were it not that I am speaking as a representative of the district in Scotland in which there has been most serious difficulty on account of this strike, I should certainly not support any Resolution of this character. I, for one, am very much opposed to any attempt to interfere with the hours of labour by legislation unless the circumstances are such as to render it absolutely desirable, and therefore I should not take part in a discussion of this kind unless a case had been clearly put before the House in which exceptional circumstances have been demonstrated. The case of the Scotch railways was brought before the House by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan), and from that we find that in Scotland there has not been for some time past the means of maintaining safe railway communication. For more than a month railway travelling, not unattended with accidents, although neither of the accidents that have occurred have been of so serious a character as might have been anticipated, still, railway travelling in Scotland has not only been intermittent in service, but has also been accompanied by considerable danger. This is one of the reasons why we think there are some grounds for appealing to the President of the Board of Trade on this subject. Arbitration has been set aside in this dispute, and as it has been made impossible for any understanding to be arrived at we are bound to ask ourselves how long is this state of things to be allowed to continue without our trying to provide some machinery by which this unhappy deadlock may be ended. On the north of the Border there has been very considerable sympathy shown for the strikers, because of the circumstances under which these difficulties have arisen. They have not, perhaps, received that full measure of support which they might have obtained had it not been for the irregularity which occurred at the time of the origin of the strike. Serious exception has been taken to the movement because the strikers went out without notice, and it was felt to be quite impossible to conduct business unless the proper legal notices were observed. At the same time, there is some difference of opinion as to whether the contracts into which the men had entered were not of too severe a character. At any rate, for more than two years the men have been lodging complaints with regard to the hours of labour, and latterly the dispute became a question of the Union. The Directors refused to meet the representatives of the men because they were representatives of the Union. Now, it seems sufficiently obvious that if a state of affairs arises in which it is manifest that there can be no settlement of the dispute unless there are some means of forcing arbitration or some Government power which has power to intervene, then one or the other must be absolutely necessary. I should be sorry to see intervention by a Government Department until every other method had been tried, and had failed; but I think it was shown pretty clearly by the hon. Member for Edinburgh that in the case of this strike in Scotland everything has been done that could possibly be suggested in order to bring this dispute to an end. But all these endeavours have failed; and, therefore, I feel that, under the circumstances, I cannot refuse my support to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire. The conduct on the part of the men on strike has, upon the whole, been marked throughout by orderly conduct and by a proper expression of their grievances. The public support given to the movement has been of a very wide and extensive character. Meetings of thousands and thousands of individuals have been held in every part of the country in support of the reasonable demands of the men; and I believe that there has seldom been known so general a support on the part of the community in a case of this kind as that which has been given to the strikers in Scotland. Now, the result of the strike, if it should go against the men, would be that there will be a greatly increased demand for interference in these disputes by legislative enactment. That, I think, the House will see is quite inevitable. Various leaders of the Socialist Party have been in Scotland, and they have done not a little in order to stimulate the strikers. They have done, I venture to say, good work there. I should be very sorry, for my part, to see that strike fail. If the strike fails we shall have a much wider demand for legislative interference brought before this House than is made in this Motion. If the strike is terminated with the victory of the Directors it will not be the end of this matter. It will come up again in a more awkward form than now. Exception has been taken to the use of the term "blackleg." I should be the last to say anything as to the use of this term which would tend to heat the argument. But what has become apparent in this strike is, that a battle is being fought as between what is called free labour and the labour of the Unions. If employers throughout the country are going to uphold the cause of free labour and denounce what they call the tyranny of the Unions, we have no end of trouble before us in questions of capital and labour. That is the difficulty which I foresee, and it is one which has been brought prominently forward by the Directors of the Railway Companies in Scotland. Therefore, I have no option but to support the Resolution, and to express the hope that the President of the Board of Trade may find some way of helping us out of the mess into which the Railway Boards of Scotland has landed us.

*(8.50.) MR. J. G. BAIRD (Glasgow, Central): Sir, I have no reason to complain of the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for the Leith Burghs, and he has dealt with the question of the dispute in Scotland in a fair and reasonable manner. But for that dispute, I do not think I should have intervened in this Debate. But apart from the question affecting Scotland, and to come to the Motion before the House, the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, in moving it, at the outset said he did not desire any statutory limitations of the hours of labour. Well, I fail to see the difference between a statutory limitation and any limitation which the Board of Trade might be empowered to impose. It seems to me that the limit in one case is exactly the same as the limit in the other. The hon. Member wishes the Board of Trade to limit the hours of work for special classes of railway servants. The question will at once arise—what is to be the limit? Take the case of signalmen, which class is that upon which the safety of the public is supposed to depend more than upon any other. Are you to have an universal limit of hours for signalmen, or is each signal-box to be dealt with by the Board of Trade on its own merits, on the basis of the number of trains passing daily? A signalman at a great junction, or on a main line, of course has a great many more trains passing, and consequently has to be constantly in attendance; while a signalman on a branch line may sometimes have a considerable time between one train and the next, and, consequently his actual work may be much lighter. Is the Board of Trade to take into its hands the responsibility of laying down for each signal-box throughout the country what is to be the exact limit of hours of work? If it does, it will have a considerable amount of work to do. Again, take the case of engine drivers, another important class of railway servants. Suppose a day of 10 hours is fixed, is the engine driver on a run which occupies 12 hours, six hours one way and six hours back, to leave the engine two hours before he has completed the trip? That, of course, is out of the question. In the case of goods trains, which are often delayed in sidings, is the engine driver to cease working at the expiration of his 10 hours, no matter where he may be at the time? The fact is that the necessity for overtime cannot be obviated. You cannot fix an absolute limit to the hours of certain classes of railway servants. You may fix a limit of time beyond which overtime has to be paid for in wages; but then you come to a question of remuneration, which ought to be left to be settled by the companies and their servants. There is another point which the hon. Member seems to forget, although I do not think it a very important one. Does the hon. Member suppose that during the long hours which he mentions as being a danger, the men employed are being worked the whole time? He must know that goods trains and others are constantly detained in sidings for a considerable time to allow of the other traffic being worked. Will he explain how this is to be altered? I am sure the Directors and others who have to do with railways deplore the long hours as much as any hon. Member can do. If the Railway Directors had more funds at their disposal, they would be able to employ more men and increase the number of engines. The Railway Directors have to consider the interest of the public, of the shareholders, and of their employés. I daresay a considerable number of the more wealthy shareholders would not object to a diminished dividend; but the small holders would not like a reduction of their scanty profits. The fact is, it comes really to be a question of wages in connection with the dispute between the men and their employers. Where is the extra wages fund to come from? The dividends are not extravagant, and though some of the shareholders might, as I have said, be inclined to submit to a reduction in order that the men might have better wages, many poor people who hold a few shares in railways would feel the reduction of even 1 per cent. as a sensible reduction of their already scanty income. Then, again, the public agitate constantly for a reduction of rates and fares, and are moving the Board of Trade in that direction. You cannot eat your cake and have your cake, and you cannot reduce the revenue at the command of Railway Companies, and at the same time largely increase the working expenses. I am sure that Directors would be only too glad to reduce time and increase wages; but they have to consider the public, who ask for increased facilities involving large capital expenditure, and at the same time to satisfy the demands of the shareholders, who ask that their dividends at least shall not be reduced. It has been disputed that the men are seeking for shorter hours, and that they are really demanding more wages. I do not doubt that there are men who desire shorter hours; but, at the same time, I believe some of them desire to be paid more for their overtime. On Wednesday last Mr. John Wilson, Miners' Agent, Broxburn, speaking at Edinburgh, is reported to have told a deputation from Glasgow—

Mr. Munro Ferguson

"That to concede to the men 10 hours a day and to still give them 12 hours' pay would require an enormous sum of money. They all admitted that it would require some money, and they meant that. There was no use disguising that point. In this strike, and in all other strikes for more wages and more liberty, they were waging a just warfare."

So that at the bottom of the whole dispute lies the question of wages. They are asking for 60 hours a week and overtime at time and a half. With reference to the strike, I do not know whether hon. Members are aware that a telegram has been received to say that it has been settled on the basis of a proposal made by Lord Aberdeen. That information has come by telegraph, and I do not know that it has yet been verified. I hope such is the case. I do not care to go much into the subject of the strike, lest I should embitter the feeling of the men who have been induced to return to their work. Still, I must traverse one or two of the remarks of hon. Members opposite, with regard to public opinion in Scotland. It has been said that the opinion of Scotland is on the side of the men. I traverse that statement. I affirm, as I have the right to affirm, that public opinion in Scotland is just as much in favour of the companies as it is in favour of the men. The hon. Member for Mid Durham (Mr. John Wilson) said there is no doubt the public will not object to an increase of fares and an increase of railway rates. I do not think the hon. Member for Mid Durham knows the public of Scotland. He evidently is not aware of the persistent endeavours which are being made, not only by traders, but by those who use the lines as passengers, to get facilities in every shape and form—facilities which go to increase the capital expenditure of those railways, and consequently decrease the funds available for increase of stock, the number of locomotive engines, and any increase which might be desired in wages. Sir, I do not think that the Board of Trade would be well advised to accept the Motion of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire; but if the President of the Board of Trade thinks it right and proper that a Committee should be appointed to consider the whole question of these Returns, and see how far they are brought about by circumstances that may be altered, I, for my part, have no objection to offer.

* (9.2.) MR. A. C. MORTON (Peterborough): Representing, as I do, a constituency largely composed of railway men, I desire to express my surprise that the Government have not long ere this announced their intention of accepting this Resolution; and I also desire to express my surprise that a Member of the Government, and therefore a paid servant of the country, should have got up and made a speech, not as representing any constituency, but as a Director of a Railway Company. I confess I think it would have been better if he had allowed other directors in the House to take care of the companies. We have been told that this is a vote of censure on the Railway Companies: I cannot see that at all. It may be, and probably very properly will be, a vote of censure on a company which is not doing what is right with regard to the people of this country. If there are any Railway Companies that are doing what is right and proper both towards their men and towards the public, then this cannot be a vote of censure upon them; but if there are companies which are not doing what is right, and I am afraid there are a good many companies in that category, perhaps it is very properly a censure upon these companies. Surely we have a right here to censure companies. These companies get the right to carry on their business, which is a monopoly, from this House, and therefore from the country, and surely if they are not carrying on their business properly, and nobody can truly say they are doing so at the present moment, we have a right to consider the whole matter in the interest of the country. In that sense all reforms that are brought forward in this House are votes of censure, because to some extent they reflect upon the conduct of somebody. Are we to be prevented in the future from making any reforms in this country because it may be alleged it is a vote of censure upon somebody? I hope that opinion will not prevail. The Resolution has nothing to do with the settling of strikes; but if the idea of this Resolution could be properly carried out it would do something better, it would probably prevent strikes altogether, and that surely is a matter worthy of consideration. I hope this Scotch strike has been settled on terms fair to the men, and bearing in mind the great loss which the strike has occasioned to all classes of people, especially in Scotland, to my mind this is a proper time to consider whether, by legislation or otherwise, we cannot do something to prevent these strikes. That I take to be the actual meaning of this Resolution. The hon. Member who last spoke seems to think this is a proposal to interfere with and limit these companies in some way. I do not read the Resolution that way at all. It is to empower a Public Department to interfere if necessary, and, therefore, not unnecessarily interfere with the business of these companies. The Resolution says the Board of Trade shall interfere if they think it necessary on behalf of the people of this country and the workmen on the railways. I think this is a very proper interference, because these companies have the power to do their business from this House. This would not be the first time this Parliament has interfered with the trade of the country. We have interfered with the grocer and milkman, and that trade sacred to the Tory Party—the liquor trade—therefore, why do we not interfere, if necessary, in the interests of the country, with the Railway Companies, who derive what power they have from the people through their representatives in the House? If necessary, we ought to do so. I understand this Resolution to be an appeal to this House, not in a mere Party political sense, but as representing the whole of the country to do justice to an excellent body of workmen. I am sure nobody can deny that the railway servants of this country are an excellent body of workmen, a body whom any country might be proud of, and whom this House ought to be only too glad to protect if necessary; the Resolution goes further because an appeal is also made for the safety and protection of the travelling public. I am sure it is necessary. Take the case of accidents which have occurred recently. There was the accident near Taunton on the Great Western line, an accident which occurred entirely through the gross neglect of the Company in not having a proper servant to do the work—to look after the signal boxes—and also in failing apparently to provide proper sidings. If by this interference we could prevent such a dreadful accident as that, surely we should be doing right. I am afraid that the railway men are not so well represented in this House as the directors of railway companies, who, we were told just now, have a representation here of nearly 250. But I trust that this House will say the time has arrived when the workmen as well as the travelling public shall be protected. I am sorry that, although the Railway Companies are so well represented in this House, they themselves should object to the workmen being represented anywhere else. It certainly has appeared to me from what I have read, that this Scotch strike would probably never have occurred but for the fact that the directors objected to receive the representatives of the men, so as to hear what they had to say. I cannot see why the railway directors should have objected to receive Mr. Tait, who represented the men, any more than they should have the right to have the assistance of solicitors or others to assist them. If the men choose out of their own funds—mind not out of the railway funds—to pay a man to represent them before the directors or elsewhere, surely there ought to be no objection to that, especially when that man is a man selected on account of his knowledge of railway matters. We were told by an hon. Member, who spoke to-night on behalf of the Railway Companies, that there was no danger of any harm arising, because it would be against the interests of the Railway Companies. As a matter of fact, the Railway Companies have not been so particular about their interests. It is not so many years ago that third-class travellers were treated very badly by the companies. Nobody at that time could make the directors understand it was to their own interests to look after that class of the travelling public. Now they are finding out, after many years experience, that it is to their best interests to look after the third-class passengers, who pay the dividends and the expenses. There are many other ways in which it might be pointed out Railway Companies do not consider their best interests. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Baird) spoke about the Scottish people requiring increased facilities with regard to the traffic, as well as in regard to passengers, and he seemed to think that such increased facilities would reduce dividends by creating greater expenses. All experience has shown that the more facilities Railway Companies give to the public, the more profit they make, and therefore there is no proof that in giving facilities to the public, there is any harm to the Railway Companies whatever. If you cannot do justice to the workmen or to the travelling public without reducing the dividends, in my opinion, the dividends must be reduced. There is no question at all in my mind that the time is rapidly arriving when the working men of this country will demand, and properly demand, a larger share of the good things of this world; and if those who have received perhaps too large a share of them in the past have to give up, not the necessities of this life at all, but a few of the luxuries, I shall be only too glad. I only intervene to-night because I represent a constituency in which there are a large body of extremely respectable men connected with the railways, and because I thought the Government might have given way on this question without the necessity of a five hours debate. I trust the Government will now, not as a party matter at all, but in the interests of the people generally and the trade of the country, see their way to consent to something like this Resolution. It is all very well to propose a Commission, but generally such a proposal means getting rid of the matter altogether. You may depend upon it if the Government, if the Railway Directors in this House, are strong enough at the present moment to put this matter off, there is coming a time and probably very shortly, when they will have to do more for these people than they will be satisfied with at the present moment. My experience of working men in this country is that if you are willing to treat them fairly they will not require to be extravagantly dealt with, but if in good times you refuse to do the little which is necessary to enable them to live with some little regard to the comforts and decencies of life, then you may expect a time bye-and-bye when they will not only demand, but will have the power to compel you to give them a great deal more than they require at the present moment. I do therefore trust that the Government and the House will see their way to grant this demand. We do not wish to take anything from the companies, we simply wish to empower the Board of Trade to enquire into these matters, and if necessary do justice, not only to the workmen but to the people of the country generally.

Mr. A. C. Morton

(9.15.) SIR STAFFORD NORTH-COTE (Exeter): I merely rise to express the hope that when my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade rises he may be able to make some proposition on behalf of the Government which will spare the House the necessity of going to a division. I must frankly say that if my right hon. Friend were to meet the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton with anything like a non possumus, although I am a tolerably staunch Ministerialist I could not support the Government. Perhaps my title to speak is somewhat different from that of most of those who have addressed the House from these benches, because I have not the smallest pecuniary interest in any railway in this kingdom. Therefore I do not speak from the point of view of my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works or of some other hon. Gentlemen who have spoken from this side of the House. The reason why I trust it may be possible to avoid a Division is this: The main point which struck me in the speech of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire was the suggestion, which was, I think, very acceptable upon that side of the House, that disputes of this kind should, if possible, be settled by some conciliatory means. What I would submit to the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, if he were in his place, is that if he presses his Motion at the present time to a Division it would be a very unfortunate preliminary to the establishment of such a conciliatory Board as he contemplates. If he were to carry his Motion, the Railway Companies, one and all, would feel that they were stigmatised as companies who treated their workmen harshly, whereas, although he spoke with certain vagueness, the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton) thought that some companies were guilty and others innocent. I think the passing of this Resolution would be felt by the companies as fixing a stigma upon them, and therefore render them singularly unwilling to co-operate with the Government in the establishment of a Board of Conciliation. On the other hand, if the hon. Member presses his Motion, and it is defeated, the employés of the Companies would consider that Parliament was going into the establishment of a Board of Conciliation after pre-judging their case, and pre-judging it adversely to them. Therefore, if the President of the Board of Trade sees his way to propose the appointment of a Commission or Committee, or to make some suggestion which will in no way impugn the principle of the hon. Gentleman's Motion, in so far as that Motion requires that the grievances of the workmen shall be fully inquired into, I hope the hon. Gentleman will not insist upon pressing the matter to a Division.

Sir Stafford Northcote

(9.23.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): The hon. Member for the Central Division of Glasgow (Mr. Baird) said that public opinion in Scotland is universally against the railway servants in their strike. I have just returned from Scotland, and before doing so I took the trouble to find out what the public opinion of Scotland was. There are some persons who sympathise with the Railway Companies, or, at least whose sympathies are against the strikers; but so far as I can learn these persons are merely the large employers of labour, who feel very jealous of working men's unions, and want to see them defeated every time there is a strike. Outside the class of big employers of labour I think the fraction of the Scottish people which is not in favour of the strikers is very small indeed, and I should say you get a very small fraction of that fraction who have a good word to say for the behaviour of the North British Railway Company. The hon. Member also said that if concessions are made to the men, it must necessarily follow that the dividends of the shareholders will be reduced. That is possibly the case, but at any rate that is not an argument that ought to weigh with this House. Railways are monopolies. People who promote railways, who buy up the interests of former investors, must take the evil with the good. They contract to carry the public and the goods of the public from one point to another. They have had a monopoly given to them because they have contracted. They have contracted to carry passengers and goods continuously, and to say that they are losers in certain events is not an argument that ought to have any weight with the House of Commons. Some hon. Members have said we ought not to make allusions to the very unfortunate railway strike in Scotland. I can hardly agree with that. The latter portion of the Motion proposes to give power to the Board of Trade to limit the hours of work of railway servants in certain cases, and I maintain that the present strike affords a most excellent illustration of the need of the Board of Trade having some such power conferred upon it. I speak on this occasion as the representative of a part of Lanarkshire that is especially affected by the strike, and I contend that the inconvenience caused to the public in my district is such as can hardly be exaggerated. Earlier in the evening an hon. Member on this side spoke of the extreme distress that had been caused in some of the districts by the strike, and I noticed one or two hon. Members laughed. They evidently thought the hon. Member exaggerated, but he did not do so. In my own district there are several of the great steel works of Scotland. Those works employ many hundreds of people; but in consequence of the strike they have been closed for four weeks. The employés are suffering very great hardships because a Board of Scotch Directors have had a quarrel with their employés. Coal cannot be carried from one place to another, and many of the mines are not being worked at all. Other mines are only being worked one, two, or three days a week. The distress amongst the mining population is really very acute indeed. But it is getting beyond the labouring men. Small shopkeepers in the mining villages and towns have told me how very grievously the strike has affected their trade. They laid in stores for the beginning of the new year, but they have found their trade almost entirely paralysed. I maintain that the distress in the industrial districts of Scotland can hardly be exaggerated. When it is in the power of a few gentlemen from no motive whatever to paralyse the trade of a great part of a country, it is high time, in the interest of the public, that some authority—and the Board of Trade is the most convenient authority—had some power given to it to interfere. Judging from the newspaper accounts one would believe that the strike is a much more partial affair than it is. Every day the newspapers have announced that the traffic was steadily improving. Nearly all the English newspapers have indulged in systematic misstatement for nearly five weeks. I am not in a position to know, but I have a very great doubt as to whether even the Returns published by the Railway Companies of their week's traffic are wholly to be relied upon. I have seen very few mineral trains running, and I suspect that the Railway Companies have included in their week's receipts receipts for goods which they have not yet been able to deliver. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works thinks this Resolution is intended to stir up discord. I do not think anyone who has been to Scotland and seen how far-reaching the effect of this strike is, would regard any attempt to end this strike and avert subsequent strikes, as an attempt to stir up discord. There is only one thing more I wish to do, and that is to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether enquiries have been held or are going to be held into the accidents that have happened on Scotch railways during the last five weeks. Every morning the Scotch newspapers have contained circumstantial accounts of accidents here and there. Only one has been attended by loss of life, but there has been several very serious accidents. I hope the President of the Board of Trade will tell us that the Board of Trade have inquired into all such accidents, and that it has not turned its blind eye to Scotland just now to make matters easier for the Railway Companies in their difficulties. I have felt obliged to make these observations because I believe it is only through the authority of Parliament or some body delegated by Parliament that a great calamity like the present strike can be averted in the future.

*(9.30.) COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): Hon. Gentlemen opposite have taken credit for the fact that the terms of the Resolution appeared on the Notice Paper of the House before the strike on the Scottish Railways began, but I should have been glad if the circumstances of the strike had been excluded from the present discussion, because they have a rather disturbing influence upon our consideration of the proposal for the establishment of a Board of Arbitration. It leads to confusion to have to discuss in one debate the question of such a Board being instituted and the merits of this particular dispute, whether the men had a right to leave their employment without notice, and the other points involved which have no relation to the Motion now before the House. In regard to the Motion itself as it is worded, I have no difficulty upon public grounds in supporting it, but if I am supposed to sanction any opinion upon the strike itself, I should require a large amount of time to state my views and explain my position. With regard to the Board of Trade having some control over the length of hours on railway employment, I have no doubt as to the expediency of some such intervention, for when I look at the results of inquests and inquiries into the causes of railway accidents, I generally find that the man to whom blame is attached seeks shelter in an excuse that he was overworked. From the regularity with which this plea is advanced, and from the remarks Inspectors of the Board of Trade have made, it is evident that something in the direction indicated should be done. An accident near Taunton, and the evidence showing how long a signalman there had been on duty is a recent instance proving that in the public interest some regulation is required. Having found one sufficient reason, I do not know that it is necessary that I should seek for others; but, at the same time, if the Government say that this is a large question, and before taking action they require further inquiry as to how the control is to be exercised, how regulations should be framed, whether they should also apply to steamboats, omnibuses, and other forms of public conveyance, I should be quite satisfied with that assurance, as expressing an intention to deal with the subject. I shall therefore vote for the Motion, unless the Government offer to find a better remedy.

(9.36.) MR. BIRRELL (Fife, West): I think I may assure the hon. and gallant Gentleman that by his vote he will in no way commit himself to an expression of opinion upon the strike in Scotland, which during the last four or five weeks has occupied public attention. At the same time, I do not think he can be surprised that Scottish Members should see in that lamentable conflict very good reasons for inducing men like himself to support this Motion. Like my hon. Friend who spoke just now, I represent a constituency of which I suppose I can say with safety it has suffered more in trade and general discomfort during the last five weeks in consequence of this lamentable dispute than if Great Britain had been engaged in a war with France or Germany; and when we find this dispute arises from the excessive hours of labour to which the servants of a public undertaking are subjected, and when we find this Motion is based on official evidence of these excessive hours of labour, then, putting the two things together, it is impossible for Scottish Members to keep this strike out of their minds and arguments. I confess I am rather surprised at the modesty of the Board of Trade. It is usual for most Boards to magnify the importance of their functions, and they consider it their duty, like a good Judge, to amplify their jurisdiction. But what a futile and absurd position for the Board to take up! Here we have the Returns compiled by the officials of the Board, showing the extent of this excessive labour, and we have Reports from skilled Inspectors showing the frequency of accidents and the lamentable loss of life resulting from this overwork system. These Reports are laid before us under the authority of the Department over which the right hon. Gentleman presides, and I should have thought he would have been glad to avail himself of the opportunity of giving effect to the recommendations of his own Inspectors. Are we to suppose that these Reports are mere academic exercises for the amusement of hon. Members or to harrow our feelings? I should have thought they were intended to lead to action. What is the good of sending Major Marindin, Colonel Hutchinson, and others, to inquire and report, trace home the causes, and place the results before us? The Department says, "We can get the information, but we do not know what to do with it." I should have thought a Minister of the Crown would have been glad to have the means of remedy placed in his hands. It has been said by Railway Directors and others that it would be impossible to fix any number of hours as a limit of service in certain cases, and that may or may not be the case; but, at any rate, there must be something in the system requiring change when Inspectors all agree that the hours are excessive and improper. There is no difference of opinion among the officers who make the inquiries, and all we ask is that power should be given to the Board of Trade to prevent its documents becoming little more than waste paper. Some suggestion seems to be made from the other side of the House that further inquiry is essential in this matter. Now, I must say I think the House has already possession of sufficient information. These Reports are not disputed; these Returns are not disputed. What more do we want? We have the information, and I hope we shall have the courage to act upon it. The First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) was angry at the use of the word "imposed," and he made use of the familiar argument that in this free country no workman is obliged to accept any particular conditions of labour unless he likes. I wish it were so. I cannot hear the statement without giving it a flat denial. The poor man must work, or starve, or eat the bread of dependence, which is the worst alternative. If he works he must accept the conditions upon which he can get that work, and it is the duty of the State to see that these conditions are compatible with decent human existence. On that part of the question I do not see any difficulty. Men are obliged to work on the terms offered. No doubt in some trades they can protect themselves. In mining, for instance, when employers are anxious to limit the output, it is not so difficult to come to an agreement as to hours of labour; but when employers are anxious to increase the amount of work I do not believe there is an organisation in any trade sufficient to protect itself against the greed of the capitalist or the brutality of a Joint Stock Company. We have had a Director of the North British Railway making observations which led me to suppose that he would be glad to support the Motion, but he finds himself as a Director in an awkward position. If he does not pay a dividend his shareholders are angry, if his rates are high he offends the public. Between the two he finds himself, honest man, in a difficult position. Well, I should have thought he would have been glad to have transferred some part of his responsibility to the broad shoulders of the President of the Board of Trade, that he would be glad to find that shelter which a trustee seeks from a troublesome heir, saying, "I would be glad to comply with your wishes, but the law will not allow me to do so." In like manner I should have thought a Director would have been glad to say, "We would get more work out of our servants, but we cannot under Board of Trade regulations."

Colonel Hughes

*(9.41.) Mr. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I quite agree with the hon. Member who has just spoken that there is no necessity for further inquiry. The hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Howorth) suggested at an earlier period of the Debate that the Government should appoint a Royal Commission or a Committee to make inquiries; but I should like to know into what would a Commission or Committee inquire? The facts about the length of hours are before the House and the country; they are published in the Official Returns of the Board of Trade, and if that Department requires more facts it has ample opportunity of acquiring them without further intervention by the House. I am afraid that this Commission or Committee is nothing more or less than a convenient shelter, which is run to by those who are afraid of affirming the principle which underlies this Motion. What is that principle? That the machinery of the Board of Trade should be set in motion to limit the hours of labour for railway servants. That is a principle in which I cordially concur. I am not afraid of supporting that opinion by my vote, and I shall not be deterred by the promise of inquiry from going into the Lobby in support of this Motion. It seems to me the Returns published are little creditable to the great Railway Companies of England. Honourable mention has been made of the South-Western Company, which, with the exception of a very small percentage of guards on goods trains, does not work any of its servants for more than 12 hours daily. But if we make honourable mention of one company, we must make dishonourable mention of another company. The South Eastern Company has achieved the infamous distinction of having in 1889 employed 100 per cent. of its drivers and firemen for over 12 hours daily.

An hon. MEMBER: What—all?

Mr. BAUMANN: That is the point. From another Return, it appears that the South Eastern is one of the most unpunctual as well as the most inhuman of the Railway Companies in England. I do not think I need spend much time at this hour in establishing the position that the State, as represented by the Board of Trade, is justified in intervening between Railway Companies and their employés. Railway Companies are the spoiled children of the Legislature. They come Session after Session for powers and privileges, which, so far as I know, Parliament has never denied them; and I think we, who represent the people who give the companies these large powers, are perfectly justified in exacting in return a stipulation that they shall work their servants under reasonably humane conditions. I know there is a very strong feeling against the Motion, on the ground that it is interference with the freedom of adult labour—and it is no use blinking the fact that it is an interference with adult labour—and that is said to be Socialism of the most dreadful description. Well, I have never heard that Lord Macaulay was a Socialist; but in supporting the "Ten Hours Bill," in 1846, he used these words—

"I hold that where public health is concerned, and where public morality is concerned, the State may be justified in regulating even the contracts of adults."

Now, upon this question of interference with adult labour, we hear very extraordinary arguments from all quarters of the House. I hear a great many hon. Gentlemen say, "I am perfectly willing to interfere for the purpose of restricting the labour of railway employés, not for the sake of benefit to the employés, but for the safety of the public. We have not a word or shred of sympathy for the unfortunate men who are being injured every day—and the injury they will feel to the end of their lives—by overwork, though there is an overflow of sentiment for the luxurious travelling public, who once in a "blue moon" may be injured in an accident arising from this overwork. I am in favour of limiting the labour of railway servants for their own sake. We are told that intervention is justifiable for the benefit of the public; well, I should like to know whether these hundreds of thousands of railway servants are not also members of the public? They are, and a very deserving section of the public. I say that, though in my own constituency there is no considerable number of railway servants. But hon. Gentlemen who take up this prudish attitude about interference with adult labour appear to forget that adult male labour has already been regulated by the State under two very important Statutes, the "Lord's Day Observance" Act and the "Bank Holidays" Act. There are hundreds of thousands of people who would be only too glad to work on Sundays and Bank Holidays. You have regulated days of labour; why should you not regulate hours of labour? I maintain that the principle of legislative interference with adult male labour has already been affirmed by the Acts I have mentioned. We have ample precedents for such legislation in the United States. Adult male labour is restricted in the State of New York on elevated railways and tramcars to 10 hours daily, and it is a misdemeanour for a company to exact more from a servant. In the State of New Jersey there is a 12 hours day; for the same class of employés in the State of Maine, 10 hours; there is a restriction in Rhode Island, Connecticut, and in Maryland, where there is a 10 hours day in the State tobacco warehouses, and on street cars and elevated railways a limitation to 12 hours, every breach of the law being a misdemeanour, for which a company is liable to a fine of 100 dollars. In Pennsylvania, Indiana, Michigan, and California there is an eight hours day, though the time may be exceeded by private contract. But in California, in all State and Municipal contracts, there must be a clause to the effect that the servants of a Public Body are not to work more than eight hours a day. It may be that the law in California is evaded—that may be so or not; my argument is, that these are examples of legislative interference with hours of adult male labour, and there are precedents for discussing the principle which underlies the Motion of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, that the intervention of the Board of Trade should be invoked to limit the excessive hours of labour imposed on railway servants. If the hon. Member carries his Motion to a Division I shall have great pleasure in following him into the Lobby.

Mr. Baumann

* (9.51.) MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars, &c.): It is gratifying to know that we are to have the assistance of many hon. Members opposite who are usually not in the Lobby with us. But I am surprised that there are not more of them. There appears to be a fear of the terms of the Motion, although the terms are so wide and open that it is perfectly clear that voting for the Motion will not commit any hon. Member to an "Eight Hours" Bill or any other Bill. All that the Motion proposes to do is to give the Board of Trade a discretionary power of regulating the hours of work of the railway servants where they may think that the hours of labour are excessive. That may not include all railways, and therefore cannot be said to cast a stigma upon Railway Companies generally. The Board of Trade possessing the powers will only issue orders where such are necessary. No doubt the Board would issue orders to the South-Eastern Company, and it is tolerably certain they would not issue any orders to the South-Western Company. I think it must be clear to the House that undoubtedly a case has been made out for legislative interference in reference to the work of railway men, and the only question that remains is the direction such interference should take. The Board of Trade would not define a certain number of hours to be worked daily by every man in the employment of a Railway Company, because, as we all know a hard-and-fast line of that kind would be unworkable. But it would not be unworkable to lay down a rule limiting the number of hours of regular and overtime work a man should be required to perform in a week or a fortnight. That would not be unworkable, and therefore the scope which is permitted under this Motion is so wide, that I am surprised any hon. Member should think it interferes with any principle he imagines is adhered to by the House of Commons as to fixing the hours of adult male labour. There are many reasons why the Legislature should interfere in a case of this kind. In the first place, a strike of railway servants is not an ordinary strike of workmen against their employers, it is a strike against the community, and that is what it has been in Scotland. Perhaps the Railway Companies, if the strike should terminate now, would lose, say, £200,000 in traffic and other ways, but that is not a tenth part of the loss the community has suffered by the strike. In Lanarkshire the men, in many trades, are reduced to idleness by the strike. There is a single factory where 5,000 men are rendered idle by the strike, as many, perhaps, as the number of railway men on strike. In the print works in the Vale of Leven there were at one time 6,000 men in enforced idleness in consequence of the strike. The loss to the community, directly and indirectly, has been enormous. Probably this loss has affected two or three million of inhabitants in a greater or lesser degree; but the loss is spread so widely that it is impossible to make a computation as to what that loss has amounted to. Another reason for interference is the interest in public safety. I think the hon. Member for South Salford (Mr. Howorth) spoke of the Legislature never having interfered in the question of individual labour; but that is a mistake. This House has interfered many times when the health of persons has been in danger. There are many instances of Acts interfering with the conditions of adult male labour, and this Motion will, if carried, be simply carrying out the same principle in relation to railways which has been carried out in other branches of employment in the country. Such intervention is even more necessary in reference to railways, because of the character of the work railway servants have to do, at least those of them who have to do with the train service. They are onerous duties, they require all a man's attention, there must be no carelessness, and he must be as competent to discharge his duty in the last hour of his day's work as when he began his day's work. There is another reason why the Legislature should interfere, that the men need to be protected against themselves. We have heard to-night of a man who, at the end of 12 hours work, undertook another shift of 12 hours out of kindness to a fellow-workman; and, on the other hand, there is no doubt that a large number of men, for the sake of the extra money they earn, will undertake almost any amount of overtime, and against men who undertake more than they are capable of the travelling public must be protected, and the only way to do that is to apply compulsory powers — powers which the Board of Trade ought to take to prevent Railway Companies employing men beyond a certain number of hours consecutively. Major Marindin, in a Report on a fatal railway accident, said that these accidents would occur until the companies were compelled not to employ drivers and stokers more than a reasonable number of hours. There are many reasons, besides those I have named, why the State should intervene in a question of this kind. It has been suggested that in this Debate we ought not to refer to the strike now going on in Scotland; but I say that had the opportunity not been taken to dwell on the lessons we have learned from that strike, the discussion would have been a very partial and one-sided one. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University, and likewise, I believe, the Member for Reading, told the House that the Railway Companies were very much against overtime; that it was very costly, and that as much as possible they prevented it. One speaker suggested that all the extra hours mentioned in the Report were overtime. But that is not so, for many cases are mere irregularities. The system prevailing on the Scotch Railways is a 12 hours day, with a fortnight unit, so that a man must work at least 144 hours in a fortnight, and until he does that he gets no overtime. If he has a day off he must make up the time on other days. Now, the mechanics employed by the Railway Companies to build their locomotives only work nine hours a day, while the men who drive the engines sometimes work 18 hours a day and longer. There have been cases in which men have been on a locomotive for 23 hours, and I heard of one case in Glasgow where two men were on an engine for 28 hours. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University gave us a very interesting account of the London and North Western system. No doubt there are some good railways and some bad ones. I submit that the particulars we have show that the strike in Scotland was caused by overwork. In that respect the London and North Western Railway Company were themselves very bad at one time. In the returns to this House for January, 1887, there were given 1,204 cases in which drivers and stokers had been at work for 17 hours. In the return for March last there were only 56 such cases. Again, in the return for January, 1887, there were given 562 cases in which drivers and stokers had been on locomotives for 18 or more hours consecutively, whereas in the return for last March there were only 5 such cases. That shows what a company can do. We have been told that these cases of excessive hours have arisen from unforeseen circumstances that could not be controlled. But is the House to understand that while in January, 1887, there were 1,204 cases beyond control, last March there were only 56? Does the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University mean to say that all these cases arose from causes which the company could not control? Nothing of the kind. They could have been prevented in January, 1887, just as easily as they were in March, 1890. They were due to bad management in 1887, and are now fewer in number because the line is better managed. Now, as to the Scotch companies—the Caledonian and the North British. The Returns are very interesting, and show that the plea of unforeseen circumstances cannot apply to them. In January, 1887, the Caledonian had 9,912 cases where goods guards were employed for more than 13 hours consecutively. Last March the number had been reduced to 500. In January, 1887, there were 364 cases of goods guards working 14 hours; last March there were only 113. In January, 1887, in 23 cases men worked 16 hours; last March there were only 10 such cases. Thus there was a general improvement. But let us examine the figures relating to the North British Railway. This strike in Scotland has been entirely brought about by the shameful treatment of the employés on the North British Railway. I may mention at once that in every case the figures for last March are worse than those for January, 1887. In the last-named month there were 107 cases in which guards worked 18 hours and over consecutively. In March last there were no fewer than 245 such cases. How about the doctrine of unforeseen circumstances. Does it apply to this case? The simple explanation is that the railway is undermanned. In January, 1887, there were 724 cases in which drivers and stokers had been employed for 18 hours or more. If this line had been like the Caledonian and London and North-Western Railway, if the management had improved the figures would have been reduced; but as a matter of fact there were 1,016 such cases last March. Therefore, although we have been told that overtime in nearly every case is the result of unforeseen circumstances, yet the House can now see that the real cause is very different indeed. These figures illustrate the necessity for legislative interference in these cases, for remember that although these figures have been for months in the possession and knowledge of the directors of the North British, they have done nothing to remedy the grievance, and thus have brought about the strike. We know that the directors and managers have refused to treat with the men unless they return to their work unconditionally, and trust to their sense of justice; but what sense of justice can there be in managers and directors who allow such a state of things to prevail? I believe the strike might have been avoided if the Board of Trade had issued its mandate to the company to improve its management. The hon. Member for Central Glasgow referred to the question of dividends, but I am sure the House will agree with me when I say that dividends have nothing whatever to do with this question. If a Railway Company never paid a dividend at all it should be as liable to treat its employés fairly and equitably, as is the company which pays the highest dividend. I hope, at any rate, this Debate will induce the Government to accept the proposal before the House, and that the North British will be compelled to treat its servants in a very different fashion in future from what it has done in the past, and I therefore have much pleasure in supporting the Motion of my hon. Friend.

Mr. Provand

*(10.20.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The reason I have not addressed the House at any earlier period of this Debate is not want of interest in the subject, or because Her Majesty's Government have not considered the course it will be their duty to take in regard to it. It is because I saw many hon. Members on both sides were anxious to address the House, and on a subject of such singular difficulty and complexity, I own I was anxious to become acquainted with their opinions. There is one feature in the Debate which perhaps I may say has given me unaffected and unalloyed pleasure, and that is the remarkably unanimous and almost childlike confidence which the House has expressed in the Board of Trade. I do not take that as a compliment to myself, but as a well-deserved compliment to the permanent officials in the Department over which I have the honour to preside. But that confidence has been carried by some hon. Members and a good many persons outside this House to an utterly unreasonable point. They are not only confident in us for the future, and willing to repose in us very indefinite power, but they appear to believe we possess to a great extent those powers at the present moment. I have received a very considerable number of memorials from public bodies and other persons in the districts affected by the recent strikes, praying for the intervention of the Board of Trade, and I have been obliged to reply to the effect that the Board of Trade has absolutely no authority to interfere in a dispute between employers and employed. Some of the suggestions that have been made on this point have struck me as remarkable. I have no intention whatever of dwelling on this strike in Scotland. I can assure hon. Members that if by the expenditure of any time and trouble I could have shortened that strike by a single day, no time or trouble would have been spared. But the suggestions have been very vague. I notice this morning in a speech made by the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow that he is reported to have used last night these words—

"When Railway Companies stood out beyond a certain point in a question of a strike which originated in hours and overtime, in his opinion Parliament and the Government had a right to say something."

A good deal has been said to-night, but that does not carry us much further. The right hon. Gentleman, however, went on to say something. He said—

"It was impossible that gentlemen like those should be dealt with by a Parliament in which every employer had on an average several votes, and the employed only an occasional vote."

Anyone who reads the Debate of to-night will be of opinion that that was a most invidious and unfair statement as applied to the House of Commons. In the course of this Debate we have had several suggestions. It has been suggested that the Board of Trade should set up a Board of Conciliation, and should have some kind of initiative to compel the two parties to a strike to agree, and the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, with some inconsistency, proposed to withdraw his Motion if I accept a proposition which is in no way involved in it. No one knows more about legislative attempts at the establishment of Boards of Conciliation than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield. He was the author of an admirably designed Act, which I am afraid has been almost forgotten, for promoting the formation of voluntary Boards of Conciliation. This Act has fallen stillborn. Boards of Conciliation formed without the interference of Parliament have been most successful in dealing with disputes between capital and labour, and all desire, no doubt, that that system should be extended. But if the Board of Trade are asked to propose legislation in order to enable them to appoint a Board of Conciliation, I should like to ask those who make the proposition, firstly, how are we to compel disputes to be referred to such a Board, and, secondly, how are we to compel the two parties to carry out the award of the Board? I do not wish to argue that matter to-night, but until these questions I have just put can be answered, I believe the idea of the establishment of a Board of Conciliation through the operation of the Board of Trade is nothing more nor less than a chimera. Blame has been largely attributed to the North British Company in the recent strike, and I am afraid blame might fairly be attributed to both sides. I do not wish to say one word of blame of anybody, because I trust the strike will soon be ended, and the news may be true that it is ended already. The question really at issue in this strike was not one of overtime merely. That may have been the question at issue to a certain extent, but I believe the real question at issue was a question of pay—what the length of a normal day should be, and what was to be paid for hours worked beyond the normal day. That to my mind is not involved in the Motion of the hon. Gentleman at all. It is a dispute between employers and employed on a question of wages, and it is a question with which neither Parliament or Government could usefully interfere. Supposing they were to agree to a six hours day and overtime to be paid for at the rate of time and a half, we should none the less have to consider here, on the principles of the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, whether it was safe in the interest of the public and the men themselves that they should be free to work beyond that normal day as much time as they liked. The proposal of the hon. Gentleman is that some kind of power should be vested in the Board of Trade absolutely to forbid excessive overtime. I think that anyone who has at all considered the Returns that have been presented to the House will observe that the complaints of excessive overtime are mainly true with regard to goods and mineral drivers, firemen, and guards. I think my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works addressed a very fair argument to the House with regard to those Returns. He pointed out that they were not so unsatisfactory as represented by some speakers. He showed that taking the total number of men employed, and the number of working days, the daily percentage of men employed on overtime was comparatively small, and he went on to show that overtime does not necessarily mean continuous work; that, for instance, the driver of a goods train might during the period of employment counted as overtime be shunted into a siding or shed and not be absolutely at work; or that a guard might be waiting at London in a comfortable room provided for him by his employers until it was time for him to return to his train for the return journey. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, but it is so. There is no question that the London and North Western Company and also other companies have made provision for their servants, by which they have been able to take rest at intervals when they have been on duty more than the normal hours. Again, a signalman, for instance, in a box at a country station, where there are comparatively few trains passing in the course of his 12 hours' duty, really has very many intervals of leisure, and I can say from my own knowledge that in many of these cases of 12 hours work the day's duty has been as light and is as easy as an able-bodied man could be called upon to perform. I mention these points because I think there are allowances which should fairly be made in estimating what is excessive overtime as proved by the Returns; but I am bound to admit that in my opinion the reports of the Inspectors of the Board of Trade show that the safety of the officials and of the travelling public is affected by excessive overtime. In the years 1889 and 1890 there were 122 inquiries into railway accidents by Inspectors of the Board of Trade. In 14 of these cases the accident was found to have been more or less due to excessive hours of work on the part of the railway servants, principally drivers and firemen, and 24 separate instances of overtime were given in these cases. My hon. Friend the Member for North Somersetshire (Mr. Llewellyn) asked me to state whether anything is done with regard to the Reports on accidents by Inspectors of the Board of Trade which are laid upon the Table of the Houses of Parliament. Well, I can tell him, and the fact is obvious from statements that have been made in the course of the Debate, that the Board of Trade most carefully studies these reports, and addresses remonstrances and advice to the Railway Companies upon any point on which remonstrance or advice can effectively be offered. That is all the law at present empowers us to do, and we do it, and I believe that in many cases that action and the publicity given to the Report of the Inspector have been followed by the necessary improvement in the arrangements for working the railway. I was also asked by an hon. Member what course the Board of Trade will take with reference to certain accidents which he alleged had occurred during the continuance of the unhappy strike in Scotland. Well, Sir, we have taken, and we shall take with regard to any accident of that kind precisely the same course we should take in respect to any accident occurring under other circumstances. We shall be neither harder nor milder towards the Railway Company with regard to them than we should be if there had been no strike at all. An accident must, of course, be of some importance to call for a Board of Trade inquiry, but I must say that the tendency of my own mind would be to inquire more carefully into railway accidents that occurred during strikes than into those that occurred under ordinary circumstances. Now, a good deal has been said on both sides about the feeling of the men in respect to overtime. I think there could be no doubt that, at any rate in the past, much of the overtime that has been recorded has been worked with perfect readiness by the men themselves. I do not say that they have done that altogether from any mercenary motive. The men are, of course, attracted by the prospect of earning extra wages, and who would not be? It is not only that. An engine driver feels towards his engine, even a signalman feels towards his signal-box, something of the pride that a sailor feels in his ship. He does not like to see a stranger mount his engine or put in charge of his signal box. He is zealous, and admirably zealous, in the work which he is set to do. Therefore it is not at finding fault [with the men, but as stating a simple fact, very much to their credit, that I say overtime is often due to the willingness of the men themselves to work it, even against the desire of the companies. I say against the desire of the companies, and I will prove it. I know that on one railway—and I believe it is the case on others—there is a rule in operation that drivers or guards are directed to inform the stationmaster where their trains stop, when their hours are likely to be exceeded before they arrive at their destination, and on their making that statement the stationmaster is bound by telegraph to provide for their relief at the earliest station at which it can be given. Yet that rule has had to be enforced on the men by fines, and the fact is a clear proof, if any proof were wanting, that this overtime is often against the desire of the Companies. Much has been said to-night by those who have spoken for the men, which induces me to think that the views of the men are changing on this point—that there is a desire on their part which surpasses the wish to increase their wages, to have in future, free to themselves, sufficient time for relaxation as well as for rest. That is a desire with which I am sure every Member of this House will sympathise, and I would venture to point out to the House that this desire, if it be so, removes a very serious obstacle in the way of getting rid of excessive overtime, either by the regulations of the companies or by the interference of Parliament or the Government. I should like, however, to make one observation on the possibility of preventing excessive overtime. It is absolutely impossible, I venture to say, to prevent it altogether. No one who has entered in the least degree into the necessities—the absolute necessities—of railway working can dispute that proposition. You may have a railway accident which disorganises the whole traffic of the line; trains are delayed, and over time even to an excessive extent, is often necessary on the part of the servants in the interests of the public safety. Or there may be a fog or a snowstorm, or one of the steamers crossing the English or Irish Channel might be delayed by a storm—any one of these things, as well as some unexpected excess of traffic may throw the working of a railway out of gear, and there must be overtime, perhaps excessive overtime, to meet it. That, I think, is a proposition which cannot be disputed. But the question is whether these Returns do or do not prove excessive overtime, extending far beyond any necessity of this kind, and I am bound to say that in my judgment they do; and more, that they show that there is more overtime on some lines than can be required by any difference between the circumstances of their traffic, and the circumstances of other lines with less overtime. It was remarked, and I think with force, in the course of the debate that the observations that have been made against the Railway Companies are by no means of universal application; that the action of some companies in these matters has been deserving of praise, and that if all companies acted like them there would be no necessity for this discussion, or for the interference of Parliament. That I believe to be true, and I believe also that the fact is a proof that all the companies might vastly improve their position if they only tried to do so. Still there has been progress in this direction. I have compared the Returns of March, 1888 with those of March, 1890, with respect to the eight chief companies in Great Britain as to the overtime of goods drivers and guards—that is to say employment beyond 12 hours and beyond 13 hours—and I find that in six of those eight companies there has been a sensible decrease in the percentage of overtime; one has been stationary, and one, I am sorry to say, has gone the wrong way. I can assure the House that this debate is by no means the first time my attention has been called to this subject. As long ago as October last, speaking in public in the district where the unfortunate railway strike has occurred—in Kilmarnock—I stated plainly my opinion that the Railway Companies ought to take in hand for themselves this question of excessive overtime, that it would be much better dealt with by them than by Parliament, but that it would have to be dealt with by Parliament if they failed to do so. Towards the end of last November I emphasized that statement by an official letter addressed to the Railway Association, calling their attention to the number of cases in which my inspectors had reported that accidents were due to excessive overtime, and requesting them at once to consult and consider what should be done to remedy the evil. I am sorry to say, however, that little, if anything, has been done: the Railway Companies, perhaps, have not sufficient influence over each other to remove this difficulty for themselves. I wish they had. I must honestly say, and most Members of the House will share this view with me, that, if the Railway Companies would act in these matters for themselves, it would be infinitely better for the public at large than that Parliament or the Government should interfere. But I am forced to the conclusion that such interference is necessary. And now I come to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. I thank the House for the confidence expressed in the Board of Trade, but no where is that confidence more touchingly expressed than in the terms of the hon. Member's Motion. He asks the House to resolve—

Sir M. Hicks Beach

Sir M. Hicks Beach

"That, in the opinion of this House, the excessive hours of labour imposed on railway servants by the existing arrangements of the Railway Companies of the United Kingdom constitute a grave scandal on justice, and are a constant source of danger both to the men themselves and to the travelling public; and that it is expedient that the Board of Trade should obtain powers by legislation to issue orders, where necessary, directing Railway Companies to limit the hours of work of special classes of their servants, or to make such a reasonable increase in any class for their servants as will obviate the necessity for overtime work."

But neither in the terms of the Motion nor in his speech, nor in the speech of any single hon. Member to-night, can I find the slightest hint as to the regulations which should be made. This House is asked to resolve that the Board of Trade should be placed in the position of a general director of all the Railway Companies of Great Britain and Ireland. And the Board of Trade is to do something—what we do not know—to carry into effect the general principle which this House is asked to affirm.

*MR. CHANNING: I think I stated in my speech that my suggestion was that an order should be issued by the Board of Trade, where it is found by the evidence, for instance, that the booked times for engine-drivers are such as are proved by experience to constantly result in these excessive hours, requiring the companies to limit or alter the hours of booking those men.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: What does the hon. Gentleman mean? Am I to issue an order that no engine-driver shall work for more than twelve, ten, or eight hours?

*MR. CHANNING: No.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not put this point by way of controversial argument, but as a practical difficulty. It seems to me it is a practical difficulty of enormous importance, and when I heard the Member for West Fifeshire suggesting that it was the easiest thing in the world for the Board of Trade to undertake it, I confess I felt disposed to congratulate him that he had not had the experience which I have had of the work imposed by Parliament, I am afraid at my own instance, upon the Board of Trade during the past two years. I will not go into the question of railway rates, which is not strictly germane to the present debate, but the Railway Regulation Act of 1888 enabled the Board of Trade to order all Railway Companies to adopt continuous brakes in passenger trains, to adopt the interlocking system of signals, and the block system throughout their lines. The opinions of experts and of the railway managers themselves were practically unanimous as to the wisdom and the necessity of all these provisions. The orders requiring them to be adopted were obviously of a comparatively simple and definite character, but I can assure the House that I have had the greatest possible difficulty in adapting the orders to the circumstances of the different railway lines throughout the United Kingdom, varying as they do from the great London and North Western to some trifling small local line in the North of Scotland or the West of Ireland. When it comes to a question of employment, what is it that the hon. Member asks me to do? The hon. Member asks me, for instance, to forbid the employment of signalmen for excessive overtime. Supposing I were to fix the maximum hours of signalmen at 12 hours. A 12 hours day for signalmen is a very easy day's work in certain cases, but there are signal boxes where eight hours is a very hard day's work indeed, and where even half that time is more than any one man can do without rest. Am I to settle what should be the hours of work in every signal box on every railway throughout the United Kingdom? That is the task which the hon. Member would seek to impose upon me, and, more than that, he asks me to fix the number of men which I may consider adequate to be employed in the service of the railways. ["No."] But he does, for he says—

"Or to make such reasonable increase in any class of their servants as will obviate the necessity of overtime."

I merely put these points to the fairness and good sense of the House. How is it possible for any Government Department, with any staff at its command which Parliament would be likely to sanction, to undertake such a gigantic task as this; and if it did undertake it, what would be the result? Supposing we fixed maximum hours for drivers, or signalmen, or guards, and an accident occurred, because those hours proved too long in some individual case: would not the Railway Company be able to plead, "We have done what the Board of Trade required us. These hours are within your rules. Your inspectors report, no doubt, that they were too long in this particular case, and that the accident was due to that; but our responsibility is gone?" On whom would the responsibility rest? Would it rest on the Board of Trade? Would this House be content that any Government Department should undertake responsibility, practically, for the working of the railways, without owning them and managing them as well? The idea in the hon. Member's mind is a dangerous idea to me beyond everything, for this reason—that it seems to me to lead up to the purchase and working of the railways of the United Kingdom by the State. I cannot conceive anything worse than that for the service of the public or the railway servants themselves—nothing more dangerous for political corruption in this country. The hon. Member seems to agree with me. He disclaims that idea. I am excessively glad to hear it, because it brings us nearer together than I thought we were. I am content to admit, as the Railway Companies have not dealt with this matter as they ought to have done, that the time has come when Parliament should carefully consider whether, and in what way, it should interfere; but I contend that it is impossible to overrate the difficulty of defining that interference—what it should be, and within what limits it should be confined, so as to avoid what I think this House wants to avoid, any diminution of the responsibility of the Railway Companies for the management of their own lines. If the hon. Member's Motion is adopted, the House will affirm a vague principle without the faintest explanation on the part of those who have supported it, as to the mode in which they would carry it into effect. Sir, in this matter I mean business. I want to do something practical. Let this House, if it likes—I cordially agree with the view myself—let it affirm its objection to excessive overtime as dangerous to the travelling public, and to the men themselves. Let it appoint a carefully chosen Committee, not to delay action on this matter, but to inquire whether legislation is possible, and, if so, what that legislation should be. Let us come to that resolution now by an unanimous decision, apart from Party feeling, with a desire to provide for the safety of the travelling public, and of the men, and yet, at the same time, to preserve the essential responsibility of the company. I believe we can come to such a resolution, and what I would suggest is this: I would ask the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion, and if he agrees, I would propose in its stead—

Sir M. Hicks Beach

"That, in the opinion of this House, the employment of railway servants for excessive hours is a source of danger both to the men themselves and to the travelling public, and that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether, and, if so, in what way, the hours worked by railway servants should be restricted by legislation."

*(10.55.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby):

As to the importance of this Debate and the questions raised in it there can be no dispute. There are involved in it the interests of the great Railway Companies, perhaps the most powerful and the greatest corporations in this country. I am not going to throw any stone at the Railway Companies or their directors. I have had at one part of my life too intimate a knowledge of the manner in which these great concerns are conducted not to render to them a tribute of respect for the spirit, intelligence, and integrity which they display. I believe that nowhere are these great corporations conducted with so much regard for the convenience of the public, and, generally speaking, the welfare of their employés, as in this country. Therefore I shall make no attack on them in this Debate. On the other hand, there are the men employed by them, who are to be counted by thousands, and even by hundreds of thousands, and I think no one who has thought of the exposure railway servants have endured during the past few weeks in the weather we have had can fail to believe that these men have exhibited a courage and endurance equal to any soldier in the field. Besides that there are the public at large, whom the men serve, and they have great interest in the welfare of both. Now, Sir, what is it we have been called upon to debate to-night? My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, in a speech, the ability and moderation of which everyone will recognise, proved to demonstration the fact that there is going on in this country a system of overtime which overtaxes these men, which is injurious to them, and which is dangerous to the public. That is a proposition which cannot be denied. It was sustained in a speech of great ability and earnestness by my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, who spoke with great authority on behalf of the class to which these men belong. How was it met? It was met—I hope I may say it without disrespect—by the weird sibyl of the Conservative Party. We always listen to him with respect, whether he dictates to us in the columns of the Times, or to his own party in this House, and he says, in effect—“For Heaven’s sake do not let us be compelled to vote against this Motion. Do contrive for us some means of escape, if it is only a Committee or a Commission of Inquiry, so that we may not vote against it.” The hon. Member spoke words of wisdom which sank deep into the Treasury Bench. I saw the consultation which took place, and as usual the hon. Member for Salford proved infallible, and his suggestion was adopted. Then the debate continued, and there was the usual procession of railway directors, who one after another got up and declared that there was no grievance to remedy at all; that everything was for the best in the best of all possible worlds. It was true that occasionally the men might work beyond ten hours, but that was an accidental circumstance which arose from a condition of things that could not be avoided. Then my right hon. Friend the Commissioner of Works, “garbed in white-robed innocence appeared.” I quite believe in my right hon. Friend’s innocence; but it is not against the London and North Western Railway that this Motion is directed. He spoke of the company with which he is connected, and that speech contained the most interesting and lively statistics. But what would you think of a Member who, upon a Bill to amend the law of larceny, should say, “I assure the House of Commons on my honour that I never picked a pocket in my life?” We know that my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works never picked a pocket, but that is no reason why there should not be a Bill to amend the law of larceny. The question here is, is there a grievance to be remedied or not? I remember when the railway directors and the railway interests were all-powerful in this House, and that when a dozen directors got up one after another the Government had to do what the directors ordered them to do. Those days have disappeared with household suffrage. And though I regret with my hon. Friend the Member for Durham that the railway workmen have not their personal representatives in this House, at all events they have representatives who are disposed—and who if they were not disposed, would be compelled—to guard their interests. Therefore I do not think that all this procession of Railway Directors which we have seen to-night, declaring that there is nothing to remedy at all in this case, is likely to prevail with the House of Commons. Indeed, it has not. Because if they do not confess for themselves, at all events the President of the Board of Trade, with a certain delicacy towards his colleagues, has confessed the offences of some of the Railway Companies; he has admitted that they ought to remedy these grievances; that they will not; and that they are not likely to do it unless they are compelled. At this late hour I will not go into figures, but with these Returns before us it is sheer nonsense to talk of this overtime being the result of inevitable accident. It is nothing of the kind. There are hundreds and thousands of instances, even in that impeccable company the London and North-Western itself. What is the fact? In the best companies the great increase of their business has made it enormously difficult for them to meet the demands upon them; but the best of them have made efforts, and they are meeting those demands. I would here remind the House that the scale of this Return is a 12-hour scale, while that in operation on the North Western is a 10-hour scale; and, therefore, whatever is in excess of 10 hours is in itself overtime. The other day one of the directors of a northern railway was talking to me on the subject of the strike in Scotland, and he said, "Why, in Carlisle Station, on the north side, there is a 12-hour system, and on the south side a 10-hour system." How is it possible to maintain such a contrast as that where two systems are in absolute contiguity? It is impossible. Where there is a grievance of this kind, is the House of Commons to attempt to deal with the matter? The President of the Board of Trade, inspired by the hon. Member for Salford, wishes to get rid of this Resolution. If I might venture to advise the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, I should not part with my Resolution. I have had some years' experience in the House of Commons, and I have learnt that if you want to do anything, and you bring forward a Resolution of this kind, you had better stick to it if you hope to accomplish any practical object. It has been said that public opinion ought to be sufficient in these matters to affect the Railway Companies. Well, Sir, if public opinion had been sufficient to affect the Railway Companies it would have stopped the strike in Scotland. I believe that all reasonable opinion was against the conduct of the directors. I do not quarrel with the President of the Board of Trade for not having entered upon the question of the strike. The opinions he expressed to-night are a condemnation of the directors in Scotland. Every one knows that the conduct of the North British Company is intolerable, and the whole contention is whether or not overtime ought to be restrained. Unfortunately public opinion has not been allowed to stop this contest. There are organs of public opinion, both in England and Scotland, which have kept this strike alive. I have been ashamed to read the brutal language addressed to the men in this conflict by the Scotsman in Scotland and by the Times in London. They have instigated the masters not to yield—not to make any terms with their men, not to accept anything but an absolute and unconditional surrender. I read an article in the Times the other day in which it said the strike was over. Well, Sir, that has been extremely unfortunate, and now we have to see what is to be done in the matter. One of the great evils in this question is that the companies have not chosen to meet their men. They have laid down the principle that they will have nothing to do with Trades' Unions. In my opinion that is an extremely foolish principle. What are the Trade Unions? They are the recognised representatives of the interests and wishes of the men. What would you think of one of two nations, who had gone to war and desired to make peace, starting by saying it would not treat with the Government of the other country? What an absurdity that would be! Can there be anything more absurd than the language of the Directors when they say "We won't treat with the Trades' Unions. In my opinion these recognised organs of the men are the best means of settling these questions, and I believe that all of the most intelligent capitalists are of that opinion in dealing with questions of this kind. Now, Sir, is there any objection to deal with this question by some Public Authority? It does not raise at all the question of dealing generally with the hours of labour. In dealing generally with the hours of labour you would have to deal with traders on the ordinary footing, and Railway Companies are not traders of an ordinary kind. They enjoy a monopoly created by Parliament. They are responsible to Parliament, and are in many respects governed by the Executive. Why do you order them to use the block system or a particular kind of brake? The Government has accepted the responsibility, and surely the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade must see that by ordering a particular kind of brake he is responsible for any accident it may cause.

Sir W. Harcourt

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Act of Parliament directs that it shall be ordered.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman receives a complaint in his official capacity, and upon that he interferes with the brakes used by the Railway Companies in a manner he would not adopt in any other trade. But there is another point to be borne in mind with regard to the position of the men, the railway system is not an open trade. Men are brought up as servants of the Railway Companies, and they have not got the market that men in other trades have. They can only go to the monopolists. That places the whole question of the labour of the Railway Companies, who confine their labour to a restricted market, upon an entirely different footing. Of course, there is the element of public danger in the matter, and that cannot be left out of sight. But I do not wish to enlarge upon that. Then it will be said: "You are interfering with the freedom of contract." Well, I thought even Her Majesty's Government had got past that. The Minister of Agriculture at one time entertained a horror of that blessed word "compulsion." Let me remind hon. Gentlemen opposite of one of their favourite legislative proceedings, I mean the Allotments Act. That was a compulsory Act, and when it was passed they said the new power of compulsion would lead to voluntary effort. Well, just the same will happen in this case. Do you believe that if there had been an authority that could interfere with overtime the strike in Scotland would have ever taken place? No, it would not. The fact of such an authority existing would have caused the company and the men to come to an arrangement. I was surprised, I must say, that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade should raise all those difficulties, which are no difficulties at all, about his arranging the hours of labour for a particular class of men. That is not what is contemplated. If a company systematically worked its men overtime, it could be brought before either the Board of Trade or some other public authority. It would be brought before that authority accused of having a general system of overtime. An inquiry would be made into the question whether it had a good system like the London and North Western Company or a bad system like that of the North British Company, and an order would be made upon it to amend its system generally, and that its system should be put upon a reasonable basis, and should not admit of a day of 15, 17, or 18 hours. That is business. It is perfectly easy when a man does not want to do a thing, to find every possible reason for not doing it by raising every conceivable difficulty. That is not what we intend at all. We desire to-night to make this declaration. I do not place in the Board of Trade that childlike confidence which the right hon. Gentleman thinks would be misplaced. If, instead of vesting it in the Executive, the Government thinks it better to leave a general thing of this kind to the Railway Commission, which is a body outside the Executive Government, and if it likes to amend the Resolution in that form, I would ask my hon. Friend to assent to it. That would be a body outside the Executive Government to whom a charge of that kind against a Railway Company might be properly referred, and it would be heard on behalf of the men on the one side, and on behalf of the company on the other; and the company would be ordered to amend its system in a reasonable manner on the basis of a fair standard, and afterwards it would be for the tribunal to see that it was so amended as to prevent the evils which had been condemned. That seems to me to be a perfectly intelligible proposition. That is what we desire here to see accomplished, and to push this matter over to a Committee is to leave it in a most unsatisfactory state. I believe already that this discussion will have done a great deal of good, and if it is true, as I believe it is, that the strike in Scotland has come to an end, this discussion to-night may have done something to bring about a settlement. I believe that if you establish some tribunal of this kind you will be very seldom called upon to use it. I am quite as much against the notion of interfering with the details of railway management as anyone; but I believe the knowledge that there lies behind an authority which can compel justice to be done as between the parties, and reason to be observed in the time of the employment of these men, would obviate the necessity of ever going into those details at all, and would compel a reasonable settlement of such disputes as we have seen. That is the object which I understand my hon. Friend has in view, and I hope the House will support and affirm the Resolution.

*(11.24.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in reference to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman. The President of the Board of Trade admitted that a case had been made out for the consideration of the House with respect to the excessive hours of railway servants, and he has suggested that some practical means should be taken by this House to ascertain how Parliament could fitly deal with the subject, and whether legislation is required in cases of this kind. I have listened attentively to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and he has not suggested any method by which practically this evil, which is admitted by my right hon. Friend, could be dealt with.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg pardon. I think I suggested something should be done by an Act of Parliament appointing a tribunal.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman has suggested that by an Act of Parliament somebody, whether the Board of Trade, the Railway Commission, or some other body, is to do something which is not to interfere with the details of railway management, but which is to lay down some general principle applicable to the circumstances we have to deal with, and which will avert the evil which we all agree ought to be averted. My right hon. Friend, on the other hand, has made a practical proposition to the House. He has proposed that the question shall be examined by a strong Committee of the House, with a direction as to whether legislation cannot be proposed which shall have practical effect, so as to escape all the difficulties which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby feels, but which he has not dealt with. We admit the grave importance of this question to the railway workmen of this country, who deserve all the credit which the right hon. Gentleman has given to them for their zeal in the service of the public, for their courage, and for their endurance in circumstances of great difficulty and hardship. But let us be practical in dealing with the question. We desire to assist in the object which the hon. Member has in view, and we do not desire to evade it, as we should possibly evade it, by accepting this Resolution to give power to the Board of Trade to direct Railway Companies to limit the hours of a special class of their servants, and so on. My right hon. Friend might in those circumstances receive a Report, and might write on the authority of the Board of Trade, stating that it was necessary that orders should be issued providing that railway servants should not work overtime, and that such reasonable increase in the number of servants should be made as to obviate the necessity for working overtime. There would be a correspondence between the Department and the Railway Company in fault. I should like to know whether that would include any substantive method of enforcing the authority of the Board of Trade? But this has a double effect. If the Board of Trade is responsible for directing that the hours of work shall be such as are satisfactory to the Board of Trade, there would be a demand, on the other hand, that the railway servants should be called upon to work during those limited hours. I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman will then see that we are interfering with the details of railway management which we are incapable of enforcing, and dealing with difficulties which are more serious than any we have attempted up to the present time. Let a Select Committee consider this very grave question; and if they can come to any conclusion—as I hope and trust they may—which will enable the Government to propose legislation on the subject, then we may arrive at a result which will be satisfactory.

Mr. W. H. Smith

*(11.31.) MR. R. B. HALDANE (Haddington): The two Members of the Government who have addressed the House have said that those who support this Resolution have nothing practical to propose. I reply that the Resolution itself contains a perfectly practical proposal. Coming fresh from contact with those who are concerned in this strike, I may state that there are three classes of men who are chiefly concerned in it—the signalmen, the drivers, and the guards, and they consider they have a grievance which affects the public as well as themselves. In the signal-boxes men are occasionally kept on duty for hours which are not only beyond the power of human endurance, but for hours which are inconsistent with the safety of the public. Engine drivers are kept on their engines for 16, 17, and 18 hours. These are facts which have been proved in evidence.

What we ask is not a restriction of the general hours of labour, but for some interference in the public interest—that the Board of Trade should have power to send down its Inspectors to inquire into complaints as to excessive hours, and should have power, by means of bye-laws, to forbid the employment of certain classes of railway servants for more than reasonable hours. This is a moderate and simple proposition, and it is one that does not require to be considered by a Committee. It only requires a small amendment of the Act of 1888, and the proposal would not throw upon the Board of Trade any functions it is not perfectly competent to discharge. This question has been discussed from two different points of view. One point of view has been that there is a grievance which affects the public in such a manner as to justify legislative interference. Not only are Railway Companies monopolists, but they are monopolists who have made very large profits at the expense of the public. We do not grudge them that. Their Stocks have been split and sub-divided in such a way that it makes it difficult to calculate their value; but undoubtedly, compared with what was originally paid, they stand at an enormous premium. I hold that it is not unreasonable that in the public interest we should ask for the simple powers contained in the Motion to be conferred on the Board of Trade. But when we come to the wider question involved, I feel, not on abstract grounds, but in the interest of labour, that we are brought face to face with a very grave difficulty. From what I have seen of strikes I do not believe that the question at issue in a single one could have been satisfactorily disposed of by an Act of Parliament, and if this House were called upon to deal with these disputes it would have no time to discuss any questions but those of the relations of labour and capital. I am, however, glad to think that we are not coming to that. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby that this Debate marks an epoch in the history of the relations of labour and capital in this country. Such a Debate could not have taken place 10 years ago. It has been made possible by the extension of the franchise. Even hon. Gentlemen opposite feel the pressure of their constituents, some portion of whom belong to the labouring class, and that is the explanation of the moderate tone of the President of the Board of Trade's speech, to which I listened with much interest. The right hon. Gentleman laid down principles very foreign to those which used to be urged on both sides in this House. It seems to me that we have made a great step forward. But, still, we are only at the beginning of wisdom; we have not yet reached the end. What was the question which agitated the public the other day in connection with this great strike, which we trust is drawing to a conclusion? It was, were the Railway Companies to recognise the federation of labour; whether they were entitled to say that for the future the formula should be master and servant instead of capital and labour. It seems as if a great Party issue is about to be fought out on that question. We shall have to say whether we on this side at all events ought not to insist on the recognition of the principle that the working people of this country are as free and have as perfect a right to federate against capitalists as the capitalists themselves possess. You will never get smooth relations between employers and employed until you recognise that principle. What have you in Northumberland and Durham? My hon. Friend the Member for Morpeth could give the House some interesting information as to Trades Unions. He could tell it that the Trades Unions in those counties are big enough and strong enough to appoint men of business to negotiate with the employers. You rarely hear of any friction in the relations of employers and employed there. But until you concede that the workmen of the country have a right to federate, I do not believe you will have anything like smoothness or freedom from friction. I do not rely on legislation as a means of getting rid of these evils. I recognise the principle that labour must be on a footing of equality with capital. But that is not the proposition before the House. I, for one, shall support the Motion of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, because it would be pedantry to vote against it, and because it embodies a proposition which could be easily carried out, and which I believe would work effectually. On the other hand, the suggestion of the Government would merely give the go-by to that plan.

*(11.40.) MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): As I represent a greater number of railway servants than any other Member of this House, I hope I may be allowed to speak for a few minutes. I desire to ask, in the interest of the railway servants whom I represent, and who are employés of the London and North-Western Railway, whether the President of the Board of Trade intends to move the Resolution he has suggested, and if he will undertake that it shall be accepted as a fact by the Committee which he proposes to appoint that there is excessive overtime, and that that fact shall be the basis of the Committee's inquiry? I also wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will pledge himself to deal with the subject this year. If an undertaking is given that some practical legislation will be proceeded with this year I will support the right hon. Gentleman most cordially. I consider his speech in itself an ample justification of the Motion, for he has admitted that there is excessive overtime worked on railways. With regard to what the First Commissioner of Works said as to the London and North Western Railway Company, I could, if I had time, put a very different complexion upon it.

*(11.42.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I think I ought to answer the question of the hon. Member. I will again read the terms of the Motion which I said I would propose if it were accepted in substitution for the Resolution of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire. It reads as follows:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, the employment of railway servants for excessive hours is a source of danger both to the men themselves and to the travelling public”

—that clearly admits the fact of excessive overtime—

“and that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether, and, if so, in what way, the hours worked by railway servants should be restricted by legislation.”

I said, in making this proposal on behalf of the Government, that if the Report of the Committee should be in accordance with the views of the Government, it would obviously be our duty to give the Report the earliest possible legislative sanction; but it is impossible for any Government to pledge themselves to adopt the Report of a Committee before they know its contents.
Mr. R. B. Haldane

(11.44.) The House divided:—Ayes 141; Noes 124. (Div. List, No. 13.)

Main Question again proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SOLICITORS MAGISTRACY BILL.— (No. 80.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [4th December]. “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*(11.58.) MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): When the Debate on this Bill was adjourned last night I was endeavouring to elicit from the Law Officer of the Crown some explanation of this somewhat obscure Bill. It professes to be a Bill to enable solicitors of the High Court to act as County Justices but it really proposes in its enacting clause to repeal the 6th Geo. IV., chap. 48. Now, what is that enactment? On looking into the matter I find it an Act for the recovery of small debts in Scotland. There are no fewer than 11 closely printed pages in that enactment, and I do urge that we are entitled to some explanation of this extraordinary state of affairs. What is the real object of the Bill? Will the Solicitor General kindly give us some explanation on that point?

It being midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

House adjourned at two minutes after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Monday, 26th January, 1891.*SMOKE NUISANCE ABATEMENT (METROPOLIS) BILL. [H.L.]

FIRST READING.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, I rise to ask your Lordships to read for the first time a Bill for the abatement of smoke in the Metropolis. It is identical with that which has lain before on the Table of your Lordships' House. Its object is to prevent nuisance from smoke arising from buildings and factories, so far as it is not already prohibited by Acts of Parliament. I reserve any explanation until the Second Reading, and only add now that whether it comes into force or not must depend to a great extent upon the view and course taken by Her Majesty's Government regarding it.

A Bill to amend the Acts for abating the nuisance arising from the smoke of furnaces and fireplaces within the Metropolis—Presented by the Lord Stratheden and Campbell: read 1^a; and to be printed. (No. 22.)

SHERIFFS (ASSIZES EXPENSES) BILL [H.L.].

A Bill respecting the expenses of high sheriffs in connexion with assizes—Was presented by the Earl of Camperdown; read 1^a; and to be printed. (No. 23.)

RAILWAY ACCIDENT AT WORTLEY.

*EARL DE LA WARR: My Lords, I rise to move for a Copy of the Report of the Inspector of Railways to the Board of Trade relative to an accident which occurred at Wortley, near Leeds, on the Great Northern line on the 24th December last. I should state that my object in doing this is that your Lordships may have before you one of the Reports of the Inspectors of Railways to the Board of Trade which show the connection between some accidents and the excessive hours of work of railway servants. I believe that in this Report the Inspector specially alludes to that fact. I understand that besides this accident there are others which are reported upon in a similar manner, namely, as connecting them with the excessive hours of work of railway servants. I should have been glad to have had the whole of the Reports upon such accidents together; but I have been informed, as probably your Lordships know, that the Reports of all railway accidents that are inquired into are laid upon the Table of your Lordships. I am not quite certain to what period they reach, but your Lordships will find that within the last 12 months, or nearly that time, there have been a number of accidents to which the Inspectors have referred as being the result, more or less, of the overwork of the servants. I should have been glad to have had all those Reports together laid before your Lordships; but inasmuch as they are already in the possession of the Board of Trade, it will be unnecessary for me to ask permission to extend the notice which I have upon the Paper. I would, therefore, ask that this Report may separately be laid before your Lordships as a specimen of Reports connecting railway accidents with overwork. This matter has become of the greatest importance, as your Lordships must know, especially lately, seeing what we have read and heard, and these Reports are of value, as showing that there is a certain class of accidents which are materially connected with the overwork of railway servants.

Moved for—

"Copy of the Report made to the Board of Trade relative to the railway accident at Wortley on the 24th of December, 1890."—(The Earl De La Warr.)

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): My Lords, as the noble Earl has asked for it, there will be no objection to laying this Report specially upon the Table of your Lordships' House, and I will do so; but I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that these Reports are systematically presented to both Houses of Parliament at periods of a few months. The Reports for the first half of last year have already been printed and are in the hands of your Lordships. The Returns for the last half of last year are in the printers' hands, and will be laid upon the Table of the House as soon as possible. This Report, which the noble Lord refers to in his Motion, was dealt with in the usual way at the time it was presented, that is, that after being presented to the Board of Trade it was communicated to the Railway Companies concerned, and their attention called particularly to any matter which seems to require to be called to their attention, and it was made public through the usual channels of information. It is quite true that in his Report upon the accident at Wortley Major Marindin does call attention to the length of hours which some of the servants of the company had worked, but he clearly exonerates those servants from any blame for the accident, and, so far as his opinion is concerned, he lays the blame for the accident upon a servant who had been on duty about seven hours and a half. At any rate, your Lordships shall be able to judge of the Report for yourselves, for I shall be glad to lay it upon the Table of the House.

LORD COLVILLE OF CULROSS: The noble Earl who brought forward this subject alluded, in the outset of his remarks, to a connection between the railway accident he refers to and lengthened hours of labour of the servants on the line. Probably he has never seen this Report, for if he had he might have read a paragraph in it where the Inspector of the Board of Trade says that "the persons responsible for the collision were the signalmen," and nobody else. Therefore, the long period which this driver had been with his engine had nothing to do with the question whatever. But upon that subject of the lengthened hours which the man had been driving his engine I wish to make this explanation: he commenced his work at a quarter past 3 in the morning; he went a distance of six miles, and then for six hours and ten minutes he never moved; he then went a distance of eight miles, and he then rested for three and a half hours. In fact, during the long period of 18 hours he was upon the engine he drove but a short distance on account of a dense fog which existed throughout the day, so that it was hardly possible for the engine to move at all. During the whole time he was upon the engine he only travelled 29½ miles.

*EARL DE LA WARR: I would call the noble Lord's attention to the concluding paragraph on page 5 of the Report, which states that—

Lord Balfour of Burleigh

"The driver and fireman of the Great Northern engine had at the time of the collision been on duty for 18½ hours, which is far longer than any driver should be allowed to remain upon an engine, both for his own sake and for the safety of the public."

LORD COLVILLE OF CULROSS: That was the driver of the engine which was run into, not of the engine which caused the accident.

*EARL DE LA WARR: My question was directed to the whole circumstances attending the accident, and was not confined to the fact of one driver having been on duty for 18½ hours.

LORD COLVILLE OF CULROSS: It had nothing to do with the accident.

On Question, agreed to; Return ordered to be laid before the House; Return laid before the House (pursuant to Order), and ordered to lie on the Table.

METROPOLITAN HOSPITALS, &c.

The evidence taken before the Select Committee from time to time to be printed for the use of the Members of this House (No. 24); but no copies thereof to be delivered, except to Members of the Committee and to such other persons as the Committee shall think fit, until further order.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 26th January, 1891.

QUESTIONS.

THE CHELSEA SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state to the House what progress has been made in the settlement of the affairs of the Chelsea Savings Bank, and the amount in the pound paid to depositors up to this date, and also what prospects there are of a final dividend; and will he state the amount of the total embezzlements of the late manager and secretary?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): An Order was made on the 24th of December for payment of a further and final dividend, making 20s. in the pound. The liquidator is proceeding with the payment of the depositors. The secretary of the bank has this week been arrested, and is remanded on charges of falsification and embezzlement. It has not been, and will not be, necessary to ascertain the exact amount which is supposed to have been embezzled by him, but sufficient has been traced by the official liquidator to enable charges to be preferred, and for him to speak as to a large amount. As, however, the charge of embezzlement is now the subject of inquiry in a Criminal Court, I think it would not be right at present to give any answer to this part of the question, which assumes the guilt of the accused.

THE CARDIFF SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can inform the House as to the progress made in the liquidation of the Cardiff Savings Bank; and whether any further amount has been paid to the depositors in the shape of dividend; and, if so, how much?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am informed by the official liquidator that the amounts at present recovered are not sufficient to enable him to apply for leave to pay any further dividends. Four trustees and managers, and the representatives of three deceased trustees and managers, have made payments to the liquidator which the Court have permitted him to accept in full settlement of the claims on those gentlemen. Proceedings, however, are in progress against a number of the trustees and managers who declined to admit any liability; and, under these circumstances, the hon. Member will understand that I am not in a position to make any statement at present as to the prospect of a dividend.

IRELAND—TRADE IN METHYLATED SPIRITS.

In reply to Mr. O'NEILL,

MR. GOSCHEN: The Inland Revenue Commissioners have carefully inquired into the allegation that methylated spirits are used in Antrim and Derry for consumption, but have not been able to find that such practice prevails. If the hon. Member can supply me with any evidence as to the practice, or indicate the sources from which such evidence can be procured, the matter shall be followed up vigorously.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS READING ROOM.

In reply to Sir J. SWINBURNE,

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I agree with the hon. Baronet that the electric lighting in some parts of the building is not yet all that we could desire; but I hope we shall be able steadily to improve it. In many places it is in a transition state.

THE DONEGAL EVICTIONS.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if his attention has been drawn to the account of the eviction of Mrs. McGinley at Meenacaddy, County Donegal, on 15th November last, at which, on a show of resistance by those inside the house, the police commenced throwing volleys of stones at the house, and continued doing so until the eviction was completed; and whether this action on the part of the police was sanctioned by him?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): From the Report before me, it appears that the police were violently assailed with stones from inside the house, and were placed in considerable danger. Some stones were then thrown by the bailiffs and by a few of the police in order to keep the assailants back from the window. In reply to the second paragraph, I have to say that the action of certain of the police appears to have arisen out of the circumstances of the moment, and to have been taken in self-defence.

MR. DALTON: Is it the fact that at the trial of these boys the District Inspector stated that the whole thing had been premeditated and pre-arranged?

MR. MADDEN: I do not see that in the Report before me. Some of the police were not summoned for assault, and the case was dismissed by the Magistrates on the ground that the police were justified in the action they took.

CATHOLIC PRIESTS AT ELECTIONS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether, in view of the prevailing custom in Ireland of appointing Roman Catholic clergymen as agents within the polling booths at contested elections, the Government will consider the propriety of amending the Ballot Act in the direction of preventing clergymen acting in this capacity?

MR. COX (Clare, E.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, may I ask the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) if it is not the fact that at the last election for South Tyrone several clerical gentlemen of various denominations acted as agents both inside and outside of the polling booths?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Not that I am aware of.

MR. MADDEN: Without pronouncing any opinion on the custom to which my hon. Friend refers, and without pronouncing upon the expediency of making any alteration in the existing law governing the election of Members of Parliament, I may state—and my hon. Friend will probably agree with me—that the exigencies of Parliamentary business do not at present seem to hold out much hope of our being able to add any seriously controversial measures to the programme of the Government.

MR. H. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): In the event of a measure being introduced by a private Member, will the Government be prepared to give it, at least, a benevolent consideration?

MR. MADDEN: I cannot enter into any engagement on the subject.

MAGISTRATES' PENSIONS

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if it is a fact that it is proposed to arrange that Irish Resident Magistrates who have previously served in the Royal Irish Constabulary are to be allowed to reckon their service in the Constabulary in their claim for pension as Magistrates; and in what respects the granting of pensions in the case of such Irish Magistrates differs from the course pursued in the granting of pensions to Magistrates in England, Scotland, and Wales?

MR. MADDEN: Owing to a defect in the law, public officials transferred from any Service in the United Kingdom having a special Pension Code of its own to a Service pensionable under the Superannuation Act of 1859 forfeit their previous service, and it is proposed to remedy this injustice by amending legislation. The proposed legislation would secure for Irish Resident Magistrates their previous service in the Royal Irish Constabulary in cases where appointments were made from that body. I have no official cognizance of the matter referred to in the second paragraph; but if there are any such Magistrates whose pensions are governed by the Superannuation Act of 1859, and if they have previous continuous service in any branch of the Public Service with a special Pension Code, they are in precisely the same position as the Irish Resident Magistrates who have been transferred from service in the Royal Irish Constabulary.

Mr. T. W. Russell

DR. TANNER: Are the pensions to be merely for the benefit of Government minions?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

POTATOES FOR IRELAND.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if the Secretary for Scotland will take precautions to prevent potatoes grown outside of Scotland, and imported into Scotland, being sold as Scotch seed to Irish Unions, or to contractors for Irish Unions?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I am not aware that means are available to the Secretary for Scotland for effectively taking such precautions as seem to be indicated in the question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. On the other hand, it is quite clear that such a transaction as he describes is a fraud on the purchasers, injurious both to the poor in Ireland and to the dealers in genuine Scotch seed. Should information be given to the criminal authorities in Scotland of any specific case of such fraud occurring in Scotland, that information will receive due consideration, and should the facts be found to come within the legitimate scope of the Criminal Law, there will be every disposition on the part of the Scotch Authorities to aid in repressing this shabby and reprehensible practice.

COLONEL NOLAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman instruct the police in Scotland to take action in the event of a breach of the law?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The hon. and gallant Member may rely upon it that every precaution will be taken.

PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.

*MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what, in round numbers, will be the estimated capital value of the Sinking Fund created by the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill on the 40th year of its operation if the full powers of lending, under Clause 6 (2), and re-lending under Clause 6 (3), are at once exercised, and if all the payments into the Sinking Fund under Clause 1 (2) are duly made, and the whole accumulated as provided by Clause 7 (4) but leaving out of account the uncertain elements of further increase to the fund, such as payments to it for redemption of Purchase Annuities and for purchaser's insurance money; what will be the estimated income of the Guarantee Fund for that year; what will be the estimated total of the Four per Cent. Purchase Annuities due to the Treasury from all the tenant purchasers, for the same year, if none have been redeemed; and does Her Majesty's Government intend that the Guarantee Fund shall provide for the payment of the whole of the Purchase Annuities if default is committed, or only of a part thereof; and if the latter, from what source is the remainder to be recovered by the Treasury?

MR. GOSCHEN: A Return is being prepared and will shortly be in the hands of hon. Members, which will substantially give an answer to the first three questions of the hon. Member. If he is not able to construct an answer for himself out of the Return, perhaps he will put a further question to me on the subject. With regard to the fourth paragraph, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government that the Guarantee Fund shall provide for the payment of the whole of the Purchase Annuities if default is committed.

*MR. KEAY: When will the Return be presented?

MR. GOSCHEN: It is being printed, and will be in the hands of hon. Members in a few days.

LIGHT RAILWAY FROM MACROOM TO BALLYVOURNEY.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether any steps will be taken to carry out the proposed line of light railway between Macroom and Ballyvourney; and whether, owing to the failure of the potato crop and lack of labour in the district in question, active steps will soon be taken to promote this public work?

MR. MADDEN: I have made inquiry, but I cannot find that any light railway has been proposed between the places mentioned by the hon. Member in the first paragraph of the question.

DR. TANNER: If a proposal is made to the Government, will any active steps be taken in the matter?

MR. MADDEN: I am sure that every attention will be paid to the matter.

MARINE POLICE FORCE IN SCOTLAND.

MR. DUFF (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate what steps, if any, the Government propose to take to increase the Marine Police Force in Scotland, so as to enable them to enforce the bye-laws recently approved by the Secretary for Scotland, to limit the operation of trawlers, especially in the Moray Firth?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Secretary for Scotland is in communication with the Admiralty and Treasury, with the view to concert measures to provide the necessary supervision.

ARDCHATTAN AND MUCKAIRN SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that all the members of Ardchattan and Muckairn School Board have resigned, in consequence of the Scotch Education Department having placed on the annual grant list an Episcopal school at Bonaw Quarries; whether his attention has been called to the fact that the School Board, compelled by the Department, in 1886 erected a school on a site recommended to them by the Department, to accommodate children whose parents were engaged in Bonaw Quarries; and that in order to obtain this site a public inquiry was held by the Sheriff, followed by a Provisional Order, reference, and arbitration, at considerable expense, and now a burden upon the ratepayers; notwithstanding the facts that the Board School contains ample accommodation for all the children of school age in the district, and that, in order to improve the education, the School Board pensioned the previous teacher, and recently appointed a teacher holding first class certificates; how many children there are of school age in the district, whose parents are Episcopalians; whether any of these children attend the Board School; what are the numbers on roll and in average attendance in the Board school and Episcopalian school respectively; when, and under what circumstances, and for what reasons, was the Episcopal school placed on the annual grant list; and what steps the Department intend taking for the election of a new School Board, or for carrying on the educational work of the parish?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I am aware that the School Board of Ardchattan and Muckairn have given notice of resignation on the ground stated. The Department is now in correspondence with the Board on the subject, and a reply from the School Board to a communication recently addressed to the Board has been promised. In these circumstances, and as it is most desirable in the interests of the district that an understanding should be reached, and that the difficulty which has arisen should be amicably settled, I must refrain from dealing at present with the argumentative question which the hon. Member has put to me.

BEHRING SEA FISHERIES.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any reply has yet been received from the Government of the United States, in reply to Lord Salisbury's despatch of the 10th August, 1890, proposing a reference to arbitration of all disputes regarding the seizure of Canadian sealers and the capture of seals outside the three line limit in Alaskan Waters; if so, will he place the reply and further correspondence in the hands of Members; and if he is aware that, owing to the present system of indiscriminate capture of seals away from the neighbourhood of the breeding grounds, the number of seals killed in Alaskan Waters are reported to have fallen from 60,000 in 1889 to 21,000 in 1890?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): As was stated on Friday, a reply has been received. No further communication has yet been made by Her Majesty's Government, and it is not desirable to present the correspondence in an incomplete form. The accounts received by Her Majesty's Government as to the capture of fur seals in Behring's Sea during last season state that the condition of the weather was unfavourable, but that the seals were as plentiful as ever.
Mr. Caldwell

SELF-GOVERNING COLONIES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if it is a fact that the self-governing Colonies are now entirely free to enter into preferential fiscal arrangements with each other, and even against the United Kingdom, while the Mother Country is prevented by Treaties with Foreign Powers from negotiating any special commercial understanding with the Colonies; and, in such case, if the Colonial Office will urge the Board of Trade so to extend the Reference to the Departmental Committee now considering the Treaties of Commerce, that inquiry may be made as to the effect of such limitations upon the development of inter-Imperial trade?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I understand that the first part of my hon. Friend's question was discussed before the Trade and Treaties Committee on Friday last by deputations from the Agents General for the Colonies and the Imperial Federation League, including my hon. Friend; and, in these circumstances, the Secretary of State thinks it would hardly be courteous to the Committee to express at present any opinion on the matter, or to suggest that the Reference to the Committee should at this stage be extended. It is understood that the Report of the Committee may shortly be expected.

COMMERCIAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH COLONIES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state whether either France, Germany, Spain, Portugal, or Holland, are debarred by Foreign Treaties from concluding any commercial arrangements with their Colonies, which may be deemed mutually advantageous; and if it is a fact that in France a Council is now sitting, with Colonial representatives, to discuss mutual trade and other questions; and that in the German possessions in East Africa a special preferential tariff has been adopted for German subjects?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: There are several Treaties, e.g. between France and Portugal, Spain and Germany, the Netherlands and Portugal, reciprocally guaranteeing most favoured nation privileges in their respective Colonies, subject to the reservations required by the special system to which those possessions are subject. It is the fact that a Council has been appointed in France with Colonial representatives in order to assist by their discussion the Colonial Administration. No special differential tariff has been adopted in the German possessions in East Africa.

ASIATIC TURKEY.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when the promised Papers relating to Asiatic Turkey will be presented to the House; and whether, with a view to the reported serious condition of Armenia, he will do his utmost to hasten their publication?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I understand that the Papers were distributed on Saturday.

SAVINGS BANK CLERKS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury why the Order in Council of the 15th August last, relating to the clerks in the Savings Bank, was not published, and who is responsible for its non-publication; and whether there are any other instances during the last 12 months of Orders in Council relating to the Civil Service which have not been published; and, if so, what are the dates of such Orders?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): There is no obligation to publish Orders in Council except by special direction of a statute. The Order in question was not published, because the Treasury did not think it necessary that it should be. The Treasury is responsible, and acted in the exercise of its administrative discretion. Having looked into the question, and finding that the Order may affect 400 men, I should see no objection, if there is any general desire for the publication of the Order referred to, to giving instructions for its being published. There were two other Orders affecting the Civil Service in the last year, but they were of a general character.

MR. PICKERSGILL: May I ask whether the Treasury were requested by the Post Office not to publish a Report?

*MR. JACKSON: Not to my knowledge.

IRISH POTATOES.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the alleged statement of Mr. H. Gregory, recently appointed a District Inspector under the Seed Supply Act, in telling the rural Guardians of Limerick that hundreds of tons of Irish potatoes have already been sent over to Scotland to be again imported into Ireland as Scotch grown potatoes, and whether some attempt will be made to prevent stopping the supply of all seed not proved genuine?

MR. MADDEN: The Inspectors appointed under the Seed Potatoes Supply (Ireland) Act, 1890, recently warned all Boards of Guardians by circular that large quantities of potatoes were being exported from the North of Ireland to Glasgow. The District Inspectors were similarly informed. The Inspectors had previously required Boards of Guardians to insist that the districts in which potatoes tendered were grown should be stated in the form of tender. An Inspector was some time ago appointed whose special duty it is to endeavour to prevent any attempt to practise the fraud mentioned in the question, if any such attempt should be repeated.

THE MAGAZINE RIFLE.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will state the exact details of the improvements to be made in the Magazine Rifle in the new issue known as Mark II.?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The changes proposed in Mark II. rifle are somewhat too technical to make it possible for me to explain them in answer to a question. It has been already stated that, except for the new magazine, they could all have been introduced during the manufacture of Mark I., but I may say that the main changes are in (1) the magazine, which will contain 10 cartridges, and will be much more easy to fill; (2) the foresight—experience having shown that for military purposes the Martini-Henry pattern is better than the Lewis; (3) the safety catch, which has been omitted; (4) the bolt-head and bolt-cover, which has been modified, and the screw abolished; (5) the weight of the rifle generally, which has been reduced.

INDUSTRIAL PROFIT SHARING.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when the Blue Book on Industrial Profit Sharing will be issued?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Report will be presented this week.

RAILWAY SERVANTS—HOURS OF LABOUR.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Government propose to move the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the subject of overtime worked by railway servants?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: When I made a proposal on this subject on Friday evening I did not make it merely with the object of defeating the Motion, but because Her Majesty's Government believed it to be the best and most practicable way of dealing with this most important question. I hope that from the fact that this question is asked from the other side of the House, it may be assumed that the appointment of the Committee would meet with the almost unanimous assent of the House, and that, therefore, such a Committee may be appointed without further debate. That being so, I propose to put a Motion on the Paper to-morrow on the subject.

SIR W. HARCOURT: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will put down his Motion for the Committee at such a time as will render it possible to make some observations upon the appointment of the Committee and the character of the reference to it?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am afraid I cannot hold out any hopes that the Motion will be put down in such a position as to interfere with the progress of any other business. Perhaps it might suit to put it down for to-morrow week, on the chance of there being some time on that evening. I rather hoped that, having regard to the discussion on Friday evening, the Government would be allowed to appoint the Committee without further delay.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will it not be better for Her Majesty's Government to proceed by a Bill on their own responsibility?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I understood that was the point which was decided on Friday.

THE DEATH OF THE DUKE OF BEDFORD.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, having regard to the fact that no report has appeared in the Press of the proceedings upon the inquest as to the death of the late Duke of Bedford, he will ask the Coroner to furnish to the Home Office a copy of the depositions taken at the inquest, and the names and addresses of the jurors? I also desire to know whether it is not the fact that no notice of any kind was given of this inquest on the list at the Coroner's office, as is usual in the case of all inquests?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The Coroner has been good enough to send me the depositions in this case, and I am satisfied after perusing them that there is nothing to call for further inquiry or interference on my part, or to require that I should take the unprecedented course of asking for the names and addresses of the jurors. As to the last question, I will make further inquiry on the subject.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will put this specific question to the Coroner; whether, in the usual lists of inquests exhibited at his office, the late Duke of Bedford was described as Francis Charles Hastings, without any indication of his rank or title?

MR. MATTHEWS: Certainly.

MEXICO - ARREST OF OFFICERS OF THE SEAFORTH.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE (Cardarvon District): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any further information to convey as to the intentions of the Mexican Government with regard to the illegal arrest by their officers of the Captain of the Seaforth; and what action the Foreign Office propose to take in the matter?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The last information received from Mexico respecting this case was dated the 18th of August. Her Majesty's Minister had applied for copies of the Judgment pronounced in the case by the Mexican Court. At present it appears that the master and owners have by Mexican law remedies of which they have not as yet availed themselves; and if that should prove to be the case there would not at present be any occasion for diplomatic action. Her Majesty's Minister has given his attention to the case, and it will receive such treatment as the circumstances may justify.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if his attention has been drawn to resolutions by the Tuam and the Glanamaddy Boards of Guardians pointing out the want of employment and the consequent distress to be apprehended from the shortness of last year's potato crop in those districts; and if he will soon institute in these districts local works of the character described in the Relief of Distress Bill?

MR. MADDEN: The reply to the inquiry in the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The condition of the Unions in question is engaging the careful attention of the Government. But I am not in a position at present to enter into details.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): How soon will it be convenient to the Government to make a general statement as to the steps they have taken to relieve distress in Ireland?

MR. MADDEN: I understand it will be necessary to ask for a Vote in addition to the nominal sum already voted, and the taking of that Vote would be the most convenient occasion for my right hon. Friend to make a general statement as to the character and extent of the work undertaken.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Would it be possible to lay on the Table of the House, before the Vote is asked for, the terms of the railway contracts?

MR. MADDEN: I will communicate with my right hon. Friend.

THE CORRUPT PRACTICES ACT.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether a political league violates the Corrupt Practices Act by providing free food and drink to voters at meetings called in support of a candidate, or where such candidate is present for the purposes of his candidature?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): My hon. and learned Friend's reply is that the answer to the hon. Member's question depends upon the simple question of fact, whether there has been any intention of corrupting voters. No other general answer can be given, as the particular circumstances of each case would require investigation.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Assuming the facts to be correct, may I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the following statement, in respect to the action of a member of a School Board at a recent Parliamentary election: that this member of a School Board canvassed a person in the employment of the Board, in a building under the control of the Board, and threatened him with serious consequences if he did not vote for the Liberal Unionist candidate, and whether this conduct was contrary to the provisions of the Corrupt Practices or any other Act?

SIR E. CLARKE: My hon. and learned Friend's attention has not been called to the statement contained in the question of the hon. Member; but, assuming that threats were in fact used in order to induce or prevail upon the elector to vote for a particular candidate, such conduct would, in my opinion, be contrary to the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act.

PROPOSED IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government have formed an opinion as to the desirability of repeating at an early date their invitation to the self-governing Colonies to send representatives to a Conference with Her Majesty's Ministers, similar to that so successfully held in 1887, with a view to considering, among other matters of importance, a common fiscal arrangement, in the interest of the trade of the Empire, which will also provide the funds necessary for Imperial, as distinct from local defence; a proposal made in 1887 by the representatives of the Cape of Good Hope, and generally approved by the Conference?

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg also to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if his attention has been directed to the recent speeches of Sir Charles Tupper, High Commissioner for Canada, and of Sir Gordon Sprigg, late Premier of Cape Colony, advocating the thorough examination of the possibility of establishing a commercial union within the Empire; and whether Her Majesty's Government will either recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission upon the subject, or will invite the Colonies to consider with the Mother Country the practicability of establishing a Customs Union, which shall make the Empire independent of Foreign nations, producing everything it wants, consuming everything it produces?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am sure it will be seen that the questions involve considerations of high policy of very great importance; therefore it would be indiscreet and improper for me to give answers to questions of this character without the gravest consideration. It would be also difficult within the compass of an ordinary answer to a question to place the matter at all fairly before the House. I can only assure the House that our relations with the Governments of the Colonies are of a friendly and confidential character, and all questions affecting the interests of the Colonies and the Empire at large are receiving, and will continue to receive, the very serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

Sir E. Clarke

TEACHERS' REGISTRATION AND ORGANISATION BILL.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will agree to refer to a Select Committee the Teachers' Registration and Organisation Bill, introduced by the hon. Member for the Evesham Division, and the Teachers' Registration Bill, introduced by the hon. Member for Rotherham?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There will be no objection to refer the Bills of the hon. Members for Evesham and Rotherham to a Select Committee.

PORTUGAL.

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask, with reference to a statement in the Siecle newspaper which has been copied into the English Press, that the Portuguese Government has granted to the Mozambique Company a Charter whereby the latter will obtain exclusive rights over the territories between the Rivers Sabi and Zambesi, whether Her Majesty's Government recognise these territories as being within the Portuguese sphere of influence or Dominions; and has Portugal a right to grant a Charter over them?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Convention of August, 1890, not having been ratified by Portugal, Her Majesty's Government are under no engagement as regards the boundaries of the respective spheres of influence except the agreement in the modus vivendi, which will expire in May next, and under which we are bound not to perform any act of sovereignty, beyond the line fixed in the unratified Convention. We understand that the Portuguese Government are about to issue a Charter to the Mozambique Company. Her Majesty's Government could not recognise the application of such a Charter beyond that line; and recent events have made it improbable that Her Majesty's Government can be a party to any future Convention as favourable to Portuguese claims to the south of the Zambesi as that which Portugal failed to ratify. In these circumstances, my answer must be in the negative.

FISCAL RELATIONS BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

In answer to questions from Mr. T. W. RUSSELL and Mr. SEXTON,

MR. GOSCHEN said: Sir, great progress has been made in collecting statistics with reference to the fiscal relations between Great Britain and Ireland, and when the inquiries are complete I propose to move for the reappointment of the Committee on that subject. Considerable time is necessary, both for the collection of the statistics and for checking them by actual experience. I think that when the Committee meet they will agree that the time so used has not been wasted.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON TITHES.

MR. H. GARDNER: May I ask the President of the Board of Trade when the terms of the Reference to the proposed Commission on Tithe Rent-charge will be put upon the Paper? The First Lord of the Treasury has stated that the proposed Commission has nothing to do with the present Bill; but I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that the terms of the Reference will have a considerable effect on the action of hon. Members on this side of the House.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am sorry to hear that, for I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend's statement that the Commission has nothing to do with the present Bill. I am not able now to give the hon. Gentleman the information he desires, but I hope to be able to do so on Thursday next.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. COBB: May I ask when the President of the Board of Trade proposes to take any steps with regard to the inquiry on railway rates?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have taken a good many steps on that subject. The next step will be to bring Provisional Orders, which are in course of preparation, before the House. I hope they will be ready before the lapse of any considerable time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—SUPPLY.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has considered any arrangement for the regular conduct of the Supply of this Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir; I have not considered any such arrangement other than that it will be my duty to afford the House full opportunity for discussion.

CITY OF LONDON PAROCHIAL CHARITIES.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury at what hour of the night he proposes to adjourn Public Business, having regard to the Motion which stands on the Paper in the name of the hon. Baronet the Member for London (Sir R. Fowler) in reference to the City of London Parochial Charities?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the Motion of the hon. Baronet is postponed until tomorrow I think that a convenient hour may be found for bringing it on, so that all persons who desire to do so may have an opportunity of discussing it; I do not think that we ought to postpone the Tithe Bill this evening before the ordinary hour.

MOTION.

INDIAN COUNCILS ACT (1861) AMENDMENT (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Sir John Gorst, Bill to amend "The Indian Councils Act, 1861," ordered to be brought in by Sir John Gorst and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 171.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL. (No. 110.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

* (4.12.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to move an Amendment to the effect that the landowner shall be liable to pay the tithe rent-charge only in those cases where he has no existing contract to the contrary with his tenant. I object to existing contracts being torn up in the interests of the tithe owner, and I ask the House, in dealing with this Amendment, to bear in mind the present depressed state of the agricultural and farming interest. No less than one-third, or 33 per cent, of the gross rent is now expended by the landowner in repairs, agency, and incidental charges.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is entering into matters which have nothing to do with the Amendment.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: It is the only opportunity I have of bringing forward an argument to show the great depression under which agriculture is now labouring, and how ill-timed the present Bill is.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 6, to leave out from the word "be," to the word "lands," in line 8, and insert the words—

"In the absence of any contract to the contrary between the owner and the occupier of such lands, be payable by the owner of the lands."—(Sir J. Swinburne.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

(4.15.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. Hicks Beach, Bristol, W.): This Amendment seems to me to be directed exactly against the principle which this House has practically accepted—namely, that the owner of the land should be made directly liable for the payment of the tithe rent-charge, and that the occupier should be relieved from being distrained upon for a debt which is not his own. The Amendment, if carried, would also leave the law on the subject in an extraordinary state; but the first ground is sufficient to prevent my accepting the Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I wish to point out that in many cases the landlord contracts to pay the tithe rent-charge. The object of the Bill is to put the charge on the owner, which has been the original intention. I hope that my hon. Friend will not press the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

(4.17.) MR. D. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to move the Amendment
Sir J. Swinburne

which stands in my name, the effect of which is that the owner shall not be liable where an existing contract to the contrary has been entered into before the passing of the Act. The proposal is a very modest one, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill will find it reasonable and practicable. The Bill as it stands affects existing contracts, as well as old ones, and it simply proposes that it shall not apply to contracts made before the passing of the Act. I do not think we ought to lightly set aside contracts without some public necessity is shown, and I venture to say that no case has been made out for doing away with existing contracts in this case.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 8, after the word "lands," to insert the words "unless the same shall have been entered into before the passing of this Act."—(Mr. David Thomas.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I think that the hon. Member has failed to consider that the real difficulty arises out of existing contracts. I believe that, even under the law as it stands, where fresh contracts are made, the landlord usually undertakes to pay the tithe rent-charge. If the Amendment is agreed to there would be in the same country two different kinds of law applicable to tithe rent-charge. I cannot conceive that the Committee will be of opinion that this would be a good way of dealing with the question.

(4.22.) After some remarks from Mr. H. Gardner, which were not heard in the Gallery,

(4.23.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I think that the Bill is right as it stands. The object is that the burden of the tithe shall be cast where it was originally intended to be—namely, on the owner. In the future it will be absolutely so. It would be very inconvenient to have the law in the state in which it would be left by this Amendment. The present Bill is, in my opinion, a great improvement on the old Bill in regard to the recovery of the tithe from the occupier, as now the landlord would only have the remedy which has been possessed by the original tithe owner; he cannot sue the tenant and recover on a judgment, nor can he make him bankrupt, or do many other things which have been objectionable in the previous Bill, nor is the tenant now to be liable for costs. My own belief is that where the owner of the land pays the tithe he very frequently does not recover the whole tithe from the tenant. In these circumstances I cannot support the Amendment which has been proposed.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: If I remember rightly, when the Agricultural Holdings Act was passed it did not apply to existing leases; they had to run out before those farms came under the Act. This Bill has been brought in not for the benefit of the tithepayer, but of the clergy and tithe owners. Let us understand this Act of Parliament. Is it proposed that the tithe owner shall receive an increased value, and at the same time be relieved of the cost and trouble of collecting the tithe by making it a direct charge on the land?

(4.32.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): The hon. Baronet does not seem to realise that the object of this Bill is to keep the pecuniary burden on the occupier at precisely the same amount as it now is, but to save him and the tithe owner from the annoyance caused by the present system of collection. If the Bill should at all alter the pecuniary obligations of the tenants, I should not be prepared to support it. But it does nothing of the kind, and I therefore hope that it will not be pressed, or if it is, that the Committee will reject it.

*(4.33.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): This Bill as it stands, is more favourable to the occupier than that of last year. Under last year's Bill in an action between the landlord and the tithe owner, the occupier was not required to be served, and yet might be saddled with costs of the proceedings. He should only be made liable for the sum actually paid, by the landlord to the tithe owner.

*(4.34.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I should like to ask whether in a case in which there are several occupiers of one tithe field under existing contracts, the landlord would be able to make one occupier pay the whole tithe, or whether he must apportion it among all the occupiers?

*(4.35.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): That question scarcely arises out of this Amendment. The law is not altered in that respect. The Amendment merely refers to excluding from the operation of the Bill cases in which the tenants have at present to pay the landlords' tithe. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby is entitled to credit for having pointed out objections to the Bill of last year.

Question put, and negatived.

(4.36.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): The next Amendment in my name is to omit the words, "unless it is otherwise agreed between him and the owner of the lands." This Amendment affects the recovery of the sum from the tenant by the landlord, and it is proposed by the words which I am about to move the omission of, to allow the landlord and tenant to so agree between themselves that the tenant may be liable to other remedies than those of distress. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has just said he is not willing to give any other remedies to the landlord than those now provided. But if these words stand, the effect will be that the landlord or his agent will immediately go to the tenant and say, "The Act of Parliament allows me to make a new contract with you. Will you kindly consent to an agreement whereby, instead of paying the sum as tithe, it will be added to your rent?" The Government seem to me not to object to setting aside contracts at all, when that is to the interest of the landlord or clergy, and now it is proposed to allow contracts to be entered into which may be beneficial to the landlord and prejudicial to the tenant. I fear that one effect of the retention of these words will be to deprive the tenant of the benefit of Sub-section 4 of the first clause, whereby he may be allowed to deduct any rates which he may have to pay in respect of tithe rent-charge. But it will have other worse effects. Suppose, to take a concrete instance, the tithe payable upon a farm is £25, the landlord would go to the tenant and say, "Instead of your paying the tithe I will increase your rent from £75 to £100." The effect would be that while the tenant would have to pay the increased rent, the landlord might not have to pay the tithe. At any rate, he would be able to keep in his pocket for months the money the tenant had paid in lieu of tithe. And again, the tithe might be reduced from £25 to £20, but still the tenant would have to pay the £25 rent which had been added to the old rent by the landlord. The landlord would reap the benefit of the reduction, and the tenant would not. Moreover, the tenant would be subject to all the remedies now afforded for the recovery of rent, instead of to distraint only, as in the case of tithe at present.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 13, to leave out from the word "unless" to the word "lands," in line 14, inclusive.—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(4.40.) SIR R. WEBSTER : I hope that the House will not agree to this Amendment. The position of matters seems to me to be favourable to the tenant who has contracted to pay the tithe, and the words really involve no hardship of any moment at all upon him. The position is this. The clause assumes that the tenant is under a contract to pay the tithe, that he does not pay it, and that thereby it is thrown upon the owner, and it enacts that the tenant shall be liable to the landlord a sum of money equal to that he ought to have paid in respect of tithe. The words the hon. Member wishes to leave out simply enable the tenant to come at once to a fresh arrangement with his landlord. He may come and say to his landlord, "Instead of my continuing my term at £100 a year plus the tithe, I agree to take it on at £115 a year, you paying the tithe." They are purely permissive words, and cannot be used against the interest of the tenant. Surely it is an advantage to a tenant to be in a position to get more satisfactory terms from his landlord. If I could see any means whereby the landlord would be in a position to put the screw on the tenant I would agree to the omission of the words. With regard to the suggestion that the effect of these words would be to deprive the tenant of the operation of Sub-section 4, I can assure the hon. Member that that section provides that where the occupier has been called upon to pay rates he shall be allowed the benefit of the Section. I think it better that these words should stand, as I am unable to see how they they can possibly work hardly on the tenant.

Mr. S. T. Evans

(4.43.) SIR W. HARCOURT : I hope my hon. Friend's Amendment will be carried, for this reason. As I understand the framework of this clause the sub-section has this primary object : to make the landowner liable, and to secure that no new contracts shall be entered into which could obviate that. My hon. Friend's fear is that these words will allow of a new contract being made, and enable the landlord to press a disadvantageous contract on the tenant. But all that the sub-section will do will be to moderate the old contract, and not open the door to a new one. These words will, in any event, be mere surplusage, but they might by some persons be construed as if authorising some new contract in reference to the payment of tithe between landlord and tenant. Why should you open the doors to a new contract at all? I hope that Her Majesty's Government will accept my hon. Friend's Amendment.

(4.46.) SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) : If I thought these words had been introduced in the interest of the landlord, I should have been willing to support this Amendment. But if my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby will look at the first clause he will see that its object distinctly is that the liability for tithe shall be thrown on the landowner, notwithstanding any contract to the contrary. Therefore, I do not see how these words can be construed so as to allow the landlord and tenant to come to some agreement by which the owner will be relieved from the payment of tithe by casting the liability on the occupier. That construction is, I repeat, barred by the wording of the first clause, which says that the tithe shall be payable by the owner notwithstanding any contract to the contrary. The words may be regarded as surplusage, but in the interest of the tenant I think it would be well to retain them. Even if you omit them, there is nothing to prevent a landlord making an agreement with his tenant.

*(4.49.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: My reason for supporting my hon. Friend's Amendment is that the words, if retained, will enable the landlord to put the screw on the tenant; you may depend upon it that any agreement entered into would be to the advantage of the landlord and not of the tenant, and we should serve the interest of the latter better by keeping out the words.

*(4.50.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): I think the words would be useful in cases where the landlord may be dead. In such cases, in the absence of any agreement, the executors would be bound to enforce the full payment whatever the private understanding between the parties may have been. And so in the case of the bankruptcy of the landlord; the assignee of the estate would have no option but to claim the full amount. I do not see how the landlord can be said to put the screw on his tenant when he is merely releasing him from an obligation.

(4.51.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury says that these words are mere surplusage. If that be so, then I hope that the Government will yield to our apprehensions, and not be moved by the arguments of my hon. Friend the Attorney General. I am unable to appreciate his argument that if a man owes another a debt, no part of it can be remitted without agreement under an Act of Parliament. Under these words there may be an agreement with reference to the methods of recovery. But we want to close the tithe question as between owner and occupier, and these words seem to us to leave a door open for new agreements. Unless the Government attach vital importance to them, I hope they will strike the words out.

*(4.54.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I am utterly unable to see any means whereby these words can be construed otherwise than favourably to the tenants, for in the case of the landlord's death, or of bankruptcy, or in other cases where statutory consent is necessary to reduce the liability, the words will operate. I can assure my right hon. Friend that if anybody could point out a way in which a tenant could possibly be injured, I should be inclined to let the words go. But no one has pointed out a concrete case of injury to the tenant. We desire to make the Bill work fairly with the interests of the tenant, and we ask the Committee to let the words stand. I can imagine cases in which the words would be advantageous to the tenant.

*(4.56.) MR. S. T. EVANS: Take the case put of a farm on which the tithe rent-charge at the present time is £25. Suppose the landlord says—"I will add £25 to the rent; you will pay it not as tithe but as rent." Is not the tenant likely to be prejudiced by that? Why the tithe might be reduced to £20, but yet under his agreement he would still be paying £25 more than his rent. I do not think these words are, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury said, surplusage. If they are surplusage, why not agree to omit them, but if they are not, then they will enable the landlords to put the screw upon the tenants. The Attorney General says the tenant need not enter into a fresh agreement unless he likes, but I submit that no opening should be left for such agreements to be forced on the tenant.

(4.57.) SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): The question is—Is it desirable so to frame the Act that anybody may depart from its provisions? I think it is not, and for this reason: An agreement might be made between landlord and tenant that the latter should pay the tithe. But, as I understand it, the object of this Bill is that the landlord shall always pay, and I regret very much to think that anybody should even suppose that a tenant might go on paying. It is perfectly obvious that if a landlord desires to give his tenant more favourable terms, he can do it without any formal agreement. We constantly hear of remissions of rent being given to tenants; might not remissions of tithe be granted in the same way? I cannot help thinking that we had better omit the words. They are not necessary, and they might introduce an element of difficulty which nobody desires. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will carefully consider the objections which have been raised.

*(4.59.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not think my hon. Friend quite appreciates the effect of these words. They have nothing whatever to do with the question of the payment of tithe rent-charge and they would not enable the landlord to get rid of his liability to pay. In the case assumed by the hon. Member for Glamorganshire the landlord has already power to give notice to quit to enable him to raise the rent, and therefore these words give him no greater power than he has already. I think the words will enable more favourable terms to be made in the tenant's interest than would be the case without it.

(5.1.) MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I dread very much any suggestion being made in this Bill that there is any occasion whatever for an agreement between landlord and tenant arising out of it. If there is no necessity for making such a suggestion, and if these words are deemed by high legal authority to be surplusage, I hope the Government will not put them in. One of the great objects of those who brought forward the Bill was to provide that there should be afforded as little opportunity as possible for the raising of difficulties between landlord and tenant. I hope that under the circumstances my hon. Friend will press the Amendment.

(5.3.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): There is a very great danger that a new contracts might result in shifting the burden from the shoulders of the landlord to those of the tenant. A great portion of the farmer's capital is always sunk in the soil, and when he leaves he gets no compensation for it in spite of any Act that may be passed. This always places a certain lever in the hands of the landlord in dealing with the tenant. If you leave out these words you have a perfectly simple and definite statement of law, but if they are allowed to remain, to that simple and definite statement you add a provision which opens the door to future complications, the end of which it is impossible to foresee.

(5.4.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I would point out that a fresh agreement might be made on this particular point without entering into the question of the contract on which the tenant holds his farm.

(5.5.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The more I hear this matter discussed the more I see of the danger to which attention has been drawn. Take a case in which the tithe rent-charge is £30, and a new contract is entered into under which it is agreed to take a payment of, say, £25. Supposing before the expiration of the lease the tithe rent-charge falls to £15, the tenant will still be bound to pay £25 although the landlord will only pay the £15. If no fresh contract could be made the landlord could only recover the £15 from the tenant, and yet you are going to allow a contract to be made which will enable him to recover £25. If you strike out the provision the tenant will never have to pay more than the landlord pays. I am not at all sure that under this clause the tenant might not be induced to agree to go on paying the owner what he has paid as tithe after the expiration of the lease. It is of course difficult at the moment to realise all the circumstances that might occur, but I do see a danger in opening the door to evils that may arise under a new contract.

Sir M. Hicks Beach

(5.7.) SIR R. WEBSTER: With regard to one point that has been raised, the clause is distinct. It says, "Notwithstanding any contract to the contrary," which means any existing contract. The right hon. Gentleman had put forward an hypothesis in which the tithe rent-charge is £30, and the tenant agrees to pay £25. The right hon. Gentleman's assumption is that, although he pockets so large a reduction, he may have eventually to pay more than the landlord had to pay. The right hon. Gentleman, however, did not consider the quite as probable contingency of the tithe going up. This provision must, at all events in the first instance, operate in favour of the tenant, because the tenant would not be likely to enter into a contract unless it was to pay less than the amount of tithe due. It is a contract prima facie in favour of the tenant, and I hope Parliament will give him power to enter into it.

(5.12.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I do not think the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General has quite seen the force of the illustration put by my hon. Friend. The gist of the objection, I take it, is the possibility of adding this fixed amount to the rent rather than allowing it to remain in the nature of tithe. There is nothing to prevent the landlord saying, "Instead of your repaying me the tithe let us decide on a fixed amount, based on the average amount of tithe, and add that to the rent." The retention of these words would enable such an arrangement as that to be made. The tithe would then, as between landlord and tenant, be converted into rent, and the landlord would have the like remedies for recovering it as for rent, including eviction in cases where there may be a right of re-entry on non-payment of rent. Such an arrangement, therefore, would practically repeal Sub-section 3, which says that such sum shall be recoverable from the occupier by distress, in like manner as provided by the Tithe Acts in regard to arrears of tithe, and not otherwise. The case put is not one where there is agreement to take a reduced sum, but a fixed sum. I put this to the Government. Further: It is apprehended from one point of view that these words would be injurious, and seriously injurious, to the tenant; it is conceded from the other point of view that they are surplusage. Why, then, cannot the Government omit the words, seeing that they are considered unnecessary?

(5.14.) SIR H. JAMES: I put it to the Government that they might permit these words to be struck out, seeing that from both points of view their retention is regarded as immaterial. If the section says that money is to be owed, if these words are struck out, the landlord and tenant can agree that it shall not be owed. If the Amendment is carried, the agreement can still be made—you do not prevent it by striking out the words. The landlord and tenant, if it be right, can still come to an agreement. My right hon. Friend, in asking for this, is asking for no protection for the tenant; the Government, in seeking to retain the words, are seeking no protection either for the tenant or landlord. We are discussing nothing, and if the words remain out or in, the fact of the voluntary agreement will remain still. If the Government agree that the retention of these words will not alter the law, would it not be better to allow them to be struck out, so as to ensure progress being made with the Bill?

*(5.15.) MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): So far as I see the tenant farmer will get no benefit from the words, consequently, I shall support the Motion to leave them out.

MR. PICTON: The matter of costs has been overlooked.

*(5.16.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I listened with great attention to the observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) in the first instance, because the matter appeared to be of a legal character. I thought the right hon. Gentleman was in favour of the retention of these words, but now I see he regards them as surplusage. Under the circumstance—as I do not attach very much importance to the words myself and as I am anxious to make progress with the Bill—I will consent to the words being left out.

Question put, and negatived.

*(5.17.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: I desire to move an Amendment on the same point—before the word "owe" to insert these words "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary." The words just struck out were surplusage, but it is necessary to prevent a landlord putting pressure on the tenant by increasing his rent, so as to bring it up to the estimated average amount of the tithe. Unless these words are inserted, such an agreement could be entered into, and thereupon Sub-section 3 would become of no effect whatever.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 13, before the word "owe," to insert the words "notwithstanding an agreement to the contrary."—(Mr. J. Bryn Roberts.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(5.18.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I hope this Amendment will not be pressed. We had in our minds that the landlord and tenant might come to an agreement if they thought fit, and these words would prevent the landlord from agreeing to relieve the tenant of the payment, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury has explained can be done under the section as it stands.

Question put, and negatived.

*(5.19.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I move, in line 14, to omit the word "owe," in order to insert the words "be liable to pay."

Amendment agreed to.

* (5.20.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I would now move to insert, in line 14, after the word "has," the word "properly." If this is not agreed to, a tenant might be called upon to pay a sum which the landlord might have improperly paid to the tithe owner.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 14, after the word "has," to insert the word "properly." — (Mr. Samuel Evans.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'properly' be there inserted."

* (5.21.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: There might be litigation, if this Amendment were accepted, as to the propriety of a payment that a landlord might have made on account of tithe rent-charge. It can hardly be supposed that he would pay more than was due.

* (5.21.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): If the tenant were in arrear, say for three or four years, and the landlord chose to pay, could he recover the full amount from the tenant?

* (5.22.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The only remedy for recovery of tithe rent-charge is limited. There can be nothing recovered that is more than two years overdue. I fail to see what improper payment there can be by the landlord, especially when we remember that his remedy against the tenant is expressly limited.

* (5.23.) MR. S. T. EVANS: If the words stand as they are there is no inquiry whether the landlord has paid properly or not. Supposing the tithe owner, who may be a poor clergyman, has gone to the landlord and has said to him, "You will owe me tithe in six months; I am very hard up; give it me in advance." That, I think, would be a payment, and the landlord might forthwith make the tenant pay what was not due. At any rate, I do not see what danger there is in inserting the word "properly."

Question put, and agreed to.

* (5.27.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I have an Amendment on the Paper to leave out "exclusive of" in line 15 in order to insert "but shall not be liable to pay." I will not move it, however, if the Attorney General thinks the words "exclusive of" better express the intention.

* (5.27.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I think those words would be better in the interest of the tenant.

* (5.28.) MR. S. T. EVANS: Is it understood that in no case shall the landlord's costs be recovered from the tenant?

* SIR R. WEBSTER: Yes.

* (5.28.) MR. MORTON: I beg to move, in page 1, line 16, after the word "rent-charge," to insert—

"Provided that in case there are several occupiers in any tithe-field the landlord shall divide the tithe rent-charge among the said occupiers according to the rent reserved by him."

I understand the Attorney General to say that the law as to collection will remain the same under the Bill as it is now. At this moment where there are several occupiers in a tithe-field each occupier is liable for his neighbour's tithe. I can give instances where the law has been put in force in that direction in large cities, and has led to something like a riot. At Streatham, I remember, the rector of the parish endeavoured to make a man who occupied perhaps the fiftieth part of a field pay the whole of the tithe. I do not know what was the upshot of it, but there was a great deal of excitement in the neighbourhood, and it does appear to me that, now that you are dealing with the question of tithe, you should take the opportunity of making the law fair to occupiers. I cannot see why the Government should not provide in the Bill that the landlord shall in each case divide the tithe according to the rent on each parcel. When the owner puts in a distress because one occupier cannot pay, he says, "You have your remedy by making your neighbours pay their share." But it will be found that there is difficulty in a man's making his neighbours pay, because practically in most cases the expense makes the remedy impossible. I myself have gone to agents of tithe owners, and have said, "Why don't you collect the tithe from the parties from whom it is due?" and the answer has been, "Because we have the power to make one person pay, and we go to the one whom we know to have the most valuable goods." I may say that I have heard more cursing and swearing and more harsh language used towards the Church with regard to this mode of collecting the tithe from a single occupier than in regard to any other subject.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 16, after the word "rent-charge," to insert the words—

"Provided that in case there are several occupiers in any tithe-field, the landlord shall divide the tithe rent-charge among the said occupiers, according to the rent reserved by him."—(Mr. Morton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(5.34.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I must point out that the hon. Member is really mixing up two completely different matters. This clause deals with the liability to the tithe, and has no reference at all to the tithe owners. If he desires to alter the law whereby the tithe owner can recover the whole of the tithe from any one of the tithe owners of a field or of several fields, he must do so by a separate section. It is impossible to engraft on this section any Amendment of the kind.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I think, with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, that it would be better for the hon. Gentleman to endeavour to deal with this matter by a new clause.

MR. MORTON: I shall have no objection to do so if that be deemed the proper course; but I hope the Government will give the matter their consideration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name—namely, in page 1, line 17, to leave out the words "such sum," and insert the words "tithe rent-charge."

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I would point out that this is merely a Consequential Amendment, which is inappropriate in this place.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(5.38.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I now have to move as an Amendment to this clause, in page 1, lines 17 and 18, to omit the words "by distress," in order that I may hereafter move the insertion of the words "if it were rent in arrear," so that the sub-section would then read thus—

"Such sum shall be recoverable from the occupier in like manner as if it were rent in arrear."

The case we are dealing with is, where the occupier has made himself liable to the owner by covenant to pay the tithe rent-charge. It has nothing to do with the question between the occupier and the tithe owner. The tenant not having paid the money, the landlord has done so, and he has to recover it. As the law stands, if the tenant fail to pay the tithe rent-charge, and the landlord has done so, the landlord can sue him for breach of covenant, and compel him to refund the money so paid. No reason has been shown for taking this right from him. One of the objects of the Bill is, that the tenant may not feel that he is paying the tithe rent-charge as such. A large number of the farmers do not object to pay a larger rent out of which the tithe rent-charge is paid, but they object to pay a tithe rent-charge as such in any case whatever. Indeed, some of them have made vows that they will, under no circumstances, ever pay the tithe rent-charge, and it is one of the objects of the Bill to get rid of this feeling. It is put as a matter of contract between the tenant and the landlord, and it is undesirable that the landlord should be obliged to distrain for the amount so paid as a separate thing. It would also be unfair that where the tenant has broken his contract the landlord should not be able to get damages for the breach as he does now. I hope the Government will accept my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, lines 17 and 18, to leave out the words "by distress."—(Mr. Sydney Gedge.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(5.41.) SIR R. WEBSTER: It seems to me that we cannot possibly accept the proposal of my hon. Friend, although doubtless there is a great deal to be said in favour of the view he puts forward. I am one of those who did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, that it was unjust that the tenant should be liable in respect to the non-payment of tithe in the same degree as in respect to the non-payment of rent. But when you have shifted to the landowner the responsibility for the tithe, our view is that you ought to give him the same remedy against the tenant as he now possesses. After what I said a few minutes ago, I could not accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

SIR W. HARCOURT: This is certainly one point on which I took strong objection to this Bill, my ground being that it places the tenant in a worse position than before; that is to say, he will be liable to other and stronger remedies than at present in respect of the amount payable for tithes. I am glad Her Majesty's Government have made a concession on this matter. The hon. Member opposite would, however, overthrow this, and expose the tenant to being sued and pursued by other and different methods to those that are now adopted, thereby lessening his present position and rendering the law much more oppressive than before.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: At the present moment the tithe owner may distrain on the tenant's property for the amount of the tithe rent-charge, and not only so, but for the amount of the whole of the charge on land not in the occupation of the tenant. He is also under the liability, if he does not pay, of an action for damages for breach of covenant, and that is where I leave him.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: I would point out that if the Amendment of the hon. Member be carried, the landlord may distrain in respect of the tithe rent-charge on the dining-room furniture or any other chattels of the tenant, which he cannot do now.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON: Under the proposal of the hon. Member for Stockport, it may be that the tenant will be committed to gaol. If he be sued in the County Court and does not pay, and the County Court Judge thinks he ought to pay, he may be committed to prison. Therefore, I regard the Amendment as a most objectionable one, and as altogether opposed to the understanding come to some time ago.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I hope my hon. and learned Friend will not press the Amendment to a Division. The matter is one which we carefully considered, as we thought that the tenant ought not to be placed in a worse position than that in which he had voluntarily placed himself. It was for that reason that we accepted the principle of the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman opposite thinks of so much importance. I do not think it so important as he does, because the whole matter is temporary and only applies to existing contracts, and if the landlords or tenants wish to get out of them they can give notice to terminate them.

Sir R. Webster

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(5.45.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I beg to move, in page 1, line 19, at the end, to insert the words—

"But such sum shall not be recoverable until three months after the owner has served on the occupier a written notice specifying the amount so paid by the owner, and to whom, and the date of payment thereof."

I think the Amendment is a very reasonable one, and I hope the Government will see their way to accepting it. I would point out that by Clause 2 this indulgence is given to the landlord, who is allowed three months in which to pay. If my Amendment is not carried, then I suppose the landlord is to be treated differently to the tenant, and that, I think, ought not to be the case. I remember that last year Lord Brabourne said that it was the universal custom to allow the tenants three, six, or even nine months in which to pay their tithes. I think the Amendment a reasonable one, and that it ought to be accepted by the Government.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 19, after "otherwise," to insert the words—

"But such sum shall not be recoverable until three months after the owner has served on the occupier a written notice specifying the amount so paid by the owner, and to whom, and the date of payment thereof."—(Mr. S. T. Evans)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The alteration proposed is in favour of the tenant, who would not be liable to pay the charge. At present he is allowed 21 days in which to pay the tithe; but now that it is proposed that the owner shall pay it, the hon. Member asks that the occupier shall be allowed three months to meet his liability to the owner.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: Why should the landlord have it in Clause 2?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: That is a question to consider on Clause 2.

SIR W. HARCOURT: As to the question of the tenants not having notice, I would call my hon. Friend's attention to Sub-section 5 of Clause 2—

"Where the occupier of the lands out of which the tithe rent-charge issues is liable under any contract made before the passing of this Act to pay the tithe rent-charge, and is consequently liable by virtue of this Act to pay the amount thereof to the owner of the lands, he may serve notice of such liability on the owner of the tithe rent-charge, and thereupon before an order under this section is made, there shall be such service on and hearing of the occupier, in addition to the owner, as may be prescribed."

It strikes me that is a protection, because the tenant cannot be called upon to pay unless notice is served.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: I do not think it is, because that sub-section is only to apply to proceedings in the County Court. It says so—"That before an order is made by the Court notice must be given." I do not think the sub-section meets the provision which I want to insert.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The hon. Member will recollect that the tenant must be aware of his liability.

(5.54.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 99; Noes 172.—(Div. List, No. 14.)

*(6.2.) MR. MORTON: The Amendment I desire to move is to provide that implements and animals used in land cultivation should be exempted from distress. It may be said, of course, if the owner has to pay the tithe, the occupier who uses the implements and animals may not have much to do with the matter; but there are, at this moment in the country, a certain number of small freehold occupiers who would be affected in this way, and I believe we all hope that in the future there may be more freehold occupiers of small farms than there have been in the past, and the future operation of this Bill may affect a great many persons. At the present time, as the law stands, a workman's tools and various other articles are exempt from the process of distress, and all I wish to do is to put these small freeholders in the same position as regards distraint. I observe that under the old law, or custom, you could not put a distress upon beasts used in tillage, and so it came to my mind to ask the Government to accept this Amendment, as I hope they will.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 19, after "otherwise," to insert the words—

"Provided that implements and animals used in cultivating the land shall be exempt from such distress."—(Mr. Morton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(6.5.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I hope the hon. Member will not press this Amendment. In the first place, I may point out, there is no necessity for it, but my principal objection is, it is quite impossible to alter the remedy for the collection of tithe without a much fuller discussion of the law of distraint from a complete point of view. At the present time beasts for tillage can only be taken when there is no other means of distress. Certain rights are given to the occupier, and the same law prevails in this as in other forms of distress. I do not think the hon. Member has shown a sufficient reason why here there should be a deviation from the general law, and I have never heard a demand for the alteration in the general law.

*(6.7.) MR. MORTON: I do not agree that it is an alteration of the general law of distress, because all I want to do is to put small farmers who are freehold occupiers on the same footing as workmen in other trades. I do not wish to detain the Committee, but I think it is my duty to take a Division.

*(6.8.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I hope the hon. Gentleman will not do that. It is only a partial alteration, and it can only apply temporarily. On the general principle perhaps something may be said, but not certainly on such a clause as this.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2.

*(6.9.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I hope the Government will accept the Amendment of which I have given notice, to strike out the words "three months" and insert "21 days." I am looking at the matter not from the point of view of the parson alone. I am supposing that the tithe is the property of the nation, and will ultimately fall into the nation's hands; the question simply is in regard to a just debt—how and when it shall be recovered. At present, if the tithe-payer does not pay his tithe, a distress can be levied in 21 days. The Bill does away with one remedy and provides another, but it postpones the operation of that remedy for three months. Now, the remedy is in itself a slow remedy. Application must be made to the County Court, and a day has to be fixed for hearing, and the remedy then determined, and, in fact, the tithepayer will get a great deal of delay he has not at present, and in certain cases this will operate with considerable hardship on the man entitled to receive the tithe. For instance, tithe being due in July, he can take no proceedings for three months, and that brings him to the vacation, and the hearing is put off to the next sitting of the Court. So, practically, it may be four or five months before the tithe owner can apply the remedy to get the amount justly due to him; and he gets no interest meanwhile. I really do not see why there should be this long interval. In other cases a man can take proceedings at once when the debts are due, and though people do not do so, that is because it is pleasanter to use a little patience and persuasion before taking proceedings. The same course surely might be pursued in the case of tithe rent-charge, and there is no reason why there should be a statutory limitation barring proceedings for three months.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 28, to leave out the words "not less than three months," and insert the words "twenty-one days."—(Mr. Sydney Gedge.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'not less than three months' stand part of the Clause."

(6.11.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I join in entreating the Government to accept this Amendment. May I point out to the Committee that the argument which was used with unanswerable force by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade in the earlier part of the Debate applies totidem verbis to this Amendment? Why should longer credit be given to landowners in regard to the payment of tithe than has been given hitherto to occupiers? I fail to see why landowners should have longer credit; why they should have a period of six months, within which no action shall lie; while the occupier has only 21 days. Further, let me point out, the question as to length of notice required, really concerns only those cases of tithe where it is undoubtedly a fact that the tithe is justly due and recoverable; for in any other case, in a case where ultimately it is shown the tithe is improperly or unjustly claimed, it really matters not two straws whether the claim is brought to hearing in three months or in a year, because when it is brought to hearing, it will be disposed of, no payment will be made, and no harm will have been done. But this concerns cases where tithe is actually recoverable as a just debt, and surely no more is required than a reasonable time, so that a person who intends to pay his debt may not be put to the hardship of being called upon at a moment's notice to make the payment, or be visited with penalties for not doing so. I trust it is not the intention of the Legislature to inflict such a hardship upon the owner of the tithe as to compel him to wait three months before he can take proceedings to recover that which is justly due to him. We know that would mean a considerably longer time before payment could actually be realised. Probably it will come to this: that three months will be regarded as the legitimate time within which payment is actually due and ought conventionally and customarily to be paid. In many cases this would be a serious hardship. In the case of a large number of owners of tithe a considerable portion of their income is derived from this source, and to pass the clause in its present shape means that a certain portion of the community will be deprived of their debts justly due for an appreciable portion of time during which no interest shall accrue.

Mr. Sydney Gedge

*(6.18.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It is a mistake to suppose that this Amendment is on all fours with that of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire. We are imposing a new liability on the landlord, and therefore it is obviously reasonable that any difference in his position as compared with his liability under his present position ought to be fairly considered. What is the difference? As a general rule, the landowner does not obtain his rent for, at any rate, three months after the period at which it is due. That is a point which surely my hon. Friends behind me, who have spoken on behalf of the tithe owners, ought to take into consideration. You are imposing a liability on the owner of land to pay a certain sum. You ought, in fairness to him, I think, not to enable the tithe owner to proceed against him for non-payment until a reasonable time has elapsed to enable him to obtain the money to discharge that liability. Well, the extension from 21 days to three months has been, I think, in all Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bills submitted to the House. I observe that some hon. Members think the period insufficient, and that it should be extended to six months, and that seems to indicate that we have adopted a happy medium, and that three months is a term that commends itself to those who consider the matter from both sides. I believe it is not the custom for any tithe owner to expect or to receive payment of tithe until at least two months after it is due. Speaking from my own experience, being a considerable tithepayer, the tithe owners are never so harsh as to exact payment before that time. I believe this is a general custom throughout the country. There may be some delay owing to the fact that the question will have to be brought before the County Court; but, on the other hand, remember the sittings of the County Court are more frequent than my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport supposes. At any rate, they do not indulge in a long vacation, as he suggested; and therefore if the tithe rent-charge is not paid in three months, I do not think a very long period will elapse before the tithe owner may take proceedings.

*(6.21.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I suppose the right hon. Gentleman referred to me, for I have put down an Amendment to make the period six months, believing three months not sufficient. The object of interposing delay is two-fold, first, to give the landlord an opportunity of receiving his rent, and I should have thought that on the average a landlord would be exceedingly lucky to get his rent within six months; and further, to give the parties an opportunity of settling the matter amicably, or, as the hon. Member for Stockport said, pleasantly. I am sure we must all deprecate hasty hostile proceedings, and I think that 21 days for the purpose of settlement is manifestly too short a period. There need be no apprehension as to the length of time required for recovery, for, as a matter of fact, County Courts have no long vacation, and they sit every month except in September.

(6.23.) MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I hope the Government will agree to limit the period. There can be no doubt that the result of the Bill, whatever else it may be, will not be to lead to an increase of the income of the tithe owners. Indeed, to some extent, it will diminish it; and I fail to see why we should go out of our way to impose a greater burden upon them to place more difficulty in the way of their collection of their income. I do not think it has been sufficiently placed before the Committee that there are a number of the poorer clergy who are entirely or mainly dependent on tithe for their subsistence. These poor clergy have their household bills to meet, and if you keep them out of possession of their tithe for three months they will have to borrow money and pay interest for it, while for the delay in payment of tithe they will receive no interest. I hope the Government will see their way to modify the Bill, and allow some less period than three months.

*(6.25.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: Upon agricultural holdings rents are frequently allowed to run half a year, and not collected, perhaps, for six weeks or two months after that, so that really the landlord gives a credit of eight months. I am a tithe owner, and I know that my tithes are not paid more than once a year, so for six months they are running. Here we give every possible advantage to the tithe owner. We make the tithe easy of collection; we make it a first charge upon the land; whereas now it is a charge on the produce of the land, and I think it is only reasonable that tithepayers should have at least six months for payment. Landowners will have to pay rates for the tithe owners in advance, and it is right they should have some consideration in return. There is no doubt this Bill will double the value of tithe. From 12½ years' purchase it will become worth 25 years' purchase, and the least concession we can make to tithepayers is to allow them six months to pay in.

*(6.27.) MR. C. W. GRAY: As I had something to do with trying to induce the Government to propose this change, which the landlords of the country have accepted, placing a large responsibility on their shoulders, I may be allowed to express an opinion that the landlords have some claim in return. In the Eastern Counties it is the custom for landlords to collect the Michaelmas rent in January, and the Lady Day rent in July, and sometimes later than that. That is all very well when the farms are in a prosperous condition, and when the tenants are able to pay the rents are collected, but I know farms where 12 months' and 18 months' credit has to be given. This is not because the landlord likes it, but because it is Hobson's choice with him; he must wait until the tenant can scrape the money together, or he must be content to have the farm vacant on his hands. Under all the circumstances, and considering the enormous responsibility the landlords of England have accepted for the benefit of tithe owners, I do hope that if any alteration is made in the terms of this clause, it will be in the direction rather of extending than of restricting the credit. As the clause stands, I think a happy medium has been reached.

*(6.29.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: I think hon. Members are making too much of this point. Under the present system collection is seldom made under three months. The 21 days' notice is a sort of penal notice which is given preparatory to distress; but in practice, when the tithe becomes due the tithe owner waits a month or two before applying for payment, and if payment is not made, then follows the 21 days' formal notice prior to distress. This notice is considered to be of a penal character; it involves a payment of 2s. 6d., and it is only resorted to after previous application has been made for payment. This is the invariable custom. The three months' period is a reasonable compromise on the existing system, and I hope the hon. Member will not consider it necessary to press the matter further.

(6.30.) MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): I hope the Government will stick to their guns. Considering the advantage given to the clergyman, I think he ought not to expect payment on the nail, but that he should be content to wait three months.

(6.31.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I think it would be difficult to recall a single case in which a clergyman has thought proper to institute legal proceedings, by distraint or otherwise, when tithe has not been in arrear for more than three months. Suppose, for instance, 21 days is substituted for three months, and the clergyman thinks proper to avail himself of the substitution, what will be the result? Irritation will be caused, and far more harm done to the Church, in whose interest this Bill has been brought in, than the reverse. I think it would be far better to leave the clause as it stands.

*MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I think the balance of the argument is on the side of my hon. Friend who moved the Amendment. Yet, on the whole, I would advise him not to press the Amendment to a Division. I tender the advice on the ground that this Bill is essentially a Bill of compromise and conciliation. It is a Bill for the settlement of a long-vexed question, and we can never settle any vexed question unless there is a certain amount of give and take. There can be no question that if this Bill is passed it will put the tithe rent-charge on a firmer and more solid basis than it has hitherto occupied, and that is a very desirable consummation. I believe the tithe rent-charge will be paid as regularly and punctually as before—perhaps more so—and if so, whether the tithe owner has to wait for payment three weeks or three months is not very material. We have all of us to wait for payment of debts, and I suppose the tithe owner must wait like other people.

(6.34.) MR. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I sincerely trust the Government will stick to their Bill in this respect. Although the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Talbot) said the balance of the argument is in favour of the Amendment, he did not give any reasons for his belief. But I rose principally to demur to one statement of the hon. Gentleman, and that was that this is a Bill of conciliation and settlement. I assure him that, in the opinion of many of the tithepayers of the country, this is not a Bill of conciliation or settlement in any sense of the word, nor will the tithepayers accept any measure as one of conciliation and settlement that does not involve some equitable distribution of the tithe rent-charge.

*(6.35.) MR SYDNEY GEDGE: If this Bill were going to conciliate people all round, I should be happy to give way; but the hon. Gentleman has just told us it will do nothing of the kind. I do not feel disposed always to give and never to take, and therefore I cannot withdraw my Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

*(6.36.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I move to leave out "whatever is the amount," in line 29, and insert "where the amount due is over five pounds, and does not exceed fifty pounds." Considering the very great advantage the tithe owner gains under this Bill I do not think he ought to be able to go to the County Court unless the amount is over £5. The hon. Member for the Oxford University has spoken about concession, but it appears to me that the concessions are all on one side.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 29, to leave out the words "Whatever is the amount," and insert the words "Where the amount due is over five pounds, and does not exceed fifty pounds."—(Sir J. Swinburne.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(6.37.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Amendments of the hon. Member would leave the law in a very remarkable state. Under them the tithe rent-charge would be recoverable by distraint, under the existing law, on the occupier when it was under £5 or above £50. The hon. Gentleman excludes the tithe rent-charge under £5 and above £50 from the purview of the County Court, and therefore I am reduced to the belief that he intends to retain the existing law. I utterly fail to understand how the hon. Member would recover from the owner who does not occupy his own land.

Question put, and agreed to.

*(6.38.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I beg to move, in page 2, line 3, after the word "owner," to insert the words "and occupier." I understand the Attorney General has been considering whether he can agree to the insertion of these words. My reason for proposing the Amendment is that the occupier is to be bound by proceedings which are conducted in his absence. Under the 5th Sub-section the occupier is to give certain notices before proceedings are taken, but if he does not receive notice how can he give notice under the 5th Sub-section? I do not think the occupier ought to be bound by anything which takes place in his absence, and therefore I hope the Attorney General will see his way to the acceptance of the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 3, after the word "owner," to insert the words "and occupier."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(6.40.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I have not a particle of objection to the insertion of these words, if it is really thought it is desirable to insert them, but after the best consideration I do not think it is desirable. This matter must be considered together with Sub-section 5. The general case is this: Land is held. The landlord or owner is responsible for the tithe in the first instance. The tenant will never have to pay tithe so far as the tithe owner is concerned, but what will happen will be this: if the tenant owes rent, and a receiver comes to him and says, "Your landlord owes the tithe owner so much money," the occupier, under Sub-section 5, will have to pay his rent to the receiver. In that case I have not been able to appreciate—and I have discussed this with the hon. Member—any case in which the occupier could wish to go through the Court at all, because he has nothing to do with the dispute. All he will have to do is to pay his rent to the receiver instead of to his landlord. It seems to me the Amendment would increase the cost in every case without the slightest reason. Then take a special case. Under Sub-section 5 we have provided that in every case where the occupier is liable to pay he shall have such hearing as is necessary in order to protect his own interests. That necessitates the occupier, who is under terms, by his contract, to pay to give notice to the tithe owner. But that would equally apply in case he had notice under the sub-section. The tithe owner cannot tell the cases in which the occupier is liable, and in which he is not liable. The Amendment would increase the costs, and although the increase would be small I think it ought to be avoided.

*(6.45.) MR. S. T. EVANS: We only want to protect the occupier from being prejudiced. So far as costs are concerned, there need be no additional cost, or, if there is, it need not amount to more than 1s. for the service of the notice. With regard to the bearing of Sub-section 5 upon the matter, I think the difficulty which would arise might be got over by the acceptance of my Amendment to Sub-section 5, which provides that instead of the occupier, the owner should give the notice. Let me also point out that before an order could be got under the proceedings a month might elapse. During that time the landlord, if he desired, might get the tenant to pay him any rent which happened not to be paid; but if notice was given to the occupier at the commencement of the proceedings the money would be tied in his hands until the proceedings were concluded.

*(6.47.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: On the former Bill I pointed out that where the occupier is liable—

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The Amendment does not deal with a case in which the occupier is liable.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I pointed out that where the occupier is liable it would be unfair that the landlord and tithe owner should be able to settle the question without any service on the occupier, which would have been the effect of the old Bill. It seems to me the Government have met the case fairly by Sub-section 5, which gives the occupier who is liable the opportunity of serving notice, and in that way being heard. If the Amendment is carried it would be necessary in every case, whether the occupier is liable or not, for the occupier not only to be served, but to be heard. That seems to be a little unreasonable and unnecessary. I trust the hon. Gentleman will not press his Amendment.

*(6.50.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I can hardly understand anything more hard on the poor occupier than the

Sir R. Webster

Amendment of the hon. Gentleman. What are these occupiers? Many of them are ignorant people. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not mean ignorant of the three R's, but ignorant of the provisions of Acts of Parliament. A poor widow, for instance, may be served with a notice, and she will have to attend, or pay a solicitor to represent her, although she may not have the slightest interest in the question. Why should you give a person in such a position the trouble of having a notice served upon her which will frighten her out of her life?

*(6.51.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: We entirely agree with the views of the hon. Gentleman opposite, and if he can withdraw his Amendment now and can suggest to us any case which is not covered by Sub-section 5, but can be included in it, we shall be very glad to consider it.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: I will fall in with that proposal.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.52.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: The object of the Amendment I have placed on the Paper is very clear, and I think the Committee may at once proceed to a decision upon it. I take it that it is not the intention of the Government to encourage litigiousness. If the Government will not consent to the words I propose, I can only imagine that some other means will be provided by which the cost of recovery will be added to the tithe where it is found to be recoverable.

Amendment proposed in page 2, line 5, after the word "due" to insert the words "together with the cost of recovery."—(Sir R. Lethbridge.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(6.53.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I hope the hon. Member will not press this. It is one of the many small matters that must be dealt with by rules. It is very undesirable to endeavour to affirm in this Bill what is to be found in the County Court Acts, although it may be expedient to declare that certain provisions of those Acts do not apply in this case.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: Am I to understand from my hon. and learned Friend that the costs will be added by the rules of the County Court?

SIR W. HARCOURT: It would be most improper that such a rule should be laid down in an Act of Parliament. Costs are generally or very often in the discretion of the Court. This Amendment, if adopted, would take away that discretion. Though the Court thought a case a very proper one to be argued, and that each party should pay his own costs, there would be no power, if this Amendment were passed, to make such an order.

*(6.54.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I think the right hon. Gentleman cannot have read the clause. The words are not "the Court shall" but "the Court may order." My hon. Friend proposes to add, "together with the costs," and the right hon. Gentleman wants the House to believe that under the Amendment the Court "may" order payment of the sum and "shall" order payment of the costs. Will my hon. and learned Friend give me the assurance that if the words remain as they are in the Bill the Court will be able to give the costs?

*(6.55.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I thought my hon. Friend's experiences of County Courts was larger than mine. I have no personal knowledge on the point, but I am so advised by County Court authorities, and I think there is no doubt about it. We intend to give the County Court the discretion, but I will look into the matter.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: That quite satisfies me.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(6.56.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I beg to move the Amendment which stands next in my name. The first part provides that the County Court Judge may have power to order payment of arrears by instalments, and the second that the owner of the land shall not be liable to imprisonment for non-payment. At present no tithepayer can be sent to prison for non-payment of his tithe, but it is doubtful whether under this Bill he could not be sent to prison either for contempt of Court or otherwise. I think that when the subject was discussed by the House last year it was generally understood that there should be no imprisonment for non-payment of tithe in any shape whatever.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 7, at the end, to insert the words—

"Provided always, that the County Court Judge have power to order the arrears of the tithe rent-charge to be paid by instalments, and provided also that the owner of the lands out of which the tithe rent-charge issues shall not under this Act be liable to imprisonment for non-payment under an order of the County Court.—(Sir J. Swinburne.)"

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(6.58.) SIR R. WEBSTER: Two questions are raised by the Amendment. As to the first, with regard to payment by instalments, the answer is exactly the same as I have already given on the subject of costs. The power is possessed by the County Court Judge already, and it would be unwise to reaffirm it in the Bill, as it would give rise to the argument that other powers, now possessed by the Judge, are intended to be withheld by this Bill. As regards the question of imprisonment, I would ask the hon. Baronet not to raise it now but to allow it to be discussed on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. S. T. Evans). The question has been considered by my right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade and myself, and I may indicate what we regard as the right line to take. We have not the slightest intention of making any person liable personally, that is to say by imprisonment for non-payment of tithe. I say that in the most distinct manner possible. But there is one case that has to be carefully observed, and that is a case, not exactly of contempt, but one which I am sure the sense of the House would not like to see excluded. I refer to the case in which a bailiff, who is simply executing the process of the Court properly is met either by assault or by having the goods taken from him. That is already dealt with by the County Court Act, under which a person who acts in that way is liable to a fine of £5, which can be recovered before the County Court Judge. I am sure no one would wish that a mere Ministerial officer should be assaulted with impunity or have the proceeds of the distress taken from him. It is perfectly clear, however, that the existence of liability will under no circumstances enable a person to be imprisoned for non-payment.

(7.0.) SIR W. HARCOURT: It is very desirable that we should clearly understand where we are on this point. I should therefore like to know whether, in respect to an owner now liable for tithe rent-charge under the Bill, there will be any remedy against him whatever except such remedy as now exists, that is to say, no remedy but distress?

SIR R. WEBSTER: None whatever. Distress, or occupation of the land.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Sub-section 2 declares that the officer of the Court—

“Shall have the like powers for the recovery of the sum ordered to be paid, as are conferred by the Tithe Acts on the owner of a tithe rent-charge for the recovery of arrears of tithe rent-charge.”

I would suggest that this requires strengthening by the words “like powers and no other.” So long as we have it distinctly that the tithe owner shall have no remedy he does not now possess against the landlord, who is now in the position of tithepayer, I think we can work out the section on these lines.

*(7.2.) SIR R. WEBSTER: It seems to me it is only a drafting question. The powers you confer are conferred in so many words, and the addition of the words “and no other powers” adds nothing to the effect. I think it is perfectly clear. Take first the tenant under agreement. All he has to do is to pay over the rent to the receiver of the County Court, and not to the landlord. Where the owner is the occupier, recovery is then made by an officer of the Court, who will have the same powers as are conferred by the Tithe Acts. The only other case provided for is the case that does not directly arise, improper interference with the officer of the Court, but that, of course, does not affect the liability of owner or occupier.

*(7.3.) MR. S. T. EVANS: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman undertake to introduce words to show that the reference is expressly to a particular section?

*(7.3.) SIR R. WEBSTER: It is impossible to give that kind of promise without seeing what section the hon. Member means. If he suggests any particular section, I will of course consider any such suggestion. My distinct opinion is that the words in the Bill are amply sufficient to prevent any other remedy being enforced against occupier or owner.

*(7.4.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: I understood the Attorney General to say that the Court will have power to make an order for payment by instalments. Is that consistent with the scope of the Bill? The remedy is not an order for payment, the remedy is the appointment of a receiver. There will be no order to pay, except to pay the amount which the receiver is authorised to recover. Is the County Court to appoint a receiver, and direct him to accept the rent-charge by instalments? I do not know whether the Attorney General has considered the matter; but what he says may be reported, and may lead to a construction of the Act not intended. I apprehend that it is the duty of the receiver to recover the amount, and not to accept instalments, unless the exigencies and necessities of the particular case require it.

*(7.6.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I must disabuse the hon. Member's mind of the idea that anything I say will be used as an interpretation of the Act. I do my best to explain to the Committee what the state of the law will be, but no one should know better than the hon. Member, an experienced practitioner, that the Court puts its own construction on the words of the Act. The hon. Member has really answered his own question. There are no directions in the Act that the money shall be paid by instalments. The receiver will receive the rent and profits, and he will act under the direction of the Court. He will come back to the Court, and say he cannot recover the whole of the tithe rent-charge, but has an offer to pay £5 or £10, or whatever it may be, a month. The Court will consider whether this is a proper arrangement, and will sanction the receiver in receiving it. There will be no difficulty; it occurs not unfrequently in existing practice and procedure in cases of distraint, and there is no occasion for an alteration in the clause.

*(7.8.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I should like the Bill to be so drafted that the County Court Judge should be able to order payment of tithe to be made by instalments if he thought fit, like any other debt; but not to go through the form and expense of putting in a receiver. If the Attorney General assures me that the Bill is so drafted that the Court can say the debt for tithe shall be paid at so much per month I shall be satisfied.

(7.9.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Member has not quite sufficiently studied the scheme of the Bill. So far as the tenant occupier is concerned we propose that he shall not be liable for more than he owes the landlord, and it would be impossible for the County Court to order it. It would alter the whole scheme of the Bill to do as the hon. Member suggests. The receiver for the County Court will receive the rent and profits, but in cases where the receiver cannot get the whole, the Court will authorise him to proceed by instalments. It would be utterly inconsistent with the whole scheme of the Bill if the Court were, in the first instance, to enter into the question whether there should be payment by instalments or not. A little more consideration of the Bill will show the hon. Member that the words he proposes are unnecessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.10.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: The next Amendment raises exactly the same question as was raised earlier, in reference to the cost of recovery and upon the undertaking given by the Attorney General; I do not move it.

7.10.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I propose to add at the end of the sub-section the words, "and no greater or other powers." This will meet with the approval of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and I leave him to press the Amendment upon the consideration of the Committee.

(7.11.) Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 13, at the end, to insert the words "and no greater or other powers."
—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(7.11.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The powers conferred are set forth in the Statute, and it is for anyone who suggests that the receiver has other or greater powers to find the words that give such powers in the Statute. My only objection to the words is that they would be extremely bad drafting. Of course, the hon. Member may say he does not mind that if it adds to the clearness of the section. All I can say, and speaking from some experience, is that the powers given are given by Statute, and the addition of these words do not make the meaning more clear, while they are contrary to the recognised rules of drafting.

(7.12.) SIR W. HARCOURT: If you give to the County Court jurisdiction in a matter where it has not jurisdiction already the natural inference is that the ordinary County Court regulations and powers apply to this subject matter, and, supposing you said nothing more about any special remedy, all the County Court powers and remedies would be applicable to this subject matter. Now, here you give the County Court jurisdiction in regard to tithe.

SIR R. WEBSTER: If the right hon. Gentleman will look at line 13, where the Amendment moved comes in, he will see that the powers conferred for the recovery of the tithe rent-charge refer to the powers of the receiver under the Tithes Act; they do not refer to the County Court Act at all.

SIR W. HARCOURT: But I have not said what I wish the Attorney General to hear. This gives, no doubt, power of distress under the Tithe Rent-Charge Act, which the County Court does not naturally possess. But, in my opinion, it would not be an unreasonable interpretation to say this is a cumulative power. It does not exclude the ordinary County Court powers, but gives, in express terms, a jurisdiction that does not belong to the County Court at all, and it is quite possible to hold that the ordinary and natural County Court jurisdiction and administration should attach to the matter, plus the special remedies given under the Tithe Act. You say you allow these powers, but you do not say only these powers, excluding other County Court powers. It is not an unreasonable proposition to say this gives the County Court extraordinary powers it did not before possess. If you do not mean that, say so; make it clear that you do not mean to add this to the ordinary County Court powers.

(7.15.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: We did not conceive it possible that such an interpretation could be placed upon the words in the Bill; but as we find it is possible, and that the right hon. Gentleman has suggested such an interpretation, to save further discussion we will accept the Amendment.

* (7.16.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby will look at the first sub-section he will see that we have already amply provided that these shall be the only powers given to the County Court. The Court "May order that the said sum, or such part thereof as appears to the Court to be due, be recovered in manner provided by this Act, and tithe rent-charge as defined by this Act shall not be recovered in any other manner."

That excludes all other powers of the County Court.

* (7.16.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: If I agree it is conditional upon the discussion now ending.

Question put, and agreed to.

(7.17.) MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON: I propose to move at the end of the clause a provision that the occupying owner when a receiver is appointed shall be entitled to all the advantages an outgoing tenant would have under the Agricultural Holdings Act. The landowner occupying his own land is to be under the existing law, with the exception that an officer of the Court will be appointed to act for the tithe owner. I believe under the existing law the tithe owner can enter and occupy land from which tithe is due after it has been due for some considerable time. But under the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883 the incoming tenant will pay the outgoing tenant for ploughing, harrowing, tilling, and various other acts of husbandry. Certainly these things are not the produce of the land; and I think it would be very desirable if the tithe owner in future when he enters on the owner's land should be put in the position of any incoming tenant and pay the outgoing tenant for such tillage which he would have payment for, were he an ordinary tenant under the Agricultural Holdings Act.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, after line 13, to add the words—

"Provided that if an officer is appointed by the Court and enters into occupation of the land the landowner shall be treated as an outgoing tenant, and shall be entitled to be paid such money as he would be entitled to receive if he were an outgoing tenant under the 'Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883,' and by the custom of the country, and such money shall not be retained as a set-off against the tithe."—(Mr. Farquharson.)

Sir M. Hicks Beach

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(7.20.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: This sub-section refers to the case of occupying owners, against whom the remedy is by distress, and I do not quite understand how the proposed words apply in that case. I think that, at any rate, I must ask my hon. Friend to place his Amendment on the Paper, for it is evidently an Amendment I could not agree to without some consideration, and I confess I do not quite understand how it would apply at all.

* (7.21.) SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID: Further, I think the hon. Member must tell us where the receiver is to get the money. His proposal appears to me to be an absolute impossibility.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.21.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I propose to move the omission from lines 16 to 20 of the words—

"Unless the Court otherwise direct, on the ground that it is unnecessary for recovering the rents and profits of such land, also of the rents and profits of any other lands of the same owner which are occupied by the same occupier, together with those lands."

If these words remain, I think, as an hon. Member behind me has explained, the tithe owner can sue on the owner of the land for the whole of the tithe, whether the tithe is charged upon the whole of the land or not, a power which I think should not be granted.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, to leave out from the word "and," to the word "lands," in line 20.—(Sir J. Swinburne.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

* (7.22.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The reason for the words is this: It frequently happens that a farm consists of tithable and non-tithable land, and if a person were appointed receiver merely of the tithable part of the farm there would be a difficulty in deciding what he was appointed receiver of, and it would give very great trouble to the receiver. Of course, this is a change in the present Bill to the advantage of the owner of the lands as compared with the proposal we made last year. In some cases it might be possible for the Court, in co-operation with the owner, to divide the land and appoint a receiver over one part, and this would come in under the words "unless the Court otherwise directs." Non-tithable land is in no way liable for the payment of tithe rent-charge. It is rather a technical point, but I hope I have made myself clear.

*(7.23.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: But you are going to put a charge upon land not now tithable.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No; the words are a limitation of the existing law.

(7.24.) SIR W. HARCOURT: Well, but I should like to know, does it mean that the tithe upon land in one county can be recovered by authority over land in another county? If a man occupies two farms, can you make one farm responsible for the tithe on the other?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No; they will be separate occupations.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is very obscure —

THE CHAIRMAN: There is a subsequent Amendment which deals with the point particularly; it would be better to dispose of this Amendment first.

*(7.25.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I take it that the farm would be held under a separate agreement, that it would be rated separately, and therefore would be a separate occupation. The words are applicable to a case where there is tithable and non-tithable land on the same farm.

(7.26.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I am desirous of meeting the Government in the intention that this shall be as nearly as possible a Bill to transfer the liability for tithe from the occupier to the owner; that it should not pass beyond that limit. I will support a Bill having that object. I do venture to submit to the Government that they should eschew in their Bill any alteration of the liability itself; that they should not vary the liability by a hair's breadth in transferring the responsibility from one individual to the other. Now, so far as I understand the right hon. Gentleman, he admits there is a difference from the existing law in this multiple occupation. I do entreat him most carefully to avoid altering the character of the liability. I understand the tendency of these words is to make a variation in the existing law, which will, the right hon. Gentleman says, be to the advantage of the tithe owner.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Well, he admits it is an alteration in the law. He says it will be against the tithe owner if the alteration is not made, so I conclude it is an alteration in favour of the tithe owner. That we ought not to do. Apart from the incidence, we should adhere to the law strictly and literally as it is, and if there is any doubt about it I should strongly advise the omission of the words.

*(7.28.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I did not say this was an alteration of the law, but an alteration from the proposal we made last year, which was taken objection to. Our proposal last year was that the order of the Court should be executed against the lands subject to the tithe rent-charge, and against any lands of the same owner in the same parish, and occupied by the same person as the lands subject to the tithe rent-charge.

*(7.30.) SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID: It appears to me that there might be considerable difficulty in dealing with this matter. If a man occupied 1,000 acres, and the tithe had not been paid on an additional strip of 10 acres, I think it would be a little strong to seize the 1,000 acres as well as the 10.

*(7.31.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: My difficulty is that the effect of this clause as it stands will be to make tithable lands which were not previously tithable. If it does so to any extent that is a very objectionable change in the law, and quite contrary to the principle on which the Bill is based.

*(7.32.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: Unless these words stand, the clause will not be workable at all. The landlord may, perhaps, have leased or let the farm to one tenant, but the farm is liable in different parts to different charges, and unless this clause comes in the unhappy receiver will have to ascertain and apportion the precise plots of land which are subject to the different rent-charges. It would be utterly impossible, therefore, to limit the receiver in the reception of the rent merely to the particular plots. With regard to the limitation to "within the parish," that was all very well beforehand, but now that it is the landlord and not the occupier who is made responsible it is a very different thing. The landlord's estate is to be liable for the money.

(7.35.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I thought these words were dangerous before, but after hearing the speech which has just been delivered, I see that there is not only danger, but immense mischief in them. I am exceedingly obliged to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stockport, for he has explained the words by his speech. It says, it was all very well in the old days when you were proceeding against the occupier, but it is different now. Well, first of all, you never did proceed against the occupier, but against the landlord, and so you ought to do here. Now, the hon. Member has shown that by having this matter dealt with in the County Court, the tithe owner is to have greater and more extensive powers against the landlord than he had under the old law. I cannot understand at all why the Government are not content to leave the law as it is under Clause 85 of the present Act. You are altering the provisions of that clause most materially. The present clause contains none of the limitations which appear in that. If we are asked how the receiver is to distinguish between one piece of land and another, the answer is that he has to distinguish under the Act of 1836. I would urge the Government to keep the law as it is. I understand this Bill to make this simple change in the law: that the tithe is to be levied on the owner instead of the occupier, and that instead of being levied by the tithe proctor of the tithe owner, it is to be levied by the County Court officer. With that part of the Bill I agree, but I object to, and will resist, anything that goes outside those two propositions. This is a material alteration of the existing law. If it is not, leave out the words. If it is, I think for the reasons I have stated we ought to object to it, and I do object to it, in the interest of the landowner as well as of the occupier.

*(7.39.) SIR R. WEBSTER: As I understand the Amendment, it goes a great deal further than the right hon. Gentleman has just said. We have no intention of bringing within the ambit of the Bill, rents and profits in tithable land which would not be subject to Section 80 of the Act of 1836; and if the words go further than our intention, we must consider the question. But the Mover of the Amendment proposes that no other land shall be liable except the particular land from which the particular tithe issues. We cannot accept an Amendment which will, practically speaking, remove from the security of the tithe owner those very lands which are subject to Section 85.

*(7.40.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: The object of Section 85 was not to make land which was not tithable pay tithe, but to provide that when the tithe was apportioned between the various parcels of land—so much on this and so much on that—and where the lands were owned by the same parson and occupied by the same tenant, you might resort to one tithable parcel of land for what another tithable parcel was not sufficient to pay.

SIR R. WEBSTER: Not necessarily "tithable" land.

MR. T. H. BOLTON: The words point to tithable land. They must be taken in conjunction with the words "notwithstanding any apportionment." The tithe was commuted into a money payment, chargeable on the tithable lands of the parish. The apportionment divided the amount amongst the lands, and the object of the section was that, notwithstanding that division and that apportionment, if a parcel of land was not sufficient to pay the tithe charged on it, resort should be had to another parcel if owned by the same person and occupied by the same tenant. There was no provision in the Act to make non-tithable land pay tithe, and you cannot resort to that land. The proposal now made is not only to extend the liability to non-tithable land, but to extend the liability to all lands owned by the same person and held by the same tenant, whether in the same parish or not. If a farm lies in two adjoining parishes the receiver appointed to recover an arrear of rent-charge in one parish might cross the boundary and levy the tithe in the adjoining parish. That gives a far wider scope and operation to this section than ever could have been intended, even by the framers of the Bill. I therefore suggest that this clause should be considerably modified, and should be restricted to tithable lands and to lands in the same parish.

Mr. Sydney Gedge

(7.44.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: We all feel it would be desirable, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has said, to maintain the liability of lands to tithe rent-charge exactly as it is. Therefore, I would propose that we should leave the clause as it stands down to "lands" in line 18, and then insert—

"And of any other lands which would be liable to be distrained upon for the tithe rent-charge as to which the order refers under the provisions of Section 85 of the Act of 1836."

The clause would then run—

"In any other case the order shall be executed by the appointment by the Court of a receiver of the rents and profits of the lands, and, unless the Court otherwise directs, on the ground that it is unnecessary for recovering the rents and profits of such lands, of the rents and profits of any other lands which would be liable to be distrained upon for the tithe rent-charge to which the order refers, under the provisions of Section 85 of the Tithes Act, 1836."

(7.45.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I think we are agreed in the object, but the question is how is it to be carried out. You carried it out in a very simple way in a previous sub-section. Section 85 of the Act of 1836, contains part of the powers therein referred to, and the definition of the powers; and I do not see why you should not deal with the matter under this sub-section in a similar spirit, even if the circumstances prevent your repeating the same words. Why should you not be content to give the receiver the powers that already exist under the existing Tithes Act? That would be quite safe. I do not see that any specification is necessary; and you have done something similar under Sub-section 2.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: These powers are only powers of distress, and we must remember that the receiver has other powers, such as receiving rents and profits.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not quite understand how the case stands in the mind of the Government. You are no longer to proceed against the occupier. You have initiated action against the owner where he is occupier, and have made other new departures; and then you say in "other cases" the orders shall be executed in accordance with the powers conferred by the Tithe Act. What is meant by other cases?

SIR R. WEBSTER: The "other cases" are where the occupiers are not the owners; there is no doubt about that. The right hon. Gentleman says, "Bring the same powers into this sub-section," but what is the subject matter? It is different from that of the other sub-section, being the land in respect of which the rent, and profits are to be received. Accordingly my right hon. Friend has suggested that the receiver should have power to recover the rents and profits of such lands, and of any other lands which are liable to be distrained upon under Section 85 of the Tithes Act. It is said that we should apply to that out of which the rent is to issue, namely, the land, exactly the same provision as that we apply in giving power to a receiver; and it is assumed that the same drafting should be resorted to in either case. Obviously that cannot be done.

(7.53.) SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID: I hope the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade will accept the Amendment. I objected to the Bill because it extended the powers of the receiver, but that objection was met by the receiver being placed in the same position he formerly occupied. I hope the Committee will accept the proposal.

(7.54.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I would suggest that the words—

"Unless the Court otherwise directs, on the ground that it is unnecessary for recovering the rent and profits of such lands," are unnecessary. The receiver ought to have the full power conferred on him by the Act of 1836. In certain cases where tithe has been apportioned on a small parcel of the land, the fact that the tithe owner had the right to recover from the land in the occupation of the same occupier, owned by the same owner in the same parish, was a great security to him, and it does not seem to me that he ought to be limited in these powers in reference to such land. I do not think the Court ought to be asked to consider whether it is unnecessary for the purpose mentioned. The tithe owner ought to have the full power he possessed now under Section 85 of the Act of 1836 to recover his tithe from all the land owned by the same owner in the same parish, occupied by the same occupier.

(7.55.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: If the right hon. Gentleman assures me that the words of the proposed Amendment carry out the full intention of hon. Members on this side of the House, and that the powers of the receiver will not exceed those possessed by him under Section 85 of the Act of 1836, I will, with the permission of the Committee, withdraw the Amendment.

*(7.56.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I think I am right in my recollection that the insertion of the words giving a discretion to the Court to exclude the other lands was intended to be an equivalent for the omission of the limitation to the parish, but it would be fairer to both sides that we should leave the matter as it was.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.57.) Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, to leave out the words—

“Unless the Court otherwise directs, on the ground that it is unnecessary for recovering the rents and profits of such lands,”

in order to insert the words—

“And any other lands which would be liable to be distrained upon for tithe rent-charge as to which the Order refers under the provisions of Section 85 of the tithe.”—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

Question, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause,” put, and negatived.

Question, “That those words be there inserted,” put, and agreed to.

*(7.58.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I beg to move to leave out, in line 21, the words—

“The County Court shall have the same powers for the purposes of this Act as in any other case where the Court can appoint a receiver,” in order to insert—

“In respect of receivers, and may confer on the person appointed as receiver any powers that the Court may confer on receivers.”

If these words I move to omit are allowed to stand they will, I think, be found very dangerous. At present the County Court has the right, I believe, to appoint receivers in any case that may come before it; therefore, the words as they stand would give the County Court the same power that it has in every other case within its jurisdiction. I think the words I propose to substitute will carry out the intention of the Government.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 21, to leave out from the words “the
Sir J. Swinburne

County Court,” to the word “and,” in line 23.—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

*(7.59.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I have some difficulty in following the scope of the Amendment, because it is not on the Paper. It seems to me it is only a question of language. It is necessary for the Court to keep control over the receiver; and even if the words the hon. Gentleman suggests were accepted, my impression is that the powers of the receiver would not be as they are now. The words sought to be struck out are necessary to keep the control of the Court over the receiver, and the words the hon. Member proposes to insert in their place are merely alternative.

(8.0.) SIR W. HARCOURT: What my hon. Friend is afraid of is that these words, “shall have the same powers for the purposes of this Act as in any other case,” may go beyond what is desirable or necessary, and he thinks that the words he suggests would provide the requisite limitation.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The objection is that you propose to appoint a receiver and give him all the powers the Act of Parliament gives in the case of the High Court of Justice.

(8.1.) MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.): I think the intention would be best carried out by these words—

“And the Court shall have such control over such receiver, and may confer on such receiver such powers as an ordinary receiver is subject to and enjoys;”

that is to say, there shall not be given to this receiver under this Act any exceptional position; that he shall have no further powers than an ordinary receiver, and shall be subject to the same control. The words of the clause, however, go much further than that.

SIR R. WEBSTER: The words objected to have been carefully considered, and I should prefer to stand by them unless the hon. and learned Member for Monmouthshire can show that other and greater powers than are intended are given by statute, and point out the statute that gives them. I do not see any advantage that would be derived from the adoption of the words suggested instead of those in the Bill.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: I would suggest these words—

"And subject to the prescribed regulations, the County Court shall have the same powers in respect of receivers, and may confer on the person appointed as receiver any powers which the Court can confer on receivers."

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Those words seem to be practically the same as ours. At any rate, I cannot see the difference; but I will say that if we find that our words do not satisfy us on consideration before the Report stage, I shall be ready to consider the suggestion of the hon. Member.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: I have now to move the Amendment I have placed on the Paper, providing—

"That it shall not be competent to the County Court Judge to appoint a receiver where the amount of tithe rent-charge due shall not exceed the sum of ten pounds, and provided also that the receiver appointed under this Act shall be answerable to the owner of the lands out of which the tithe rent-charge issues, for mismanagement or for injury to the produce or to the holding."

As the Bill now stands, it might be used in a very oppressive manner, through a receiver being appointed if a very small amount were overdue, that receiver—being merely anxious to recover the sum due—ploughing up old grass land without regard to the injury he is doing, in order to secure a crop, and then, when he has sold the proceeds and discharged the debt, leaving the farm in a ruinous condition.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 25, at end, to add the words—

"Provided always, that it shall not be competent to the County Court Judge to appoint a receiver where the amount of the tithe rent-charge due shall not exceed the sum of ten pounds, and provided also that the receiver appointed under this Act shall be answerable to the owner of the lands out of which the tithe rent-charge issues for mismanagement or for injury to the produce or to the holding."—
(Sir J. Swinburne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: In regard to the first part of the Amendment, I should like to ask the hon. Member how does he suppose the tithe rent-charge could be recovered without the appointment of a receiver? With regard to the other part of the Amendment, the receiver will, of course, be answerable to the Court, and I do not see any special reason for the adoption of the hon. Baronet's proposal.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: If the receiver is made liable for improper use of the farm, he will be more careful. If the Government desire it, I will withdraw the first part of the Amendment; but I think I must press the second portion.

(8.15.) SIR R. WEBSTER: Suppose you have a receiver, he is liable for any misconduct of that character. It would be a most injurious thing in the interests of the tenant and the owner to say that he is to be otherwise liable.

MR. WARMINGTON: I understand that a receiver is nothing but a receiver. He is not the manager of the farm; that would be entirely outside his duty, which is to receive the tithe rent. If he misconducts himself, he will be answerable to the Court, and in a very summary manner.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE: Suppose the occupier and owner decline to go on cultivating the farm, then the receiver would appoint a farm bailiff to cultivate it—probably some ignorant person, who would be told to make the amount of the tithe rent-charge as quick as he could. Complaint would be made, and the reply would be, "We did our best." There may be a legal remedy, but practically the owner and occupier would be without any redress whatever.

MR. C. W. GRAY: I should like it to be made perfectly clear whether, under any circumstances whatever, the land will be cultivated by the Court officer, because the owner and occupier should be safeguarded under the circumstances. If it is merely a case between the payer of the rent and the tithe owner, I have no objection to the clause as it stands. But I cannot be put off by any words which are ambiguous.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It was never intended by the word "manager" that the receiver should cultivate the land. He receives the rent and pays the tithe.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I should like it to be clearly understood. We know that, under the old Tithe Law, if there were arrears for a certain time, and it was impossible to get the money, then the tithe owner could go in, and he does so now. Where the tithe exceeds the rent, and it is not worth while cultivating the land, you get what is called "derelict" land. We know there are certain cases in which the Colleges of Oxford occupy farms which have become derelict in consequence of the extreme burden of the tithe. Unhappily the cases of derelict lands are not infrequent in this country. In Berkshire and Oxfordshire there are such cases. The tithe, as in the old days the poor rates, have eaten up the profits, and it is not worth while, either on the part of owner or occupier, to go on with the cultivation. I want to know, under this Bill, what would happen in those circumstances? There is no question of the receiver receiving the rent; there is no rent paid; there is no tenant to pay it; there is no one who will cultivate the land.

*(8.20.) SIR R. WEBSTER: Of course. Those cases do not come under Sub-section 3, which applies to cases where the land is occupied. And where the land is occupied the receiver has no power to interfere, except to receive the rents. It may be that in drafting Sub-section 2 I have not sufficiently considered the cases to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has referred, but I think the law in these cases is that the owner is the occupier. There is no such thing as a derelict farm, in the sense of its being entirely unoccupied. It is perfectly correct that under the powers of the Tithe Commutation Act the tithe owner has gone in and worked the farm; but Sub-section 3 does not apply, but under Sub-section 2 the officer of the Court would have the power of entering. That is quite clear, though it cannot be discussed now, Sub-section 2 having been passed. Still, I am prepared to consider it before the Report stage.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Under those circumstances the receiver would be the manager.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No; the receiver would not be manager at all.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Who is to go in? The officer of the Court, the Attorney General says. Land goes out of cultivation because it does not pay, and it is to be made remunerative by sending an officer of the Court to farm it. Are the officers of the County Courts throughout the country to cultivate these derelict farms?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I never suggested it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: These farms become derelict because it does not pay to cultivate them. We ought really to have some more agricultural exposition of what is to be done in what I may describe as desperate cases. I understand that the receiver is a man who receives rent. Now, suppose that the tithe rent-charge is £50, and only £40 is forthcoming, what is going to be done with reference to the other £10?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not know whether I can be considered an agricultural authority or not, but I think the right hon. Gentleman entirely misses the intention of this sub-section. This sub-section cannot apply where the land is not let. It only applies where the land is let. Well, then, the land being let, the owner of the land would obtain relief under the 3rd clause of this Bill, and the tithe would be reduced in accordance with the provisions of that clause, and no more of the tithe rent-charge would be recoverable than that clause allowed. But if it is a derelict farm then it would come under the provisions of Sub-section 2; and under those circumstances the officers of the Court would enter and distrain, subject again to the provisions of the 3rd clause, which would prevent the tithe rent-charge distrained for being more than a certain proportion of the assessment to the Income Tax under Schedule B.

SIR W. HARCOURT: My proposition is that there is nothing to distrain on on a derelict farm.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: That being so, the other provisions of the Tithe Act of 1836 would come into force, under which, where there is no distraint, the tithe owner can enter and cultivate, subject to the limitations of that Act. That, I think, answers the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Not quite. Would it be the tithe owner, or the County Court Officer? Is the Court Officer to farm derelict land?

*MR. S. T. EVANS: The Attorney General says that Sub-section 3 does not apply to derelict farms. But I will put a case to him which would fall within Sub-section 3. The landlord might say to the tenant: "If you come to an agreement with me, I will let you the farm for 7 or 14 years at a very low rent. I will, for instance, give you a lease for 14 years, and if you erect the farm buildings you shall have the farm for seven years at a peppercorn rent." What would the officer of the Court do in such a case? Receive the peppercorn?

*(8.31.) SIR R. WEBSTER: My hon. Friend has overlooked the provisions of Section 3. Still, it seems to me that this is a matter which requires further consideration, and it shall receive it when we come to the right clause.

*(9.3.) MR. S. T. EVANS: The Attorney General thinks that Section 3 applies to the difficult cases in connection with the clause we are now dealing with. But Section 3 deals solely and simply with the remission of tithe, and not with payment of tithe. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to think that if there is an abatement of tithe under Section 3, that section imposes a personal liability on the landlord to pay the tithe rent-charge at the amount fixed by the Commissioners. There is no provision in the Bill to meet the cases we have put. It might very well happen that a tenant agreed to put up farm buildings on the understanding that he should pay a peppercorn rent in the first half of the period of his lease. In that case, by what method are you going to get your tithe from him?

THE CHAIRMAN: The question raised is rather wide.

*(9.5.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby raised the question whether the receiver proposed to be appointed under this Bill was to take possession of the farm, or whether the tithe owner, falling back upon the remedies given to him by the existing Act, was to do so. If the Attorney General will refer to Section 1 he will see there a distinct declaration that the tithe rent-charge shall not be recovered in any other manner than the manner prescribed—that is to say, by the appointment of a receiver. The appointment of a receiver is the only way in which tithe rent-charge can be recovered.

SIR R. WEBSTER: Sub-section 2 gives other powers.

MR. T. H. BOLTON: Yes, in reference to land occupied by the owner; but it amounts to the same thing. The receiver is the only person who can do anything, and he is to have all the powers given by the Tithe Acts for recovery of the tithe. One of the powers given by the Tithe Acts for the recovery of rent-charge is taking possession of the land. The Act of 6 & 7 William IV., chapter 71, section 82, provides that where there is not a sufficient distress to provide for the tithe rent-charge certain proceedings are to be taken, and they result in the tithe owner taking possession of the land. Therefore, the receiver to be appointed under this section may, under certain circumstances, be charged with the duty of taking possession of and, if he cannot find a tenant, I suppose of cultivating the land. If that is not intended, there will have to be some alteration in the Bill. I do not know that this is a very serious or practical difficulty, because the receiver appointed will act, I suppose, as a sensible man. He will collect the rent if there be any. He will let the land if he can. If he cannot let it he will have recourse to the Court, and the Court will give him instructions. I do not suppose he will carry on any extensive farming operations. He may expend a little money in laying down grass. I hear the hon. Member for Lichfield say that it would take a generation to produce pasture.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment before the Committee is that of the hon. Baronet the Member for Lichfield Division.

MR. T. H. BOLTON: The hon. Baronet proposes that the receiver appointed shall be answerable for mismanagement or bad cultivation. I am endeavouring to show that there may be a responsibility of the kind upon the receiver, but that I doubt whether the responsibility is of a very serious character. I do not think we should pass this section without realising the full effect of it, namely, that it will give the receiver a right to take possession and to carry out farming operations. That may involve putting land in pasture. The hon. Baronet says that is a long operation. I do not know that it takes 50 years. I have myself managed it in less time than that. At any rate whatever agricultural operations the receiver will have to carry out will not be of a very serious or important character. But in 999 cases out of 1,000 the probability will be that there will be a tenant who will pay rent, a some one who will be willing to take the land and pay something for it. The last thing the receiver will do will be to take the land and cultivate it. I prefer to leave the clause as it is, for there will be great difficulty in getting a man to act as receiver, if in a certain event he has to farm the land and to be responsible in damages if he does not farm it properly.

(9.15.) MR. H. GARDNER: I do not at all agree with my hon. Friend when he says it will be a trifling matter if receivers who have no knowledge of agriculture have to work the land. But I rose for the purpose of ascertaining from the Attorney General what the situation is. I understand from the President of the Board of Trade and the Attorney General, that it is possible if lands become derelict—as many lands in Essex have—and there is absolutely no occupier, Section 2 of the clause will come into operation, and the owner become the occupier. It is under Section 2 of the clause that all the remedies given by the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836 come into play, therefore it is obvious that the County Court when called upon will have all the remedies and power of the tithe owners under that Act. These remedies and powers include the appointment of a manager to enter into possession of the land, and work it for the benefit of the tithe owner. I want to know from the Attorney General or the President of the Board of Trade, who is to appoint this manager, and who the manager is to be? Is he to be the receiver? If so, I think we shall be landed in some difficulty. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has said, this derelict land, which is really the land about which the difficulties produced by excessive tithe arise at the present moment, will be handed over, in the County of Essex, to the receiver of the County Court.

*(9.17.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The questions put to me are really not strictly in order, and I can only answer them by the leave of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby suggests that I have proposed that all these derelict lands should be cultivated by the receiver of the County Court. If he likes to make a joke at my expense I have no objection. I never suggested anything so absurd. I admit that before the Report stage we shall have to consider whether or not some addition should be made to the language of Sub-section 2, in reference to derelict lands. But this Amendment does not apply to Sub-section 2 at all. It is a proviso to Sub-section 3, and to that sub-section it has no application of any sort or kind. I appeal to the Committee to proceed to the other clauses, and make progress, instead of continuing this barren discussion.

Mr. T. H. Bolton

(9.18.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. and learned Gentleman is mistaken; this question arises on Sub-section 2. Sub-section 2 applies to land occupied by the owner, and an untenanted farm is not occupied by the owner. ["Who occupies it?"] Nobody. Such a case comes under Sub-section 3—"in any other cases"—and that is why these words do not apply to land occupied by the owner. Those words include cases in which land is not occupied by the owner. Rates are levied upon the occupier. If an owner does not cultivate the land, what rates does he pay? He does not pay rates. I remember Mr. Henley telling me that land all round him was allowed to go out of cultivation in 1835, in order that no rates might be paid. To pretend that what is meant by Sub-section 2 is a non-beneficial occupation is to raise a technicality, which is not applicable to a business discussion. Let us treat this on a business footing, and I assert that there is no business man in the County of Essex who will call a man the occupier of a farm if he does not cultivate it or go near it. You may send any number of Attorney Generals down to a market town, but you will not persuade the people that a man is in occupation of a farm if he does not cultivate it or go near it. That is the distinction between practical agriculture and technicality. Let us deal with this matter in language that is "understood of the vulgar," and not in the celeris juris of the Attorney General. Do not let us call people occupiers who do not occupy. I contend that in some form or other you can provide for the matter under this section. Under Sub-section 3 you begin very properly by making provision for the receipt of rents and profits where there are rents and profits. That is quite right. That is one of the other cases. Now we are putting to you a case where there are no rents or profits, where there is no occupation, and where under the old tithe law the tithe owner has the right to go in. I will give you a case where the tithe was much greater than the rent. The tithe owner, that is to say a college, went in and took possession under the Tithe Act of 1836. They were not going to cultivate the land themselves, not even by their bursar, who would be a better man for the purpose than the bum-bailiff of the County Court. They said—"We are the tithe owner and there is no question of the tithe." They induced a man to go into the farm. They said—"We will let you the land, and you shan't be governed by the custom of the country; you shan't be under any restrictions as to the cropping of the land." They could not get a tenant except under those destructive conditions. This is one of the "other cases" which you have not dealt with. You must explain to us who is to stand in the shoes of the tithe owner at present: when it is necessary to take possession of the land which is neither worth the rent by the tenant or worth occupation by the owner.

(9.28.) MR. C. W. GRAY: I cannot agree with the hon. Member for St. Pancras, that because there are only a small number of cases that will be affected by this Amendment we are not called upon to deal with them. It is just these cases which are the burning cases. We have before us two propositions. The hon. Baronet (Sir J. Swinburne) proposes that the receiver appointed under this Act shall be answerable to the owner of the land out of which tithe rent-charge issues for any injury done the holding, and the Attorney General suggests that we had better not deal with this subject now, because it could be dealt with better on a subsequent clause.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I pointed out that it must be dealt with by some words in Sub-section 2. The person entitled to possession is the occupier, if it is not held, and that has been decided over and over again.

MR. GRAY: I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for the correction. I desire that the point shall be dealt with in the best practical manner possible, but I do not quite understand what is the meaning of the word "must." Will the Government undertake that this matter shall be dealt with in a business-like way on the Report stage? The whole reason shown to the House for the Bill is connected with the collection of the tithe. We are told that circumstances have so altered since the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act that some of the tithe owners are in such a plight that this House should pass a Bill to strengthen their position, and give them the means of collecting their tithe with more certainty than hitherto. But, on the other hand, circumstances have changed also with landlords and tithe-payers, and they are in a different position since the passing of the Commutation Act. And just as the one contention on the part of the tithe owners has force, so I maintain the other contention on the part of tithepayers ought to gain attention here. There is no doubt whatever that a number of farms are derelict, or nearly so, that landlords are seriously considering whether it would not answer their purpose better to make them derelict, and so be free from the imposition of tithe and taxes, which are collected so long as cultivation continues. This being so, I may ask the Government to say not only that this question shall be considered on the Report stage, but in what sense they will be prepared to consider it.

(9.32.) MR. W. B. ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I concur with the hon. Member for Maldon in asking the Government to give some more definite indication of the spirit and sense in which they will consider this point. Apart from the matter of cultivation, there is the greatest possible room for danger to be apprehended from an officer of the Court being turned loose as receiver or manager of a farm. I also think the Attorney General has been unconsciously a little impatient in his appeal to us to pass on to another clause, considering the manner in which the Committee have dealt with the Bill, and the progress we have made.

(9.33.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: All that my hon. Friend the Attorney General meant was to restrain the Committee from an unpractical discussion. I am sure he did not for a moment desire to suggest that there had been any delay in the progress of the Committee. In fact, we have to thank the Committee for an attentive and a business-like sitting. It occurred to my hon.

and learned Friend that this point does not arise on this sub-section. In our belief, where land is not let to a tenant the owner of it must be the occupier. In other words, he must be rated as the occupier. I have had some little experience on Assessment Committees and matters of that kind, and I am sorry to say I am owner of some unprofitable land, and I know it is impossible to escape rating as such. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby contends that is not so, and that the case would fall under Sub-section 3. This I will say, that under whatever section it may come, we are quite in accordance with the view the hon. Member for Lichfield suggests, and which I think the Committee will agree with, that the officer of the Court should not waste the land. Now, we believe that he is prevented from doing so by the provisions of the existing law. We will look into the matter, and if the provisions of the existing law are not clearly sufficient under the law controlling the ordinary work of the County Court officials, and we find that additional provisions are necessary, then these additional provisions shall be inserted. I do not think I can give a more definite pledge, and with that understanding I hope the hon. Member will withdraw his Amendment. I am inclined to think the provisions of Sub-section 2 on the point ought to make it clear that where the land in the absence of distraint is taken possession of by the tithe owner under the provisions of the Tithe Act that the tithe owner should cultivate, and not the officer of the County Court. But the matter shall be carefully considered.

*(9.37.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: With this assurance I am content. I want to be assured that officers of the Court shall not pocket the money and allow the land to be spoilt and wasted, doing more injury, perhaps, than can be repaired in half a century. I cannot enter into a controversy upon fine legal points. But from a practical agricultural or pastoral point of view, I know that in many cases small farms have been rendered utterly valueless by the ploughing up of old grass fields. But with the assurance that the point shall be considered I withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Sir M. Hicks Beach

*(9.39.) MR. S. T. EVANS: The object of my next Amendment is clear, and I think I need only move it.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 29, after the word "Acts," to insert the words—

"But such sum shall not be deemed a preferential debt or payment in bankruptcy."—
(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(9.40.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I think the hon. Member is regarding this as if it were a personal debt, but it is not that; it is a charge on the land, and therefore must have priority over other debts. If the tithe rent-charge were to be dealt with as the hon. Member supposes it should, then it would merely rank pari passu with the interest on a mortgage. But it is really a charge on the land before any debts of that kind can be dealt with, and we do not propose to alter it.

*(9.41.) MR. S. T. EVANS: It would also prevent the wages being paid of the persons who created the produce which goes to the tithe owner.

(9.41.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I really think an answer is required. Irish Members have not intervened in this discussion, for as Irishmen they are not interested; but, really, I think that some substantial reason should be advanced in support of the contention, and that the matter ought not to be allowed to go by default in such a great issue as this. There is too little fight on this side of the House in support of the English tenantry. I hope hon. Members will rise to their responsibilities, and try to gain more for those they represent in Great Britain than they seem disposed to do. Something more is wanted from the Government than this brief, rather curt, and obtuse answer.

(9.45.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 67; Noes 143.—(Div. List, No. 15.)

*(9.54.) MR. S. T. EVANS: At present the occupier of the land is made to give notice before an order can be made in which he is interested, but I think the occupier ought not to be put to that trouble and expense. My object is to place on the owner, and not the occupier, the duty of giving notice. I hold that as the owner is made liable the duty of giving the notice should rest on him.

Amendment, proposed in page 2, line 34, to leave out the words "he may," and insert the words "the owner of the lands shall."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'he may' stand part of the Question."

*(9.56.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I should have thought that where the occupier has an interest in the matter he would protect that interest by giving the notice. Personally, however, I have no objection to the method suggested by the hon. Member, but it is a matter for the Committee to decide.

*(9.57.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The occupier may not know, but the owner must know, and it must be remembered the occupier may be a poor and ignorant man.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: To save further discussion, I am willing to accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

*(10.0.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The object of the next Amendment on the Paper, standing in my name, is to carry out what we are all agreed is the intention of the Act. The words I have put down are borrowed from one of the Tithe Acts. I understand, however, that the President of the Board of Trade has come down prepared to move an Amendment, which will make the clause clear. I will, therefore, only formally move the Amendment, for the purpose of giving an opportunity for discussion.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, after line 37, to insert the following sub-section:—

"Nothing in this Act contained shall create any personal liability for the payment of any tithe rent-charge in any owner or occupier or other person, or in the executors or administrators of such owner or occupier or other person."—(Mr. G. Osborne Morgan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(10.2.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am advised that the words of the right hon. Gentleman would not do, because they would include all other persons, and, therefore, they would include the receiver, who of course must be personally liable for the tithe he receives. An Amendment on the subject would, I think, come in better after Sub-section 6, where the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. S.

Evans) has put down his Amendment, and I will read to the Committee the words we suggest for dealing with the point. They are as follows:—

"Nothing in this Act shall improve or constitute any personal liability upon any occupier or owner of land for the payment of any tithe rent-charge or any other sum which by this Act shall be payable as tithe rent-charge, and the Court shall not by virtue of this Act have power to imprison any occupier or owner by reason only of any such non-payment of any tithe rent-charge or other sum."

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: As far as I can see at present that will meet the point. But I should like to have an opportunity of considering it more carefully.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(10.5.) MR. S. T. EVANS: When we were discussing Sub-section 1 of Section 2 the Attorney General said he was willing to consider any suggested clause respecting the occupier's liability. I think this is the proper place to move an Amendment on the point, and I therefore propose to add to the sub-section—

"Where in any case any property, right, or interest of the occupier may be affected by any order to be made under this Act, then before that order shall be made there shall be such service of the order on the occupier."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 57, to insert at end—

"Where in any case any property, right, or interest of the occupier may be affected by any order to be made under this Act, then before that order shall be made there shall be such service of the order on the occupier."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*(10.6.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The sub-section is inadequate for the purpose suggested, and I would suggest that it should be more carefully considered. We have no objection whatever to the occupier coming forward in cases where he gives proper notice; but the sub-section does not provide for the occupier giving notice that he will appear. I would suggest that the hon. Member should submit his Amendment before the Report stage.

*(10.7.) MR. S. T. EVANS: What struck me was this: that it might appear to the Court that the occupier was interested, and the Court in such a case would not make any order until there had been such service on, and hearing of, the occupier as is described. I will, however, assent to the suggestion made by the Attorney General.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(10.8.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: The object of the next Amendment which stands in my name is to secure uniformity in the Rules of Court throughout the country.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 38, after "(6)," to insert the words—

"As soon as may be after the passing of this Act the Lord High Chancellor shall make, and may afterwards vary."—(Sir Roper Lethbridge.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I may say that there is uniformity already under the County Court Act. The rules are made by the Judges, and are subject to the sanction of the Lord Chancellor.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I should like to remark that the Law of Distress (Amendment) Act, 1888, points to the Lord Chancellor himself making these rules from time to time. It does seem to me that there might be advantages in the Lord Chancellor taking the initiative in the matter, instead of merely accepting the suggestions of a committee of Judges.

*(10.10.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The two matters are not the same. The County Court Judges first make the rules of their own Court, they being conversant with the practical working of the Court. The rules so prepared are then submitted to a Committee, composed of some of the members of the Court and the Lord Chancellor. I venture to think, therefore, that it would be better to leave the matter where it is at present.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(10.11.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I would suggest that the word "shall" be substituted for "may," in line 38.

*(10.11.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The word "may" is invariably used, because it points to the making of the rules from time to time. I have glanced at several of the rule-making sections, and I find that that is the word used. I think the section is right as it stands.

*(10.12.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I beg to move the insertion of the words—

Mr. S. T. Evans

"Provided that the total cost of orders and proceedings in any case within sub-section (2) of this section, shall not exceed the amount of costs recoverable in a like case under the Tithe Acts now in force."

The principle of the Bill, we are told, is that the landlord is to be liable for the payment of the tithe. I do not know that it would not have been as well to allow the remedy of distress without the intervention of the County Court in the cases of occupying freeholders. A man tilling his own land ought not to be in a worse position as to costs than he would be in case of distress at present. I do not know what the scale may be, but I think this proviso ought to be put in so that the occupying freeholder should not have to pay more costs than he is liable to at present.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the clause, to add the words—

"Provided that the total cost of orders and proceedings in any case, within sub-section (2) of this section, shall not exceed the amount of costs recoverable in a like case under the Tithe Acts now in force."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*(10.14.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not think it possible to agree with this. The procedure under the Bill will be entirely different to that under the existing Statutes. There are different scales, and we propose that the fees should be settled precisely in the way they are settled in ordinary cases in the County Court. The question of the scale of fees in the County Court is important, but, considering the difference of procedure, to say that the County Court costs shall in no case exceed the amount of costs under distraint is a thing I could not agree to.

(10.16.) MR. H. GARDNER: I do not know whether the Government apprehend what the costs will be. This matter does not only affect large land-owners, but also small occupiers, of whom there are many in England and Wales. Under the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836, the Attorney General knows the whole costs of recovering a debt of tithe rent-charge amounts to the cost of the statutory notice, which is only 2s. 6d. But if the recovery is to be in the County Court, a small owner, who owes a tithe of £20, will probably have to pay £10 instead of 2s 6d.; therefore, I wish it to go forth to the small owners of the country, that if the Government will not accept the Amendment, they will, by this Bill, be imposing on the tithepayers a fine of something like £9 18s. 6d. in the matter of recovering the tithe rent-charge. I maintain that the Amendment is very important, and it is one which I hope will be pressed to a Division.

*(10.18.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: I hope it will not be pressed to a Division. Under present circumstances I admit that the expense is very small if the amount is less than £20; but where the distress is for more than £20, there is a very wide latitude allowed with reference to expenses. "Reasonable" expenses may mean a good deal. In cases of distress for tithe of £20 and upwards the expense is very considerable, and if you refer to the costs and expenses in cases where possession is taken—where the land is derelict—the costs will be found to be much larger. I have within reach a copy of a bill of costs relating to taking possession of land, and it shows that where the tithe was £5 or £6 the costs were £46, or something of that sort. The present procedure is distress, and failing sufficient to distrain upon, taking possession. That is a different process altogether to recovery by action in the County Court and the appointment of a receiver. In the case of the County Court, tithe actions will have to be fitted in with the ordinary business, procedure, and expenses of the Court. Having every sympathy with my hon. Friend, I cannot go with him in a proposal which is only calculated to embarrass and throw difficulties in the way of the working of the Act.

(10.21.) MR. H. GARDNER: The hon. Gentleman speaks with great authority in the matter, but he has wholly misstated the case. The fact is, that the expenses to which he refers would be incurred in both cases—in the case of the tithepayer under the Tithe Commutation Act and under this Bill. The case I referred to was one in which the expenses under the former were 2s. 6d., and would be under the latter 50 per cent. of the tithe. The contention of my hon. Friend has nothing to do with that case.

*(10.22.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: We are to have the system of applying to the County Court and appointing a receiver, and, of course, must be governed by the rules and proceedings of the County Court, and necessary expenses in the County Court must be provided for.

*(10.24.) MR. S. T. EVANS: My hon. Friend has entirely misapprehended the matter. I would remind him that the clause says that where land is occupied by the owner the order of the Court shall be executed by the appointment of an officer who shall have powers corresponding with those now exercised, so that the proceedings are analogous. There will not be the appointment of a receiver at all in such cases, as he seems to think. There will only be a change in the authority which appoints the bailiff. Now the tithe owner appoints the bailiff who makes the distress, and under the Bill the County Court will appoint the bailiff, but the distress will be the same. All I seek by the Amendment is that the costs shall not exceed those which are now recoverable.

*(10.26.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I contend that the costs will be the same, because the processes will be the same.

*(10.27.) SIR R. WEBSTER: There are two objections to the proposal. It has been said that under the Bill the costs will be at least £10, but there is no warrant whatever for that statement. Assuming that the amount of the tithe was under £5, the ordinary County Court costs, including the hearing fee, would only be a few shillings, half of which would be returned. Coming to tithe of £20, £30, or £50, the costs would only be a fraction of what under ordinary circumstances would now be incurred. And there is this further objection: that the proposed Amendment sets up no standard of fees of any kind. The Rule Committee will consider the matter; and having regard to the simplified procedure, the Rule Committee may be safely trusted not to impose extravagant or absurd costs. Everyone who knows the procedure of County Courts must be aware that as regards notices and such things the outside cost will only be a few shillings. The cost should be according to the work done. I cannot sympathise with the action of the member of the legal profession who succeeded in building up the heavy bill of costs referred to by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Bolton).

*(10.29.) MR. S. T. EVANS: If the amount of tithe were £6 10s. there would be an entry fee of 8s. and a hearing fee of 14s., without any professional or other charges.

(10.29.) MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): The Amendment would practically kill the Bill, because if the recovered costs were to be limited, the remainder might exceed the value of the tithe. One of the difficulties at present is that the owner finds the cost of recovering tithe exceeds the value of the tithe. If by Act of Parliament the costs of recovery are limited, resistance to the recovery of tithe will be at once encouraged, and that will defeat the object of the Bill, which is to facilitate the recovery of tithe.

(10.32.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): The effect of the Bill will be to penalise every yeoman in England and Wales in costs. The old remedy is cheap and easy, although it sometimes imposes costs on the tithe owner to set it in motion. The object of the Amendment will be attained, and the difficulty suggested by the Attorney General will be avoided, by the Rule Committee being instructed to draw up a scale of costs which shall not exceed those under the present system. If the Amendment is not carried tithepayers in Wales will have to make a protest under the coercion and penal pressure of costs.

*(10.34.) MR. W. B. ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): The argument of the hon. and learned Member for Harrow is that the object of the Bill is to simplify the collection of tithe, and then he goes on to say that the process of increasing costs will facilitate the collection of tithe, which seems to the uninstructed mind a singular conclusion. The costs will either be more under the new system or less. If they are likely to be more, it is our duty to take care that they shall not be; and if they are likely to be less, there can be no harm in accepting this Amendment. As to the argument of the Attorney General, I think he has been answered by my hon. Friend who spoke before me. If we impose on the Rule Committee the power of making a scale of costs we should do so with the instruction that the scale should not be higher than under the present system. Under these circumstances, can any harm be done? I do not think there can. On the contrary; I hold that, as has been pointed out by the hon. Member for South Glamorganshire (Mr. A. J. Williams), in the interests of the Welsh people, this is a most important Amendment, and one which I venture to hope will commend itself to the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

Sir R. Webster

(10.31.) SIR W. HARCOURT: Sir, I believe that the practical working of this Bill will very much depend on how we deal with this question of costs; for, after all, its practical effect will be not so much how it will affect the large landowners as what effect it will have on the small owners where the amount of tithe payable may be small and the cost of collection proportionately great. This question of costs will, I think, be found, when we have had experience of its working among the smaller owners to be the most material of all. It has been found that in criminal cases as before the Magistrates, where a fine of only 1s. is inflicted, it very often happens that the costs amount to as much as 25s., and that is a circumstance which very seriously compromises the whole question. My great objection to the former Bill was the manner in which it was likely to affect the question of costs. In the former Bill the costs were put upon the occupier. That was a great objection, which of course cannot occur here, because the question is one which now affects the owner. Nevertheless, it is one which may have a serious effect upon the small owner. I venture to warn Her Majesty's Government that the question whether the Bill will do any good or not depends a great deal on how they deal with this question of costs. I would venture, with all respect, to advise the hon. Gentleman the Attorney General, in the conduct of this Bill, to entreat his legal supporters not to argue in favour of anything that is likely to add to the costs or to do too much in the way of crossing the "t's" and dotting the "i's" of this measure, in such a manner as to exhibit the magnitude of all the blots in the Bill. We have had some experience of this sort of thing in the course of the discussions that have taken place this evening. The hon. and learned Member for Harrow has told us that this is a Bill for the collection of tithe, and that we cannot carry this object out better than by increasing the costs. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has dealt with this Bill in a very reasonable spirit; and if we could only induce his legal supporters not to point out these things in so embarrassing a manner, I think it would be all the better for the progress of the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Harrow has shown us the animus of the Bill from his particular point of view. He says that at present the costs are light, and the tithepayer is not much terrified by them; but he went on to say that, as compared with the existing system, there will be an increase. That is a course which we on this side of the House will resist to the uttermost. It is contrary to the whole spirit in which we regard this Bill. We have agreed to change the incidence of payment, but have not agreed to make that incidence heavier, whether the amount is paid by the occupier or the owner. And yet here we have it avowed from the other side of the House—from what I may call the tithe owners' party—that their object is that which I have just stated. Let us see how that question regarding costs really stands. Everybody knows that under the existing system there are no costs whatever, except the costs of distress. The costs, therefore, are naturally very light. The question arises, Are the costs of recovering the tithe in the future to be more than the present cost of a simple distraint? If they are, then the tithepayer is by this Bill damnified in his relations to the tithe owner. By Subsection 2 it is provided that the powers of recovery are those of the present Tithes Act. That, I suppose, means the power of recovery by distress; therefore, pro tanto, it remains in that respect as at present; but before you go to distraint you have to take proceedings in the County Court. That is a process which you do not go through now; therefore, plus the cost of the recovery, you must have the antecedent cost of going to the County Court to enable the distress to be executed; therefore by this Bill you have added to the system of costs by the necessity of going to the County Court. I confess that until I heard the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Harrow, I was not fully alive to the magnitude of the question before us; but now it is made perfectly plain that you will have not only the existing costs in addition to the amount of debt, but also the costs incident to the proceedings that will have to be taken in the County Court. Therefore this Bill, instead of lessening the cost to the tithepayer, necessarily makes it more expensive. I think we ought to make as strong an objection as we can to this part of the Bill, and not have the position of the two parties altered by making the costs heavier.

(10.47.) MR. AMBROSE: The right hon. Gentleman was once a member of the legal profession, and that being so, I think he cannot be serious in saying that the costs were a penalty or fine to be obtained, either by the defendant or prosecutor, as in legal proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman has clearly forgotten the original meaning of these costs. They are not a fine or a penalty in any sense. They are an indemnity to the party proceeding, for loss sustained by the defaulter of the party proceeded against. Who causes the costs to be incurred? Not the tithe owner, but the tithepayer, who is absolutely master of the situation. He can pay his tithe and avoid costs altogether. [Laughter and Cheers.] I am glad hon. Gentlemen appreciate that point. If the tithe owner, because of non-payment of tithes, has to incur costs, surely it is equitable and just that he should be indemnified. If you alter that principle in any degree you put it in the power of the tithepayer to make the cost of obtaining the tithe so great as to destroy the value of the tithe altogether.

(10.50.) MR. H. GARDNER: I cannot take so pleasant a view of the costs as the hon. and learned Gentleman. As to the statement I made with reference to the amount of the costs, I based it on information given me by a solicitor practising in the County Courts in my own county. Taking the recovery of a debt of £20 on a small farm, he put down the various items, which brought the costs up to £10. I showed the statement to my hon. and learned Friend, who said that the charge was small. I think the Government would do well to follow the golden rule laid down by my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, that we ought not to add any fresh penalties to those which already existed under the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836. We should endeavour in this measure not to lay any fresh burdens on the tithepayer.

(10.53.) MR. ABEL THOMAS (Carmarthen, E.): Sir, the cost under a distraint for tithe is 2s. 6d. for the ten day notice, the possession money, so much per day, and a small sum for the auctioneer's charges; but by the Government's present proposal of proceedings in the County Court, where possibly counsel or a solicitor would be engaged, the costs would be very largely increased. You have all the costs of an ordinary County Court action added to the former costs. Therefore, whether you call it an indemnity or a penalty matters not, for I would point out that the tithe owner, under this Bill, is put in a better position than before. It is perfectly evident that this section puts the tithe owner into a better, and the tithepayer into a worse, position. I trust the Government will be consistent throughout, and that they will accept my hon. Friend's Amendment, which is to put the tithe owner exactly in the same position after the passing of this Bill as he is now, and which the Government have again and again alleged to be the object of their Bill.

(10.56.) SIR W. HARCOURT: Before we go to a Division we ought to make the position quite clear. If they do not agree that the costs of the County Court shall not be excessive, we must to the best of our power resist Clause 2, which creates the County Court jurisdiction in substitution of the present process. Unless you mean to act adversely to the tithepayer you have no right to introduce a more expensive procedure against him. That is the clear principle upon which we shall, so far as we can, fight this out. All the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Harrow goes for nothing at all. Suppose you took the most expensive tribunal—the House of Lords—where the costs would be several hundreds of pounds. Would not that be an injury to the man whose position you would change in that respect? In a minor degree, if you substitute for the simple process of distress litigation which involves costs to the amount of even £3 or £4, that amount, though apparently little, is large to little men. Unless you will give us a guarantee that this County Court procedure is not going to cost the tithepayer more than the present procedure, you are doing him an injustice. That is a perfectly plain principle. If you will not give us this security, we shall do our best to resist the second clause. The first principle of putting the liability on the tithe owner may remain in the first clause, because that is only a return to the present law, which has been pirated by owners who have contracted themselves out of it. That principle can remain, and the tithe owner—dropping the second clause—can recover as at present. If you want to alter the method of recovery it is only fair to demand that the alteration shall not be such as to throw any additional cost on the tithepayer. That is the plain principle on which I think we ought to go. Is your new method of recovery going to cost more than the old? If it is, then we say it is unfair to the tenant, and we must do our best to prevent such a provision being enacted.

*(11.1.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: That no doubt is a very formidable threat. As my right hon. Friend has made his position clear, it is only right that I should try to make our position clear. In the first place, we decline to accept the Amendment. It seems to me, with all deference to the hon. Member, absurd to say that when you were changing the procedure in a matter of this kind the costs of the new procedure shall not exceed the costs of the old. If the procedure is different the items of cost must necessarily be different. They may be more or less, but when the right hon. Gentleman asks the Government to guarantee that the costs of the new procedure shall not be more than those of the old, the Government can give him no such guarantee. But this guarantee we can give—that we have no desire to use this new method of procedure as a means of penalising any one. We propose it as a better mode of procedure, but we have no desire that the costs shall be run up. Our wish is that the costs shall not be one farthing more than is absolutely necessary for the plan to be efficiently carried out. One thing, however, we will not be so foolish as to do—namely, to propose a new procedure, and then to whittle it away by a limitation on the costs which may deprive it of efficiency. I will guarantee that this matter of costs shall be considered by the proper authority—the Rule Committee of the County Court Judges in conjunction with the Treasury—and that the influence of the Government shall, as far as possible, be brought to bear with the view of reducing the costs to the minimum point consistent with efficiency. Below that point we will not go, and we must ask the Committee to support us in that.

(11.4.) SIR HENRY JAMES: Allow me to make a suggestion, which may, perhaps, meet the arguments which have been urged with such force on both sides of the House. I understood that the substitution of the County Court process for the old process was for the benefit of all concerned—of the tithe owner, of the person upon whom the tithe ought to be levied, and of the public, who would be relieved from the pain of witnessing scenes which every one regrets. Please recollect, as a matter of justice, that you are compelling the tithe owner by this Bill to go to the County Court, in his own interest no doubt, but also in the interest of the public. How, then, are the costs to be borne? The argument of my right hon. Friend is that you must make the tithe owner pay the additional costs, and that the increased burden shall not be cast upon the poorer person. But it is unjust to make the tithe owner go to a tribunal for the benefit of the public, and then to make him bear the increased costs; to say, in fact, "You are to go for the benefit of the public to the tribunal we appoint, but the increased costs shall not be borne by the tithepayer." I feel, however, that one thing might be done to mitigate the hardship. The Government might say that the costs shall not exceed the sum mentioned in the schedule, and in that schedule they ought to make plain what the costs will be. If they cannot be reduced to 2s. 6d. they might be reduced to a very low standard. If the Government will bring up on Report a Schedule showing that the costs will be reduced to a very low standard, I do not fear that any great burden will be cast on the tithepayer.

*(11.6.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I join issue with my right hon. Friend as to for whose benefit this Bill has been brought in. The tithepayer did not ask for it, the country has not asked for it, but the Bill is one solely and entirely in the interests of the tithe owner. Under the Act of 1836, the tithe owner had no person liable to him—neither the landlord nor the tenant—for the payment of tithe. He simply had a charge on the produce of the land, recoverable by distress, and nothing more. We are quite content to go on under the Act of 1836, but the tithe owner says—"No, I want security, and I want the mode of collecting my tithe facilitated." One hon. Member has stated in the course of the Debate—I do not know with what accuracy—that the introduction of this Bill has already had the effect of nearly doubling the value of tithes in the market. That may be right or it may not; but, undoubtedly, the position of the tithe owner has been much improved, because he gets some one responsible for the payment, and that he never had before.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: No.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Well, I do not know if the hon. Member opposite thinks the landlords of England are not responsible. I believe that those gentlemen will send the cheque for the tithe as regularly as they pay their butchers' bills. But we are not dealing with them; we are dealing with the case of the small yeoman owner, who is himself the occupier. You are going to make him liable to this additional procedure, and the proposition now before the House is that the costs of the new procedure shall not be greater than those of the present system. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury suggests there must be more costs. Why?

SIR H. JAMES: The change is for the benefit of the public.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: This is a question between the Treasury and the tithe-payer. At present there is a profit on County Court fees which goes into the Imperial Exchequer. I agree that you do not want to employ lawyers in cases of this kind any more than you do in Courts for the recovery of small debts. But there is no reason why you should impose fees which will add to the revenue of the country. You are putting the tithe owner in a far better position than he ever held before, and you are making his property practically safe. You ought not, then, to impose an additional burden on the tithepayer. Unless the Government are prepared to proceed on the lines suggested by the right hon. Member for Bury we must go to a Division.

(11.10.) MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): This question of fees, in the light of those now charged in the County Courts, becomes very important. Take the case of a man suing for a sum under five guineas. The total costs which are allowed amount to £2 17s. 6d., and in addition many other costs may be incurred for witnesses and travelling, as the plaintiff may have to travel miles to the Court. I maintain that unless the Government give a special scale of fees in all cases where the tithe-charge is small, the costs will equal, and even exceed, the amount of the tithe.

*(11.12.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I should like to explain that I did not say the landlords were not a responsible body; all I said was that they were not personally responsible for the tithe. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton showed his ignorance of the Bill by suggesting that it would throw the responsibility personally on the landlords. I say it does nothing of the kind. With regard, however, to this particular matter of fees, those of the County Court are undoubtedly too high. I hold there ought to be a Schedule to this Bill fixing the fees at a very low figure. But it must be remembered it is impossible for the tithe owner, when endeavouring to recover the tithe, to control the amount of costs; that depends on the manner in which the defendant resists the claim, and if it were to go forth that in all cases the tithe owner would have to pay the costs above a certain amount, it might lead to an increase of costs by the defendant obstinately fighting what was a just demand, and it would thus prevent the recovery of the tithe, because the costs would exceed the amount of the tithe owner's claim.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

(11.15.) SIR W. HARCOURT: My right hon. Friend the Member for Bury has proposed that there should be a Schedule attached to the Bill. But what is it to contain? Extra costs—costs other than those of levying a distress. The whole of the costs of the County Court will be costs which are not now incurred, and therefore we have the fact that whether the fees be large or small you are putting an additional burden upon the tithepayer. I must recognise with gratitude the assistance given by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Stockport. He showed that the costs must be raised to a very large extent under this Bill. If these extra costs are incurred in consequence of the introduction of this County Court procedure they ought to be paid by the men who benefit by the change of procedure, and those men are the tithe owners. That is the simple issue before us.

*(11.17.) MR. S. T. EVANS: The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury says the proceedings are totally different, but they are not different in the case in respect of which I propose this sub-section, except so far, that the County Court Judge will appoint the bailiff, instead of, as now, the tithe owner. The only costs now recoverable are the costs of distress. The legal advisers of the Government ask—Who are to pay the extra costs? I think that people who benefit by the new procedure ought to. Now it is clear that the tithe owner is the only person who will benefit. The landlords do not like the Bill and the tenants do not want it. It has been brought in solely in the interests of the tithe owner. The Prime Minister when he introduced his Bill in the House of Lords in 1887, proposed that inasmuch as the tithe owner was getting an easy, instead of an awkward, method of procedure, he should abate his claim 5 per cent. The Prime Minister went on to say that it was very much better for the tithe owner that he should go direct to the land owner for the tithe instead of to the occupier, and it was proposed to recognise that by allowing the land owner 5 per cent. discount. I believe the proposal was once to make the discount to 10 per cent. Surely, it might reasonably be arranged that the County Court fees should be paid instead of the discount? The hon. Member for Harrow suggests that the costs should be made so heavy as to frighten a man into paying without the necessity of having recourse to the County Court. But let me remind him that a discussion has already taken place about the County Court Judge being allowed to order payment of the tithe by instalments. We hear a great deal of agricultural depression, and is it not possible that some of the small owners may be desirous of going to the County Court simply to get an order that the tithe may be paid by instalments? Why in that case should the costs be made heavy? As to the suggestion that a Schedule should be attached to the Bill, I would withdraw in favour of that, providing that the principle is acceded to that the costs under the new procedure should not be heavier than those under the old.

(11.21.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON: We have as yet had no reply from the Government to the suggestion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury. It is a remarkable fact that as the Debate proceeds the objections urged against the Amendment gradually disappear. In the first place the difficulty was raised of want of uniformity of standard, and it was suggested that each County Court Judge would take a different view on the question of costs. But it has since transpired that the County Court Judges are to meet together as a Rule Committee, that they will report to the Lord Chancellor, and that thus uniformity will be secured. Is it not possible for the County Court Judges to ascertain the average costs incurred under the present system, and to draw them up in the form of a Schedule to be submitted to this House? That is, as I understand, the suggestion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury. I should be inclined to support that, but the Government show no sign of agreeing to it. The obvious inference is that if they refuse that offer, and if they increase the costs by changing the procedure, our contention is justified that the Bill was introduced in order to confer tremendous advantages on the tithe owner. The Government, when that contention was first raised on this side of the House, denied it but their conduct shows how well founded the charge is. There is the prospect that in some cases the costs will be in excess of the tithe, and it is to guard against that contingency that this Amendment is proposed. I still hope that the Government will accept the suggestion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury, and make it clear that in no single instance will the costs imposed on the tithepayer be enhanced or increased by this Bill, which has been introduced for the advantage of the tithe owner, and is in every way to the disadvantage of the yeoman farmer.

*(11.25.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: Let us try and see clearly how things stand. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury has tried to persuade the Committee that this is a magnanimous act on the part of the Government; that it is a great gift to the public, to the tithe owner, and to the tithepayer. But who wants the Bill? The tithepayer does not, neither does the landlord. It is the parson and the Prime Minister who want it. And in order to secure these great benefits to these two parties the tithepayer is to be mulct in heavy fines in the shape of costs on every possible occasion. And that is not all. The tithe owner is to have the tithe collected for him free of cost, whereas he now pays 5, 6, and sometimes 10 per cent. to an agent for collecting them. His rates, too, are to be paid in advance by the landed proprietor or occupier, and some three or four months will elapse before the tithe owner is called upon to repay them. He has the highest security conferred on him, and I am informed by competent authorities that if this Bill passes the value of the tithe will be increased from 75 to 100 per cent. It appears to me that the Government, knowing that they have a strong majority, decline to listen to reason or argument, but intend to force the Bill through.

*(11.28.) MR. W. B. ROWLANDS: I hope the Committee will bear in mind that there are some small owners and occupiers who really cannot pay the tithe, and who ought not to be punished by the infliction of heavy costs. It seems as if hon. Members are arguing this matter on the assumption—a most mistaken one—that every man who will be taken to the County Court is a wicked person who declines to discharge his just obligations. I say that the majority who do not pay are actually unable to do so, and that makes it imperative that the costs of the new procedure should not exceed those of the present system.

*(11.30.) MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): It is to my mind apparent beyond all question that the Government have in view two objects—one being to create costs, and the other to put the tithe owner in the position of prosecuting the person who is liable to pay the tithe for any assault or battery or any disturbance which may take place in the course of carrying out the process of a Court of Common Jurisdiction. The Government say in effect: "If you will not pay these tithes willingly, whether you are in a position to pay them or not, we will at least double them." I have in my hand the scale of fees recoverable in County Courts in cases exceeding £10 and not exceeding £20, which I apprehend would be about the average under this Bill. I find that for preparing particulars of claim 4s. may be charged; for preparing further particulars, 2s., or 8d. per folio; for a summons to each witness, 2s.; a summons in chambers, 2s.; preparing notices, 3s.; preparing all affidavits, 5s.; preparing all interrogatories to witnesses, 5s.; instructions for counter-claim or to sue or defend, 3s. 4d., or 5s. 8d.; brief to counsel 30s. and fees to counsel £3. Now all these costs are to be incurred when there is no earthly necessity for it, because, after all these proceedings in the Court, it is necessary to fall back upon the remedy that exists to-day of putting a distress in. Let the person who is to be benefited by this legislation—the tithe owner—pay for it, and do not saddle the unfortunate tithepayer with double the amount he is liable to pay already, because if you do you will be going far beyond the intention of law-makers in times past when these tithes were created.

*(11.34.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: This Amendment does not appear on the Paper, and I think the Committee have lost sight of this point. It only deals with the costs in cases where the owner is also occupier. It does not extend at all the general class of cases contemplated by the Bill where a receiver is appointed of the rents and profits. The process in this case will be the same as at present, except that the receiver will be appointed by the Court. I have not heard any argument at all why in such a case the costs should be increased, and I think there should be some provision against an indefinite increase of the costs.

(11.35.) MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): We were all very glad indeed at the commencement of this Debate this evening to think that the Government were endeavouring to do justice to the people. One thing, however, has been made evident—namely, that the Government have either forgotten or neglected any provision for that class of men who fail to pay their rents, although they have provided for the case of men who refuse to pay tithe. Some Members have used strong language as to the injustice of refusing to pay just, legal debts, but there has been nothing said at all of the injustice of imposing these debts on men who receive nothing for them. The House ought to appreciate the opposition of the Welsh Members to this clause when it considers that it is bad enough as it is to have to pay tithe without receiving any equivalent, and it makes it still worse to have the costs increased.

(11.38.) DR. TANNER: The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James), who has been one of the saviours of Her Majesty's Government, one of the crutches on which Her Majesty's Government leans, has addressed a remonstrance to them to-night, and they have remained dumbly silent. They were content to remain silent, as they could not trust to the force of their arguments, or to the strength of their position as regards common sense. I do not like to see Her Majesty's Government so supinely ridiculous. I should at any rate have hope that when the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury got up and asked them a proper and fair and legal question he would have been properly replied to by the Attorney General. We have listened to many arguments to-night. We have heard the hon. Member for Harrow who, when he was tackled, gave up his position. I sincerely hope he will go into the lobby with us. At any rate I think the Committee are entitled to some reply to the question addressed to them by the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Derby and Bury. The Prime Minister has shown his attachment to this Bill, his foundling, by putting it before the Irish Land Bill. I object to it being carried volens volens through the House without sense and without argument, and in order to give the Government an opportunity to reply to the arguments advanced from these benches I beg to move that you, Sir, do now report Progress.

Sir J. Swinburne

Dr. TANNER moved, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again;" but the CHAIRMAN being of opinion that the Motion was an abuse of the Rules of the House, declined to propose the Question thereupon to the Committee.

(11.45.) The Committee divided:—Ayes, 102; Noes, 170.—(Div. List, No. 16.)

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

*(11.55.) Mr. H. H. FOWLER: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he intends the Committee to be the first Order of the Day on Thursday, and if that is so, what will be done with the four Orders relating to Irish land?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Those Orders will stand further postponed. The Government will proceed with this Bill until it is finished.

Dr. TANNER: At what time will the Irish Land Bill be taken?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: I hope this Bill will be concluded without much delay. It is not in my power to say when the Land Bill will be taken.

*Mr. H. H. FOWLER: Do we understand that the Report stage of this Bill will immediately follow the Committee, that is, assuming that the Bill passes through Committee on Thursday, will the Report stage be taken on Monday?

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: Yes.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

POLLEN FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

(No. 91.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Question again proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

Dr. TANNER: I beg to move that you do report Progress. I should like to hear something from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Macartney) in charge of the Bill by way of explanation. Up to the present we have heard nothing, and I learn from several friends in the North of Ireland that the Bill is not by any means a satisfactory measure.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Dr. Tanner),—put, and agreed to.

Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

TEACHERS' (REGISTRATION AND ORGANISATION) BILL.—(No. 153.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir R. Temple.)

(11.59.) Mr. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I regret that my hon. Friend has brought this Bill on at this hour. The Bill affects a large number of persons. I think it would be very desirable that every educational institution of the country should be under some control, but if we are to control schools, let us control them all. I have read the Bill, and I confess I have great difficulty in ascertaining what—

Objection being taken to further Proceeding, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON SUPER-ANNUATION BILL.—(No. 49.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir R. Temple.)

(12.0.) MR. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): This Bill is of the utmost importance to Metropolitan Members. In the principle I think we are all agreed, but it is a Bill as to which a great deal depends on the ratepayers. I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury, in view of the fact that much depends on the amount of the deductions from the teachers' salaries and the liability of ratepayers, whether he will consent to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee?

*(12.1.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I understand that my hon. Friend in charge of the measure desires to have the Bill sent to a Select Committee, and if the Bill is read a second time, such a course will be taken before further progress is made with it.

(12.1.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I must object to the Bill being further proceeded with at this hour.

Debate adjourned to this day.

MOTION.

CITY OF LONDON PAROCHIAL CHARITIES ACT, 1883 (CENTRAL SCHEME).

RESOLUTION.

*(12.5.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): I regret to have to trouble the House at this late hour, but this is a matter most important to my constituents, and this is the only opportunity we have of calling the attention of the House to this scheme. In the first place, I wish to say for myself and those I represent in the matter that we do not object to the scheme as a whole. These is much that is of value in it, but there are serious objections which it is my duty to bring before the House in regard to some of the details of the scheme. One hundred and three parishes are affected by the scheme, and, while it is impossible for me at this late hour to go into all the points involved, I cannot refrain from complaining that Her Majesty's Ministers have declined to receive a deputation of the bodies who have objections on matters of detail to urge on the attention of the Government. On the 8th of December last, I asked the Vice President of the Council a question on the subject, in reply to which he reminded me that I should have an opportunity of moving an Address in the House; that a scheme would be published and a hearing given to the objectors. My right hon. Friend could not have been aware of a letter addressed to the Clerk of the Corporation of London by the Secretary of the Council, in reply to a letter from the Corporation requesting to be heard, with which their Lordships expressed their intention to publish the scheme without delay to allow Parliament time to consider it during the present Session, and further that their Lordships did not propose to receive any deputations on the subject. I cannot complain in one sense that Lord Cranbrook and my right hon. Friend, hard working Ministers of the Crown as they are, should be unable to go into these details. Obviously when there are some fifty bodies having special objections to urge on matters of detail in the scheme, it could hardly be expected that the Minister for Education should go into all these, but if the Vice President and my noble Friend (Lord Cranbrook) were too greatly employed, at least some other and less occupied Members of the Government, like the Lord Privy Seal or the Lords of the Treasury, or a permanent official of the Crown, could have been deputed to examine the questions raised by the various parishes interested. It will be remembered, that in Debates in the House, when the office of Lord Privy Seal has been called in question, it has been argued for the retention of the office that it was desirable there should be some Member of the Government free from official cares, in order that he might take in hand some special subject. At all events, I do not think it was consistent with the known courtesy of the noble Lord and my right hon. Friend that the Department declined absolutely to receive any deputations. May I remind the House that many of the questions are raised with regard to properties bequeathed to the parishes by benevolent persons who lived in them in former generations? Legacies have been left not, perhaps, in accordance with the views of the present day, but at all events, this property was designed for the benefit of the persons among whom those making the bequests lived, and their representatives now are surely entitled to be heard, and their representations considered by the Government. I know that the Corporation and many of the parishes have made representations asking for favourable considerations at the hands of the Government. It must not be overlooked that the Corporation and the City parishes, generally speaking, do not object to the scheme as a whole, but only to the absence of provisions in respect of objects specially defined by the Act under which the scheme is framed. I will take two or three instances of particular parishes which should have been considered, having regard to the charitable work already being done, and in connection with which no provision has been made for the continuance of such work. There is, for example, the parish of St. Michael, Cornhill. For years past the parish trustees, with the full approval of the Charity Commissioners, have annually distributed a sum of £350 between the London Hospitals—St. Mary's Hospital, King's College Hospital, the London Orphan Asylum, the London Ophthalmic Hospital, the Royal Free Hospital, and one or two other similar institutions. I appeal to hon. Members whether these are not objects well deserving of support. Yet, although the Charity Commissioners have been reminded of this hospital work, and have been asked to afford facilities for the continuance of it, no provision is made in the scheme for the purpose, notwithstanding the all-important fact that the Commission were directed by the Act passed under the auspices of the hon. Gentleman I am glad to see opposite (Mr. Bryce) to have special regard to the wants of the poor in connection with the formation of convalescent homes, provident institutions, and the like. Of the parish of St. Sepulchre I will not say much, because my hon. Friend who is to second the Motion will deal with that particular case; I would only say that that is a parish having a large number of poor who have been wont to receive relief from these funds, and it certainly seems to be only fair that they should continue to do so during existing lives, and that they ought not to be deprived of what has been a source of income for many years. Of course as they drop off, I do not ask that successors should be appointed, and year by year the means in the hands of the Commissioners will become larger. There is another Petition presented from St. Mary-at-Hill, where no allowance is made for the benefit of the parishioners. I will not go into ecclesiastical questions, several of which arise. In the parish of St. Anne's, Blackfriars, in the same way, there are many deserving objects on whose behalf the funds of the parish could still be usefully employed, including a fund for the relief of poor widows. In St. Benet's there is a sum of £150 usefully employed, and in St. Mildred's, Poultry, there is a fund to be alienated by the scheme which might be very usefully employed for the relief of necessitous persons, and prevent such from applying for parochial relief. In Allhallows' again, and in other parishes, funds have been provided by the benevolent in former generations, and I do not like to see such funds taken away from those by whom former generations wished them to be appropriated. These are illustrations of the way in which the scheme works. I will not multiply instances, for it is late, and I know many Members desire to speak. All I wish to say is that we desire a full and impartial inquiry, which we consider we have not had, at the hands of the Education Department or the Charity Commissioners. The Commissioners have adopted the scheme on the Table of the House, and they have told complainants they may appeal to the House of Commons. I appeal to the House of Commons accordingly. I ask the House not to sanction the scheme, but let the Education Department go carefully and fully into it. Those whom I represent on this present occasion are ready to be bound by the objections they have raised; they will not raise any new objections; and on those grounds I earnestly appeal to the House not to sanction the scheme which lies on the Table.

Mr. J. R. Kelly

Motion made and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent from the scheme of the Charity Commission now before the House for the management of the Charities comprised in Statements VI. (1) to (15), VII. and VIII. under the above Act."—(Sir Robert Fowler.)

(12.21.) MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): In seconding the Motion, I wish to say that people in the City feel that they have not been properly treated, because they have not been allowed to place their views before the Charity Commission. The Act provides in the 25th Section that objections and suggestions shall be received during two months. It is perfectly true that it says "in writing," but it does not mean in writing to be consigned to the waste-paper basket. We have positive knowledge that suggestions which have been made have not been properly considered by the authorities. In one parish in which I am interested an objection was sent signed by more than 1,000 persons, and asking permission for a deputation to attend before the Charity Commissioners, but the objection was never considered, and the objectors were never allowed to appear in any form. We maintain that the Commissioners have exceeded their powers. The parish of St. Sepulchre the Commissioners have arbitrarily divided into two parts, and they have allocated a great deal too much to that part of it which lies outside the City, but in the County of London. This is not a change which can be justified by the Act. There are in the parish 5,000 or 6,000 poor inhabitants, and these are deprived of their share in the funds for the assistance of education and local charitable institutions. If this scheme becomes law now without being sent back to the Charity Commissioners, the parish will be deprived of all remedy, but I hope the House will agree to send back the scheme so that these matters of complaint may be thoroughly investigated.

(12.25.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): For the convenience of the House, I may say that I shall move the Resolution of which I have given notice in the form of an Amendment to the Motion of the hon. Baronet, and I and those who act with me intend to vote against the Motion of the hon. Baronet. It may perhaps be for the convenience of hon. Members if I as briefly as possible explain what the Commissioners propose to do by this scheme. They have in accordance with the Act of 1883 divided the charities of certain parishes into two portions—a general portion and an ecclesiastical portion, allocating to the former £56,000 a year, and to the latter £35,000. They have laid aside a capital sum of £300,000, £150,000 of which they propose should be devoted to the preservation of open spaces in the Metropolis; £80,000 they intend to devote to two institutions in Bishopsgate and Cripplegate, and £51,000 to City polytechnics; £24,500 will be devoted to other polytechnics, with which the scheme properly deals. The scheme assigns for the maintenance of certain polytechnics and other institutions £22,500 a year, to which may be added another £5,000 a year which it is proposed the new governing Body shall bestow on similar institutions to be determined by it. A sum of about £6,000 is allowed for compensation for vested interests. A margin will be left of about £10,000 a year to be disposed of by the governing Body. Although the scheme is open to criticism, it undoubtedly provides for the useful application of a fund which is at present not usefully, and is in many respects badly, applied. Some references have been made in a statement that has been handed round to the small sum that is to be given to the poor in City parishes. Well, poor were to be found in those parishes when these funds were left, but the City has excluded them, and as the rest of the Metropolis has to pay for them, we say that these funds ought to follow them. Although some improvement might be made in the scheme, on the whole, as far as the General Funds go, I and my friends approve of it. It takes the funds from the City where they are useless and uses them for the Metropolis as the Act directs. But when we come to the disposal of the ecclesiastical funds I have a very different story to tell. There is, as I have indicated, about £35,000 a year to deal with. It is dealt with as the Act directs. The Act directs the Commissioners to apply the property which is scheduled as ecclesiastical property to the maintenance of the fabric and the services of the church, if any, in any parish possessed of ecclesiastical property applicable to such purposes, and then it goes on to state that the rest of the funds not so applied shall be paid to the Commissioners for use in the Metropolis generally. There are in the 106 parishes of the Metropolis 55 churches, with stipends attaching to them amounting to between £31,000 and £37,000 a year. Sir Henry Peek has taken a census of their congregations on a particular Sunday, and he gives the total attendance as 4,837 persons, almost half of whom were officials, so that 2,784 represented the general congregation. These churches serve a series of parishes whose population amounted in 1881 to only 29,000, and has no doubt fallen since then, seeing that the population of the City has been steadily decreasing. In 1861 the population of the City was 113,000, in 1871 it had fallen to 75,000, and in 1881 to 50,000. As this diminution of the City population has been going on since the Act was passed, the state of things provided for under the Act has become still more serious. I will now tell the House very briefly how the Charity Commissioners propose to deal with the funds. In the first place, for the repair and restoration of a certain number of the churches, they set aside a sum of £45,000 capital to be paid off in ten equal yearly instalments. In the next place, there are to be certain other payments to specified persons amounting to £4,500 a year; and lastly, they propose to make a perpetual addition to the endowments of £1,573 a year, and to allot £16,200 for the maintenance of the churches and services. What I submit to the House is that under the circumstances these are extreme sums to allow for the carrying out of the purposes of the Act. In fact, there will be less than £10,000 a year—I am told and believe there will be little over £5,000—utilisable for the general ecclesiastical purposes of the whole of the Metropolis out of this sum, although we all of us receive day by day urgent, necessary, and proper claims for many of these purposes outside the City. Let me show why I can justly object to the action of the Commissioners. Let me give one or two instances of the way in which the scheme will work. The income of the rector of St. Mary Abchurch is variously estimated at £584 and £206 a year. The population of that parish has diminished from 497 in 1861 to 236 in 1881, and at the time Sir Henry Peek took his census, the congregation consisted of 28 persons. Yet it is proposed to add £180 a year to the stipend of the Incumbent, and to expend £1,310 upon the restoration of the church. The stipend of St. Michael, Wood Street, is at present £305 a year. The population of the parish has decreased from 375 in 1861 to 172 in 1881, and the congregation at the time of Sir Henry Peek's census amounted to ten persons. Yet an addition of £100 a year is to be made to the salary of the Incumbent. If you take the number of persons these churches supply, and if you consider that £16,000 is, in addition to what I have referred to, to be spent on the maintenance of the services in these churches, you will see that a sum is being spent which is far beyond the necessities of the case. Even if the terms of the Act of 1883 do require this extreme misappropriation of these ecclesiastical funds, or even if the Commissioners can make out a good case for what they have done—and I think they cannot—all I can suggest is that it would be far better and wiser of the House to suspend that portion of the scheme until some Act dealing with the subject can be passed through the House. If the House agrees to this Motion, it will agree to some such Act, which will set the Commissioners free to deal with this matter, if they are not free at present. The maintenance of these 55 churches in the City of London is an anomaly and a mistake. No doubt some are of great architectural interest, and some are, in fact, required by the spiritual needs of the City, even with its reduced population, but having regard to the facts I have pointed out, I should be glad to see some Act of Parliament passed to enable the Commissioners to deal with the whole of the case. It has been urged on me by some well-fitted to argue the matter, that if I were to succeed—as I hope I may—in getting the House to assent to the Motion which I shall humbly make, to ask Her Majesty to refuse her consent to this ecclesiastical portion of the scheme, I should thereby destroy the whole of the scheme of the Commissioners ["Hear, hear!"] Somebody says "Hear, hear," but that is not so. The Act distinctly provides for Her Majesty's assent being withheld from certain portions of the scheme, and the remainder being nevertheless adopted. The scheme is made in what I may call water-tight compartments, so that it is extremely easy to indicate in the House what portions of it are covered by specific objections. The part I object to is covered by specific clauses, and it is possible to hang up certain portions of the scheme to be dealt with in this Act or an amended Act. It has been urged on me that there is another clause in the scheme which I now refer to—Clause 5—which provides expenses under this Act, and which divides them into two portions, one portion of £24,000 to be charged with the ordinary general funds and the other portion of £16,000 to be charged on the City Church Fund. That division can in no sense hang up or hinder the whole scheme, because I find, under the Act I hold in my hand, that the expenses are so arranged that they may be defrayed in the first instance out of money to be provided by Parliament which shall be ultimately repaid. If we reject this part of the scheme which applies to the ecclesiastical portion of the charity, then Parliament has only, in the meantime, to meet the expenses which will ultimately be repaid by the Commissioners when the scheme is finally carried out. I have endeavoured to condense the rather complicated statistical matters I have dealt with as much as possible, considering the time of night. I will not delay the House by one single extra word, but will sit down, moving as an Amendment that the following words be added:—"So far as the said scheme relates to the City Church Fund." The effect of that Amendment will be that those who vote for it will object to the particular portion of the scheme that effects the ecclesiastical funds. I hope the House will carry that and will assent to the other portions of the scheme, of which I heartily approve.

Sir R. Fowler

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question to add the words "so far as the said Scheme relates to the City Church Fund."—(Mr James Stuart.)

Mr. J. Stuart

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(12.50.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I will not, at this hour, take up the time of the House by dwelling on the case of the City churches, which has been so ably dealt with by my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreditch, but I cannot refrain from bearing my testimony to the accuracy of his statement. It is true that the funds spent out of the Parochial Charities are, to a great extent, wasted. Some of the churches, it must be borne in mind, have congregations of under 20 persons, consisting very largely of officials. The total population of the inner parishes of the city is only about 30,000, and out of this sum of £35,000, which constitutes the ecclesiastical income of this fund, it will, under the scheme as it stands, now be possible to apply only about £5,000 to general ecclesiastical purposes throughout the Metropolis. It does seem a great pity that with the need that exists for the building of new churches and the establishment of new parsons throughout the whole of the Metropolitan area, we should only be able to spend £5,000 out of the large revenue of £35,000 for the general purposes of the Metropolis. This view is confirmed by the Commissioners themselves. In the Blue Book which has been presented may be seen the answers given to the representations of the County Council, the Commissioners implying that they would have exercised a wider discretion in favour of the general spiritual needs of the Metropolis if they had not felt themselves barred by the Act. But the Act is not equally binding on the House. The House itself may very well, in the fuller light which eight years have produced, review the Act it passed eight years ago. But what I am more concerned in at the present moment is to make a few observations on what has been said by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London and the hon. Member who seconded the Motion. What is the fact as to these Charities? The present scheme may not be perfect, but it certainly is an enormous improvement on the old state of things—as, indeed, is admitted by the hon. Baronet himself—and I would like to put to the House a question. The contention that he raises now on behalf of his colleagues, the trustees of 50 churches, is simply the objection made when the Bill was before the House. It was before the House three years. The Bill was brought in in 1881 and was fought in that year and also in 1882 and 1883. Besides that, it was fought hard in two Select Committees. Very much the same arguments that are used by the hon. Baronet now were used by hon. Members who sat up until the small hours of the morning then. The 14th section of the Act says that the property that constitutes the Church Fund of all these parishes—that is, all but five populous ones—shall be applied in three ways: first, to such of the purposes now existing as are beneficial; secondly, to other purposes which are beneficial. At the present moment the funds are not available to those who used to reside in these parishes, because they have been practically denuded of their poorer population.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: Not all of them.

MR. BRYCE: I do not speak of the five outer parishes; but the parish of St. Sepulchre Within, under the jurisdiction of the Commissioners, has only a population of 2,000. As it is, the purposes to which the funds are applied are mainly in the nature of doles and small gifts of money. The Commissioners have continued pensions during the lifetime of their recipients, and beyond this the funds go to a large extent in salaries to officials; for instance, to vestry clerks and other officers, while a considerable amount is expended on dinners, luncheons, and the supply of refreshments consumed by officials on various occasions.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: That is not the case now.

MR. BRYCE: Yes, I assert it is the case now, and that it is the case in the parish of St. Sepulchre itself; and I may tell the House, as the case of the parish of St. Sepulchre has been brought up, that the vestry clerk there is in the habit of receiving £500 and the sexton £40 a year. It is, in point of fact, the vestry clerk and other officers who are really receiving the main benefit of these charitable funds, and it is they who are now complaining of being deprived of the enjoyment of their privileges. The case which they endeavour to make out is that the expense of administering parish affairs has been legitimate, and that those affairs cannot continue to be properly administered unless the funds are appropriated as hitherto. The simple answer to that, however, is, how do other parishes that have not charity funds at their disposal contrive to pay their officials? But the fact is, that a large portion of the work now discharged by the parish officials will henceforward be taken away, and this will do away with the necessity for continuing those payments, though why the parishes themselves should not bear the expense of discharging their own business I am unable to conceive. To apply charity funds in the manner already pointed out is not charity; it is simply a method of relieving the rich from burdens which they ought properly to bear, out of the funds which are taken for that purpose from the poor. As those funds were intended for the poor, I trust that this House will do the best it can to see that they are administered. Would it be believed that, as things are at present, the poor have no share whatever in these funds; and I think if hon. Members will take the trouble to refer to the Report of the Commissioners, as the result of the inquiry they have instituted, it will be found that evidence to this effect was given before those gentlemen. The officials have sought to show that the application of those charity funds to the poor is not beneficial to that class, and they desire that they may continue to use the money as they have hitherto done. We, on the other hand, desire to see it applied to better purposes. We wish to create in this Metropolis institutions such as polytechnics and free libraries, which will be for the real benefit of the poor of this City, by conferring upon them the means of improving their education. We regard this system of doles as extremely demoralising, and look forward to the enormous benefit that may be conferred on the Metropolis by the establishment of such institutions as I have just referred to. The hon. Member who seconded the Motion has referred to the intentions of the donors. I would put it to the House, are we not entitled to believe that if those donors were now living, they would be opposed to the application of their money for the benefit of the owners and occupiers of the large City warehouses and other business establishments, who have, in modern times, rendered the City parishes during the night times and on Sundays almost a desert? Would they not rather have followed the poorer population, who have been obliged to migrate to other parts of the Metropolis, and have endeavoured, by means of those charitable funds, to have made their lives and their homes more happy and comfortable? I hope that the hon. Baronet the Member for the City of London will not press his Motion. I think it will be felt that even to delay the operation of the scheme to which I have referred for the benefit of the poor of London would be a serious disappointment to the population of our city. I trust, therefore, the House will see fit to support the scheme of the Commissioners.

(1.8.) MR. W. H. FISHER (Fulham): I must express my hearty agreement with the tenour of the speech just delivered by the hon. Member for Aberdeen. I think that the scheme of the Commissioners is, upon the whole, a wise one in the interests of the inhabitants of London, and I trust the House will be of opinion that the hon. Members for the City of London and Uxbridge have signally failed to make out any case whatever. I think it was at least incumbent upon those hon. Gentlemen to have shown that some better application of the funds could be made than that proposed by the Charity Commissioners. After this long period of gestation the Commissioners, no doubt, ought to have brought forward something worth having in the interests of the Metropolis, and I think they have given us something that is worth having. I claim to say a few words on behalf of the South-West London Polytechnic Institution, in which I am specially interested, as I think that without this scheme that Institute would have been impossible. I therefore ask hon. Members to vote for the only practicable scheme that has been put before the House. It is, of course, impossible to trace what were the original intentions of the donors of those charitable funds; but I certainly think that those donors would not have given their bequests to Vestry clerks and sextons if they had known how the City of London would have spread to Fulham and Chelsea. It is evident, however, to my mind that they desired to benefit the people of London, and I do not see how the money bequeathed by them could be applied to such purpose except by some such scheme as this. Certain I am that no case whatever has been made out for any better application of those funds.

Mr. Bryce

*(1.10.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Sir, I am going to be as merciful as possible to hon. Members, more especially as at an early period of last Session an interesting Debate took place on this subject. If one thing more than another was noticeable in that Debate, it was the universal chorus of approbation from all quarters in favour of the scheme, and the unanimous feeling that it should have a fair trial. My hon. Friend, at the commencement of his remarks, made an assertion which would seem to imply that the Lord President and myself were careless with regard to the people affected under this scheme, and that we had not granted them a proper hearing. I am obliged to assert, in contradiction to that statement, that every care was taken, not only by the Commissioners during the promulgation of the scheme, but by the Education Department, to hear all the parties interested. Every step that has been taken with regard to other schemes has been taken with regard to this scheme, which was advertised in the usual way. It was notified as having been submitted to the Committee of Council, and notice was given that one month from the date thereof the Committee of Council would, in pursuance of a certain section of the Act, receive all suggestions made in writing. It has been stated that the scheme was only advertised in two newspapers. That is very far from the fact. For two consecutive weeks this scheme was advertised in the Times, Daily Chronicle, Daily News, Daily Telegraph, Standard, Citizen, and City Press, and another paper called the Metropolitan. Then with regard to objections to the scheme, the Commissioners examined all objections that were forwarded in writing. It is true that the Lord President and myself refused to receive a deputation. I regret that. I say so advisedly. But I think the House will admit that we had some reason on our side, when I say that we had to look to the possibility of having to receive deputations from 106 parishes. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that we decided not to receive the deputation. Still, personally, I regret that we did not receive it, though hon. Members will admit that we were justified in shrinking from the prospect of such an enormous number of deputations. With regard to the scheme itself, I ask the House whether my hon. Friends the Mover and Seconder of the Resolution have adduced sufficient reason for upsetting the scheme, after several years of laborious work at it? It is true that my hon. Friend has brought forward cases of grievances; but his objections are directed against the whole purport of the Act. No doubt, if the scheme is worth anything, it is one for diverting those charities, and spreading the blessings which flow from them. I am afraid that a great deal of the opposition to this scheme is the opposition of Vestry clerks. My hon. Friend has referred to what is called parochial administration, which really means, I take it, the emoluments paid to certain Vestry clerks. On that point the Act is specific and plain. Therefore it is of no use that my hon. Friend, or those for whom he speaks, should cavil at that part of the scheme. Section 41 of the Act provide that no emoluments or remuneration of any kind shall be applied to the payment of poor rate, or other rate, or any public charge whatsoever, or payment to any official, except for services performed under the scheme. In regard to that portion of the scheme the Commissioners had no alternative whatever; they were obliged to observe the terms of the Act, which is perfectly precise in its language. My hon. Friend has referred to the City of London, and there again the scheme might possibly have been more generous in regard to certain charities. But the scheme does a great deal for the City of London. In Section 38 a vast number of vested interests are provided for. In Section 39 pensions are provided for, which at present equal a sum of £6,000. In Section 40 almshouses and pensions are considered to the extent of £700 per annum, and in Section 41 pensions and temporary grants are provided for to the amount of £500 per annum. Section 42 furnishes the machinery for carrying out the above proposals. In Schedule 58 there is provision for a library in the City, to the amount of £40,000, and there is provision for the City Polytechnic, which has an income of £5,550 per annum. It cannot, therefore, be fairly urged that the City is neglected. I now pass to the objections raised by the hon. Member for Shoreditch. I would say, ab initio, that when the hon. Member proposes that this scheme should be amended, or a portion of it excluded, I believe, according to the strict letter, such a thing would be possible; but to carry an Amendment of the kind proposed would involve the complete annihilation of the scheme. [MR. J. STUART: How?] The hon. Member says "How?" Because, financially, the scheme is so evenly balanced that I am assured, if the Amendment were carried, it would be absolutely fatal to the scheme. The hon. Member has also alluded to the application of the ecclesiastical funds. It may be objected to the scheme that the whole of the property ought not to be dealt with at once; but I am assured by the Commissioners that the ecclesiastical endowments are so mixed up with the general endowments, at least to the extent of £50,000 per annum, that it was utterly impossible to dissociate the various items. No doubt the hon. Member has made some point with reference to the sum supposed to be spent on the City churches. If the hon. Member will look at Section 14 of the Act he will find laid down in precise terms what is to be the action of the Commissioners with regard to the City churches, and I think it is impossible for them to frame this portion of their scheme on any other basis. And what the hon. Member practically urges to-night, after enormous labour has been expended on this scheme, is that we should have a new Act, and then, after we have got a new Act, that we should have a new scheme to meet the wishes of the hon. Member. I venture to think that if you took a course of that kind at the eleventh hour it would afford you small satisfaction. The inhabitants of the Metropolis are eager that this scheme should at once become law. Whatever are the merits or demerits of the scheme, hon. Members will recognise that the educational portion of it, at all events, has met with such an extraordinary response from private munificence and other sources that it would be a very severe blow to the Metropolis to throw over the scheme, which is practically the proposal of a gift of £500,000 for education.

(1.19.) MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): I only rise for one moment in order to correct a mistake into which the right hon. Gentleman has fallen. He has said that the Vestry clerk of St. Sepulchre is in receipt of an income of £500 per annum. I believe the amount he receives is actually £290. I will only add that I share the regret which has been expressed by the right hon. Gentleman that he did not receive a deputation on this subject; because I am sure that it would have been better for him to have heard the objections they would have been able to bring forward, and to have carefully considered them face to face with those by whom they were urged.

(1.20.) The House divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 110.—(Div. List, No. 17.)

Main Question put, and negatived.

RIGHTS OF WAY (SCOTLAND) (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Charles Dalrymple, Bill to enable County Councils in Scotland, on a report by the Sheriff, to sue actions of Right of Way, ordered to be brought in by Sir Charles Dalrymple, Mr. James Campbell, and Mr. Mark Stewart.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 172.]

POLICE (METROPOLIS), INCREASE OF PAY.

Address for—

“Extract from Police Order of Monday, the 8th day of December, 1890, announcing the sanction of the Secretary of State to an Increase of Pay to the Metropolitan Police Force.”—(Mr. Stuart Wortley.)

PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS DISTRIBUTION.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in superintending the form and regulating the distribution of Parliamentary Papers.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of,—Mr. Arthur Acland, Mr. Bartley, Mr. Causton, Mr. Arthur Elliot, Mr. Gill, Mr. Howell, Mr. James Maclean, and Sir Herbert Maxwell.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.—(Sir Herbert Maxwell.)

IRISH SOCIETY AND LONDON COMPANIES (IRISH ESTATES).

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire as to the terms of the Charters or other instruments by which their Estates in Ireland were granted to the Irish Society and to the London Companies, and as to the trusts and obligations (if any) attaching to the ownership of such Estates, and as to the mode in which the sale of their Estates has been effected, or can be effected, consistently with such trusts and obligations as may be shown to have existed, or now exist.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of,—Mr. Clancy, Lord Elcho, Sir John Ellis, Mr. John Ellis, Mr. Elton, Mr. T. M. Healy, Colonel Laurie, Mr. Lawson, Mr. Lea, Sir William Marriott, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Sexton, and Sir Richard Temple.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. John Morley.)

COLONISATION.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into various schemes which have been proposed to Her Majesty's Government to facilitate emigration from the congested districts of the United Kingdom to the British Colonies or elsewhere; to examine into the results of any schemes which have received practical trial in recent years, and to report generally whether in their opinion it is desirable that further facilities should be given to promote emigration; and, if so, upon the means and the conditions under which such emigration can best be carried out, and the quarters to which it can most advantageously be directed.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of twenty-one Members.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of,—Sir George Baden-Powell, Mr. Gerald Balfour, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Clark, Sir John Colomb, Mr. Munro Ferguson, Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Hobhouse, Mr. Loder, Mr. James Maclean, Mr. William M'Arthur, Mr. Mahony, Colonel Malcolm, Mr. G. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Rankin, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. William Redmond, Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Schwann, Mr. Seton-Karr, and Mr. Wodehouse.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Jackson.)

LONDON TAXATION BILL.—(No. 51.)

Order for Second Reading upon Wednesday, 6th May, read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

METROPOLITAN WATER COMPANIES' CHARGES BILL.

Ordered, That the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills do examine the Metropolitan Water Companies' Charges Bill with respect to compliance with the Standing Orders relative to Private Bills.—(Mr. Causton.)

It being after One of the clock, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Two o'clock.

sions in them ; some sort of compromise is arrived at, and it is an undoubted fact that even measures of real importance and of considerable magnitude have passed through the other House of Parliament without a single word of discussion. The form of legislation is a matter of supreme importance, because though the object of a change in the law may be one with which we all agree, if the shape it takes is such as not to carry out that object or not to carry it out effectively, the very purpose of the legislation is defeated, and if the language used is not carefully scrutinised the measure though passed with the best possible intentions, may not only fail in its object but give rise to great litigation, expense, and worry. Therefore your Lordships would, I suppose, all be agreed that the duty of carefully revising the language of legislation is one which is cast especially on this House and that we ought to endeavour to fulfil that duty in the best possible way. I think it is hardly possible for any one, either, to controvert this fact, that down to the time of the creation of these Standing Committees, that was a work which had been very imperfectly discharged. I am not saying this at all by way of blame. It resulted from an infirmity of human nature. "What is everybody's business is nobody's business," and the consequence was that when measures were introduced which were not of any very exciting character or especially attracting the attention of particular Members of your Lordships' House they were apt to pass through with very little notice or concern. It is, of course, very difficult even for those who would be disposed to criticise the language of legislation to be always on the alert, present, and prepared to discuss the provisions of a measure on every occasion when the Member of your Lordships' House in charge of a Bill may chance to put it down ; and without any particular blame therefore to any one that particular function of this House, we all agree, was very imperfectly discharged. That by the system of Standing Committees of the House legislation has been scrutinised, revised, and amended to a greater extent than ever before is a fact, I think, which is impossible of dispute and capable of demonstration.

I am not going to trouble your Lordships with more than one or two examples, though I could give many. Take for example such a measure as that for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. There was one Amendment made by your Lordships' House about which there was some controversy, and which some considered to be rather mischievous than beneficial ; but putting that aside, and it was comparatively a small matter, I do not hesitate to say that many blots were removed from the Bill, the gaps which had been left open were stopped, and many improvements effected in it by your Lordships ; and those who were interested in the Bill frankly admitted that when it had passed through your Lordships' hands it was a very much more effective piece of legislation than it was when it left the other House. Another measure to which I may refer was the Official Secrets Bill. That Bill had an object about which there was a common agreement, but it had been insufficiently sifted by the other House. It came to your Lordships' House in a form which would have made it cover many cases, which, as all agreed, ought not to be covered, and in a shape which might have given rise to considerable difficulty between ourselves and some of the colonies connected with the mother country. These blots were removed by the Standing Committee, and the measure assumed a more satisfactory shape. One other instance only to which I will refer is the law relating to factors, a very difficult subject, which was taken up in your Lordships' House. This is an instance of a Bill originating here ; but the reason which renders it necessary that this House should carefully scrutinise the measures coming from the other House must render it also necessary that even greater care, if possible, should be exercised with regard to measures going from this to the other House. A Bill had been introduced by Her Majesty's Government, and another Bill had been introduced by Sir John Lubbock in the other House. Those two Bills were taken and moulded into one, and a great deal of time and care was bestowed upon them. What was the result ? The Bill went to the other House, was referred to their Standing Committee on Trade, and after undergoing the 'complete scrutiny of members of the mercantile community, more than two hours previous to the sitting of the House. It has occurred to me that perhaps some improvement might be effected in regard to reporting the proceedings of the Standing Committees by negotiations with the Hansard proprietors, in order to obtain from them a report of proceedings in the Standing Committees on a similar scale to that which is now given of the proceedings in Committees of the whole House. I had the honour of being Chairman of a Joint Committee of both Houses at the expiration of the last Hansard contract, and provision was then made that fuller reports should be given in Hansard of the proceedings in Committees of the whole House, and it appears to me—I only throw it out as a suggestion—that, by negotiations with the Hansard proprietors, we might ensure an equally full report of the proceedings in our Standing Committees. I think this would be a very desirable object to attain, because, beyond the mere sentimental objection that it is thought outside by the public that we do not work as hard as we really do, there is also the fact that Bills which have passed through the House of Commons and have reached your Lordships' House are liable to be thrown out after discussion in the Standing Committees, without the possibility of the public generally, or those specially who are interested in the subjects with which the Bills deal, being able to ascertain for what reasons they have been so summarily rejected. I do not know whether this suggestion of mine will bear fruit, but I should be glad if other noble Lords would make any other suggestion which might seem to obviate what I believe to be the only tangible objections to the Standing Committees. I need only add that I do not think this Committee need occupy the time of your Lordships for more than one or two sittings. It is necessary that we should proceed with it as soon as possible, because I am informed there are Bills coming before this House which will require the attention of Standing Committees. Therefore it is desirable that it should be appointed without delay. In the meantime, I trust that your Lordships will agree with the suggestion I have made in regard to reporting the proceedings in Standing Committees, and that the result of the labours of this Select Committee will be to so improve the operation of those Committees as to remove the objection which appears to be felt to them on the part of some of your Lordships. I beg to move in accordance with the Motion which stands in my name.

Earl Cadogan

Moved,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to examine and report upon the Standing Orders of the House which relate to Standing Committees."—(The Lord Privy Seal, E. Cadogan.)

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I do not rise for the purpose of offering the slightest opposition to the proposition which the noble Lord has made. The change introduced two years ago by the institution of these Standing Committees was, no doubt, one of considerable magnitude and importance, and it is quite reasonable that after two years' experience we should take counsel together to see whether the system could be improved, and whether some objections that have been raised could be obviated. I am very glad the noble Earl has given no countenance to the idea that those Committees have proved a failure and have not answered the purposes for which they were appointed, for nothing, I believe, could be further removed from the fact. The evil which those Committees were designed to meet was a serious one. Now, I do not believe there can be two opinions that one of the most important functions of your Lordships' House is to act as a Chamber of revision, to carefully scrutinise legislation as it passes through Parliament, and to see that the intentions of those who are changing the law are not only carried out, but are carried out as efficiently as possible. This is a function which your Lordships' House is in a position to discharge more effectively than the other House of Parliament, and changes in the procedure of the other House have rendered it more than ever necessary that that function should be discharged by the House of Lords, for, owing to such changes, it has become almost impossible to pass through the other House what I may call the smaller measures with anything like adequate discussion. Private Members' Bills, if they are to be passed at all, must be passed by means of some arrangement or compromise with those who take objection to those measures or to certain provisions in them ; some sort of compromise is arrived at, and it is an undoubted fact that even measures of real importance and of considerable magnitude have passed through the other House of Parliament without a single word of discussion. The form of legislation is a matter of supreme importance, because though the object of a change in the law may be one with which we all agree, if the shape it takes is such as not to carry out that object or not to carry it out effectively, the very purpose of the legislation is defeated, and if the language used is not carefully scrutinised the measure though passed with the best possible intentions, may not only fail in its object but give rise to great litigation, expense, and worry. Therefore your Lordships would, I suppose, all be agreed that the duty of carefully revising the language of legislation is one which is cast especially on this House and that we ought to endeavour to fulfil that duty in the best possible way. I think it is hardly possible for any one, either, to controvert this fact, that down to the time of the creation of these Standing Committees, that was a work which had been very imperfectly discharged. I am not saying this at all by way of blame. It resulted from an infirmity of human nature. "What is everybody's business is nobody's business," and the consequence was that when measures were introduced which were not of any very exciting character or especially attracting the attention of particular Members of your Lordships' House they were apt to pass through with very little notice or concern. It is, of course, very difficult even for those who would be disposed to criticise the language of legislation to be always on the alert, present, and prepared to discuss the provisions of a measure on every occasion when the Member of your Lordships' House in charge of a Bill may chance to put it down; and without any particular blame therefore to any one that particular function of this House, we all agree, was very imperfectly discharged. That by the system of Standing Committees of the House legislation has been scrutinised, revised, and amended to a greater extent than ever before is a fact, I think, which is impossible of dispute and capable of demonstration.

I am not going to trouble your Lordships with more than one or two examples, though I could give many. Take for example such a measure as that for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. There was one Amendment made by your Lordships' House about which there was some controversy, and which some considered to be rather mischievous than beneficial; but putting that aside, and it was comparatively a small matter, I do not hesitate to say that many blots were removed from the Bill, the gaps which had been left open were stopped, and many improvements effected in it by your Lordships; and those who were interested in the Bill frankly admitted that when it had passed through your Lordships' hands it was a very much more effective piece of legislation than it was when it left the other House. Another measure to which I may refer was the Official Secrets Bill. That Bill had an object about which there was a common agreement, but it had been insufficiently sifted by the other House. It came to your Lordships' House in a form which would have made it cover many cases, which, as all agreed, ought not to be covered, and in a shape which might have given rise to considerable difficulty between ourselves and some of the colonies connected with the mother country. These blots were removed by the Standing Committee, and the measure assumed a more satisfactory shape. One other instance only to which I will refer is the law relating to factors, a very difficult subject, which was taken up in your Lordships' House. This is an instance of a Bill originating here; but the reason which renders it necessary that this House should carefully scrutinise the measures coming from the other House must render it also necessary that even greater care, if possible, should be exercised with regard to measures going from this to the other House. A Bill had been introduced by Her Majesty's Government, and another Bill had been introduced by Sir John Lubbock in the other House. Those two Bills were taken and moulded into one, and a great deal of time and care was bestowed upon them. What was the result? The Bill went to the other House, was referred to their Standing Committee on Trade, and after undergoing the 'complete scrutiny of members of the mercantile community, as well as lawyers, it came back to your Lordships' House with only one single Amendment, and that not of an important character. I have given these few instances—I might have given many more of them—to show that an amount of care and attention has been recently bestowed upon the form of legislation—and the form, as your Lordships know, is often of the very substance of it—which never was bestowed formerly; and I am quite certain that all who have attended those Committees will agree with what the noble Lord has stated in the testimony he has given to the very great care and attention bestowed by the Committees on the Bills which come before them. The attendance has been continuous, and the Members so attending have been numerous. A great many Members of your Lordships' House have followed the discussions thoroughly, and have taken part in the legislation, who would never have taken any such part had it been that the measures were simply coming forward as they used to do for discussion in Committee of the whole House. Suggestions were made and difficulties pointed out by noble Lords who would never have thought of getting up in your Lordships' House to make speeches upon the subject, but who joined without hesitation in the kind of discussion which takes place in Committee, and threw out suggestions which were often very valuable. The establishment of Grand Committees has therefore led to more of your Lordships taking part in legislation, taking an interest in it, and actively concerning themselves about it, than was the case before. So much with regard to the results arising from this change. But it has been said by some that all that has been done in these Committees might have been done in Committee of the whole House. With that I cannot agree. I say it would not have been done in Committee of the whole House, and I say also that it could not have been done as effectively in Committee of the whole House. Saying that it would not have been done I hold to be justified by what had occurred in the past, and I have already pointed out to your Lordships shortly the reasons why that was the case. That it could not have been done I assert, because it appears to me that the kind of criticism which you want for a Bill where no question of principle is raised, and when upon the general object you are agreed is one for which a Committee of the whole House, affords the worst possible machinery which the wit of man could desire. When, on the other hand, we are met together in Standing Committee, suggestions are thrown out and the matter is dealt with in a more informal fashion than is the custom here—you can deal with it in a way that you could not in Committee of the whole House. While those Committees have been sitting the Members attending upon them have been by no means excluded from taking part in the discussions on the Bills. More than that, I think it capable of demonstration that the discussions upon Bills after they have been through Committee have been fuller than on former occasions when they had not. The explanation is simply that a greater number of your Lordships have become acquainted with the points which have arisen in a way that they could not have become acquainted with them if the Bills had not come up for discussion there; and, therefore, you have heard noble Lords taking part in discussions who would not have done so had they not attended the Grand Committees. So that instead of causing less to be done in this House it has caused more time and attention to be expended upon measures before it. I know there have been other objections made. It is said that you seem now to do less than you had done before. I do not myself feel oppressed with that. I quite admit it is desirable that the public should know what we are doing, but if a choice has to be made between seeming to do work and not really doing it, and not seeming to do work but yet, in reality, doing it, I, as a practical man, must say that I very much prefer the latter, and I am glad that the result has been accomplished, even if we have seemed to do less. But I think that one objection would be met if we could persuade the Press to take a somewhat different course than that which they have taken. It seems to me that it would be of advantage to the public and not disadvantageous to the newspapers themselves. Some of the discussions in the Grand Committees have been very well reported in the Press, but the reports have not been put under the heading of "Parliamentary Intelligence." You have had to search for them, and at last have found them, perhaps in some out-of-the-way corner of the newspaper, whereas, if they had appeared, even if only at the same length, under that heading, I believe that those interested in the discussions would be glad to be able to find them more easily and to obtain more readily the information which they desire, and I do not see that it would be of any disadvantage at all to the newspapers. I do not throw out that suggestion in the interests of your Lordships' House only, but in the interests of large sections of the public, who take an interest in such Bills as that for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and who would be glad to find such reports as are given placed under the head of "Parliamentary Intelligence." I do not propose to detain your Lordships further. I am very glad that this matter is to be considered by a Select Committee, in order, if possible, to remove any objections and to make the working of this machinery more effective than it has been, and if I may venture to say so I will most heartily give such aid as I can to accomplish that result. I was only anxious that no impression should get abroad that this experiment of Standing Committees had proved a failure, or that it had not carried out the object contemplated by those who introduced it. I would point out this also: that amongst its most valuable results have been those obtained owing to the suggestion of the noble Marquess at the head of the Government, that particular classes of Bills which require minute examination should be referred to a Sub-Committee of the Standing Committee. One instance of that I may mention. A Bill was introduced to codify the Law of Partnership; a very intricate and difficult subject, and that Bill was considered line by line by a small Sub-Committee, presided over by my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor, who gave very many hours to the consideration of that measure. I cannot doubt that the result of that consideration will be that when that measure is brought into practical working a great deal of litigation may be saved which would very likely have followed if great care had not been bestowed on the wording of every part of it. My Lords, I trust the deliberations of this Committee may result in the improvement of this machinery, and certainly not in impairing the beneficial effect which has been produced by the change made two years ago.

Lord Herschell

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I am very glad to hear the spirit in which this Motion has been received by the noble and learned Lord opposite, to whom we owe to a very great extent the institution of these Committees. I agree with him that the Standing Committees have done a great deal of good work, and that the Statute Book has been the better for their work. I desire, however, to point out lest anyone should think reference to a Committee is needless, that there are two matters which require to be considered and decided in the open House. One of them is the question whether you will go on with two Committees, or whether we should have only one. It has occasionally happened during the last Session that the second Committee, for General Purposes, presided over by Lord Kimberley, has met, and there has been no business for it to do. There has been a little difficulty in apportioning the work between the two Committees. The noble Lord referred to the plan of doing the work by delegating it to Sub-Committees as being one which had in his experience worked satisfactorily, and I am not sure that it would not be better to do the whole of your work in that way, and to have one Committee which should be empowered to appoint Sub-Committees to consider the Bills which may be submitted to them: At all events, such an arrangement would have the effect of always providing business for the noble Lords who come down, and it would prevent one Committee from being overloaded with work while the other had no work at all. The other difficulty is rather a curious one, and arises, it seems to me, a good deal from sentiment. I have heard it stated again, by some of the noble Lords behind me, that this system prevents discussion in the open House; but as the Bills have to pass through Committee of the whole House after passing through the Standing Committees, it is very difficult to perceive how that complaint can be justified. But I am told it is not in human nature for noble Lords to criticise a Bill of which all the criticisable parts have been taken out by the Grand Committee. It is like gleanings after a very careful harvestman. They say that the first pressure of the olive or the grape produces by far the most excellent and valuable result, and I can conceive the disappointment of those who have expected to get a lengthy discussion upon the provisions of the Bill at being deprived of a considerable amount of criticism of a measure after it has been subjected to the press of the noble Lord on the Woolsack, and of the noble and learned Lord opposite and others. No doubt it may leave them in rather a disappointed condition, and they may think that they have been asked to rather a Barmecide feast when they are asked to apply their powers to the discussion of Bills from which all the materials for discussion have been removed. I will venture with diffidence and humility to suggest a remedy which I think would meet the difficulty, and that is, that Bills should pass through this House before they are referred to a Standing Committee. This House is too modest and too timid to discuss a Bill which the Standing Committee has passed, but I am quite sure the Standing Committee would not be too modest or too timid to discuss a Bill which this House has passed. We should have the general principles which were to be laid down duly brought forward and discussed in the Committee of the whole House, and the more prosaic work of making a decent Act of Parliament would be delegated to the Committee upstairs. I believe that that would be a plan by which we should unite practical utility with patriotic sentiment, and that we should in that way overcome one of the most formidable difficulties with which we have had to contend.

On Question, agreed to.

Then the Lords following were named of the Committee—

L. Chancellor	E. Granville
E. Cadogan	E. Kimberley
(L. Privy Seal.)	V. Oxenbridge
D. Richmond	L. Foxford
M. Salisbury	(E. Limerick.)
E. Derby	L. Brabourne
E. Morley	L. Colville of Culross
E. Beauchamp	L. Herschell.
E. Camperdown

The Committee to meet on Monday next, at half past Two o'clock; and to appoint their own Chairman.

The Marquess of Salisbury

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

The Lords following, viz. :—

E. Lathom	L. Colville of Culross
(L. Chamberlain)	L. Kensington
V. Oxenbridge

with the Chairman of Committees were appointed a Committee to select and propose to the House the names of the Five Lords to form a Select Committee for the consideration of each opposed Private Bill.

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE.

Appointed: The Lords following with the Chairman of Committees, were named of the Committee :—

E. Cadogan	E. Wharncliffe
(L. Privy Seal)	E. de Montalt
M. Bath	V. Sidmouth
E. Lathom	V. Gordon
(L. Chamberlain)	(E. Aberdeen)
E. Winchelsea and	V. Hardinge
Nottingham	V. Oxenbridge
E. Lauderdale	L. de Ros
E. Lindsay	L. Clinton
E. Waldegrave	L. Zouche of Haryng-
E. Bathurst	worth
E. Belmore	L. Balfour of Burley
E. Powis	L. Boyle
E. Harrowby	(E. Cork and
E. Amherst	Orrery)
L. Foxford	L. Thurlow
(E. Limerick)	L. Hartismere
L. Colchester	(L. Henniker)
L. Wigan	L. Sandhurst
(E. Crawford and	L. Fermanagh
Balcarras)	(E. Erne)
L. Poltimore	L. Monk-Bretton
L. Sudeley	L. Sudley
L. Belper	(E. Arran)
L. Houghton	L. Colville of Culross
L. Romilly	L. Kensington
E. Camperdown

All Petitions relating to Standing Orders which shall be presented during the present Session referred to the Committee unless otherwise ordered.

HOUSE OF LORDS OFFICES.

Select Committee appointed: The Lords following, with the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President, the Lord Privy Seal, and the Chairman of Committees were named of the Committee :

D. Richmond	E. Kimberley
D. Saint Albans	E. de Montalt
M. Salisbury	V. Hardinge
M. Bath	V. Oxenbridge
M. Ripon	L. Willoughby de
E. Mount Edgcombe	Eresby
(L. Steward)	L. Boyle
E. Lathom	(E. Cork and
(L. Chamberlain)	Orrery)
E. Waldegrave	L. Foxford
E. Belmore	(E. Limerick)
E. Harrowby	L. Colchester
E. Bradford	L. Ker
E. Beauchamp	(M. Lothian)
E. Camperdown	L. Rowton
E. Granville	L. Colville of Culross.
E. Stratford

House adjourned at Five o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 27th January, 1891.

QUESTIONS.

PORTSMOUTH DOCKYARD.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that certain specific charges of grave character have been recently reported to the Superintendent Engineer of the Portsmouth Dockyard; whether any and what inquiry has been made, and by whom, into such complaints; whether any and what evidence was taken, and with what result; and whether any further action will be taken in the matter?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The charges referred to appear to be those which have been made periodically since 1884, with regard to irregularities alleged to have taken place as far back as 1883 in connection with the dredging contract at Portsmouth. They have been brought forward on each occasion by bargemen who had been discharged by the contractor. When first made they were investigated by the Admiral Superintendent and the Superintending Engineer of the Dockyard, and they have subsequently been reported upon by successive Superintending Engineers, and it has always been decided that they were groundless.

THE SOUTH AFRICA COMPANY.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, inasmuch as certain concessions led Her Majesty's Government to assent to a Charter being granted to the South Africa Company, he has been made aware that these concessions do not belong to that Company, but to another Company which has a capital of £4,000,000, representing one-half of the value of these concessions, and that the Chartered Company is merely a lessee of the aforesaid Company, receiving one-half of the net income derived from the concessions in consideration of bearing all the expenses involved in the obli-tions that the Chartered Company has undertaken in consideration of obtaining the Charter, and whether Her Majesty's Government was aware that this arrangement was to be made when the Charter was granted; whether he will take steps to see that no undue influence is exercised by the Company on Lobengula to induce him to cede land to the Company in addition to the mining rights hitherto granted; whether his attention has been called to the seizure on the part of the Company of Manica, which is claimed by Portugal, and to the imprisonment and deportation of Portuguese residing in Manica by the Company; whether there is any limit laid down in regard to the area over which the Chartered Company has acquired rights in consequence of its Charter; and, if not, whether such limit will at once be laid down; whether his attention has been called to Clauses 3 and 4 of the Charter granted to the Company, by which it is prohibited from exercising any act of sovereignty or powers of government in relation to any treaty or concession, until a copy of such concession, grant, or treaty, with maps and particulars, have been submitted to the Secretary of State, and he has signified his approval thereof either absolutely or subject to any conditions or reservations; and whether the so-called Treaty with Mutassa in respect to the concessions granted to the company by that chief in respect to Manica has been submitted to the Secretary of State, and he has signified his approval of it; and, if not, what action it is contemplated to take against the Company for infringing its Charter, by exercising acts of sovereignty and powers of government in Manica under a so-called concession from Mutassa?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): In answer to the first question put by the hon. Member, I have to say that Her Majesty's Government was not, when the Charter was granted, and is not, aware that the facts are as stated, and is not responsible for the details of the relations between the British South Africa Company and any other Company or person holding concessions within the field of its operations. As regards the second question, Her Majesty's Government does not believe that any improper influence has been brought to bear upon Lobengula by the British South Africa Company. The answer to the third question is: Yes. In reply to the fourth question, the field of operations of the British South Africa Company has not been further defined since the Charter was issued, and no further steps in that direction will be taken while the negotiations with Portugal are pending. As regards the last two questions, Her Majesty's Government are familiar with the clauses referred to; and they are not yet in a position to consider whether, and to what extent, the Treaty with Mutassa should receive approval.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Has the Treaty with Mutassa been submitted, as stipulated by the clauses, to Her Majesty's Government?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Yes.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay it on the Table of the House?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: That will be considered.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): May I ask whether the Government have received information that the Charter alleged to have been granted by Portugal to the Zambesi Company contain provisions hostile to British interests; and whether, having regard to the fact that the British South Africa Company have secured a concession in the Manica Company and the neighbouring territory for a modus vivendi, the Government will recognise such concession as the basis of further negotiation?

MR. SPEAKER: Order! The hon. Member had better give notice of that question.

MR. CONYBEARE: I will put it tomorrow.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): Are we to understand that the Government exercise no control over the concessions and Sub-leases granted by the Chartered Company?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: No; the hon. Gentleman is not to understand that.

THE CLEANERS OF THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works
Baron H. de Worms

whether arrangements have been made by which the cleaners of the two Houses of Parliament will be placed directly under the Office of Works, will receive their pay without any deduction to a middle man, and will have a half-holiday on Saturdays and the usual annual holiday that is granted to other working men employed in the two Houses of Parliament?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. PLUNKET, Dublin University): It is not intended to increase the number of workmen employed about the Houses of Parliament, and employed directly under the Office of Works; but the cleaners will, under the new form of contract, which comes into force in April next, receive their pay without deduction to a middleman, and will not be required to work on Saturday afternoons except under very special circumstances, in which cases they would receive extra pay. The men regularly employed about the Houses on special duty, for instance, in the ventilating department, are paid by the week, and may often have to work for long hours without extra pay. They, therefore, get an annual holiday, which is not given to contractors' men, who are paid by the hour.

MR. LABOUCHERE: And the annual holiday?

*MR. PLUNKET: Men employed by the Office of Works are paid by the week, and sometimes do extra work without receiving extra pay, and consequently an annual holiday is given to them.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE BILL.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Public Trustee Bill, which has twice passed the Upper House, will be reintroduced; and if the Select Committee promised on the subject will be appointed in sufficient time to enable it to report sufficiently early for legislation on the subject to be effected in the course of the present Session?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I trust that it will be reintroduced in the course of a very few days, and I think that the best course will be to refer it to the Standing Committee on Law.

ALIEN ACT.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is in a position to state the results of the enforcement of the Alien Act upon certain routes of immigration into this country frequented by pauper foreigners?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir; the statistics with regard to this matter will be found in the Annual Report on Emigration, which will shortly be presented to Parliament.

ALLOTMENTS BILL.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it is correctly stated, in a number of Warwickshire papers, that the Government contemplate bringing in another Allotments Bill, giving power to Local Authorities to take land compulsorily upon lease for providing allotments; and whether the Government have changed their views, and are prepared to adopt the principle of compulsory leasing?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): No, Sir.

THE EDUCATION GRANT.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education when the Return will be published showing the expenditure from the Education Grant in the year 1890, the number of elementary schools, and the accommodation and number of scholars on the 31st August, 1890, and the results of inspection and examination during the year ending 31st August, 1890, together with a summary of statistics for the same year, in continuation of a similar Return published last year?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The preparation of the Return is being completed in the ordinary course, and it will be laid before Parliament at the usual time shortly after Easter.

CARRIAGE OF LIVE CATTLE FROM AMERICA.

MR. CHARLES WILSON (Hull, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Government is intending to make any and what regulations or restrictions as to the carriage of live cattle across the Atlantic?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer the question. The hon. Member is probably aware that a Joint Departmental Committee of the Board of Agriculture and the Board of Trade is at this moment examining into the question of the transit of cattle across the Atlantic, and I think it would be desirable to wait for the Report of that Committee before deciding what alterations, if any, may be necessary in the regulations existing at present.

GWYLWYN SETT QUARRY, CARNARVON.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any, and, if any, what, progress has been made with the negotiations for the lease of the Gwylwyn Sett Quarry, Pistyll, Carnarvonshire; and if a lease has been granted, what provision (if any) has been made to ensure the continuous working of that quarry?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): There has been some delay, and I am sorry to say the negotiations are not yet concluded, but the Welsh Granite Company have been requested to return the draft lease for engrossment by the 31st inst.; so I hope by the end of the month that we shall have an answer accepting or declining.

TRADE AND TREATIES COMMITTEE.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Trade and Treaties Committee have yet sent in any Reports to Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, when will such Reports be circulated?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The first Report of the Committee has just been received by Her Majesty's Government, and will be carefully considered. Of course, it must be a matter for future decision whether, and when, it should be published.

MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has come to a decision upon the means of prosecuting at the public expense offenders against "The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887," and if fresh legislation will be necessary?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: There has been some delay in this matter, as it has required very careful consideration from a legal point of view; but I am advised that legislation will not be required to enable the Report of the Committee on this point to be carried into effect. I am in communication with the Attorney General as to the manner in which this should be done, and I propose, of course, to address a communication to the Treasury on the subject.

EVICTION OF MINERS.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been directed to the threatened eviction of several hundred miners, with their families, from their houses at Selksworth Colliery, near Sunderland; and whether, in view of the distress and danger to health likely to ensue from evictions at this season of the year, he will communicate with the Local Authorities for the district, with the object of securing proper temporary accommodation for the evicted families?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have no information except that derived from the newspapers. I earnestly hope the contingency referred to by the hon. Gentleman may not arise. The duty of the Guardians is restricted to the relief of destitution.

MAIL SERVICE TO STORNOWAY.

MR. RAYMOND HEATH (Lincoln, Louth): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been drawn to the inefficiency of the mail service between Stornoway and the mainland; whether he is aware that owing to her faulty construction, deficiency in steam power, and insufficient size, the steamer Lochiel is quite unsuited to carry the mails, as she cannot keep up to time in any but the finest weather; whether he is prepared to put the contract for carrying the mails between Stornoway and the mainland up to open competition on the first opportunity; and when will the present contract terminate?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I am aware that complaints have been made relative to the mail packet service to which the hon. Member refers; but the contractor does his best with the means at his disposal, and is not prepared to employ a larger and more powerful steamer without additional subsidy. The existing contract cannot be terminated before the 31st December next, and meanwhile I have the intention of offering the service to open competition.

BATTERY AND EARTHWORKS NEAR SUNDERLAND.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is true that he is negotiating for the purchase of a large quantity of land north of Roker-on-Sea (near Sunderland), for the purpose of constructing a battery and earthworks; and, if so, will he issue instructions for the speedy removal of the obsolete gun battery situated near Roker Park, and which, when used, is a nuisance and source of danger to the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, as well as to the large inshore traffic of fishing and pleasure boats?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): No, Sir; no such negotiations have taken place.

SAVINGS BANK CLERKS.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his Order compelling the clerks employed in the Savings Bank Department to work for two hours beyond the usual time each day, except on Saturdays, applies to the whole of the staff; and whether the payment for this compulsory overtime is in each case at a rate not less than that received for work done during official hours?

*MR. RAIKES: The Order referred to in the first part of the hon. Member's question applies to the whole of the male staff, with the exception of such superintending officers as are not required. The payment for extra duty is rateable on the salaries up to a maximum of 1s. 6d. an hour.

THE WRITERS IN THE STATISTICAL ABSTRACTING DEPARTMENT.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Board of Customs have been informed of the decision of the Treasury respecting the future status and rates of pay of the writers in the Statistical Abstracting Department; and, if so, what is the cause of delay in the issue of the new scheme?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; the Board of Customs were informed of the Treasury decision on the 19th ult., and are occupied in settling the details of the scheme, which contains arrangements affecting other divisions of the Statistical Office besides the writers. I have asked the Commissioners to proceed, if possible, at once with the portion affecting the writers.

THE SINKING FUND.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer where, as under the Land Purchase Bill, a Government Stock is created, the yearly interest and sinking fund of which are provided by Terminable Annuities, whether there are any precedents for lending the capital value of the Sinking Fund on real estate for fixed periods, extending beyond the date of the termination of the Annuities; and, if there are such precedents, will he state them to the House?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I do not know whether there are any such precedents; but what the hon. Member suggests really would not happen, because it is not the object of the Bill to employ the Sinking Fund. The Sinking Fund will be employed only in the ordinary way that Sinking Funds are employed.

*MR. KEAY: The phrase used in the question is "the capital value of the Sinking Fund," not the Sinking Fund itself.

*MR. GOSCHEN: If the hon. Member will wait for a Return which is being prepared it will clear up this matter altogether.

THE MALAY PENINSULA.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicester, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there is any foundation for the report, published in the Globe of 26th January, that Germany is endeavouring to obtain from the King of Siam the cession of a port and some territory in the Malay Peninsula, North of Penang, and South of British Burma; and whether Her Majesty's Government have any information as to whether such cession would be in accordance with the wishes of the Siamese Dependency of Kedah, formerly under British protection?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Sir, we have reason to believe that there is no foundation for that report.

MESSRS. BRASS.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works when the contract with Messrs. Brass for the supply of workmen to Government Offices expires; and whether on its termination the Government will dispense with the services of middlemen, by engaging and placing under the control of the Government Clerks of Works all workmen employed at the Houses of Parliament, the British Museum, and other Government Offices?

*MR. PLUNKET: The contract with Messrs. Brass expires on the 31st of March next. The system of this and similar contracts entered into by the Office of Works has been carefully inquired into in the course of the past year by a Departmental Committee, which has advised that the practice of working through contractors should be continued, but under new regulations in regard to the payment of wages. I do not admit that under the existing contract middlemen are employed in the sense which seems to be suggested by the question of the hon. Member; but, under the new system, the sums paid by the Government for wages will not be subject to any discount or to any other deduction by the contractor. An invitation to tender for the new contract will in a few days be issued, and that will fully set out the conditions to which I have referred.

MR. CREMER: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay on the Table the terms of any contract proposed to be entered into?

*MR. PLUNKET: I have already stated that the invitation to tender will convey all the information asked for, and I hope it will be satisfactory. If afterwards the hon. Member wishes to see the form of contract I should be glad to show them to him; or, if it be necessary, there will be no objection to publish them.

MR. CREMER: I do not gather whether there will be any deduction made by the contractor from the wages of the workmen as voted by the House.

*MR. PLUNKET: There will be no sort of discount or deduction whatever.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): Is there any objection to lay on the Table a statement of the terms before they are adopted?

*MR. PLUNKET: It will be seen as soon as the invitation is issued what the terms of the contract are, and I hope hon. Members will then be satisfied.

MAGAZINE RIFLE.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the drawings and specifications of the changes made in the Magazine Rifle in the new issue Mark II.?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The changes which are contemplated were indicated in general terms in answer to a previous question; but I am quite willing to lay on the Table a more detailed and specific list of the suggested improvements.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: How are we to discuss the details of this weapon unless we know what changes have been adopted?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have no desire to keep back any information; but, to speak frankly, I do not think the House is competent to settle the details of a question like this.

RAWNSLEY BOARD SCHOOL.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been drawn to the closing of the Infant Department of the Board School, Rawnsley, Staffordshire; whether he is aware that there was sufficient accommodation for infants at the Rawnsley School, and that such closing was resolved on against the express wish and despite the protest of the parents of the children attending the school; whether, prior to closing such infant school, the Cannock School Board satisfied the Education Department that the infant school was unnecessary, or whether the school has been closed without the sanction of the Education Department; whether he is aware that the nearest school is Hazel Slade Church School, 1,726 yards distant from the Rawnsley School, and more than a mile and a half distant from the homes of some of the infant children, who have, in consequence, to walk from four to six miles, twice going and returning each day; whether parents of infants residing in Rawnsley have been prosecuted for not sending their children to Hazel Slade Church School; whether bye-laws of the Cannock School Board have been recently altered so as to deprive the parents of excuse if residing more than one mile from the school; and whether the Department will cause inquiry to be made in the matter?

SIR W. HART DYKE: A small infants' class, which was attached to the Board School at Rawnsley for some years, has been discontinued, but I am not aware on what grounds. No complaint has been made as to the inadequacy or inconvenience of the present accommodation for infants; but in view of the circumstances described by the hon. Member, the Department will make further inquiries. The alteration of the bye-laws has only reduced the limit which constitutes a reasonable excuse, from two and a half miles, to two miles.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether it is true, as stated in the public Press, that a competition is to be held for plans to complete the South Kensington Museum; and, if so, whether he will publish the conditions of the competition; and whether plans and models have already been prepared and paid for by the public, to complete the buildings in harmony with the large portion already erected; and whether these plans have been approved of by the Museum authorities?

DR. TANNER: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, I wish to know whether the competition is to be confined to the architects already selected, or will be open, as was the case of the Law Courts, to other plans sent in too late for the competition?

MR. PLUNKET: It is true that a limited competition has been invited for plans to complete the South Kensington Museum. Eight gentlemen have been so invited, four of them named by the Council of the Royal Institute of British Architects, and four by the Office of Works. It is also true that plans were prepared by the late General Scott and paid for as part of General Scott's official duties when he was Director of the Works at South Kensington. I believe that, so far as they went, they were approved of by the Science and Art Department; but these plans were never put forward in a completed state, nor were they ever approved of by the Office of Works. In answer to the hon. Member for Mid Cork, I am glad to say that one of the gentlemen named by me is a very distinguished Irish architect.

MR. BARTLEY: Have the Museum Authorities been consulted in drawing up the conditions of the competition?

MR. PLUNKET: I do not know whether they have been formally consulted; but I am quite sure the conditions will meet with their entire approval.

CIVIL SERVICE CLERKS.

MR. JOHN KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in accordance with the Treasury Minutes of 10th August, 1889, and 4th February, 1890, and of the Order in Council of 21st March, 1890, relating to the clerks of the Second Division of the Civil Service, any recommendations have been received from the Heads of Departments for the promotion of meritorious clerks of that Division; how long any such recommendations have been before the Treasury; and what action has been taken with regard to them?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Some promotions of Second Division clerks have been made, upon the recommendation of Heads of Departments, to vacancies in the First Division and to certain staff places. Other recommendations affecting clerks of the Second Division have been received as part of change of organisation arising out of the Order in Council of March 21, 1890. In certain cases no decision has been arrived at on these recommendations, because the changes of organisation are still under consideration.

THE PROBATE AND DIVORCE COURT.

MR. JOHN KELLY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is proposed to make any alteration with reference to the very extensive patronage now vested in the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division before any successor to Sir James Hannen is appointed; and whether, if such alteration should be made, it would have the effect of securing a fair prospect of promotion to the highest offices to those who may have filled efficiently the higher and subordinate offices?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The right of appointment to offices in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division is vested by Act of Parliament in the President for the time being; and Her Majesty having been pleased to approve of Mr. Jeune as the new Judge, Mr. Justice Butt has already, as senior Judge of the Division, by virtue of the Judicature Acts become President. No alteration, as far I know, is likely to be proposed in the prospects of the clerks of the Probate Registry, where the opportunities of rising appear to be better than in any other department of the Supreme Court.

TOWN HOLDINGS.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Town Holdings Committee will be re-appointed, with the addition of the Scotch Members to the Committee, to consider the Scotch branch of the subject, as promised by the Government on 19th May, 1890?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Town Holdings Committee will be re-appointed as soon as possible, and the promise of the Government as to the addition of the Scotch Members will not be overlooked.

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in nominating the Committee on the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, he will take care that English and Irish Members are fairly represented, as the principles adopted with regard to Scotland will guide future legislation with regard to England and Ireland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In nominating the Committee on the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill care will be taken that English and Irish Members are fairly represented.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask whether the hon. Baronet speaks with authority when he says that "the principles adopted with regard to Scotland would guide future legislation with regard to England and Ireland?"

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Baronet speaks on his own responsibility.

IRISH LIGHT RAILWAYS.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if a Memorial has been received from the Guardians of the Bandon Union, County Cork, urging the construction of a light railway between Crookstown and Linniskeane, and if this Memorial has been considered; and with what result?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): No Memorial of the nature mentioned by the hon. Member has been received by Her Majesty's Government.

In reply to a further question by Dr. TANNER,

MR. MADDEN said: Any suggestion made by the Guardians will receive careful consideration.

HAULBOWLINE DOCKS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty when the Haulbowline Docks in Cork Harbour will be completed; whether any practical advance has been made to provide these docks with the necessary fitting shops; whether any employment for labour will be afforded to local workmen; and what has been the cost up to the present time in the construction of the docks?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The dock and basins at Haulbowline are complete. Existing buildings and machinery are being adapted or provided for fitters' workshops, and will shortly be completed. Work connected with repairs and maintenance will be done by local labour, and, in the case of new works done by contract, suitable local firms would be invited to tender as well as other firms. The works in connection with the extension of the yard and other accessory works and buildings have cost approximately £600,000.

Sir Julian Goldmid

DR. TANNER: How soon will it be possible to accommodate ships of the size which now frequent Cork Harbour?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I am not sure that that can be done all at once; but I think it will be possible in the course of a few months.

H.M.S. SHANNON.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is a fact that H.M.S. Shannon, which has been employed as a guardship in Bantry Bay, was recently sent to Plymouth for repairs to its deck; whether such repairs could have been efficiently, and with less cost, carried out at Passage West in Cork Harbour; and whether, in view of the great distress prevailing at Passage, any necessary repairs of ships of the Royal Navy stationed on the South Coast of Ireland, which could be effected satisfactorily and with economy, might be done in the Passage docks?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The Shannon has gone to Devonport for her annual refit, repairs, and stores, and the class of work required could not have been done by any private dockyard.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE CRIMES ACT.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Mr. Speaker, may I remind the First Lord of the Treasury that on the first day of the Session he was good enough to promise me a day for raising a discussion on certain matters connected with the administration of the law in Ireland, and may I ask him whether it would be convenient for him to name a day on Thursday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope I may be in a position to give the right hon. Gentleman an answer on Thursday.

TRADE AND NAVIGATION.

Accounts ordered—

"Relating to the Trade and Navigation of the United Kingdom for each month during the year 1891."—(Sir Michael Hicks Beach.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 58.]

"R. F. CURRAN AND OTHERS."

Address for—

"Revised Report from the Western Morning News of the 10th day of January, 1891, of the Judgment delivered on the 9th day of January, 1891, by H. M. Bompas, Esquire, Q.C., Recorder of Plymouth, upon an Appeal against the Conviction of Curran, Matthews, and Shephard under Section seven of 'The Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875.'"—(Mr. Stuart Wortley.)

LICENSED PREMISES (SCOTLAND).

Return ordered—

"Of Particulars, with Abstract added, relating to Premises Licensed for the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors in the Burghs (Glasgow excepted) and Counties of Scotland, in the following form :

	Address of Premises, Street, and Number.
	Name and Address of Owner of Premises.
	Name of Holder of Licence.
	Annual Rental of Premises.
	Estimated Population of each Ward in Towns and of each County.
	Number of Licences per 1,000 of Population.
Number of Licences.	Grocer.
	Public House.
	Hotel.

—(Mr. Provand.)

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Christopher Furness, esquire, for the Borough of The Hartlepoons.

M O T I O N S.

THE PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH.)

(4.10.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.) in rising to move—

"That the Resolution of this House of the 22nd day of June, 1880—'That, having regard to the Reports and Proceedings of two Select Committees appointed by this House, Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to take the oath or make the affirmation mentioned in the Statute 29 Vic., c. 19, and the 31 and 32 Vic., c. 72,'—be expunged from the Journals of this House, as being subversive of the rights of the whole body of Electors of this Kingdom " said : I am sure that in every part of the House there will be one feeling of regret and of sympathy with respect to the unfortunate illness of the hon. junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), which disables him from moving the Resolution which stands in his name. In compliance with what I believe to be the wishes of the hon. Member on a subject that naturally lies near to his heart, I have taken upon myself to move that Resolution. In the few words which I propose to address to the House in explanation of the Motion, I trust that I may avoid a single word that would stir up bitter memories of past controversies, and I shall confine myself to stating briefly the facts on which the Motion is based. It will be in the recollection of those hon. Members who had seats in the House between the years 1880 and 1885 that a long series of painful controversies took place in regard to the position of the hon. Member for Northampton, and that on June 22, 1880, a Resolution was arrived at by the House declaring that the hon. Member should not be permitted to take the oath or make the affirmation required by statute. There were two views presented to the House at that time of the rights and duty of the House of Commons with respect to Members taking the oath or making the affirmation. On one side it was contended that the rights and duty of the House were of a purely ministerial character ; that its sole duty was to see that the forms prescribed by law were duly observed; that if any controversy were raised as to the legal effect of what was done in any particular case, that should properly be determined in the Courts of Law, where a legal remedy is provided if the oath is improperly taken; and that a long course of experience has shown that this House has seldom been happy when it has trespassed beyond the strict sphere of its legal duty. On the other hand, it was contended that the House had a right to interfere between a Member and his taking his seat. Whatever views may be entertained on that question, the fact remains that in 1886 and 1887, when the hon. Member for Northampton took the oath at the Table, the House abandoned the position it had formerly taken up and did not interfere with his taking the oath. And again, in 1888, mainly by the exertions of the hon. Member for Northampton himself, an Act was passed which for ever puts an end to the cause of the controversy which then existed. In these controversies there was not only a political, but a personal element. I remember the hon. Member for Northampton himself when he spoke at the Bar of the House referring to the language which had been showered upon him, and expressing himself thus:—"How unworthy I am that this controversy should have to be decided in my person." At that time the name of the hon. Member for Northampton was darkened by a great cloud of misconception. I believe it will be universally admitted that of those who from personal motives and considerations at that time were opposed to his admission to the House—sincerely and conscientiously opposed to it—there are now very few who by this time have not entirely changed their opinion. I think all will be agreed that the hon. Member for Northampton has displayed a most devoted attention to his public duties, unwearied industry, conscientiousness, and great ability, and I think I shall have the assent of Members in all parts of the House when I say that there is no Member who exhibits greater courtesy and fairness to his opponents than the hon. Member for Northampton. With regard to the form of the Motion, it has been framed upon the precedent in Wilkes's case. In that case the Motion that was adopted on May 3, 1782, was that a certain Resolution should be expunged from the Journals "as being subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors of this kingdom," so that the present Motion is framed strictly on precedent; but I believe I am expressing the views of the hon. Member for Northampton in saying that if there is any difficulty about accepting those words the hon. Member would be satisfied with a Motion rescinding the Resolution of 1880. I believe that I shall best consult the wishes of the House by now leaving in its hands the Motion which I beg to move.

Mr. Hunter

MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.) seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Resolution of this House of the 22nd day of June 1880, 'That having regard to the Reports and Proceedings of two Select Committees appointed by this House, Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to take the Oath or make the Affirmation mentioned in the Statute 29 Vic. c. 19, and the 31 and 32 Vic. c. 73,' be expunged from the Journals of this House, as being subversive of the rights of the body of Electors of this Kingdom."—(Mr. Hunter.)

(4.17.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): The hon. Member has moved the Resolution which he has proposed to the House with much moderation, recognising that it is a serious thing which he wishes the House to do—namely, to 'erase as far as may be from its records an incident which is undoubtedly of a very remarkable and very important character. The hon. Member has not gone into that discussion of precedents which took place when this matter was last debated in this House, in the earlier part of 1889. He may be sure that there is no one in this House who does not feel sympathy and regret as to the causes which prevent Mr. Bradlaugh himself from being in the House to argue his own case. But the suggestion which the hon. Member has made to the House, and which was made about two years ago and was then rejected, is a Resolution of a serious character, and should be justified—if it is justified at all—by reference to some considerations of public expediency or to some precedents in our Parliamentary history. In the Debate which took place two years ago several precedents were stated to have occurred for the erasure of a Resolution of this kind, but to-night the hon. Member has mentioned only the case of John Wilkes, who in 1769 was declared by a Resolution of this House incapable of sitting in Parliament, but who afterwards sat in Parliament from 1774 to 1782, and who then, after a series of almost annual Motions, succeeded in obtaining the consent of the House to the erasure of that Resolution. That certainly was an interesting and notable incident, but the House must remember what the circumstances were under which the Resolution of rescision was passed; that it had been moved year after year from 1774 to 1782, and in 1782 it was carried in the House of Commons in a very small House, in spite of the protest of Mr. Fox. It was carried by a House so small in its numbers as to make the question of the rescision of that Resolution one of very little importance indeed—[Opposition cries of "Oh!"]

—of very little importance indeed, because it had only been rescinded by the House when it was weary of the importunity of successive years, and in a House very much smaller than that in which the Resolution was originally carried. I am sure it will be conceded that the authority of a decision of the House of Commons depends very much upon the number of Members present in the House at the time when the decision is taken. If there had been a distinct controversy raised, and a Resolution passed in a large House with many Members in attendance, and it was afterwards rescinded in a very much smaller House than that in which it was passed and without so distinct a challenge having been raised, its rescision would be, I venture to say, of comparatively small importance. We are now asked, in a small House, to deal with a Resolution which, on the 22nd of June, 1880, was passed after a long and important discussion by a House consisting of over 500 Members. Supposing that the Resolution was not such as the House would now accept, is it according to the traditions of the House, and useful, that that Resolution should be expunged from the proceedings of the House? I venture to say that it is not. I venture to say that there is no precedent for it of any value at all, except the case of Wilkes, and in that case not only was the Motion passed under the circumstances to which I have referred, but the Resolution which it was sought to rescind declared that Wilkes was incapable of sitting in Parliament. But at the time when the Resolution was moved Wilkes was sitting in Parliament, and had been doing so for some years. Therefore it may have appeared to Members that an anomaly existed which they ought to correct, and that they should not leave on the records of the House a Resolution excluding a Member who in fact had been sitting in the House for many years. But these things being remembered in the case of Wilkes, I would ask the House what useful purpose would be gained by the excising of the Resolution passed in 1880? Nothing can do away with the fact that in 1880, after serious challenge and a substantial Debate, the House of Commons came to the Resolution now complained of. No number of Resolutions passed by this House now or hereafter can remove that fact from the Parliamentary history of the country. Whether it was right or wrong, it was a resolution taken and an act done by the House, and I confess that it seems to me childish to strike out from the records of the House an incident which must remain celebrated in the history of this House. But, secondly, supposing that it is desired to contradict the assertions of the Resolution, a more direct way would have been to submit to the House a Resolution raising the real question which was raised in 1880. If that were raised, I should be very glad indeed to meet such a Resolution, and to maintain that the original Resolution was right, and that the act of the House of Commons was not only within its legal and moral competency, but an act which the House was bound, in protection of its own dignity, to do. I would ask the House to note what the Resolution is that was passed in June, 1880, and which it is now sought in some way or another to get rid of. It says that Mr. Bradlaugh should neither be permitted to affirm nor to take oath, and the ground upon which it was arrived at is this:—A Committee of this House reported that Mr. Bradlaugh was not a person, who, as the law then stood, could be allowed to affirm. That was the first proposition, and that proposition was correct in point of law, and was afterwards upheld by the Court of Appeal of this country, which decided that Mr. Bradlaugh was not at the time of the passing of that Resolution a person who in law was entitled to affirm. The other portion of the Resolution forbade him to take the oath, and it was contended that the House of Commons knew, from Mr. Bradlaugh's own statement, that he was a person who in law was disqualified from taking the oath. On that contention the House acted, and on that contention it passed the Resolution. That contention was correct, because Mr. Bradlaugh came to the Table of the House and went through a form of taking the oath, and its validity was examined before a Court of law, and it was decided then that the House of Commons was right in its judgment of the 22nd of June, 1880, that Mr. Bradlaugh was not a person who could take the oath. Therefore both the propositions contained in the Resolution of the 22nd of June, 1880, were carefully examined and deliberately affirmed by the best judicial authority of the country. In these circumstances, what is the proposition that is now laid down? It must be admitted that at the time when the Resolution was passed, Mr. Bradlaugh could not take the oath according to law, and could not affirm according to law. What the House of Commons did on the 22nd of June, 1880, was to protect its own dignity and the regularity of its proceedings, by forbidding the performance before it of a ceremony which in law would neither be the valid taking of the oath nor the valid taking of an affirmation. Although it was contended at the time that he was entitled to take one of the two courses, that contention is no longer possible in the face of the decision given by the Courts of Law. In these circumstances, why is the House asked to rescind this Resolution? Is it because the Resolution is not in its substance and its foundation true? That cannot be, because its truth has been established in the Courts of Law. It must be on the ground that although circumstances then known to the House satisfied its judgment—and satisfied its judgment correctly—that neither process would be lawful, that though the House was right, it has no title to enforce the law in its own protection, even when fairly and rightly informed both of the law and the facts. I venture to say that that is not a proposition which can be substantially maintained before this House. I may remind the House that it was not upon extraneous information, upon rumour from outside, or upon evidence which the House was not entitled to regard, that it took this step in 1880. It was in a Debate started by the hon. Member for Northampton on behalf of his colleague, when he moved that Mr. Bradlaugh be allowed to make an affirmation. The only possible ground on which the hon. Member could claim to do so was that an oath was not binding on his conscience, and that very claim gave notice to the House that the hon. Member was not a person who could properly be allowed to go through the mere empty form and ceremony of taking the oath at the Table. The House of Commons had already been advised by its Committee that the hon. Member could not legally affirm, and how can it be suggested that the House of Commons was not entitled to protect its own proceedings? I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian proposes to support the Motion in Debate. If he does, I will remind him now of words used by him in Debate in 1880 in regard to the proposed erasure from the Journals of the House of the Resolution of 1769. The right hon. Member said—

Sir E. Clarke

“ Mr. Wilkes renewed his Motion from year to year for seven more years, and at last in 1782 he carried it. Not only that, but as a mark of ignominy he induced the House of Commons to expunge the proceedings taken against him from the Journals of the House. He then strengthened and deepened that mark of ignominy by appending to the Motion that the proceedings of the House were subversive of the rights of the body of electors in this country.”

If the right hon. Gentleman is going to support this Resolution in Debate, he will be asking the House of Commons to adopt a Resolution which will not only reverse the decision of 1880, but, as a mark of ignominy, he will be inducing the House of Commons to expunge these proceedings from the Journals of the House. Why is this ignominy to be brought on the Parliament of 1880? The Resolution complained of was not a sudden expression of the partisan feeling of a Party majority of the House. The right hon. Gentleman at that time was Prime Minister and Leader of the House. He had with him a very large majority in the House, and was at the head of one of the strongest Ministries of modern times, and yet, with all the influence that could be brought to bear upon his followers, and with the inspiration of one of the most remarkable speeches the right hon. Gentleman ever delivered in this House, he was defeated by a majority of 275 to 230, this being not at all an expression of Party antagonism, but the expression of a very much stronger and deeper feeling even in parts of the House where the right hon. Gentleman's authority and influence were well recognised—a feeling which induced the majority to refuse to allow proceedings to take place at the Table which they believed would be simply a mockery of legal forms. On that ground I submit to the House that there is no reason for passing the Resolution put forward. There is no doubt a difference of opinion on the point, but I believe absolutely and clearly that the House was within its rights in the proceedings it took; and although by the Act of 1888 the House has removed the difficulty and rendered intelligible the position of Members who desire to come to the House without feeling able to go through the form of taking the oath, yet I trust that if any similar circumstances should happen in the House, the House will have courage and resolution enough to protect itself by passing a similar Resolution. Since 1880 there has no doubt arisen a feeling of sympathy for the hon. Member for Northampton, and the hon. Member has more than once pleaded in the House as if this were a personal matter to him. That no doubt to some extent has moved and swayed the judgment of some hon. Members, but surely that is not a practical way of looking at the matter. The question whether or not this Resolution shall stand does not in the least concern the status in the House of the hon. Member. The Resolution was carried in 1880, but he has been sitting among us since 1885, and if he should come to take his seat in another Parliament the Act of 1888 has removed every difficulty from his way. There can be, then, no personal object in the matter, no such reason as was shown in the Wilkes case. Thus the erasure of the Resolution will answer no purpose, and while I contend that that Resolution was rightly come to, was justified by the facts and by the opinion of the House of Commons at that time, and was distinctly and unequivocally endorsed and upheld by the Courts of Law, I contend that it having been come to by the House of Commons, and also entered upon the Journals of the House, as a record of an interesting and important incident in Parliamentary history, it will answer no useful purpose, nor will it be in furtherance of any principle, or in relief of any individual from disqualification now, to remove it from the Journals of the House.

(4.40.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I am happy to think that in this Debate the speeches have been brief and the tone temperate. I shall endeavour to follow the example which has been so well set by my hon. Friend and the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, and make no long demand upon the time of the House. In point of fact, I think that while length of speaking may sometimes be warrantable in the view of zealous advocates, for the purpose of covering a case which is felt to be weak, we who support the Motion of my hon. Friend have such confidence in the strength and in the simplicity of our case that it would be quite unwarrantable if we were to lead the House into lengthened disquisition. I cannot help saying, after having heard the speech of the Solicitor General—of whose acuteness we are all perfectly well aware—I cannot help intimating a suspicion that the Solicitor General himself has spoken with a feeling of some discomfort, mistrust, and misgiving, as to the nature of the arguments he was using, which I admit he may have been so far justified in using, that there were no better ones that could have been brought forward. But the hon. and learned Gentleman must not suppose that this is a gratuitous flourish or endeavour to inflict pain or slight or disparagement upon anyone by passing a Motion which he began by saying was totally unnecessary. I will endeavour to give the hon. and learned Gentleman the reasons. The proceedings of this House, speaking generally, are precedents for the future conduct of the House. Whatever proceeding stands uncorrected is a precedent pro tanto, and is presumptively entitled to some degree of weight and authority, or at any rate we are entitled to suppose, if it remains, and remains unattacked, that it does not contain within it the elements of a vicious principle. We believe that the proceeding in question is one that cannot be defended, and that it was fraught with one of the most mischievous and dangerous of all principles—namely, excess of jurisdiction. We believe that that constitutes the strongest reason for removing it. I say, Sir, that excess of jurisdiction is a matter which is usually subject to appeal. Even if it is not subject to appeal, it is limited to a particular case. It is sure to be noted, and it is most unlikely to recur. But in an assembly possessed of the almost immeasurable powers that belong to this House, and in an assembly with regard to which appeal against its proceedings is a thing totally unknown—for no power on earth can interfere with them so far as regards its control over its own Members—excess of jurisdiction is the greatest fault the House can possibly commit, however honest or conscientious it may be; and to leave on our records, with a presumptive authority, a case of manifest excess of jurisdiction is to leave upon our records the seeds of future mischief to be appealed to and turned to evil account in evil times. I think that is a pretty strong reason for our proceeding in this case. The hon. and learned Gentleman relies a good deal upon the Judgments of the Courts of Law. Sir, the Judgments of the Courts of Law do not touch the point. They do not notice the excess of jurisdiction on the part of the House. If the question had been raised before the Courts of Law whether the House had acted within its right, and the Courts of Law had then affirmed that the House had acted within its right, then I could understand the appeal of the hon. and learned Gentleman. But no such question could be raised before the Courts of Law. I might be considered guilty of a criminal offence—it is unlikely, but I can conceive of such a case—I or any Member of this House might be considered guilty of some criminal offence, and that criminal offence might be practically within the knowledge of those who hear me. That would not justify the House in passing judgment and condemnation upon me. It is one of the highest duties of this House to limit its own functions and jurisdiction, and I cannot therefore agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman in considering this Motion as being without any substantial meaning and purpose, for the object which I have endeavoured imperfectly to describe is one of high and serious order. The hon. and learned Gentleman says this is only a small House, and that only a few Members are present compared with the numbers who passed these Resolutions. But is that a just criterion? This House may now be smaller than it otherwise would be, on account of the reluctance of some hon. Members to take that part in this discussion which their Party allegiance might seem to entail on them in regard to the Motion of my hon. Friend. That may account for the partial reduction in the attendance this evening, and for the comparative smallness of the number of Members present; but the true answer is that the smallness of the House is not the test. I remember a good case in point. For three months in 1851 we were engaged in a desperate battle over the Ecclesiastical Tithes Bill, and it was discussed in large Houses of 300, 400, and 500 Members. I should like to know how many Members were in the House when that measure was repealed. It was not a case so grave as this, for it was a matter of policy, while this is a case of jurisdiction. But it was a case in which everyone felt that a great and grievous error had been made, yet I should not be surprised to find that the Act was repealed in a House of less than 100 Members. The hon. and learned Member says that the rescinding of the Resolution in the case of Wilkes was not entitled to much authority, because it was carried in a small House. I presume there was a small House, because there was a general concurrence in what was being done. If it was a small House owing to surprise that would be a different matter; but there could be no surprise in the case, for, as the hon. and learned Gentleman has stated, the Motion had been made year by year and Session after Session, and its Sessional revival was a notice to all who cared to be present at the discussion. The hon. and learned Gentleman went on to admit, however, that in the case of Wilkes there was some reason for a proceeding of that kind, because it was felt to be a Parliamentary anomaly that there should be sitting in the House of Commons in his corporeal form a gentleman with regard to whom there was, on the Journals of the House, a Resolution declaring him incapable of so sitting. But does not the hon. and learned Gentleman see that that exactly applies to the present case? Yes, precisely. If that was a matter of consideration in the case of Wilkes it must also be so in the present case. I will only mention another point in regard to which I feel the House will do well to correct the error into which it fell on a former occasion. I myself was one of the minority, but I was a Member of the House, and am concerned in the honour of that past House and of every House in which I have had the privilege of having sat, and I am therefore anxious that we should clear ourselves as well as the rest of the House from the discredit of an act which involved serious error. What I feel—what is felt on this side of the House, and what I think must on reflection be felt on the other side of the House also—is this: The strength of the case against Mr. Bradlaugh depended upon the words drawn by us from his own mouth. We sent him before a Committee. Before that Committee Mr. Bradlaugh, with an ingenuousness which does him honour, but with a simplicity which a practised man of the world would have qualified on such an occasion, made statements which caused us to become seised of the state of his mind in regard to questions of religious belief, and it was by our own act and by the pressure put by us on him that we drew from him statements on which our subsequent proceedings were based. I do not think that was a generous proceeding. However viewed then, viewed calmly now in the light of the golden distance, we must feel that that was a proceeding open to correction. Now, with regard to the form of this Motion, the hon. and learned Gentleman has quoted from a speech of mine in reference to the similar Motion in Wilkes's case. I pointed out that Mr. Wilkes's Motion not only relieved him from all difficulty and cleared up finally and completely the case in which he was concerned, but it carried a sting in it and recorded a distinct reproach against the House of Commons by describing the proceedings which it was supposed to rescind, "as being subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors of this kingdom." Those words are repeated in the Resolution of my hon. Friend now before the House. I confess I should be glad if we could arrive at some pacific solution of this question, and I venture to suggest we should do no harm by consenting to the omission of these words. Our object is to remove these records from the Journals of the House, which, so long as they remain there, give them some kind of title of authority as precedents. Our object is a wholly practical one. I think if we attain this object the hon. Member for Northampton may feel we do him no injustice in consenting to abandon the attempt to place on the Journals of the House words which convey a reproach on a former House which is totally unnecessary. If we are able to dispense with the closing words of my hon. Friend's Resolution, which I understand he is willing to do, I would commend this Motion to the House as one that is called for by the circumstances of the case, and one which may save its successors from the danger of committing the most dangerous error—the error, namely, of exceeding the limits of its own jurisdiction.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

*(457.) SIR STAFFORD NORTH-COTE (Exeter): As the House is aware, I may claim some hereditary interest in this matter, and I should like therefore to say one or two words, such as I believe Lord Iddesleigh would have used had he been with us. As a private Conservative Member I should like to remark that all who heard the speaker, the introducer of the Motion, must be prepared to acknowledge the admirable tone and temper with which the question has been brought forward. All on this side of the House will be perfectly prepared also to recognise fully the good service which the junior Member for Northampton has rendered in the House, and to unite in expressing deep regret at his serious illness. Having said this I may venture to suggest to the First Lord of the Treasury that the compromise which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has recommended be accepted at once and with unanimity. By the adoption of this course the wish of the hon. Member for Northampton, which has been referred to, to the effect that no pain might be given to Members on this side of the House; will be gratified. As the Motion stands at present it would be impossible for us on this side of the House to accept it, for we cannot admit that the action of the former Parliament was illegal. But as the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has expressed his opinion that the insertion of the words to which exception is taken is not obligatory, so far as I am concerned, I shall be glad if the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House can see his way to adopt the amended Resolution.

(5.0.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I do not wish to prolong the Debate. I think for many reasons it would be undesirable to do so. Speaking in a sense as the personal representative of Mr. Bradlaugh, I may say that he will consent willingly to these words being withdrawn. If the Resolution be passed without them, my hon. Friend will regard the matter as entirely settled; and when my hon. Friend returns amongst us, as we all hope he will soon, he will in no sort of way raise the question again.

* (5.1.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I feel that after the admirable appeal of my hon. Friend from behind me, and after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, it is only right that I should intervene now and state the course which the Government propose to take. I must express for myself, and, I am sure, for all my hon. Friends on this side of the House, the great regret we feel at the illness of the hon. Member for Northampton. As the hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen has remarked, the Member for Northampton is undoubtedly a warm partisan. He takes a strong view on all points on which he thinks it right to give expression to his views in this House; but he has been undoubtedly a valuable addition to this House, not only from the freedom and independence with which he has expressed his views, but from the manner in which he has conducted himself in this House. We have now to consider his Motion in his absence. He would, no doubt, have preferred to make a statement in the House on the subject himself, ably and temperately as it has been done by the hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen. There are a few observations which I wish to make. While acknowledging the moderate tone and temperate spirit which have characterised the debate on this question, I wish to take exception, so far as the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian is concerned, to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman in which he urged us to expunge the Resolution of 1880 from the Journals of the House, on the ground that all the proceedings of the House are precedents, and are binding on the House in future. Undoubtedly the proceedings of the House are valuable precedents for the guidance of the House in its business. They are precedents, and ought to be precedents, unless the law is altered in respect to that which was entered on the Journals. The law has been altered in the case of the oath. It was altered by the Act of 1888, and the proceedings of the House in 1880 can therefore form no precedent whatever. Therefore I should contend—and I hope I am not introducing contentious matter into this Debate—that the House in 1880 did not exceed its jurisdiction. It has been shown distinctly, and conclusively, that the House acted according to the best interpretation that it had of the law of the land, and of Parliament at that time. The evidence on which that action was grounded was the statement of the Member for Northampton himself, as to his own views made before the Committee. The House acted upon that information, which shows conclusively that in so acting it was not acting without knowledge, and it so acted to give effect to what was the law of the land at the time. If the hon. Member had refused to answer the questions put to him, he would no doubt have been within his right in doing so, but in giving his answers he acted in a consistent, straightforward and manly manner. I am quite sure the hon. Member for Northampton would be the last person in the world to complain of the consequences of his own acts, or that his words formed the ground upon which action was based. I have considered very carefully the suggestion which has been made by the hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen, and supported by my hon. Friend behind (Sir S. Northcote). We remain of the opinion expressed in the Resolution of 1880. We believe that the House at that time did its duty—the majority of the House, which consisted not only of Conservatives, but a large contingent of Liberals. But, Sir, the circumstances are entirely changed. There is no longer any necessity for maintaining on the Journals of the House this Resolution, and in all the circumstances in which we find ourselves, and bearing in mind the fact that Mr. Bradlaugh has been a useful Member of this House during the last six or seven years, I, for one, shall not resist the Motion, which the hon. and learned Gentleman has made, upon the understanding that the last words impugning the authority and control of the House are struck out. I could not under any circumstances, consent to say that the House in 1880 exceeded its duty—that it did anything contrary to the law of Parliament, or anything in derogation of the rights and privileges of the people. But if it is merely the desire that the Resolution of 1880 should be erased from the records, I shall offer no opposition.

Sir Stafford Northcote

(5.8.) MR. HUNTER: I believe I shall be acting in accordance with the wish of the hon. Member for Northampton, and as he would act if he were here, in accepting the suggestion which my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) has made, but I think it right to point out to the House that these concluding words were inserted in the Resolution, I imagine, rather from a strict fidelity to the precedent my hon. Friend (Mr. Bradlaugh) was copying, than with the intention of making any suggestion derogatory to the House. Therefore I will move the Resolution, omitting the words “as being subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors of this kingdom.”

*(5.9.) MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): In the painful circumstances, I am most unwilling to prolong the Debate; but I think that no conclusive argument or justification has been brought forward for expunging the Resolution from the Journals of the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian stated more than once that he thought the House in 1880 committed an excess of its jurisdiction, but I may remind hon. Members that at that period the right hon. Gentleman was himself responsible for the proceedings in this House; he was then omnipotent, with a large majority at his back. I can only endorse the words of the Solicitor General, and it has been plainly proved that no useful purpose can be served by removing the Resolution from the Records. I will not put the House to the trouble of a Division; but I wish, on the part of myself and many Friends around me, to point out to our Front Bench that we are not entirely unanimous, and to make a personal protest.

(5.10.) MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): I beg, consistently with the action I have taken on former occasions, to enter my personal protest against the course which has been adopted in making the compromise. It may be a matter of small consequence whether the Resolution is expunged or not from some points of view, but I think that if such a step is taken it will tend to lower the status and dignity of the House of Commons. I have expressed the opinion before, that a national assembly which legalises atheism and whitewashes treason cannot long withstand the waves of anarchy which threaten to overwhelm all civilised countries. I may be wrong in my view, but I avail myself of my privilege and make my protest. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian may now contend that the Government recognise the force of his arguments, and that is a position which he is clearly entitled to take up. The Government have consented to expunge this Motion from the Journals of the House. I foresee the day, not long hence, when an effort will be made, and successfully made, to expunge the Report of the Parnell Commission as being an excess of jurisdiction. The Leader of the House at that time will say to the mover of the Resolution, “I deny your arguments, but you shall have your way.” If we cast our eyes back to the History of the English Parliament, I, as a royalist, maintain that this House was guilty of exceeding its jurisdiction when it condemned King Charles I., but I have never heard that at the Restoration it was proposed to expunge the record of that event. I can only express my deep regret at the illness of Mr. Bradlaugh. I never opposed his action from any personal or private motives. It always appeared to me to be simply a matter of principle, and if, on former occasions, I opposed the abolition of the oath, I did so in the belief that the abolition of the oath entailed the abolition of the decalogue. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen may laugh, but I maintain in strict logic if the decalogue has no higher sanction than the dictum of Moses, then it has no binding force upon us, but recent events prove to us that the decalogue is as sacred to those who sit opposite as it is to those who sit around me. I can only express my deep regret that Her Majesty's Government have retired from the position which I thought they would always maintain when I first sought the honour of representing a constituency of my native county as a Member of the Tory Party.

*(5.15.) SIR W. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North West): I regret extremely that we are not unanimous on this question. I had hoped that we should not have a dissentient voice from the offer of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, which has been accepted by the leader of the House. The Tory Party feel that they were right in the course they took in 1880; but things have altered since then. The Act of 1888 has made a great difference. The conduct and the character of Mr. Bradlaugh since he has been in the House have been such that, whatever our political opinions may be, we cannot help admiring the straightforwardness of that hon. Member in the discharge of his duties as a Member. A generous feeling has prevailed towards Mr. Bradlaugh, and I hope it will continue to prevail when the House learns the circumstances in which that hon. Member is now placed. God grant that the junior Member for Northampton may recover; but whatever happens, hon. Members will feel that, by accepting this Motion, they have done a generous act to a man who has endeavoured to do his duty.

*(5.18.) MR. SPEAKER: The Motion must be withdrawn so as to be brought up in an amended form.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. de Lisle

Motion made, and Question,

"That the Resolution of this House of the 22nd day of June, 1880—'That, having regard for the Reports and proceedings of two Select Committees appointed by this House, Mr. Bradlaugh be not permitted to take the Oath or make the Affirmation mentioned in the statute 29 Vic., c. 19, and the 31 and 32 Vic., c. 72,'—be expunged from the Journals of this House, —put, and agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILWAYS.

(5.20.) MR. LENG (Dundee): Rose to move a Resolution standing in his name on the Paper.

*(5.20.) MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member proposes "To call attention to the Return presented to both Houses of Parliament in pursuance of section 4 of The Regulation of Railways Act, 1889; and to move for leave to bring in a Bill to limit the hours of labour of Railway Servants, and to confer certain powers on the Board of Trade."

I am afraid that in the face of the decision of the House on Friday, it will be impossible for him to make that Motion. Further steps would first have to be taken to rescind the Resolution of Friday, which affirm that no Bill ought to be brought in giving powers to the Board of Trade. The hon. Member's Resolution would, therefore, be out of Order.

SECRETARY FOR MINES.

*(5.22.) MR. W. P. MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I rise to move—

"That in the opinion of this House it is desirable to create a Department to have the control and supervision of the mining industries of the country, to be controlled by a Minister of the Crown, such Minister to be called the Secretary for Mines."

It is the first time that a Motion of this character has been brought before the House, but we have a precedent for the creation of new Ministers in the appointment of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture. We have also the example set us by all our Colonies, who have Ministers of Mines to whom appeal can be made in matters affecting the mining industry. It should be borne in mind that the total output of the mineral wealth of the Australian Colonies is £26,000,000, while the average of the United Kingdom varies from £75,000,000 to £80,000,000 per annum. I submit that this fact shows the necessity for the creation of a new office, which can easily be controlled by a Minister like the present Minister of Agriculture. For such an important industry as that of mining it is essential, to my mind, that there should be some Minister in the House to whom appeals can be made with reference to it. We know that when questions arise in this House affecting the industry of mining, the Home Secretary has to reply in his place. We know that the mining industry is suffering, particularly in Wales, because there are an insufficient number of inspectors of collieries, and we know well that whenever a catastrophe happens, then, and then only, are these matters taken notice of. The mine proprietors are quite able to take care of themselves, but it is the bounden duty of the State to see that life and limb are properly protected in the carrying on this great and important industry. I will not detain the House at any length on this matter, but I must say it does seem to those who are connected with the industry to be an extraordinary thing that in this House there is the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer looking after the interests of the Mining Department in one respect, and the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary looking after it in another respect. If any one refers to either of these Ministers he is usually sent first from one to the other, and finally to some Department where very little is known of the subject which is being administered. I am anxious, on the other hand, to concentrate all the business connected with the mining industry under one head, so that hon. Members may have some one to whom they can appeal, not only with respect to the condition of the industry itself, but as to the risk to life and limb which those engaged in it are continually incurring. We know that when an accident occurs at a colliery an inquiry is held. As the matter stands at present responsibility cannot rest upon the shoulders of the Home Secretary; but if there were a Minister of Mines in the House, we should be able to appeal to him, and he would be responsible not only to this House but to the country. The Home Secretary has other onerous and important duties to perform, irrespective of taking charge of the mining industry. The Chancellor of the Exchequer also has important duties to perform, and cannot devote his time to the matter. I bring forward this Motion in the hope that the Government will favourably consider it. It is no party question, but one which may have an important bearing upon the development of the mineral wealth of the country. If we had some one to whom we could appeal when we got into disputes, it would be greatly to the interest of the industry. We have a Commission now sitting to inquire into the question of mining royalties, which Commission is doing important work. Shortly it will present its report, but there will be no one on the Ministerial Bench in a position to speak for the Government on the question of mining royalties generally. I have no desire to thresh out the question now, but, having had this opportunity of dealing with it for a few moments, I trust the House will receive the Motion in the spirit in which I tender it—with a desire to do all that can be done to develop the mineral resources of the country.

(5.30.) MR. PICKARD (York, W.R.

Normanton): I beg to second the Motion.

It is well known that the Home Office is overburdened with work, such as that which is connected with a magistracy and other matters, and the consequence has been that it has not been able to pay that amount of attention to the interests of the great mining industry which that industry deserves and ought to receive. I do not intend to say anything against the manner in which the Home Secretary has discharged his functions in regard to the mining interests, because, as I have already said, I believe the Home Secretary has quite sufficient to do in regard to the other matters I have mentioned. We know from long experience that when accidents do occur in connection with mines, it takes the Home Office a long time to analyse the facts. The Home Secretary has to receive information from the various persons engaged in investigating the circumstances, including the Coroner, and the Inspectors of Mines, and this information he must necessarily have sufficient time to consider in order that he may be in a position to determine what course he ought to pursue. We also know that it often happens that in cases where prosecutions may have been expected there are no prosecutions at all. When we remember that there are now between 3,000 and 4,000 large mines in the country, with all the ramifications which make them so different from what mines were some years ago, it is only reasonable to suppose that it has become necessary that some one person shall be responsible and be at the head of some department which shall have these matters under its particular supervision, and have the means of understanding exactly the real position of affairs. When we remember that the Home Secretary has not only to receive all the Reports sent to him of Coroner's inquests, together with the results of investigations made by the Inspectors of Mines, but is also called upon to answer whatever questions may be put to him from time to time in this House, it must be clear to those who consider the subject that the person who has to deal with all these important matters should occupy some position in connection with the Government, which should be not only that of a Secretary of State, but should also be accompanied by a seat in the Cabinet. Considering this matter as I have done from time to time, I have come to the conclusion that the Home Secretary, as far as he is personally concerned, would be thankful to be relieved from that portion of his duties which relate to mines. I have no doubt that were he now in his place the Home Secretary would tell us that he would like to be relieved from this portion of the work he has to do, and that he would be glad if he could see his way to the adoption of a Resolution like this, which, if carried, I have no doubt will be productive of a great deal of good not only in relation to the saving of life, but also in regard to the development of the great mining industry. I have no desire further to protract this Debate, and, therefore, will at once conclude by seconding this Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable to create a Department to have the control and supervision of the Mining Industries of the Country, to be controlled by a Minister of the Crown, such Minister to be called the Secretary for Mines."—(Mr. Pritchard Morgan.)

Mr. Pickard

*(5.37.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. C. STUART WORTLEY, Hallam, Sheffield): There are here two principal questions to which I think the House ought to pay attention. The first is whether the mining industry is in such a position of pre-eminence and superior magnitude in comparison with all others that it is desirable it should have special administrative treatment; and the second is whether, assuming that it occupies such a pre-eminent position, it is desirable that the State should undertake the functions foreshadowed in the speech of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil. I should be the last to dispute the great importance of the mining industry, both with regard to the magnitude of the wealth which it adds to our national resources and the greatness of the risks to the property invested in it, and, what is of even more importance, the risk to the lives of those who are engaged in its prosecution. These are matters which must in any case occupy a very large place in the view of Parliament. But when the hon. Member goes further and proposes that the mining industry should be treated exceptionally in comparison with other industries and should have a particular Minister to itself, he is making a proposal which proceeds on a fallacious view of the right functions of the Government in this country. It is quite true that there is already a very important connection between Parliament and the mining industry. The mining industry is one of the regulated industries of the country—regulated by minute rules laid down in Statutes to which Parliament has given much labour and attention, and by those regulations and restrictions important additions have been made, not only to the Criminal Law, but also to that part of the law which, though properly described as not criminal, yet involves penalties for its infraction. Now the enforcement of this law is a very important function, because it is one which concerns the safety of the lives of large numbers of miners no less than with the question of property. For the discharge of the functions connected with these matters there is already a Department fully equal to the task imposed upon it. But that is not all. The State is not merely charged with the duty of laying down regulations in the interests of the miners with regard to life, but in another capacity it may be the owner of the soil under which the mine was driven, or, in virtue of its sovereignty, may be entitled to a reversionary right in regard to royalties and other dues. The uniting in one Minister of the functions arising from those different relations would be neither logical nor necessarily advantageous. But it is not alone in the case of mines in which various interests have to be dealt with that State regulation is required. Factories are, perhaps, even more minutely regulated than mines, but I do not suppose that the hon. Gentleman would say on that account that a special Minister should have charge of factories. To justify a Motion of this kind there must be reason for complaint with regard to such action as the State has undertaken. I will say, in the absence of the Home Secretary, that my right hon. Friend has been careful, both with respect to the enforcement of the existing law and to its improvement; and, not merely has he shown great interest and acuteness in devising improvements in the law, but it may be contended with justice that he is in advance of public opinion, and of the opinion of those who are specially skilled in this matter, and in support of that contention I may appeal to the fact that my right hon. Friend has announced his intention to institute a new inquiry as to the special properties of accumulations of coal dust in mines, with a view to diminishing the number of explosions. The hon. Gentlemen who have moved and seconded the Motion may think that certain delays have interfered with the enforcement of the law. The expiry of the three months limit for prosecutions has possibly caused defeats of justice. But that has been because the pendency of an inquest has rendered inevitable a delay in deciding. When inquests have to be resorted to, an elaborate review of the facts is necessary, and until that inquiry is concluded no Department could say that we are in a position to judge whether a prosecution is likely to succeed in the particular case. In a former Debate on the subject of the inspection of mines, my right hon. Friend admitted that the period of three months, which has to elapse before he is in a position to decide whether to prosecute, is too short. I venture to submit that the case of the hon. Member who says the Home Office Department which has charge of mining affairs is overworked, and is therefore incapable of properly dealing with these matters, has not been substantiated. The hon. Member who seconded the Motion complained that where accidents take place in mines there is no Minister who is responsible. I would ask the hon. Member does he seriously mean that any Minister should be put in a position involving administrative responsibility for the occurrence of all accidents in mines?

MR. PICKARD: I said there should be some one responsible for legislative action in this House, not administrative action.

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: So there is. We have at present a Minister who is responsible for most of the legislation introduced into this House, but it is clear that nobody but the House itself can be responsible for the legislation it sanctions. I submit that the speeches which have been delivered interpreting the Motion show that the duty which it is sought to impose upon the State is far in excess of the duties which the State should undertake.

(5.45.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Sir, I should like to say a few words before the subject is allowed to drop. The hon. Gentleman, in his concluding remarks, seemed to suggest that my hon. Friends were going beyond precedent in asking for the appointment of a Minister of Mines, and that there was no other industry in this country which claimed or received such special attention. I would remind the hon. Gentleman that we are simply following the precedent formed by the appointment of a Minister of Agriculture. If the industry of agriculture is deserving of such special recognition, the mining industry is entitled to even more recognition by reason of its importance to every other industry in the country. Hardly any industry, no matter what its character, can proceed without there has first been recourse to the bowels of the earth for various minerals, notably coal to generate motive power. I do not think it needs a single additional word to establish the mining industry. Then comes the question, does it need the control and support of a Minister of Mines. The hon. Gentleman who has replied for the Government has taken an exceedingly narrow point of view. He seems to be unable to carry his view further than the question of the regulation of mines for the prevention of accident. But collieries do not solely constitute the mining industry of this country. I am connected with tin mining in Cornwall; and while we are dependent on coal for the prosecution of tin mining, the latter industry is none the less one of great importance. In other districts of the country, various other minerals are extensively mined. While I recognise the first importance of protecting women and children from excessive hours and excessive labour, and the men from the dangers of their calling, still what we want to see besides is a development of our mines. We want a special Department of the Government for the purpose of looking after the mining industry, which has been, I will not say throttled, but hampered, through the control exercised by private individuals. In other countries there are mining Departments, and mining Ministers, and those countries are immensely benefited. We believe that a similar institution in this country would be attended with great and beneficial results to the mining industry. It would bring about a further development of mining enterprise, while at the same time providing for careful attention to the safety of those employed. We ask for the creation of a Government Department which will control the hampering influences of landlords, who are the absolute monopolists of our soil and all our mineral wealth, and for the purpose of giving our mines such fairplay as will tend to the enormous development of our mineral interests. In Cornwall mine after mine, which when in full operation employed 10,000 men, has been closed, until there are now only two at work. That condition of things is owing to the harsh and restrictive conditions imposed by the ground landlords, which make it impossible for outside capitalists to bring in their capital and develop the mining industry. There is any amount of mineral wealth in that part of the country undeveloped, and only awaiting proper appliances and inducements. The immunity from control enjoyed by the landlords, especially in regard to royalties, and the many restrictions which they can impose, have led to the deterioration of our mining industry, and we think that a Minister of Mines would be useful in checking these adverse influences and in relieving the mining industry from those harassing conditions which at present do anything but induce capital to come to its assistance. I think the idea of a Minister of Mines is a step in the right direction, but I should look upon it only as one step. I also attach importance to the suggestion of having Mining Courts, and I am hopeful that we shall see them some day, whether in conjunction with a Minister of Mines or not. It seems to me that the precedent of a Minister of Agriculture forms a strong argument in favour of the Government introducing a Bill for the appointment of a Minister of Mines. In our Colonies such a system exists, and it is attended with beneficial results. In all the great mining countries of the world, Mexico, South Africa, South America, and on the Continent, you will find that Government control is exercised for the purpose of giving fair play and free scope to mining enterprise. I should like to call attention to a passage in the Report of Dr. E. Foster, who succeeded Mr. Harrington Smyth at the School of Science. In his Report, published in the year 1887, on the mining industries of our Colonies, on page 23, he says:—

Mr. Conybeare

“It is not generally known in England that the Government of Victoria, like that of some of the sister Colonies, spends several thousand pounds every year in prospecting with diamond drills, and in subsidising Companies or individuals using them. Cores from 1 inch to 3½ inches in diameter were shown by the Mines Department. They had been drawn up when prospecting for quartz reefs, for deep all vial ‘leads’ hidden under basaltic lava flows, or for coal seams in the mesozoic strata. Some of these boreholes have been the means of discovering gold. The Report of the Secretary for Mines on ‘Diamond Drills in Victoria,’ describes the work done up to the end of 1884, and explains many useful improvements upon the original drills imported from the United States.”

I have here a communication from Dr. Foster, giving me details—with which I will not trouble the House—regarding experiments which have taken place during the last year or two. Now, if we had a mining bureau we could follow the example thus set by our Colonies, and stimulate to an enormous extent the development of our mining industry. It is well known that there are enormous districts in this country in which some mining operations have been carried out, but which contain latent resources only awaiting enterprise for development, and which should be fostered here, as they have been in our Colonies. Let me refer to the action which the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Pritchard Morgan) with great public spirit has taken up in the interest of the mining industry, and those who have spent their capital in developing the gold-mining industry of Wales, an action in which he unfortunately has not met with great success in the Law Courts. Questions affecting Crown rights are involved in this litigation. I am not going to question the legal decisions, all I will say is it is very hard that a private individual who has done his best to develop this gold mining industry should be mulcted in an enormous sum for the purpose of deciding these questions. The hon. Member for Merthyr made no personal allusions, but we who stand outside may point out that this offers a strong argument why we should have a Minister of Mines, for with such a Minister and his Department, great questions of public rights such as these would be taken up and settled in a scientific manner without discouraging persons who do their best to develop the resources of the country, putting them to enormous expense and anxiety in fighting these questions in the Law Courts. It should also be mentioned that the geological survey of the country is by no means in the condition it ought to be, and if we had such a Minister, a great stimulus would be given to that branch of science, to the improvement of the trade and industry of the country. In previous Sessions I have drawn attention to the magnificent series of geological maps provided by the Government of the United States of their territory, far superior to anything I have discovered in any museum or library in this country. We want these things attended to, as at present they are not. At the present time the Department of the Home Office is crowded with an enormous amount of detail with which the Home Secretary and his subordinates have to deal. I am not for a moment complaining of the Home Secretary or his Department. I can only say that it appears to me altogether impossible that any single human being can properly look after all the interests which are heaped upon the Home Secretary, and I think I may say that almost every other kind of business the Home Department has to do has priority of urgency of attention before the mining industry of the country, I mean in the particular direction I am alluding to. I am not referring to the mere question of the administration of Acts passed at different times for the protection of life in coal and other mines. I think it must be admitted we have made out a good case for the assistance we conceive might advantageously be extended to this important industry, and we have indicated instructive precedents. We have raised a question that must be solved one of these days, and if we do not get what we want from the present Government, then we shall from their successors.

(6.7) MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): I simply wish to express my approval of the Motion for the creation of a separate Department of State and a Minister in touch with the important mining interests in the country. It is a justifiable step, and I might even say an imperative necessity. It would soon be justified by the great increase and rapid development of the mining industry throughout the country. The Motion should command the support of both Parties in the House. The Home Secretary has deservedly won the regard of the mining interest and those who represent it in this House; but however desirous he may be to promote mining questions, it is impossible for him to do so with much advantage so long as he has so many subjects demanding his attention.

*(6.9) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): Inasmuch as I represent a constituency composed almost entirely of miners, it is right I should say a word in support of the Motion. The mineral wealth of this country is such that it should have a separate Department to look after this interest. An objection was raised by the hon. Gentleman who spoke for the Government that this would increase the cost of administration, but the wealth and importance of the industry is such that it might well bear the expenditure required for a Department to look after its interests. The mineral wealth of this country amounts to about £80,000,000 a year. The Home Secretary has multifarious duties to perform, and though I am bound to say there is considerable satisfaction with the readiness with which the Home Secretary listens to our complaints or demands, yet there is some dissatisfaction on account of the delay in the attention given to mining matters at the Home Office. There is a subject I brought before the House on another occasion, but which is germane to the question now before us. If we had a Minister of Mines we should not have more delay in the appointment of sub-inspectors of mines, a delay which is fraught with danger to the lives of miners. I think there was a promise last Session that the Home Secretary would look into the matter, but we can quite believe that, occupied as the right hon. Gentleman is with many affairs, he has not been able to give the necessary attention to, and bring his mind to a conclusion on the matter. But I do not think that if we had a Minister of Mines there would be any more delay. It is an imperative necessity, and must take place before long, and for this reason, among many others, I support the Motion.

(6.10.) MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.): The recent appointment of a Minister of Agriculture strengthens, I think, our claim for the appointment of a Minister of Mining. The conditions of mining are much more hazardous than the conditions of agriculture, and the reasons are much more urgent for supervision and control. There is a general feeling among those engaged in the mining industry that the Home Secretary is too far removed from them and their interests, and all his information filters through inspectors. I do not say that this is justifiable, but I know I speak the view of miners that the Secretary for the Home Department is not sufficiently near them and sufficiently interested in their pursuits that they have confidence that their interests are properly safeguarded. Equally I think I speak the view of miners when I say that their wants and interests have never been more regarded by any Home Secretary than by the right hon. Gentleman who now fills that office. He has shown an amount of sympathy and intimacy with the wants and work of miners I very gladly recognise. Yet it must be admitted that the duties of the Home Secretary are too much dispersed over many interests to hope that the mining industry can receive that attention which is required.

Mr. S. T. Evans

*(6.12.) MR. BURT (Morpeth): I can testify to the fact that there is a very strong feeling among miners in favour of the appointment of a Minister of Mines. Again and again that feeling has found expression in Resolutions passed at conferences and in deputations to successive Home Secretaries. The belief which I think rests on a solid foundation is that the Home Secretary is so over-burdened with work that it is impossible for him to give the time necessary to many important matters connected with the mining industry. In saying this I find no fault with the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the present Home Secretary has discharged those duties in connection with mining which are entrusted to him under various Acts. I must express my dissent from one remark that fell from my hon. Friend who introduced this Motion, that it would be an advantage to transfer the control of mines to the Minister of Agriculture. I do not think that would be any improvement, but quite the reverse. As regards the number of men employed, the risks attending the prosecution of the industry, the amount of capital invested, the influence upon other trades, the industry is of such transcendent importance that there ought to be a Minister to devote his time and attention almost exclusively to this one thing.

*(6.15.) COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): I am opposed to the multiplying of Ministers, but it would perhaps be convenient that the Permanent Under Secretary at the Home Office should be understood to be the official at the Home Office at the head of all matters affecting mining interests. But the Government would do well to wait for the Report of the now sitting Commission before making any change in present arrangements. It may be found desirable to establish Mining Courts to decide certain points, but a decision now would, I think, be premature. It would be well to wait until the Report of the Commission is in our hands.

(6.17.) MR. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): I am very glad to hear a Gentleman from the front bench admitting the importance of the coal industry, though he did not allow that pre-eminence we claim for it. It is, perhaps, natural that practical colliers should think there is no industry in the country more important than coal mining. No other industry can claim to be so essential to the success of all other undertakings. At all events, we, more than other persons, feel the necessity of having in the House a Minister to whom we can appeal for immediate assistance in all matters affecting safety to life and limb in the working of mines. We know the importance to miners of having an authority of this kind. I gladly recognise the spirit in which our claims have at various times been met on either side of the House, for this is no Party question; it is a question vital to life and limb. The exhaustion of physical power and nervous energy is such a danger in mines that there ought to be certain limits laid down beyond which miners should not be permitted to go to the danger of the lives of themselves and of their fellow-workmen. There is danger in a man working an unlimited number of hours. If we had a Minister to whom we could directly apply, before whom we could bring evidence, to whom we could make representations, I say, with all respect to the gentlemen now in the Home Department, we feel that the wants and wishes of our many thousand workmen underground would receive the required attention, and the danger to life and limb would be minimised. The mining industry will owe a debt of gratitude to any Government which brings this result about.

(6.20.) MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I can testify to the good results which have attended the appointment of such a Minister in our Colonies. In the Australian Colonies there are Ministers of Mines, and there is every reason to believe that, if there were a corresponding Minister in this country, the existence of a separate department would have a beneficial influence on the development of mining industries. I therefore support the Motion of the hon. Member.

*(6.21.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I wish to assure hon. Members opposite who are identified with mining industries that Her Majesty's Government will leave nothing undone that could in any way minimise danger to life and limb in the working of mines. We are fully alive to our responsibility in this respect, and if we hesitate to accept a Resolution in favour of the creation of a Minister of Mines, it is simply because we do not believe that at the present moment a case has been made out for the creation of a new Department to be represented by a responsible Minister. Much more evidence will have to be adduced to justify an addition being made to the large number of officials representing the Government in this and the other House of Parliament; and it is not absolutely certain that the addition of another Minister would secure all the advantages that hon. Members desire to obtain. Hon. Members will admit that there must be circumstances that weigh with the Government which cannot so well be appreciated by non-official Members. I say at once that if the creation of such a Minister would be the means of preventing a recurrence of mining accidents that shock the country, then by all means let such a Minister be appointed. But hon. Gentlemen know better than I do, that accidents occur from circumstances no precautions can control, from causes apparently beyond the control of man, and in fact unknown to those who suffer from them. My hon. Friend (Mr. Stuart Wortley) has stated that the Secretary of State is already taking steps with the view of securing a further examination of the causes of accidents in coal mines. The right hon. Gentleman has consulted me on the question, and I have assured the right hon. Gentleman that the Government will give him the fullest assistance in the investigation he has directed. If he is right in the course he has taken, and his assumption of the causes of some of the accidents we deplore, in the result he will confer a greater benefit on the country than any of the Home Secretaries of the past. He is engaged now in these investigations. It is a question whether a special Minister could do more than is being done at present for mines and miners; and if their special claim is conceded, it may be that other industries will then put in a similar claim. We have other regulated industries, including cotton factories, railways, and shipping; indeed, all factories are inspected; and the Acts affecting these interests are carried out under the superintendence of the Home Office or the Board of Trade, and recently a Minister of Agriculture has been created.

I by no means assert that our existing system is the best that could be devised; I should be the last to suggest that no improvement can be made in our administrative arrangements; but I deprecate the acceptance of an abstract Resolution upon the assumption that, as soon as a new Minister and Department is created at large expense, and a Department formed, there will necessarily result a great improvement in the conditions and circumstances of those engaged in the industry concerned. We shall give the most careful consideration to what has been urged in support of the Motion; but we cannot be expected to assent to a Resolution which would have the effect of transferring from the Home Office a large portion of its present work. We shall do our best to investigate and correct every deficiency which may be shown to exist in the present system, and to provide a full and complete responsibility in every Department of the Public Service; but we cannot admit that a case has been made out for an addition to the official element in Parliament.

(6.29.) MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): There are strong grounds of justification for the Motion, and every argument used in support of the creation of a Minister of Agriculture applies with even greater force to the appointment of a Mining Department. We do not expect that the advantage to the mining industry would be at once apparent; but we do consider that with the appointment of a Minister charged with a direct and special responsibility there would be less delay in the prosecution of matters connected with the mining interest. I, like my colleagues who have spoken to-night, am not disposed to reproach the officials in the Home Department, because I believe they have given every evidence of a sincere desire to do all that it is possible for men to do to minimise the serious character of the fatalities that occur during mining operations. But I think it is possible for the Government, by appointing a Minister for Mines, to give more general satisfaction, and to secure even better results than they have already secured. The appointment of a Minister for Mines in other countries has given general satisfaction, and I think it would give equal satisfaction here. In point of importance it is difficult to find another industry to compare with the mining industry. There are between 3,000 and 4,000 coal and iron-stone mines in the country, turning out 180,000,000 tons per annum. Between 600,000 and 700,000 persons are employed above and below ground. In these circumstances, it is, in my judgment, desirable we should have some person whose attention will be devoted exclusively to the appeals that are made, and must necessarily come before him, arising out of such an industry. The First Lord of the Treasury promises to give serious consideration to the subject. I hope the time is not far distant when we may have the pleasure of hearing him declare that the Government have come to the conclusion to meet our wishes in this matter.

Mr. W. H. Smith

(6.34.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): My hon. Friend is somewhat ingenuous if he is satisfied with the promise that Ministers will take this matter into consideration. When Ministers say that, they mean that they intend to do absolutely nothing, and I think my hon. Friend will find that will be the course pursued by Her Majesty's present Ministry. I was anxious to know how the First Lord of the Treasury would defend the appointment of a Minister for Agriculture and refuse to appoint a Minister for Mines. If the right hon. Gentleman had said there were already sufficient Ministers, and that every industry in the country might claim to have a separate Department, the contention would be a good one. But the Government have already appointed a Minister for Agriculture. Why? Because they are supported by gentlemen who say they represent the landed interest, and they could not refuse the request of their friends. But when gentlemen from Wales and other mining districts ask that a Minister for Mines should be appointed, they say, "We will seriously consider it." I am the last person in the world to urge increased expenditure. I think that we could do without many of our Ministers, and that in the open market we could get men for considerably less than we pay Ministers. But considering the importance of the coal industry, I think it is desirable we should have a Minister for Mines, and it seems to me we might appoint one and not incur any extra expense. We might do away with one or two of the wasteful sinecures that exist now, and devote a salary—a small but fitting salary—to a Minister for Mines. I am afraid, however, that will not be done. When a Minister for Agriculture was appointed, we were promised that that Minister and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster should be one and the same. But the Chancellor of the Duchy still enjoys his salary, and an absolutely new salary has been created for the Minister for Agriculture. I suggest that right hon. Gentlemen opposite should subscribe something from their own salaries, or should arrange matters in some way by which this useful reform may be effected without costing the country a farthing.

(6.39.) MR. D. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): The First Lord of the Treasury has stated his belief that most of the accidents in mines are beyond human control. Probably they are; but it is, nevertheless, the fact that the number of fatal accidents diminish in proportion as mines are better managed. I went into the matter very closely some time ago, and I was enabled, by the kindness of colliery managers, to get Returns from about a dozen of what I regard as the best managed collieries in South Wales. On an average, each of these collieries employed between 700 and 800 men, and the number of fatal accidents in these mines, during a period of ten years, was proportionately somewhere about one-third of the number over the remainder of the coal-fields. It seems, therefore, that a very great deal of good can be effected by good management, and that points to the necessity for the appointment of a Minister for Mines. We have been reminded of the large number of persons employed in mines, and of the magnitude of the output. The coal industry is a great industry, great not only because it gives employment to 600,000 or 700,000 people, but because also it is the motive power of all other industries. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the cotton industry, and of the railway and shipping industries; but where would these industries be if it were not for the coal industry? We not only supply ourselves, but to a great extent we supply the world with coal. An hon. Member opposite has said that although he agrees with the Motion he considers it premature; premature because a Royal Commission on Mining Royalties is sitting at the present time. What bearing a Royal Commission on Mining Royalties has on the appointment of a Minister for Mines I cannot conceive.

(6.42.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): It is now four years since the Royal Commission on Mining, of which I had the honour to be Secretary, after having sat for nearly eight years, reported to Her Majesty. Though it was not within the scope of the Commissioners' duty to suggest a separate Mines Department, it was obvious that the Commission was impressed by the fact that the Secretary of State for the Home Department had the control and regulation of mines in his hands. I do not wish to reflect in the slightest degree upon the Home Department; but I think it proper to say that the Commission felt that the Department was not fit to cope with the enormous coal industry, and with the various accidents that constantly arise in connection with mining operations. I cannot help thinking that if we cannot have a separate Minister for Mines the time has come when we might fairly ask the Government to separate the mining business from the ordinary business of the Home Office. The Commission of which I have spoken reported—

"The result of our laborious investigations has impressed upon us the need for the official establishment of some permanent arrangement by which the continuous pursuit of this important class of work would be secured, and by which also the merits of suggestions and inventions should be investigated promptly and thoroughly and authoritatively."

Whilst we are waiting for the appointment of a Minister for Mines, surely it is not unreasonable to ask that what was suggested four years ago by a very important Commission should be adopted by the Government. Let me give an illustration of the absolute inadequacy of the present state of things. Anyone who has taken the trouble to read the final Report of the Royal Commission on Mining will learn that coal dust has a great effect in producing explosions in mines. To my great surprise I find that during the last three or four weeks the Secretary of State has issued a Circular directing the attention of all those engaged in mining operations to the very important bearing coal dust has upon accidents. I trust that the Government will seriously consider whether they cannot, at all events as an instalment, detach the work relating to mining from the ordinary administration of the Home Office, and make it a separate branch of work altogether.

(6.47.) The House divided:—Ayes 88; Noes 118.—(Div. List, No. 18.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 66.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [4th December], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

(6.58.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): This Bill was moved last Session, and my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary said he had no objection to the Second Reading. I do not oppose it on the present occasion, but I hope the Committee stage will not be taken for some time, in order that the Government may consider whether any, and if so, what, Amendments are necessary.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I wish to meet the wishes of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and will put the Bill down for a day that will suit everybody.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I suggest it should be put down for Monday, and then the most convenient day fixed for the Committee stage.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

TEACHERS' REGISTRATION AND ORGANISATION BILL.—(No. 156.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [26th January], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*(7.2.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): In moving that this Bill be read a second time, I would explain that there is another Bill for a similar purpose, for an almost identical purpose, introduced by the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland), and it is our joint desire, if the House gives this Bill a Second Reading, that the two Bills should be referred to one Select Committee.

Mr. Arthur Williams

*(7.3.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I am glad to find that the Government support the Second Reading of the Bill with the intention of associating it with another Bill in reference to a Select Committee. I have before me a copy of a Bill which was read a second time in 1869, part of which became law under the name of the Endowed Schools Act, but the second part of which, dealing with the organisation of school teachers was withdrawn, not because the late Mr. Forster had any doubt as to the policy, but from mere lack of time and the difficulty of carrying a complicated measure through Parliament. When I compare the Bill of 1869 with this Bill introduced by my hon. Friend, I cannot but observe the present Bill contains many deficiencies. In the first place, the Bill of my hon. Friend appears to go much further than did Mr. Forster's proposal. Mr. Forster confined his registration to teachers of endowed schools; but, as I understand my hon. Friend's proposal, he extends his registration and the compulsory part of his Bill to schools which are not included in the category of endowed schools. I regret this extension, and think it is unfair to teachers in private schools. When the Bill is examined in Committee, I feel confident that this defect will be recognised. I fear also that sufficient provision is not made for the working of the scheme. The only financial arrangements are that certain fees are to be paid; but under the Bill of Mr. Forster, while there was the same arrangement in regard to fees, there were also fees levied in endowed schools which were not free, but where they were not free a grant was provided from the Consolidated Fund. I am afraid that it will be found this Bill contains but a mere sketch outline of finance, and that unless this is materially strengthened the machinery will not work for lack of that most essential motive power—funds.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON (SUPER-ANNUATION) BILL.—(No. 49).

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [26th January], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*(7.8.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): It is the intention that this Bill also should be referred to a Select Committee if the House shall be pleased to read it a second time. According to the intention of the promoters, the Bill is so framed that by deductions from the salaries of teachers a fund shall be created which will insure the rates being free from any possibility of burden. That is a point as to which doubts have been raised in some quarters, but those doubts can best be disposed of by a Select Committee. I hope my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. F. S. Powell) will for the moment waive his objection and allow the Second Reading to be taken in order that a Select Committee may investigate the particular point he objects to. The sincere desire of the promoters is to ensure the rates against any real liability and any possibility of appreciable burden hereafter.

*(7.9.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I have opposed the Bill through two Sessions, because I fear it will do great injustice to voluntary school teachers. The voluntary schools have a severe burden to bear, and are engaged in sharp competition, and any proceeding of the Legislature which enables School Board teachers to form within themselves a powerful body with a superannuation fund will almost inevitably be prejudicial to the interests of teachers in voluntary schools. My experience of pension schemes, too, warns me of their dangers. I have known cases where the finance of such schemes has proved unsound, and resort has had to be made to the rates in support of the weakness of the original scheme. I am afraid the same thing may occur now, and I am glad to know that the attention of the Select Committee will be directed to this point. Let me draw the attention of my hon. Friend to the last clause in the Bill, which does not seem consistent with what he said just now. This clause provides that the expenses of administration are to be paid out of the School Fund. Now the School Fund comes from the rates; therefore, notwithstanding the honest desire of my hon. Friend to keep the rates clear from any burden arising out of this Bill, there is this clause directly imposing a charge on the rates. However, I will not carry my objections to the length of obstruction, and shall not oppose the reference of the Bill to a Select Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

RAILWAYS COMPANIES RETURN
TICKETS BILL.—(No. 81.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(7.14.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill, let me explain that its object is to give power to the Board of Trade to control unreasonable conditions made by Railway Companies in respect of the issue of passenger tickets, more particularly the condition by which the return halves of tickets are declared not available unless used within a certain limited time. As there seems to be a feeling in favour of Select Committees, I may say that if the Bill is read a second time I have no objection to it being referred to such a Committee. Really, I think we need to do something to cure the evils that arise from a railway monopoly, where there is not the freedom and cheapness that competition brings, by giving more power to the Board of Trade. It is, for instance, a constant experience that we take a return railway ticket, and from accident, from missing a connecting train, or change in our plans, we are unable to make use of the return half of our ticket under the conditions laid down by the company. But seeing that we have paid for the double journey it would be only fair that a passenger should use the return half upon payment of the difference between the return ticket fare and the two single journey fares. In this way Railway Companies would not so often obtain payment for work they do not carry out, while the passenger would lose the advantage of the reduced rate when not fulfilling the conditions on which it was charged. Where there is competition between Railway Companies or between railways and steamboats, there is not much difficulty in the terms the Railway Companies offer. Thus, between Glasgow and Edinburgh, a distance of about 50 miles, the third-class fare is 2s. 6d., or 4s. return, owing to the competition between the Caledonian and the North British Companies. But where there is no such competition then a company may exact all kinds of onerous conditions as to breaking journeys and time of return.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Clark.)

(7.16.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): The more we examine the Bill the more we are convinced of the benefit it will be to the middle classes and those whose occupations require much travelling. I appeal to any hon. Member, has he not again and again, through mischance, found himself unable to use a ticket because he has been unable to use it within a certain time. I hope this Bill will receive the same consideration as has already been extended to several Bills, and may be submitted to the investigation of a Select Committee.

*(7.18.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): This, no doubt, is a Bill which will appeal to the feelings of all hon. Members. There is probably not a Member in the House who has not at some time or other lost the benefit of the return half of his ticket. However that may be, and whatever may be the possibilities, and I think they are considerable, of a wise and useful extension of the return ticket system by the Railway Companies, I do not think the House ought to assent to the Second Reading of this Bill. It is based on this remarkable proposition: that whereas Railway Companies are not bound to issue return tickets at all, all return tickets issued in future shall be available as long as passengers choose. The companies have the obvious remedy in their own hands by refusing to issue return tickets. Let me point out that the effect of the Bill would probably be to interfere with that which is a very considerable advantage to no small portion of the inhabitants of the Metropolis—the cheap Saturday to Monday return tickets. These are issued at much lower rates than the companies' ordinary charge, in order to encourage this particular traffic. I cannot accept the Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill.

Dr. Clark

(7.20.) The House divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 106.—(Div. List, No. 19.)

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 102.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(7.30.) MR. G. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I ask permission of the House to make an explanation with regard to this Bill. Mr. Plimsoll is in Canada making inquiries on the subject with which it deals, and the Government are also making inquiry. I shall give some notice when I wish really to take the Second Reading, and I shall not do so without the consent of the President of the Board of Trade.

*(7.31.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I quite appreciate the action of the hon. Member, and think he is quite right in the course he is following. I think it is only fair that we should not proceed further with this Bill until we hear the views of the Dominion Government.

Second Reading deferred till Tomorrow.

M O T I O N .

POLICE (METROPOLIS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. James Rowlands, Bill for placing the Police of the Metropolis under the control of the Ratepayers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Rowlands, Mr. Cremer, Mr. Beaufoy, Mr. Howell, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. James Stuart, Mr. Causton, and Mr. Lawson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 173.]

"R. V. CURRAN AND OTHERS."

Return presented,—relative thereto [Address 27th January; Mr. Stuart Wortley]; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 59.]

House adjourned at half after Seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 28th January, 1891.

"KIRK V. CONNOR."

Ordered—

Address for Revised Report from the Newcastle Daily Chronicle, of the 22nd day of November, 1890, of the Judgment delivered on the 21st day of November, 1890, by His Honour Judge Seymour, Q.C., Recorder of Newcastle, upon an appeal against the conviction of Connor, under section seven of "The Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875."—(Mr. Fenwick.)

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ROADS AND STREETS IN POLICE BURGHS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 12.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

* (12.35.) MR. H. ELLIOT (Ayrshire, N.): Although this Bill simply proposes to give powers to Police burghs in Scotland, under certain conditions, to control their own roads and streets, which at the present time are to some extent exercised by County Councils, I admit that it is a matter that is rather technical and dry. But dry as the subject may be, it is one that has the deepest interest for a large majority of the people of Scotland. The proposed application of the Bill embraces a population of over 300,000, or about one-twelfth of the whole population of Scotland. Perhaps, at the outset, I had better explain what the Police burghs are concerning which I propose to legislate, and how it is that they differ from Royal burghs and Parliamentary burghs and require to come to Parliament for special legislation. The Royal burghs existed prior to the Act of Union; the Parliamentary burghs were created by the Reform Acts of William IV. and Victoria; and the Police burghs are towns of a certain size which have adopted the Police Act of 1862. But the Scotch Law draws a distinction between these various classes of burghs. Royal burghs and Parliamentary burghs have an administration in reference to roads and streets of their own, but that is not the case in regard to Police burghs. In my opinion, and in that of most of the Scotch people, there is no ground for any such distinction. One of the grievances of the Police burghs is that they are not treated in Municipal matters in an equal manner with the Royal burghs. This Bill is a Bill practically to amend the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act of 1878. The House will remember that the Roads and Bridges Act created an entirely new road law for Scotland. That Act has been a very beneficial one, but, in my opinion, it had one defect: it stereotyped to a certain extent the distinction which exists between the Royal and Parliamentary burghs and the Police burghs. By that Act the Royal and Parliamentary burghs have each a separate Road Authority, and they have no liability to maintain the county roads in the neighbourhood. But when the Act came to deal with Police burghs the authors of it seemed to recognise the impossibility of entirely distinguishing between the Royal and Parliamentary burghs and the large Police burghs. It therefore provides that any Police burgh which has a population of 5,000 or upwards at the time of the adoption of the Road Act by the county in which it is situated, may, if it makes the claim within three months, have a separate Road Authority. It in fact classifies these Police burghs with Royal and Parliamentary burghs. This provision has led to probably unforeseen, and certainly to very illogical, results. The Road Act has been adopted by many counties a good many years ago. Since that time a great change has happened. Some Police burghs, which were then over 5,000, have perhaps hardly increased at all, while those burghs which were then under 5,000 are now far over 5,000, so that it is quite possible at the present moment for two Police burghs to be existing side by side—the smaller having the privileges of a city, the larger being treated like a country village. This is an anomaly which probably no one will defend. The Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill proposed to remedy it. One of the first objects of my Bill is to place these thriving young burghs on some equality with older burghs of the same size and of the same class. I now turn to those burghs which were under 5,000 at the time of the adoption of the Road Act by the county in which they are situated, and to the burghs which have become Police burghs since that time. The position of these burghs is unfavourable, compared to that of the Royal and Parliamentary burghs, and is unsatisfactory as regards each other. Police burghs which were under 5,000 at the time of the adoption of the Act are part of the road district of the county in which they are situated, and are rated on their gross rental. The whole amount thus raised is spent upon the highways in the district, including, of course, the portion of any highway which passes through a burgh, but not a penny of this money is spent upon the streets of the burgh, nor can the burgh have its streets placed on the list of county highways. It will, therefore, easily be seen from this that where a burgh is large and rich, and only a small portion of highway passes through it, a very large sum of money is raised, nearly the whole of which is made a present of to the county. I will give an illustration. The Lord Advocate is already acquainted with it, but I may as well present it to the House. The Police burgh of Carnoustie is situated in the County of Forfar. On an average of the last five years the Road Authorities of the County of Forfar have levied an annual assessment of £477 on the burgh of Carnoustie, and the whole of this sum, with the exception of about £45, has been spent on the county roads outside the burgh. The case of Ardrossan is almost as strong. It pays, roughly speaking, about £562 a year to the County Road Authorities of Ayrshire, of which sum only about £106 is applied to the upkeep of the roads within the burgh. I am not arguing now as to whether it is right or wrong that a Police burgh should pay some contribution towards the maintenance of the county roads; but what I do say is that a charge of this kind is excessive. We see, too, from these illustrations how unequal is the incidence of the present law. Had Carnoustie and Ardrossan had, happily for themselves, a few years ago a few hundreds more inhabitants a-piece, they would have been called upon to pay nothing to the county roads; had they become Police burghs a year or two later, they might, as I am about to show, have had their streets put on the list of county highways. Now, lastly, Sir, there is the case of the burghs which have become Police burghs since the adoption of the Road Act by the county in which they are situated. These burghs are also part of the county road district in which they are situated, and are rated on their gross rental. They are, however, in a more fortunate position than the burghs I have just been alluding to. It is competent for them if their streets are properly made to have them placed on the county list of highways. Thus, though they are assessed by the county in precisely the same way as the other burghs under 5,000, the money when raised is more equally distributed. Sir, we object to all these legislative inequalities—this fanciful distinction between burgh and Police burgh, Police burgh and Police burgh. We consider them unjust, inconvenient, and unsatisfactory. The Bill in my hand proposes as much as possible to get rid of them all. It proposes to get rid of the divided control of streets in burghs, which has been found inconvenient, and of the population limit, which has failed. We hope in altering the law to proceed upon a principle which the House will consider sound. We accept as a general principle that all burghs, great and small, should be allowed to manage their own affairs. We consider that especially in the matter of roads should this principle be applied. A system of road administration which may be good in the country may be bad in a town. The highway in a burgh is frequently the chief street of the burgh. It is often the place where much business is transacted. It even, to some extent, gives character to the burgh. It is wrong to treat the portion of highway which passes through the burgh in the same manner as that which passes through the country. Take, for example, the simple question of mud. Mud after rain may be allowed to accumulate on a country road without doing much harm, while mud collecting on a road in the town will produce not only inconvenience, but possibly consequences injurious to health. Then, Sir, there is another point. Highways, like streets, are always the tracks for sewers and pipes. There are connections from these pipes to the houses,

Mr. H. Elliot

It occasionally happens that these connections have to be examined, and it is often necessary that the examination should take place at once. The Road Act, however, provides that the highway is not to be broken without the consent of the Road Surveyor; and perhaps the Road Surveyor is at the other end of the county. It may be said that the burghs might do something for themselves. That they might supplement the money they receive from the county by a contribution of their own. They might pave their streets, for instance, and otherwise improve them. But even this is impossible. The Police Commissioners are not entitled to assess for the maintenance of a highway. They must take the highway as they receive it from the County Road Authorities. There are other inconveniences arising from the divided control of the streets, such as the erection and removal of boardings, encroachments on the building line, &c., which I need not perhaps go into. The Bill proposes to remove them in the following way:—It provides that the burghs may, if they choose, have transferred to them the powers over their roads at present vested in the County Councils. The terms and conditions of this transfer are to be agreed upon between the Commissioners of a Police burgh and the County Council, with a reference in cases of dispute to the Sheriff. This right of absolute control is one to which the Police burghs attach great importance. Finally, Sir, comes the question of the liability of Police burghs to contribute to county roads. As I have already explained, Royal burghs, Parliamentary burghs, and certain Police burghs of a population over 5,000 are subject to no such liability. There seems, therefore, to me to be no reason in equity why Police burghs should not be placed in the same favourable situation. The Police burghs, however, are very anxious to meet the counties in a conciliatory spirit, and are prepared not to press their claim; though they reserve their right to do so at a future time if this compromise is not effected. They are prepared to make some contribution towards the roads in the vicinity of the burgh; but they insist that there shall be some proportion observed between what they give and what they receive; that there shall, in fact, be some give and take in the matter. The argument of the counties is that the people of a burgh use the country roads, and should, therefore, pay for them. As a matter of fact, I believe that the approaches to a town are far more used by the country people than the town people. The town is their market, their railway station, and their post office. I believe in these days of railways that the county district depend far more on the towns than the towns do on the country districts. But let this pass. There is another argument which cannot be so easily dismissed. If the burghs use the roads of the county, the county uses the streets of the burgh. We may frequently see heavy carts passing to and fro between the railway station in a burgh and farm houses or small villages in the country, or passing over the streets from the store where they have gone to purchase materials, or traversing the street of a burgh which connects two highways. For the use of these streets the counties pay nothing. There must, however, be some reciprocity in these matters. If the burghs are to pay for the roads of the county, the county ought to pay for the streets of the burgh. One of the objects of this Bill is to fix the equitable contribution, which the burghs should pay to the counties. This contribution, it is expressly provided, is to be among the conditions to be arranged between the Commissioners of Police burghs and the County Councils, with a reference, in case of dispute, to the Sheriff. In conclusion, Sir, I hope that the House will admit that the Police burghs complain of a real grievance, and that they seek a remedy in a temperate and moderate spirit. The grievance has, I believe, been acknowledged by, at least, one county. One county I know entered into an agreement with the single Police burgh within its boundaries—an agreement which worked admirably, till it terminated, in consequence, I understand, of a legal opinion which decided that it was unlawful. Under these circumstances the Police burghs, in seeking for justice, have no option but of coming to Parliament; and counties if they desire to do justice, as in the case

I have mentioned, must appeal to the same high authority. Sir, I do not wish to anticipate objections to this Bill, but I have heard it suggested that the counties have not had sufficient notice. I say, Sir, that they have had several years' notice of this legislation. They have had the notice of the Burgh, Police, and Health Bill of 1888. They had the notice of my Bill of last year. They have had the notice of a deputation which waited on the Lord Advocate in Edinburgh in October last; and they have had the notice of this Bill which was circulated a fortnight ago—a time amply sufficient for the County Councils, or, at all events, their Law Committees, to have met and given their opinion. I do hope, Sir, that the extreme good fortune of the Police burghs in securing so early a day for the Second Reading of their Bill will not be used as an argument for refusing to pass it.

† Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. H. Elliot.)

(12.50.) MR. ASHER (Elgin, &c.): I rise for the purpose of seconding the Motion of my hon. Friend. I congratulate him on having been successful in bringing it forward at so early a period of the Session. I agree with him that the matter is of a somewhat technical and dry nature; but I can confidently add my testimony to his as to the great interest which is taken in the subject among a large number of the Police burghs which are affected by the measure. The present system in the Police burghs of Scotland in regard to their roads seems to me to be altogether indefensible. It is full of anomalies, which can only be characterised as ridiculous. In many cases it is attended with such inconvenience and injustice as to make it quite unreasonable to require the Police burghs to submit to it in silence. It violates the very first principles of local government. I presume we are all agreed that there is no matter which falls within the category of local administration more completely than the management of roads. That principle received distinct recognition in the Roads and Bridges Act in regard to

Mr. H. Elliot

Royal and Parliamentary burghs. That Act fully recognised that the roads in the country and the roads in the towns require a distinct and separate administration—that the interests connected with each are quite distinct, and ought to be maintained in a totally different manner. Accordingly, while the county roads were placed under the County Road Trustees, the roads in the Royal and Parliamentary burghs were placed in the hands of Local Authorities, to be paid for out of the rates levied within the burghs. But that principle was entirely left out of view when the small Police burghs came to be considered, and burghs with a population of less than 5,000 are treated simply as if they form part of the county. The consequence is that at the present moment something like 88 Police burghs, many of them with a population exceeding 5,000, are in regard to roads under the administration of the County Councils. In many of these burghs the Local Authority has absolutely nothing to do with the maintenance and administration of the roads. The roads in these burghs are divisible into two classes. There are the roads which are known in the language of the Roads and Bridges Act as highways, and the streets within the burgh which are not highways. A highway under the Roads and Bridges Act means a turnpike road or a statute labour road, which is to say that the streets within a burgh are not highways within the meaning of the Act. The consequence is that a street running through a town is maintained by the County Council out of the county rates; whereas the streets of the same town which are not highways are not under the administration of the County Council, but under the administration of the Local Authorities of the burgh, and maintained by that Local Authority. The County Council makes no contribution whatever towards the maintenance of such streets, and yet the burgh is assessed to the full value of the property within it for the maintenance of the county roads. I might give, as an instance, the case of a town through which a main road runs. In the same town are no fewer than 22 streets which the Local Authority has to manage and maintain, and yet the chief road is managed by the County Authority, and the burgh is assessed to the county rate for road purposes. There are other anomalies which one is tempted to dwell upon. A burgh which was a Police burgh prior to the adoption of the Road Act cannot get side streets or new streets leading out of a main road repaired by the county, yet similar roads in those burghs which have been made Police burghs since the passing of the Road Act are eligible to be placed on the list of highways repairable out of the county rate. If within three months of the time of the passing of the Roads and Bridges Act a Police burgh had a population of 5,000, it was allowed to take over the management of its own roads; but if its population only happened to reach 5,000 four months after the passing of the Act, then it was not allowed to have its roads and bridges under its own management. Again, burghs which maintain the greater number of their own roads are assessed to the full amount of their property in aid of the county rates. These are some of the anomalies which exist under the present system. No doubt it may be said that an Act of Parliament might be passed which would, to a large extent, remove the anomalies, place all the burghs on the same plan, and yet recognise the existing limits of population. But it appears to me the more expedient method of dealing with this difficulty is contained in the Bill, which in itself would sweep the anomalies away altogether, by giving every Police burgh, whatever its population, the power of saying whether it will undertake the absolute control of its own roads, and along with it the responsibility of maintaining the roads at its own expense. Many reasons might be adduced in favour of that proposal. In the first place, it would assimilate the management of roads in Police burghs with that in Royal and Parliamentary burghs. My hon. Friend has referred to the small number of Royal burghs. I do not think he intended to do so in any depreciative sense; but the argument might have been used that the policy of allowing Royal and Parliamentary burghs, however small, to manage their own roads had proved so successful that it might well be extended to Police burghs. There is another reason for this Bill which I think is almost unanswerable. When a burgh is constituted under the Police Act and has its Police Commissioners, surely those Commissioners are the proper authority for the administration of the roads within the burgh limits. It is perfectly true they are Police Commissioners, and not a Town Council; but the duties which fall upon them are really identical with those which fall upon the Magistrates in Council in Royal and Parliamentary burghs. They have, at the present time, the management of such streets as are not main roads within their respective burghs. They have a staff of officials for the purpose of attending to those streets; and why in the world should they not have the power of managing the principal street of their burghs, just as well as of the side streets which adjoin and run out of it? Again, under the surface of this principal street run sewers and gas and water pipes, which are under the control of the Local Commissioners. These pipes require constant attention from a Resident Authority; if a pipe bursts the sooner it is repaired the better; and is it reasonable that authority to break up the road in order to make the repair should have to be obtained from a county surveyor who may be many miles away, and with whom it may take days to communicate? Of course, it is sometimes impossible to await such authority, so the local tradesman breaks the road up, its condition is seriously impaired, and the Road Trustees refuse to put it right again, because of what they term a high-handed act on the part of the local tradesman. Therefore, it does appear to me that the appropriate authority to take charge of the management of the main road in a burgh is that authority which already controls the other streets in it. Again, there is no doubt that the principal street of a burgh requires totally different management from that which is suitable to and adopted in the case of country roads. Of course, the traffic on a main road in a burgh is much greater than that on a country road; the people resident upon it are much more interested in its being in proper order, yet the County Authority treat it simply as a part of the old turnpike road. I do not blame them for that; I do not think they could be expected to do more than they do at the expense of the county rate; and yet as the law now stands, however anxious the Burgh Local Authority may be to supplement the expenditure of the county on the road, it cannot do so out of the burgh rates. Thus you have this position: On the one hand, the County Council cannot fairly be expected to spend the money necessary to keep the street in thorough and proper order, and the Police Commissioners, on the other hand, are not able to supplement the expenditure at the expense of the people resident within the burgh. Therefore, the appropriate course to pursue under these circumstances is to give the Local Authorities complete administration of the roads within their own boundaries, they to be at the expense of maintaining them in the future. It may be said that the County Councils have not had time to consider this matter; but I agree with my hon. Friend that they have had ample notice, and it seems to me that they have up to the present done nothing by way of indicating serious hostility to these proposals. But any apprehension on their part of risk of prejudice in consequence of the Bill is, I submit, fully met by a liberal provision that any question which may arise between County Councils and burghs as to the terms on which the roads are to be taken over must either be adjusted by consent between the parties or settled by reference to the Sheriff. That, I think, is a most moderate and fair provision, and it is, indeed, difficult to see how the interests of the County Council can in any way be prejudiced by the passing of the Bill in its present form. I congratulate my hon. Friend on getting this Bill on at such an early stage of the Session. I sincerely hope that it may pass the Second Reading to-day, and that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate will not oppose that being done. Of course, we are all aware of the conciliatory manner in which he met the deputation in regard to this matter. If the Bill passes this Session it will remove a serious blot on the existing system of administration in a large number of flourishing communities in Scotland, and it will be a reform of a most practical and highly satisfactory character.

Mr. Asher

(1.13.) SIR A. ORR EWING (Dum-barton): I do not think the County Councils are hostile to this proposal; the only difficulty in the past has been that the burghs objected to an extension of their boundaries. Every one knows that the burghs (by reason of their population being greater) use the roads more than the county, and therefore, in fairness to the ratepayers, they ought to undertake the burden of maintaining roads some distance beyond their present limits. I hope that the Lord Advocate will see his way to agree to the Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill, which, I think, is a very safe one, for it leaves the parties to make between themselves the best arrangement they can. I hope the Bill will pass this Session.

(1.15.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I think it will be found there is a general consensus of opinion among Members from Scotland as to the necessity for some legislation upon this subject. That has been, I think, long universally admitted, but the proposal of my hon. Friend is an entirely novel one, and comes upon the Scottish county representatives somewhat by surprise. I do venture, therefore, to urge upon the Government, and upon the Lord Advocate, that before they give unqualified assent to the Bill they should see that some greater consideration than it now contains is given to the interests of the counties in this matter. I cannot quite agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ayrshire that the counties have had sufficient notice of this Bill. My hon. Friend not very long ago had before the House a Bill in which certain limits of population were proposed—I think the limit was as low as 2,000—but this is the very first time it has been proposed unconditionally and without any reference to the extent of population, to confer upon Police burghs the management of their own roads. I have been in communication with the Lanark County Clerk upon this matter. He was quite unaware that this proposal was being made, and not having time to get copies of the Bill from London, he had the copy I forwarded him reprinted and circulated, and he convened a special meeting of the County Council to consider it. Unfortunately, that meeting is only being held to-day. Now, the grounds for advocating an amendment of the law have always hitherto had reference to a limit of population. Let me say in a word or two what I think are the principles on which this question will have ultimately to be decided. There are obviously two considerations of an opposite character, and yet to each of them the Bill will have to give due weight. The consideration on the one side has been most ably presented to the House by the Mover and Seconder of the Bill. No doubt there is a great deal to be said in favour of a Police burgh having the management of all the roads within its boundaries, seeing that the Commissioners of the burghs have already vested in them paving, cleaning, and lighting powers. But the other consideration to be borne in mind is the pecuniary interest of the counties. I would point out to the House that, under the Act of Parliament regulating these matters in Scotland, centres of population of very moderate size have the power of erecting themselves into towns. The limit of population is, I believe, 700. That is a low limit, but certainly the power has not been abused in the county which I represent, for many towns and large villages, with populations far exceeding the limit, have not availed themselves of it. But there are many other districts where the population is more widely distributed, and I wish to point out that because two or three people are gathered together, so to speak, it would not be fair to take that district away from the rateable area of the county. No doubt where the population chiefly exists in villages, the inhabitants there are the main users of the county roads, and they ought consequently to pay a fair share of the cost of maintaining them. This is a consideration the House should not lose sight of, and consequently I hope the County Councils will have an opportunity of expressing their views on it. It is said that this Bill provides for an arrangement being made by the Sheriff under which any pecuniary claim may be satisfied. But, surely, some principles should be laid down on which the Sheriff should proceed, otherwise it would not be safe for the counties. I am not at all opposed to some legislation on this subject; but I do not think the Bill would remedy all the anomalies which have been pointed out. I trust the Lord Advocate will give such assurances as will enable County Councils to have confidence not only that their interests are attended to, but that they will also have the opportunity of making representations themselves before anything final is done.

(1.25.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire):

I do not know that I can add very much to the fair and exhaustive statements of the Mover and Seconder of the Bill. But, as representing a locality in which this question has created considerable interest, I wish to impress on the House that the existing arrangement is a fruitful source of conflict and dispute between County Councils and Police Commissioners, and for that reason, as well as on account of pecuniary considerations, it is desirable that the matter should be settled in a way that will obviate the necessity of coming to Parliament for further legislation. No doubt it is well for a Local Authority to have absolute control of all matters within the burgh boundaries, and this principle should be carried out wherever it is possible without causing serious inconvenience. But, on the other hand, as the hon. Member who preceded me has pointed out, there is something to be said as to the size of the burghs. I do not suppose that any of the very small burghs would care to take the management of the roads into their own hands; but this question of limit of population is one which the County Councils certainly should consider. No doubt the Roads and Bridges Act settled questions between burghs and counties on a basis satisfactory at the time; but its provisions unfortunately contained no elasticity, and since it was passed new burghs have been incorporated and old ones have largely developed, and it has become necessary that Parliament should again consider the question, and lay down some principle, the elasticity of which will render further Parliamentary interference unnecessary. The Police Committee of the county which I have the honour to represent have considered this Bill, and recognise the equity of its proposals in the main, the only objection they have being one which can be dealt with in Committee. I appeal to the Government to give a Second Reading to the Bill, with a view to getting rid of a serious source of conflict between counties and burghs—a source which, unless something is done, will continue to be a festering sore. I hope the Bill will go into Committee in sufficient time to ensure a full and fair consideration of all questions involved.

(131.) MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I desire to say a few words as to this Bill, the importance of which I fully admit. The hon. Member for North-East Lanarkshire has fairly narrated certain reasons why we should proceed with great deliberation in this matter. Although to the outside world it may appear we are debating but a simple principle and a very small Bill, yet a very large principle is involved, and I am not at all satisfied that it is proposed to deal with it in the most acceptable way. No doubt it is very desirable to have greater uniformity in the system of road management in burghs and counties; it would be well to avoid in the future those heartburnings which have been so rife in the past. So far as my voice goes, therefore, I am quite disposed to advocate the Second Reading of this Bill. No doubt there are evils in the present system which are susceptible of remedy. An illustration of the existing anomalies recently occurred almost within my own constituency. In the burgh of Newtown-Stewart a gaspipe got uncovered in the High Street, the main street of the town, and a horse falling over this pipe was seriously damaged. Of course, the pipe was laid by the Burgh Authority, and was under their cognisance, but the street itself was really part of the county road. An action was brought against the County Council in respect of the damage sustained, and a sum of £30 recovered, although the County Council cannot be said to be responsible in equity at all. That is an illustration of a burgh not having the right within its own precincts to keep its own house in order.

Mr. Barclay

As to the question as between the burgh and the county, I contend that the approaches to a town are far more important to the burgh than to the county. A burgh probably contains a market, a railway station, and the Post Office, to which the country people resort. By this traffic the roads are cut up, and the county has to pay the expense, and I have known cases where the cost of maintenance for three miles outside a burgh has been £50, £60, and even £100 a mile, whereas four or five miles out it has been only £8 or £10. Yet all this time the burgh is benefitting by the increase of its rateable value. I do not like the provisions making the decision of the Sheriff in such cases final. My main objection, however, is that the County Councils have not had time fully to consider the Bill, and in order to accommodate that objection I would suggest that the Committee stage should not come on till a more advanced period of the Session. I do not believe there will be found to be any disposition on the part of the County Authorities to take undue advantage as against the burghs. We want to do all that is fair and just, and I am bound to say I do not think the present system is either fair or just. I hope, therefore, that the Government will allow the Second Reading to be taken to-day.

(140.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): There is evidently a consensus of opinion in favour of reading this Bill a second time. Indeed, it may be said to have been already read a second time, for its principle was embodied in the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Act a year or two ago. There is a great deal to be said on each side in regard to the limit of population. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Elgin Burghs, who also represents certain burghs in the county which I have the honour to represent, called attention to the existing anomalies. No one can deny that those anomalies are very great. Take, for instance, the Burgh of Peterhead. My hon. Friend represents that. It is situated at the termini of the roads, and there is consequently no difficulty in dealing with the roads of the town by themselves. But there are other burghs, such as the Royal burgh of Kintore, as to which a most handsome apology was given for its existence. This burgh consists of two or three houses, but one of the great highways of the county goes through it. Of course, I admire the honourable defence made by the hon. Member who represents it with regard to its holding the rights it has; but, surely, it is a great anomaly that such a distinction should be drawn between that Royal burgh and Police burghs with large populations. That distinction ought to be put an end to. I think that this Bill does not go far enough, and I regret that the Lord Advocate does not see his way to bring in a Bill to adjust the anomalies that exist. What we want is to have the best possible Road Authority. I do not agree with the hon. Member for Kirkeudbright in all he said as to the user of the county roads; for let me point out that you cannot have a coal mine in working, or a thriving village, or a railway station, or an aggregation of population without an increase of assessable property. As one step on the way to an adjustment of existing anomalies, I think that a hard and fast line should be applied to the large cities, small towns, and burghs, whereby the right of assessing, whether of the burghs for the county or the county for the burgh, shall be uniform for all, whether great or small. Of course, if there are disputes and a reference to the Sheriff, his decision should be final; but I think there ought to be no necessity for disputes. I would have a uniform law for all without any reference to the Sheriff. If the promoters of the Bill will fix the Committee stage at a sufficiently distant date to ensure that the opinion of road authorities may be secured, I think they will be successful in carrying a permanent and satisfactory reform. At the same time, I hope that the Lord Advocate will see that the interests of the county representatives are protected in this matter of time.

(147.) MR. J. B. BALFOUR (Clackmannan, &c.): I desire to join in the appeal to the Lord Advocate to agree to the Second Reading of this Bill. I think the House must be satisfied that here there is a grievance to be remedied, and by no means a new one, for it has been before the counties and burghs for a considerable time. We know that when the Police and Health (Scotland) Bill was under consideration a great deal of interest was expressed in this question, and we know, too, that the Bill of my hon. Friend last year, and the influential character of the deputation which waited on the Lord Advocate on this subject last October, constitute further evidence of the importance attached to it. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give his assent to the Second Reading, and let the details be threshed out in Committee. It is not often that a Scotch private Member's Bill obtains such an advantageous position so early in the Session as this Bill has secured, and it will be a great misfortune if that advantage should be lost by any postponement of the Second Reading. I do not think there can be any objection to fixing the Committee stage at such a date as will enable the County Authorities to give expression to their views. With regard to providing any hard and fast limit of population, I may point out that there is a safeguard in the Bill, as drafted, against places that are too small to have the charge of their own roads attempting to do so. It will not be compulsory on all burghs to take this step; it is only made lawful for them to do so, if they think fit, and only those who hold that it will be to the advantage of the community of whose affairs they have charge will bring themselves under the provision. Those burghs which have no organised staff for this work at present will, no doubt, be quite content to leave the road control in the hands of the county. But this point is eminently one for decision by the Local Authorities themselves. A more important point is whether the burgh should to any extent, and if so what, contribute to the maintenance of the highways immediately outside its boundaries. Well, I think that difficulty is met by the provision that the decision shall rest with the Sheriff, if the authorities themselves fail to agree. As to the objection to the decision of the Sheriff being final, I should like to observe that in this case the Sheriff will not be a judicial, but an administrative officer, performing a piece of administration, and where the assistance of an officer of the independence of character of the Sheriff is invoked, it would be most unfortunate and contrary to principle to give an appeal from his decision, all the more as to have the matter settled one way or the other is the great object of this Bill.

(1.54.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I was anxious to hear the views of hon. Gentlemen before taking part in the Debate. There has been a useful and business-like discussion of this measure, and there does not appear to be any considerable divergence of opinion about it. The hon. Member for North Ayrshire presented with great clearness the anomalies in the existing law. In the first place, it is singular that some burghs having the management of their own streets are inferior in size to those which have not. It is anomalous, again, that in the case of police burghs the Commissioners have the management of all the streets in the burgh save one, and that one the principal street in the burgh. It is also a singular phenomenon that even if the Commissioners are anxious to improve the condition of the principal street, which happens to be a main thoroughfare, it is not within their competence to spend the rates upon that laudable purpose. And it is very singular that while a village which has no autonomy of its own is in a position to claim, and frequently to obtain, the admission of some of its streets to the list of county roads, that privilege is denied to police burghs, and they suffer positively a disability by reason of their having a corporate existence. Again, the fact that sewers and gas-pipes run under these roads, and cannot be reached without the consent of the Local Authority, is likely to cause irritation. It is impossible, upon a consideration of these facts, to avoid the conclusion that the law is susceptible of very great criticism, and ought to be susceptible of amendment. I should like, however, to say, on the other hand, that the reason for which the management and maintenance of these main roads has been reserved to the counties is completely intelligible, because the policy of the Legislature has been to terminate as far as possible the cutting into bits of a long line of thoroughfare and to concentrate it within the county area under the hands of one body of Trustees. That is obviously convenient. There is, in short, a conflict of convenience, however, when the thoroughfare passes through a burgh. It is desirable that continuity of management should not be broken, but it is undesirable that the Burgh Authority should be ousted from the management of the main part of the town. The proper way of arriving at a solution, perhaps, is to discover the cases where the main thoroughfare retains substantially its character of a through road, and the cases where it loses that character and is more of a street in a town. I think the House is fairly entitled to reserve its judgment as to the size of the burghs which shall have vested in them these powers of road management. Coming, however, to the practical question, it is impossible to ignore the fact that the substantive proposal is the transfer of a jurisdiction at present vested in the County Councils to the police burghs, and not only of jurisdiction, but also of a power of assessment. I think there is an awkwardness in the House pronouncing upon a question of local administration in the absence of the views of the local administrators from whom this subtraction of power is to be made, and, therefore, my opinion leads me towards the suggestion that the Debate should be adjourned until the County Councils have had an opportunity of considering the matter. I certainly do not agree that the County Councils are to blame for not having already considered this Bill. The Bill is not the same as that of last year; but even as regards last year's Bill the County Councils had a great deal to do at the time and could not consider the measure. I think they should be asked to express their opinions promptly on this Bill, and at once state their recommendations on the subject. I have some reserve in pronouncing on a matter of this kind, which is really one of local convenience, and one for local consideration, in the absence of the views of one of the authorities, which is the authority from which it is proposed to subtract power. At the same time, there is great force in what has been said by the hon. Gentleman as justifying the Second Reading of the Bill now. I am, myself, most reluctant, my hon. Friend having obtained the position of the First Order in the early part of the Session, to deprive him of the Second Reading. I do not think the subject is one of such complexity or doubt that we may not fairly give the Bill a Second Reading. But I hope the hon. Gentleman will accede to the views which have been urged in all quarters of the House, as to the sense in which he is to take the Second Reading. This is really a matter of detail. I do not suppose that he will consider that the House is committed to more than the general view that there ought to be an extension of powers to burghs in regard to roads; whether we shall confer on the Police burghs the right of managing their own roads is a question which I, for my part, desire to hold an open mind. Whether, again, there should be a limit in point of time is a subject with which it is unnecessary to deal. But that point acquires special importance when it is remembered that while the terms of transfer, according to the Bill, will be subject to agreement by the County Council, or settlement by the Sheriff, the County Council has no right of veto upon the transfer; that can only go before the Sheriff on the subject of terms. I trust that my hon. Friend will accept the suggestion which I throw out as to the sense in which he will take the Second Reading. I should like to add that nothing I have said is intended to suggest to the County Councils, or those who represent them, that there are reasons which ought to make them jealous or timid about this proposal. I cannot say that I think that is the case. Another matter which I wish particularly to impress upon my hon. Friend is this: I hope he will not fix the Committee stage for too early a date, and I would suggest that he should take it after Easter, in order to allow of the County Council meeting in March. The discussion we have had to-day has been so amicable and reasonable that he may be satisfied after the County Councils have considered the Bill that the Committee stage will not be protracted or laborious. On the part of the Government, I shall approach the subject as a matter of mere administration which ought, however, to be carried through with the general consent of the House. (2.5.)

Mr. J. B. Balfour

*(2.20.) SIR ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL (Renfrew, W.): Mr. Speaker, while concurring with the remarks of the Lord Advocate on the Bill, and being ready to vote for the Second Reading, I shall reserve to myself the right of proposing any such Amendment as may be necessary in Committee. Every County Council has not reported upon this Bill, because it has not had time; and I trust that in accordance with the suggestion of the Lord Advocate, the Committee stage will not be taken until after Easter. In my own County of Renfrew there is a large number of Police burghs and populous places where the action of the Bill as laid down would be rather hard. The county has expended a large sum of money on the main roads. We have two large road steamers, beside machinery for breaking up the road metal, and there is a general consensus of opinion that as a result of that expenditure the roads are much better than they were before. I should be very much afraid that if there were any part of the contributions by the populous places and the Police burghs withdrawn, it would bear exceedingly heavy on the other parts of the county which have to keep up their expensive machinery. I have no objection to the Police burghs managing their own roads as well as they can, but I think it should be clearly laid down that the county, having to keep up all these through roads, they should contribute, at all events, to a certain extent, to the large cost which is involved in providing for the large traffic going into these large burghs. I believe in England that the rate is collected in these boroughs, or those places which are similar to the Police burghs in Scotland, by the County Council, and that a certain portion of it is given back to the burghs. If a certain sum is to be given to keep up the roads within the burghs, the burghs would then maintain them, and the counties would not lose anything by it. Another question to be considered in this matter is the breaking up of the counties. Now, especially in Renfrewshire, the main roads which run out of Glasgow run through a number of large Police burghs, and the result of the passage of this Bill would be that if these burghs are to be taken out of the county, and to have the management of their own roads, you would have, say, one mile of road within a burgh, another in the county, and a third mile in another burgh, so that the county would be broken up somewhat after the manner of a draught or chess-board. I think that the continuity of authority which has proved so valuable in keeping the roads in a better condition than would otherwise have been the case would thereby be destroyed, and that the public generally would lose by the change. These matters could, however, be all dealt with in Committee. It should be thoroughly understood that in conceding the Second Reading of the Bill we merely adopt the principle to the burghs that the burghs should have as much authority as they fairly ought to have within the limits of their own jurisdiction, but that the counties should not lose by a measure that is intended for the safeguarding of the towns.

*MR. H. ELLIOT: I quite concur with what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate in accepting the principle of the Bill, but I hope he will allow me to put the Committee stage down for to-morrow, so that I may not lose the priority I have obtained for the Bill, on the understanding that I shall not proceed with the Committee stage till after Easter.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

CONSPIRACY LAW AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 15.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(2.27.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee):

In rising to move the Second Reading of Sir Archibald Campbell

this Bill, I feel that a certain apology is due from a private Member who invites the House to enter on the difficult subject of the Law of Criminal Conspiracy. Instead of bringing forward a Bill, I would rather have found myself in the position of offering a cordial support to the Law Officers of the Crown—who, I am sorry to say, are not here—in the discharge of the duty of submitting once more to the House the carefully-prepared and complete scheme embracing the Criminal Code, which, at the instance of a Tory Government, a little more than 11 years ago, was framed by a Judicial Commission of the highest character. The Penal Code which was drawn up by that Commission I cannot help comparing to what was done by another still more famous Royal Commission, which I think did not receive very fair treatment. The Criminal Code Commission has not even had the reward of the thanks of this House, and all that was done upon their Report was that the Tory Government of 1880 did commit itself through the late lamented Sir John Holker to the nature of that Criminal Code, for a Bill was, I believe, brought forward in that year, that measure being, with the exception of some particulars into which I need not go, the same as the scheme recommended by the Commissioners. Next to having the whole subject dealt with in that way, I should have preferred to have seen the whole subject of criminal conspiracy dealt with as a whole, but I think it would have been as entirely out of place for me to have made such a proposal as for one in my position to have attempted to alter the whole Criminal Code. If the Law of Conspiracy were to be dealt with in the way I have just suggested, I should not have stood in the way with my Bill on this occasion. I have been led to bring forward the proposals the Bill contains by the practical injustice of the Law of Conspiracy, as far as it is ascertained, and by the boundless possibilities of injustice which may be anticipated as far as it is not ascertained. The Bill is restricted to two points. I propose to amend the Conspiracy and Protection to Property Act of the year 1875 on two points, and two points only. The first of them is this: I propose to lay down the general principle that, subject to specified exceptions, no combination shall be treated as criminal unless it contemplates a criminal object. That is provided in Clause 3 of the Bill. In the second place, I propose to amend the Act of 1875 as to one word, and one word only, in Section 7 of that Act—the word “intimidates”—by limiting intimidation in the manner proposed in my Bill. As the time available for the discussion of this question, important as I think it is, has now become rather limited, I shall deal as summarily as I possibly can with the two points I have mentioned. In the first place, I propose to lay down a rule, following the Act of 1875, that, subject to certain specified exceptions, an agreement or combination by two or more persons to do or procure to be done, any act shall not be punished as a conspiracy, if when committed by one person it could not be punished as a crime. I have not been convinced that there ought to be anything in the mere act of combination which should import criminality into proceedings which are not in themselves criminal. I cannot admit the absolutely undemocratic principle that one man can do that which a hundred cannot; that a body of tenants cannot, without being guilty of a crime, do that which their landlord may do; that a body of servants may not, without being guilty of a crime, do that which their master may do with impunity. I know there is a great deal to be said on the other side; but in parting with this topic I will just say that, in taking this apparently extreme position, I am fortified by the highest authority—I have been looking at the edition of the Indian Penal Code, published by Mr. Stokes. I imagine it is virtually the same as that drawn by Lord Macaulay, and the best interpretation I can put upon it is this: that outside acts of war, outside revolution, there is nothing recognised in the Indian Penal Code as conspiracy which is not conspiracy to commit a criminal offence. Clause 3 of my Bill starts with the general principle of the Act of 1875. I leave out that which in the Act of 1875 limits the application of the principle to trade disputes. In the next paragraph I embody the exceptions laid down in the Act of 1875, and introduce certain other exceptions, which are not mentioned in that Act, because conspiracies of that kind, I suppose, may be considered unlikely to occur in trade disputes. But as I have enlarged the principle, I think it right to admit all the exceptions, which are fortified by strong authority. The clause as drawn practically reproduces the recommendations of the Criminal Code Commission of 1879, the effect of which I have stated in the Memorandum prefixed to the Bill. I will read a single paragraph from that Memorandum, which shows the views taken by the Commission of 1879, and, as far as I have been able to discover, adopted, approved, and embodied in a Bill brought before this House by the then Law Officer of the then Tory Government. The Commission says:—

“We have taken the responsibility of recommending that crimes should no longer be indictable at Common Law, but only under the provisions of the Draft Code, or some other Act in force for the time being Section 5 will thus have the effect of preventing indictments at Common Law for conspiracy.”

That is what I say is brought about by Section 3 of this Bill. Section 5 of the Draft Bill was reproduced as Section 6 of Sir John Holker's Bill, and I am not aware of anything which can relieve the Conservative Party from this, that by their own deliberate action they proposed in 1879 to pass into law the very principle I seek to establish by Clause 3 of my Bill. Why should that general principle, that only criminal combinations should be treated as conspiracies, subject to the recognised exceptions, be limited to trade disputes? That is the first question to which I invite the attention of those hon. Members opposite who have indicated an intention of opposing this Bill. Well, as I have said, I propose to repeat the Act of 1875 without its limitations, but with its exceptions. I have left out the second paragraph of Clause 3 of the Act, which says that the Act is not to apply to conspiracy which is made punishable by law. I do not know that there is any conspiracy of that sort other than, possibly, conspiracies under the Criminal Law Amendment Act for Ireland. If there is any other conspiracy punishable by Act of Parliament and which it is desirable to punish as a crime, I suggest that it should be brought into the list of exceptions. My list of exceptions may include items that are not necessary. I have put them there because they are in the existing Act and in the report of the Criminal Code Commission. It may be, on the other hand, that the Bill omits some items that ought to be there. As to that, I shall be perfectly prepared, if this measure is allowed to reach the Committee stage, to introduce into the list any exceptions for which a reasonable argument may be put forward. I am desirous on this, as on all other points, to shelter myself under and behind the best authority, and I have taken these exceptions from the Report of Lord Blackburn's Commission and the Report of the Commission of 1870. If they ought to be more completely and correctly defined, let us do it. Let us treat the list in the second paragraph of my Bill simply as a Schedule of exceptions which may be extended or reduced in Committee. May I say that at least in one important case of codification of the Criminal Law the result is precisely the same, even in point of form, as this which I now propose? A great deal of codification has been going on for a long time in the United States of America. As far as I know, the Criminal Code of New York is the most complete, if not the only complete, instance of penal codification in the United States. That Code, which I suppose is still in force, does almost literally the same thing as I hope to do in this Bill, and I venture respectfully to cite that as a precedent which the House may properly take into consideration in dealing with this part of the measure. I ask the attention not so much of lawyers as of lay Members of the House to this point. I say this is not so much a question of law as one of policy of the highest importance, on which the common sense of Members of this House is worth the judgment of a thousand Judges. The first consideration I ask them to keep in mind is this: that this proposal, or any proposal on similar lines, will at least limit the dangerous vagueness of the Law of Conspiracy. I am not going to enter into a discussion about the present state of that law, but I shall make one or two references to establish the proposition that the law is vague, and that the vagueness is dangerous. I would refer, in the first place, to a most learned controversy that has been going on for some time past in the Law Quarterly Review. That controversy has been sustained on one side by a learned friend of mine, Mr. Digby. I do not say whether he is right or wrong in his conclusions, but I say that no one can read his articles without seeing that the law is in a state of the greatest vagueness. Again, Mr. Justice Stephen, who was one of the Members of the Criminal Code Commission, speaking of the well-known Judgment in "The Queen against Drewitt"—which, of course, was an extreme case—puts in a graphic way one of the possibilities that may be drawn out of the present state of the law. He says—

Mr. E. Robertson

"If this is correctly reported, and is good law, it would follow that if two brothers, having a sister who was about to contract a marriage which they disliked, agreed together to exclude her from their society if she did so, in order by the threat of so doing to prevent the marriage, they would be guilty of an indictable conspiracy."

That is a possibility, according to one of the most learned Judges on the Bench, under the present Law of Conspiracy. Again, after laying down the general exceptions to the rule, the learned Commissioners on the Criminal Code say—

"There is not, perhaps, any distinct authority for the proposition that there are at Common Law any criminal conspiracies other than those referred to, but some degree of obscurity exists on the subject. An agreement to do an unlawful act has been said to be a conspiracy, but as no definition has been found as to what constitutes unlawfulness, it seems to us unsatisfactory that there should be any indictable offence of which the elements should be left in uncertainty and doubt."

Surely that is a most weighty deliverance, and it is not right to perplex juries of laymen with such possibilities as this law points to. Surely it is not right to trust even Resident Magistrates, certified though their legal qualifications may be by the Lord Lieutenant, to administer a law in that condition. The hon. and learned Member for Holborn (Mr. Gainsford Bruce) has intimated an intention of moving the rejection of the Bill. I ask my hon. and learned Friend to answer these two questions: How does he, and how do the Government, propose in this democratic House to justify the distinction which the Act of 1875 establishes between artizans and other classes of Her Majesty's subjects? If they are going to maintain this distinction, how do they propose to justify it in the face of the country? In the second place, I ask, can they point to any substantial differences between the proposals I now make and those contained in the Criminal Code reported by the Commission to Her Majesty, and submitted by Sir John Holker to this House? I now come to the second point on which I propose to amend the Act of 1875. Section 4 of my Bill proposes to amend Clause 7 of the Conspiracy Act by imposing the limitation I set out. I will not trouble the House by reading the whole of Clause 7 of the Act of 1875. It provides, however, that every person who, with the view to compel any person to do or abstain from doing, &c.,

"Uses violence to or intimidates such other person, or his wife or children, or injures his property," shall be guilty of an offence under the Act. The offence, therefore, consists either (1) in violence to person or property, or (2) in intimidation. What I propose to do is to limit intimidation by the words I have introduced in Clause 4 of my Bill. It is within the knowledge of every Member of this House that Clause 7 has recently received a startling interpretation by one of the Judges of the land—one of the inferior Judges if you like—but, still, one of the Judges who has the liberties of Her Majesty's subjects under his control. Everyone, I presume, has heard of a recent decision by Mr. Bompas, Q.C., a decision which has made the name of Bompas famous. But he is not the only Recorder or the only Judge who has given that decision. I believe a similar interpretation has also been put upon Clause 7 by Mr. Digby Seymour, Q.C., the Recorder of Newcastle. I have not seen any authorised version of those decisions, but I have seen the newspaper reports of the decision of Mr. Bompas, which, obviously, will not be quite accurate. It would seem, however, that he decided that where officials of a Trade Union order their men to leave work unless their employer consents to dismiss non-Union men, the officials of the Trade Union are guilty of intimidation within the meaning of Section 7. The hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division (Mr. Fenwick), who will second the Motion, will go more fully into these decisions, and will be better able to deal with them than I, as he knows more about them. I will only say that these decisions startled the whole community by the rendering they gave to Clause 7, and that is the reason that induced me to put Clause 4 in the Bill. I would ask the attention of the House whilst I go into the reasons why I have drawn Clause 4 in this shape. I propose to limit intimidation in this way, that it shall mean—

"Such intimidation as would justify a Justice of the Peace, on complaint made to him, in binding over the persons so intimidating to keep the peace."

I do not know whether my hon. and learned Friends on the other side challenge these words. I am not concerned here to vindicate their absolute legal accuracy, because I shall be quite ready to agree to their amendment, if necessary, after the Bill is read a second time, so as to bring the words into such a form as will adequately carry out the limitation I propose. But I want to tell the House—and to this I ask the special attention of the Attorney General—why I have introduced these words I have quoted. I introduced these words because they are the hon. and learned Gentleman's own—or, if not literally his own, those of his predecessor in office. The history of these words is well worthy of the attention of the House. They are to be found in an old Act, now repealed, called the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1871. The offence of intimidation was there set out in the words I have quoted, and this Clause 7 of the Act of 1875 is a corresponding clause to the intimidation section of the Act of 1871. When the Act of 1875 was before the House it contained no reference to the Act of 1871, but ultimately it was considered desirable to repeal the Act of 1871 and reproduce its provisions. That was done, and Sir R. Cross, who was then Home Secretary, re drafted it, and the words I have quoted were in the Act of 1875 when it went to the House of Lords. I believe that those words were carefully chosen by the Conservative Government of the day after consultation with certain labour representatives, and that they gave entire satisfaction. They were, I understand, inserted at the suggestion of an extremely high authority. I am not at liberty to state who it was, but if I did I think it would be admitted that the authority was a high one—higher even now than it was 15 years ago. The Bill, which is now the Act of 1875, went to the House of Lords, and came back with the limiting words struck out and the word "intimidate" in all its nakedness, and with all its possibilities of danger. How did this House take this Amendment, effected in one of the most important Bills of the Session by the House of Lords? It was received with strong opposition. It was contested by the labour representatives of that day on precisely the same grounds as those I have taken up to-day, and was only carried by a majority of 12, and with a very faint show of support on the part of the Tory Government. The majority was 52 to 40. The House of Lords' Amendment was resisted by the entire available strength of the then Liberal Party. Since then the Liberal Party has divided itself into two sections, one large, the other comparatively small. I want to show what attitude the representatives of the Liberal Unionist Party now in the House (there is only one present that I can observe, and he did not take part in the Division to which I have referred) took up in regard to this Amendment of the House of Lords. The Marquess of Hartington voted against it, as also Sir Henry Havelock, Sir Henry James, and Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh—a colleague of mine, who was in the House a short time ago when a small question of roads and bridges was under consideration, but who apparently does not think it worth his while to remain here to defend the vote he gave in 1875. But the Division was not the only significant thing on that occasion. There was a Debate as well as a Division, the same question being raised in an Amendment by Mr. Robert Lowe, which was strongly supported by the right hon. and learned

Mr. E. Robertson

Gentleman who is now the Member for Bury (Sir H. James). I want the House to listen to the words of the Member for Bury, who, I am sorry to say, is not here. He disclaimed the other day being a political prophet, and I am sure it must please him to know that he has turned out, in reference to this matter, to be a legal prophet. Speaking against the House of Lords' Amendment, he said—

"They ought to make it clearly understood what had been done, not by the Home Secretary or the Government, but by those who had considered this matter in the House of Lords. If the clause stood as it was, workmen would be placed in an infinitely worse position than they were in at present, and the House of Commons would be giving up the fruits of their labours, not to dispassionate and calm consideration on the part of the House of Lords, but to what he must characterise as hasty legislation. Under the Act of 1871 a person, in order to be convicted under this part of the clause, had to threaten or intimidate, another person in such a manner as would justify a Justice of the Peace in binding him over, and that must be done with a view to coerce. If they had a severe law, they inflicted the severe law only upon a guilty person."

And then the right hon. and learned Gentleman went on to appeal

"To Her Majesty's Government not to change their policy but to adhere to it—to adhere to what the House had accepted."—[Hansard, 3rd Series, Vol. 226, page 713.]

I have read that extract, not so much with the view of fixing upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman any charge of inconsistency if he should oppose or fail to support this Bill, but to show that the effect which has now been given to these words by the decision of Mr. Bompas, and in a Scotch case only yesterday, was anticipated 16 years ago by a Member of this House, deservedly respected for his high legal attainments and authority. Again, I say, if the wording of the clause is not sufficient, let us have better words. In the meantime, I claim that the words have the authority of this House and of Parliament. They have been enacted by Parliament, and they have been twice approved by this House and a Tory Government. I have made no reference whatever to the possible application of this Bill. I have treated it as embodying a fair abstract principle of legislation. I have said nothing as to how the Bill will affect Ireland. No doubt the operation of the Coercion Act will be materially affected, but I cannot for a moment suppose that that will be regarded by the Government as any reason for opposing the Bill. If they stand like their predecessors by the principle of the Bill, if they admit that the late Sir John Holker was right, and that his Government was right in limiting conspiracy, it does not lie in the mouth of the Government to say that they will oppose a Bill because it will affect the operation of the Coercion Act in Ireland. The Government have always insisted that that Act does not change the law. If the Government admit the principle of the Bill, and refuse to give it a Second Reading because of its effect on the Coercion Act in Ireland, they in effect admit that there is one law in Ireland and another in England. That will not be the case if they stand by the colours of Sir J. Holker, and if they are not less liberal than the Tory Government of his day. But if they oppose the Motion for the Second Reading, then they will be in this position—they will be going to impose a bad law on England in order that they may have the benefit of it in Ireland. I held that both "conspiracy" and "intimidation" are vague terms, and that their vagueness is dangerous, and affects most of all the poor and the artisans of this country. I look with misgiving upon any measure which tends to sunder the people of one part of the Kingdom from the people of another. I look with hope and confident anticipation to anything which serves to unite their interests. This Bill will unite the people of England and Ireland; the artisans of Wales and Scotland are equally interested in its principle, and in their name I appeal to the Government to allow this Bill to pass the Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. E. Robertson.)

*(3.8) MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): My hon. and learned Friend, in rising to move the Second Reading, deemed it necessary to apologise to the House for having taken on himself the responsibility of calling attention to the necessity for reform in the Law of Conspiracy. I think the House will agree with me, after listening to his very able and lucid speech, that his apology was altogether uncalled for. Perhaps I, as a layman, ought to offer some apology for having risen to second the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend. Under ordinary circumstances, I should not have thought of obtruding myself on the attention of the House in a Debate of this kind. I should have been quite content to listen to the legal gentlemen on both sides of the House, who, on a question of such magnitude as this, would have been able to interest the House for the whole of an afternoon sitting; but the House will, I think, agree with me that there are special reasons why I, who may very fairly claim to speak for a large number of people outside the House whose legal position has been very materially challenged by recent decisions in County Courts, should crave the indulgence of the House for a few minutes. My hon. and learned Friend has justly stated that the Law of Conspiracy at present is very vague, and the Judgments of the Recorder of Plymouth and of Mr. Seymour at Newcastle confirm his argument as to the vagueness of the law and its consequent dangers. Formerly Trade Unions in this country were regarded as criminal combinations; their members were brought before the Courts and sent to prison as guilty of conspiracy. That state of the law was considered so unsatisfactory that Parliament felt bound to alter it, and to give working men freedom to combine for the purpose of protecting their capital, which was their labour. The Trade Unions Act of 1871 gave that liberty, but even then there was some vagueness in the law, and the Judges held that, while working men committed no act of illegality in combining, the methods by which their Trade Unions were formed were in themselves illegal methods, and therefore open to punishment in a Court of Law. In 1875 the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act was brought in by a Conservative Government with the view of remedying that unfair state of things, and of granting to working men, as far as possible, the power to combine to improve their condition by striking either to obtain better wages or to alter the conditions of their labour, and by putting pressure on their employers to effect what they desired. It has been held by the Tories at General Elections and bye-elections that the Act of 1875 gave working men freedom in that respect. But we have seen it laid down by Mr. Bompas at Plymouth and Mr. Seymour at Newcastle that that view of the law is wrong. I am sorry the Government have not been able to get out in time for this Debate the Judgment of the Recorder of Plymouth.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): It is in print in the Vote Office.

MR. FENWICK: Unfortunately I have not had the opportunity of seeing it. I have to rely on the reports in the newspapers, and, according to those reports Mr. Bompas laid it down that it is perfectly legal for workmen to combine with the object of obtaining better wages, or of altering the conditions of labour, but that it is illegal to promote a strike for the purpose of preventing what may be the chief obstacle in the way of the attainment of either of those ends, namely, the employment of non-Unionists. That Judgment gave me, as a Trades Unionist, very great surprise, and was contrary to the opinion of many eminent legal authorities. What are the facts as disclosed in evidence in the Plymouth case? Mr. Treleaven, a local coal merchant, employed four gangs of men to unload his vessels in the port. The members of three of these gangs belonged to some Trade Society, while the members of the fourth did not. Differences having arisen between Mr. Treleaven and one of his workmen of a very minor character, three of the Secretaries of the local Trades Unions waited upon Mr. Treleaven with a view to arrange some amicable settlement of the point in dispute. Mr. Treleaven was not at his office, but his cashier made an appointment for Mr. Treleaven with the deputation for 5 o'clock in the afternoon. On arriving at that hour they found that Mr. Treleaven had, so to speak, led them into a trap. The Secretary of the Merchants' Association was present, and other gentlemen, and one or more gentlemen of the Press, for the purpose of taking a shorthand note of all that transpired. The interview was of a perfectly frank and friendly nature, and at the close Mr. Treleaven took it upon himself, in the name of the Association, to thank the deputation for the moderate way in which they had placed their views before him, and for the desire they had shown to prevent any dispute between him and his workmen. Yet, Sir, would the House believe that it was on the strength of that private interview that the case was brought into Court, and it was in that interview that it was supposed Secretaries Curran, Matthews, and Shepherd intimidated Mr. Treleaven? It was for this that they were ordered to pay a heavy fine of £20, with an alternative of six weeks' imprisonment. I am sorry there has been found a single man in this country, acting in the capacity of Recorder, who was willing to uphold that Judgment. If the law laid down in that case be correct, I say there are very few employers of labour who are not at this moment open to indictment on charges similar to those brought against these men at Plymouth. Some of us who have a close connection with Trade Organisations know what an extensive use is made of the "character note" by employers in this country. Employers may combine for the purpose of protecting their own interest. When a workman applies for employment the name and address of his previous employer is taken, and immediately a secret inquiry is instituted into the character and antecedents of the man who is seeking work. If, perchance, the workman has offended the good taste of his previous employer in any trivial matter the gates of the factory, or the workshop, or the colliery are closed against him, and he is turned adrift upon the world. Yet it is for doing an act precisely similar to this that these men at Plymouth and the men at Newcastle were ordered to pay heavy fines, or sentenced to long terms of imprisonment. I cannot help thinking that the Recorder of Plymouth and the Recorder of Newcastle have mixed up the Law of Conspiracy as laid down in the Conspiracy Act of 1875, and as applicable to this country, with the provisions of the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1887, which is applicable only to Ireland. Indeed, I find that the Recorder of Newcastle has, in his Judgment, turned expressly to the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Act of 1887 for his definition of intimidation. Speaking of the Irish Act, under which a magisterial inquiry has just been held in Tipperary, he said—

Mr. Fenwick

"That was not an Act binding on England, but he had read its definition of the word 'intimidation,' and he pointed to it as an illustration of how intimidation might be defined. The Act said: 'The expression intimidation includes any words or acts intended and calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself or any member of his family, or to put any person in his employment in fear of any injury to or loss of property, business, or employment.' That—Judge Seymour proceeded—is intimidation as defined by statute in Ireland" —

*MR. GAINSFORD BRUCE (Finsbury, Holborn): May I ask the hon. Member whether he is quoting from the Charge of the learned Recorder, or from his summing up? I have heard the quotation before.

*MR. FENWICK: It is in the Judgment delivered by the Recorder. He went on—

"That is intimidation as defined by statute in Ireland, but what is true of intimidation by statute in Ireland is also the definition of intimidation in England without statute."

It seems to me, therefore, that I am quite justified in holding that both Mr. Bompas and Judge Seymour, in their Judgments on intimidation, have mixed up considerably the Criminal Law Amendment Act, which applies only to Ireland, with the Conspiracy Act of 1875, which applies strictly to England. The Recorder of Newcastle goes on to say—

"What would have been the result of this man if he had not consented to join the Union? The gates would have been closed against him, and, for aught I know, a placard might have been put up stating: 'This yard enjoys a monopoly of Trades Unionism. Free labour is bound to go elsewhere.'"

But, with all this, there is no evidence of violence having been threatened against these men—no evidence to show that more than what he himself declared to have been a vague threat was offered to them when they were asked to join the Union. Indeed, Judge Seymour, in his Judgment, goes to the extent of declaring that it was a moral intimidation that was used against Connor to induce him to join the Union. But I contend that it would be perfectly legal for workmen to go to their employers and to say, "Unless you do so and so, we on our part will refuse to do so and so." That was all that was contended by the workmen either in the case at Plymouth or in the case that came before Judge Seymour at Newcastle in November. That, I contend—speaking not as a legal man—they have a perfect right to do, and I shall be very much surprised if any legal man gets up in this House and declares that they are bound under any circumstances to work for an employer. It has always been understood since the passing of the Act of 1875 that the workman was free to work for whom he would, or with whom he would, provided that he tendered a legal notice to his employer of his intention to leave his employment at a given time. But in the case at Newcastle, as in the case at Plymouth, the question at issue is not that of breach of contract, because if the charge had been that of breach of contract I venture to say frankly that, in my humble opinion, the men would have found that judgment would have gone against them, and legally gone against them. The charge was not that of breach of contract, and I very much doubt if any Superior Court can be found to uphold the decisions given at Newcastle and at Plymouth. However that may be, I am certain that you could not find 12 men of impartial minds who in such a case would give a verdict in accordance with the Judgments of Mr. Bompas and Judge Seymour. The vague state of the law in relation to intimidation and conspiracy—the dangerously vague state of the law—is calculated to work most injuriously against the interests of the poor and industrial classes of the country, and the time has come when some alteration in the law should be made. I hope the Government will see their way to accept the Second Reading of this Bill. It may be that the provisions of the Bill do not cover the whole question, but at least it is a step in the right direction. It may be necessary for some of us to move Amendments should the Bill come before Committee of the House, so that it may cover all the points at issue, as they have arisen out of Judgments given especially under the 7th section of the Act of 1875. We reserve our right to move such Amendments; but I think with some degree of assurance I may express a hope that the House will assent to the Second Reading, seeing that the words of the 4th clause were words introduced into a Bill by a previous Tory Government here, and only struck out by the action of the Conservative Party in another place.

*(334.) MR. GAINSFORD BRUCE: I feel the difficulty which always attends one who opposes a Bill professing to be an amendment of the law, but it is not every alteration of the law that is an amendment. I can assure my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundee (Mr. Robertson) that I am quite as anxious as he is to preserve the free course of trade in labour; but I oppose the Bill, because I conceive it will not effect that object. My hon. Friend proposes to break down the fence that the law has established to protect individuals against the combination of many, but he provides no efficient substitute. The protection which the existing provisions of the law afford is necessary for the whole community, as necessary for the tenant as for the landlord, for the servant as for the master. This Bill I conceive to be framed on wrong lines. No doubt the Law of Conspiracy is a far-reaching law. It has been said that it is a wide net, and in the course of history cases of particular hardship have arisen from the application of the law. But we find that when cases of hardship have arisen and legislation has been thought necessary, the Legislature has thought it wise not to obliterate and do away with the general law, but to introduce express provisions dealing with the particular cases. That was the course which the Conservative Government adopted in 1875, when they exempted Trades

Mr. Fenwick

Unions. That Government did wisely in recognising the way in which Trades Unions were managed, recognised them as large assemblies of men of great intelligence, of loyalty to the country; men, on the whole, willing and anxious to obey the law, men under the control of able leaders who were friends and upholders of the law. The Conservative Government thought that exception might be made for persons of this particular class. That is the reason why, in 1875, a Conservative Government thought fit to sanction the change then made, because they thought that the time had come when confidence might be placed in Trades Unions. If my hon. and learned Friend had found or known of any other class like this class of Trades Unionists—of law-abiding, peace-loving men—on whom the Law of Conspiracy pressed with undue hardship, then he might have followed the precedent of previous legislation, and proposed to make an exception in favour of that class. He has not done so. He knows that there is no class on behalf of which he could appeal, that there is no hardship which he can specify as needing relief, and so he adopts another method altogether, and seeks to sweep away the Common Law of Conspiracy in order that conspirators in general may be unrestrained. But, unless you are to encourage absolute lawlessness you cannot do away with a general law, unless you are prepared to substitute exact definitions containing the criteria of criminal acts. My hon. and learned Friend has not done that; he proposes to obliterate, but he fails to substitute. I fully recognise the great ability and industry of my hon. and learned Friend. He might, indeed, with infinite pains with reference to a myriad of precedents, have carried out an attempt to define in precise language offences he thought should be included in the Law of Conspiracy, but he would have found it a difficult and unthankful task. My hon. and learned Friend has referred to the Report of the Royal Commission, and he has affixed to his Bill a Memorandum containing an extract from the Report of that Commission. The practice which has of late grown up of affixing a Memorandum to a Bill is, no doubt, in many cases a convenient practice; but I am afraid that in many instances the Memorandum does not give a very accurate representation of the contents of the Bill. It does not do so in this instance. The Memorandum states that the 3rd section of the Bill declares the law in the terms proposed by the Criminal Code Bill Commissioners. Now, it is true that the Commissioners recommended that crimes should no longer be indictable at Common Law; but, at the same time, they introduced into their Draft Code a vast number of minute provisions, which they thought provided for the general rule they proposed to do away with. I look at the provisions of the Code my hon. and learned Friend is so anxious to impose upon the country. In the 102nd section of the Draft Code I find this definition—

"A seditious conspiracy is an agreement between two or more persons to carry into execution a seditious intention."

Now, what is a seditious intention?

"A seditious intention is an intention to bring into hatred or contempt, or to excite disaffection against the person of Her Majesty, or the Government and Constitution of the United Kingdom, or of any part of it as by law established, or either House of Parliament or the administration of justice, or to raise discontent or disaffection amongst Her Majesty's subjects, or to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of such subjects."

["Hear, hear!"] I am glad to hear that hon. Gentlemen opposite approve of this definition of the law; but if they think that it should be a criminal offence for two or more persons to agree to set class against class, why is the clause I have read not inserted in the Bill now before the House? I must say that I think if hon. Gentlemen opposite were to adopt a code of law defined as the Commissioners proposed to define it, that it would not be less oppressive than the present law. I think they will find, on reflection, that the freedom of political life would not be advanced by the change proposed by the Commissioners, and I beg to observe that I have referred only to one of the many clauses in the Draft Code dealing with conspiracy in its various forms. In reference to this Memorandum, I think that my hon. and learned Friend has hardly given sufficient consideration to the Report the Commissioners made. It seems to me he has given but very scant attention to the recommendations of the Commissioners, because while he cites a passage from their Report he stops at the end of a sentence which runs in this way:—

"The sections of the Draft Code which deal with the subject of conspiracy comprise treasonable conspiracies, seditious conspiracies, conspiracies to bring false accusations, conspiracies to prevent justice, to defile women, to murder, to defraud, to commit indictable offences, and conspiracies to prevent by force the collection of rates and taxes."

There my hon. and learned Friend stops; but, by inadvertence no doubt, he has left out the passage immediately following:—

"The law as to trade conspiracies we have left untouched; and to make it clear that we have done so, we have added a few words at the end of the clauses relating to conspiracies."

I do not know why, if the hon. and learned Gentleman appeals to the Criminal Code Report, he should not abide by that; and when I find that the definitions in that Code tend in no respect to relax the law, and expressly preserve the existing law as to trade conspiracies, I do not understand what benefit the people of this country are to get by adopting the definitions contained in the Code. I do not wish to detain the House by discussing general principles; but certainly I cannot assent to the principle that it follows, as a matter of course, that what one man may do with impunity 50 men may do with impunity. It is a small matter to me if one man walks across my field; it becomes an important matter to me if 50 men do so. It is a small matter to me if one man defames my character, using words that are not actionable, but if 50 men go about among my friends reiterating the slander, then it may become a serious matter to me. It must be admitted that, to a large extent, the character of a wrong is altered when a large number of persons join in committing it. There is a most able and judicious argument on this point in a book published by the late

Sir W. Erle, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. He discusses, in a masterly manner, the question why an act becomes a crime when done by several persons which is but a private wrong when committed by one. The distinction between a private wrong and a crime is that whereas a wrong is an injury to the individual, a crime is an injury to the community. No definite line can be drawn between the nature of an act constituting a private wrong and an act which is a public crime. The true distinction lies in the effect of the act upon the public wellbeing. Sir William Erle says—

"It may be said that wrongs become crimes by reference to the importance of the public right violated thereby. . . . There seems also to be authority for saying that a combination to violate a private right, in which the public has a sufficient interest, is a crime, such a violation being an actionable wrong. In Berenger's case (3 M. & S., 67), if I understand it aright, is an example. He combined with others to spread at the Stock Exchange a false report of the death of Buonaparte, for the purpose of raising the price of Stocks and selling at the rise. In my opinion, he violated by the use of falsehood the private right of the purchasers in the market to buy at the price settled by competition; and the Court decided that the public has an interest in the security of the public funds sufficient to make such a combination to effect a private wrong a crime."

The book I quote from was published in 1869, but I am dealing with principles which hold good now as then. It is not right to say that if the public have no interest in what one man does they have no interest in the same thing when 50 or 500 men do it. The law is founded on good sense and practical experience. It is idle to seek to abolish that law in the way suggested by the present Bill. If the hon. Member for Dundee wishes to make an earnest effort to amend the law, let him adopt all the clauses relating to conspiracy recommended by the Commissioners. But even if he should attempt that task, let me warn him that it is likely that his efforts will meet with the same failure as attended their efforts. No doubt the result of the inquiry of the Commissioners is looked upon as a great monument of learning and industry, but their Bill has not passed into law, it has not been found to meet the practical necessities of the community. Now I come to the other part of the Bill, which deals with the 7th section of the Act of 1875. In 1875, it is important to remember, you had, as it has been said, a Tory Government in Office, and measures were passed of great importance to the working classes, and, so far as I know, from 1875 to the present time there has arisen no difficulty until quite recently in the administration of the law. My hon. and learned Friend wants to go back to the law of 1871. Now, in reference to the operation of the Act of 1875, allow me to refer to a work of great interest by the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Howell)—Conflicts of Capital and Labour. In this he says—

—Mr. Gainsford Bruce

"The legislation of 1875 has produced the happiest results in the interests of law and order, for a good deal of the irritation of the past was caused by the repressive laws by which workmen were tried and punished."

Now I desire to preserve the beneficial legislation of 1875, but my hon. and learned Friend desires to go back to that of 1871—"No, no!"—I understand him to say his definition comes from the Act of 1871, and I also know what that Act contains, and that his definition does come from that Act. Now, not only does the hon. Member for Bethnal Green bear testimony to the admirable results of the Act of 1875, but like testimony comes from the Labour Correspondent of the Board of Trade. In his Report on the labour disputes of 1888, issued in 1889, he says—

"Really the Act of 1875 conceded all for which workmen had so long contended, and since it came into operation there have been few complaints as to its interpretation by the Judges, nor, indeed, have many cases been brought before them."

He then refers to Judgments given by Baron Huddleston at Maidstone, and Baron Bramwell at Manchester, and goes on to say—

"Since 1875 the industries of the nation have passed through two periods of intense trade depression, during which strikes have been large, prolonged, and frequent. There may have in a few instances been breaches of the law, but there has been no approach whatever to the secrecy and violence of the time when the Combination Laws were still in force."

Workmen are now better educated and intelligent than they used to be. The laws affecting strikes are much simpler and better known than they were a generation ago. Comparatively short enactments now show how strikes may legally be entered upon, and how, having been commenced, they may be conducted without infringement of the law. With increased liberty has come increased knowledge, and growing wisdom attends on both."

Now, I submit this testimony is enough to show that the law of 1875 has been sufficient, that it has been satisfactory to the working classes of this country, and until two recent decisions there was no complaint of this Act. Why alter this beneficial state of things I want to know? I gather from what has been said the only reason proposed for alteration is, that two Recorders have taken a view of the law which has surprised many of those who have given attention to these matters. Now, I do not wish to speak with any disrespect of the Judgments of Recorders; but the Legislature is not in the habit of altering a law until well satisfied that the alteration is required. Suppose, in giving judgment, a Judge of the Superior Court granted a case for a Court of Criminal Appeal, would you have us legislate in reference to that case before the Court of Criminal Appeal could give its decision? That is what we are asked to do now. I confess I never heard of the Newcastle Judgment until now; but the decision of the Recorder of Plymouth we have all heard of, and that Judgment is under appeal. Well, if the only reason for altering the law is that the Recorder of Plymouth has given a Judgment which has occasioned much surprise, and which, I understand, the hon. Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Fenwick) firmly believes—and he may be justified in his belief for all I know—will be reversed; why before the decision of the Appeal Court is given proceed to alter the law? I submit it is not the ordinary way in which this House proceeds, to alter a law pending an appeal to a Superior Court, especially an Act which over many years and during many strikes has never until now been called in question. I certainly think it is undesirable for this House at any time to criticise judicial decisions. We are not a Court of Appeal and, when a Judgment is under appeal it is an extremely inconvenient course for this House to attempt to anticipate the ultimate decision. At the best we have a very imperfect knowledge of the facts, and the House will be departing from its proper province in attempting to constitute itself a Court of Appeal for the review of judicial decisions. It is said you should not make intimidation a crime unless, as I understand, that intimidation is of such a character as to put a person in bodily fear. Now, I do not see the reason of that. If you protect a man against threats of bodily violence; if you protect him against kicks and cuffs, why should you refuse to protect him against other and far more serious forms of intimidation? I do not think that is consistent with the view of those who understand Trades Unionism. Let me quote again from the hon. Member for Bethnal Green—

"This view was ultimately adopted by the Legislature in 1875 by the repeal of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, which was a special enactment against a class, and by the institution of a law general in its character. . . The Legislature in this case was but fulfilling one of its most obvious functions, namely, providing for the liberty and freedom of every individual in the State, and the prevention of every species of molestation and tyranny in so far as it is possible to do so by Act of Parliament. Every right-thinking man, whatever his political or social creed, will aid in maintaining such laws against the lawless few who might seek to evade them."

I do not believe that Trades Unions want to intimidate by any means. They are opposed to every species of molestation and tyranny. I do not think there is any ground for suggesting that Trades Unions wish to intimidate by other means than personal violence; it is a slur upon Trades Unions to suggest it. Remember there are two kinds of Trades Unions—that with which we have been long acquainted, where men combine lawfully together to get the best price they can for their labour; and then there is another form of Union with which we are beginning to be acquainted, a combination and organisation of employers. There is the same law for both.

There is the same law for the servant as for the master; and if these syndicates of masters intimidate, I am sure it will not be by threats of personal violence but by intimidation, more extensive in its operation and more effectual to effect its purpose, and I say in the interests of the men that it would be dangerous to their freedom to abolish the law which now gives them protection against the possible intimidation of the great unions of capitalists, which are now springing up and which may exercise such enormous power. I believe that the alteration suggested will not advance the interests of any class, but that it will produce such confusion in the law that no one will benefit by the change. I move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Bruce.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

* (4.2.) Mr. DARLING (Deptford): I beg to second the Amendment that the Bill be read a second time this day six months. I think that a mistake will be made if, upon the 3rd clause of this Bill, too much stress is laid on Trade Unions and the law regarding them. The 3rd clause of the Bill does not affect Trade Unions in any degree whatever. Hon. Members who represent the Trade Unions in this House have nothing to do so far as they represent Trade Unions, with the change in the law proposed by the 3rd clause. They have nothing to complain of, therefore, in what the law has given them by Statute. They would not have complained for themselves in any way had it not been for a recent decision, which it is not yet certain will be upheld. The Law of Conspiracy has been modified in their favour, and with that modification they are entirely satisfied, except with regard to a point raised by a later clause of the Bill. The hon. Member who has moved the Bill asks why other people should not be put in precisely the same position as persons who are engaged in carrying on a Trade

Mr. Gainsford Bruce

Union, and who have been exempted from the ordinary Law of Conspiracy by Act of Parliament. The first reason why the Legislature in 1871 and 1875 interfered specially by name on behalf of those who conduct Trade Unions is because up to that time Trade Unions and those who joined them had not been treated by the Legislature with anything like the same indulgence as other people had been treated. Since the time of Edward III. there have been special Statutes aimed against combinations of workmen, even preventing them from leaving the parishes in which they lived, in order to seek for work elsewhere. Parliament from time to time had to consider the violence and the riots which were brought about owing to the pressure of this law on the working classes: and the question was first fully dealt with in consequence of a Bill introduced by Joseph Hume in 1824—a Bill and an occasion, which I venture to say even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) will hardly recall. That Bill was referred to a Select Committee, and their Report was the foundation of the legislation which has since been initiated. But the House has always, down to the Act of 1875, taken care to guard the concession made to the working classes by special provisions and restrictions, against one of which, as interpreted by Mr. Bompas, this Bill is now directed. The Bill, in the first instance, proposes to sweep away any kind of restriction which may at present remain in the Law of Conspiracy—to say, practically, that conspiracy is favoured by the Legislature—that we hope to see more of it, that it may permeate unrestricted through all classes and sections of English society. What does this Bill propose? Why, that any act committed by two or more persons which would not be a crime if committed by one person should not be punishable as a crime. You are to be allowed not only to do anything that is not punishable as a crime, but you are to have the right—no matter whether for the advancement of your own trade or not, and no matter whether to gratify private malice or not—to combine to do anything for which one person could not be punished as a criminal. How would hon. Members who represent the special interests of the working classes like this? Twenty, fifty, or a hundred persons might combine together to slander a man as to his skill as a workman. They might combine together purposely to ruin a man by going about from office to office in a town such as Sheffield, and slandering a workman with the view of preventing his getting employment. So long as those persons do not write down their slander they would, under the Bill, be safe, and by it such slander would be legalised. Does the House desire that kind of thing? Is it so admirable from any point of view that persons should be able to go about, and by oral slander with respect to a man in his business prevent him from being able to get work? Does the House wish to interfere so that this may be done with impunity? Beyond this, there are cases where the law interferes to preserve public order and decorum. It is not an offence for a person to go to a place of worship and sneeze and cough, but if a number of persons were to organise themselves into a body and go to a church and behave in a similar manner the law can step in and punish them. If this Bill were passed, however, the House might go in sections to its least favourite place of worship, and it might evince all those tokens of disapprobation without liability to punishment. In the interests of civil and religious liberty is it desirable to pass a Bill for that object? Is it right that people who object to religious services of a particular class should be able to combine together by noises to interrupt them? Is it to legalise that that it is sought to pass this Bill? What is it this Bill is really intended to do—and that has been kept quietly in the back ground? The hon. Member who introduced the Bill slipped out a word about "Resident Magistrates," and then took credit for not having referred to Ireland. Why is it proposed to pass this Bill? Is it the intention of the supporters of the Bill to make it legal to boycott the cattle of Irish farmers when they arrive at Liverpool? Though lately a good many complaints about certain judgments have been made, no complaint has been made of the judgment given with regard to the case of the two conspirators who followed a farmer to Liverpool from Ireland, and openly warned people in the market-place not to buy his cattle. Even right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench ought to feel it a matter for congratulation that the law of England has proved strong enough to reach this case and to enable an Irish farmer to get the best price for his cattle. No friend of the Irish tenantry would wish to see a man compelled to sell his cattle for £10 when he can get £12 for them if unmolested. Yet, if the Bill before the House becomes law, the Irish conspirator will be able to follow the cattle dealer to England, and will be able to warn people with impunity not to buy his cattle, and yet cannot be convicted of conspiracy. I am not going into the question of what the effect of the Bill would be in Ireland, but as to its effect in England. I challenge the hon. and learned Member for Hackney (Sir C. Russell) to say that this will not be the case. In fact, this is the very contemplated and purposed effect on the Bill. I venture to say that the reason why Ireland was not alluded to was that it was hoped that this afternoon we should be apt to forget this. Is what I have pointed out a result which it is so desirable to produce in this country that the House should be asked to pass the Bill? Who complains of the Law of Conspiracy? Is there a decent, respectable man in the country upon whom it presses? What do men want to do that they may not already do without the measure before the House? It is true that people are not allowed to prevent a man from getting the best price possible for his cattle; but they ought not to be allowed to prevent him. I ask myself, should I oppose this Bill or not? If it only contained this one clause, I should feel myself bound to oppose it. If it did not contain more than the one clause, I do not think it would receive the support of hon. Gentlemen opposite who represent the labour classes. They see what the effect of it would be and how it would press on legitimate business, and, I believe that, actuated as they are by the love of freedom, if it did not contain more, they would vote against it. And now, I come to Clause 4, and it is here that the interest of the Bill centres for Trade Unionists. The hon. Member for Dundee complains that the law of conspiracy wants altering because it is vague. I like it for its vagueness. [Opposition cheers.] Yes, and I will tell you why. The Legislature, with all your ingenuity, with all your pens, ink, and paper, with all the assistance you may have got from Sir FitzJames Stephen and Sir John Holker, can never be a match for the criminal classes in the matter of definitions. You can never make definitions which will catch all criminals. As soon as you have made a definition it is the business of the criminal to evade it and to make a new crime. Men know, roughly, what they may do and what they may not do—what they ought to do and what they ought not to do—but try to put into an Act of Parliament every conceivable thing that a man ought not to do and you will find you still have left hundreds and thousands of cases outside the Act. As it stands the Law of Conspiracy is consonant with justice, and no single instance has been adduced in which a prosecution under that law has worked any injustice whatever. I have not heard that there has been any attempt to show that the Law of Conspiracy has convicted anyone who ought not to have been convicted, and if that law ought not to be altered let us see if this Clause 4 is one that should be passed. It was introduced admittedly because of a certain decision, given by Mr. Bompas, in regard to the word "intimidation" in the Trade Unions' Act, 1875. It is said that the law wants altering, because Mr. Bompas has held that for men who belong to a Union to go to the master who has other men in his employ who do not belong to the Union and tell him that if he does not discharge those men—and discharge them before his contract with them has terminated—they, the Union men, will turn out, is to commit an act of intimidation. Mr. Bompas may be right or he may be wrong. I have looked into the matter, and I cannot find that intimidation is anywhere defined in the law. It is proposed to define intimidation as—

"Only such intimidation as would justify a Justice of the Peace on complaint made to him in binding over the person so intimidating to keep the peace."

I cannot find in the law that a Justice of the Peace may bind a person over for intimidation at all. The clause in his Commission of the Peace merely gives the power to bind over in cases of threatened personal violence or threatened burning of houses. The Act of 1871 limited the intimidation for which a person could be bound over to keep the peace before a magistrate, but the words used were unscientific, and nowhere in the Commission of the Peace will you find power to bind over for intimidation in those terms. Why a man's house should have been particularly selected I do not know, as the house a man lives in may not be his own, or may be insured, and I can conceive of nothing more calculated to aggravate the British bourgeois than interference with his business. The hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division said the Unions do not call on any one to do what is illegal. The hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division (Mr. Fenwick) has said that the Trade Union in the Plymouth case did not call upon the men to do what was illegal, and he further stated that—"If the Union had called on the men to do what was illegal, then the Unionists would concur in Mr. Bompas' decision."

Mr. Darling

Does he really mean to say that if the men were called on to do what was illegal the Trades Unions would not concur in that, or would they approve of the Trade Union calling on the men to do what was illegal?

*MR. FENWICK: I said nothing of the kind. What I said was that if the charge had been one of breach of contract I would myself have concluded that that charge would have been sustained, and justly sustained, against the men.

*MR. DARLING: I am obliged to the hon. Member. That will answer my purpose equally well. Mr. Bompas, in giving judgment, on p. 7 of that Judgment used these words—

"Now it is hardly disputed that in calling upon the Union men to come out before their contracts had expired they were acting illegally."

Now, to call on the men to come out before their contracts had expired was to call on the men to break their contracts. Mr. Bompas finds as a fact that the Union did call on the men to break their contract, and the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division has told us that if the Union did call on the men to break their contracts, even Trade Unionists would say that that conduct was not to be approved of.

*MR. FENWICK: Will the hon. Member read the next sentence in Mr. Bompas' statement?

*MR. DARLING: Yes. Mr. Bompas said—

"Now it is hardly disputed that in calling on the Union men to come out before their contract had expired they were acting illegally. This was decided in the case of Lumley v. Gay and Bowen v. Hall, and I think on this ground the conviction must be upheld. But if I rested my decision upon this alone it would be of little service as a guide to the future conduct of the parties, since the defendant's objects would have been equally obtained by inducing the members of the Unions not to work for Mr. Treleven in the future after the unloading of the vessels in port had been completed."

*MR. FENWICK: Hear, hear.

*MR. DARLING: The hon. Member cheers that, I hope he will be equally gratified at what I am going to say next. Mr. Bompas says in effect—"On that ground I affirm the conviction, namely, that the intimidation is wide enough to cover the inducing the men to break their contract before it was finished, and to leave their employment at the beck of the person who so induced them." I must say that down to this point it seems to me probable that Mr. Bompas' Judgment is good. But Mr. Bompas goes on to say—"It would be of little good to Trades Unionists if I did not go further." And he proceeds to hold—"That if they had only tried by calling out the Union men to get the employer to promise not to employ Trades Unionists in the future that also would have been intimidation." Now, I do not think it would, and with the rest of Mr. Bompas' remarks I cannot concur. Of course it matters little whether I concur or not, but perhaps it does matter, when I find that the hon. Member opposite and myself are at one in thinking that the Unionists convicted by Mr. Bompas on this state of facts ought to have been so convicted, because the hon. Member has said that if the Unionists had tried to make the master break the contract they would have done wrong. Well, Sir, Mr. Bompas convicted them of that, and although my approval of Mr. Bompas' action in this respect is immaterial, the approval of the hon. Gentlemen opposite is of much importance.

*MR. FENWICK: I do not like to interrupt the hon. Member, but I must repudiate the attempts he is making to put into my mouth words which I never used. What I did say was that I claimed that the men had a legal right in their Union to use arguments and moral suasion to induce the employer to discharge the non-Union men, always assuming that they kept within the legality of their contracts.

*MR. DARLING: What I am trying to point out is that they did not keep within their contract. Mr. Treleven engaged certain men to unload certain vessels for which he would pay them when the work was done. The contract was not concluded until the vessel was unloaded. Before it was unloaded certain men came and said to him, break your contract and discharge the non-Union men, do not let them unload the ships, but send them away, if you do not, our Union men will leave work before their contract is fulfilled. Mr. Bompas finds that they did this, and he also finds that if they had endeavoured to induce the master to discharge the men after the contract was completed that would have been intimidation. I do not agree with Mr. Bompas in that. I need not give my reasons for this, but I do not concur with him. I think that if Mr. Bompas were right on the latter point the liberty given to the Trades Unions by the Acts of 1871 and 1875 would to a large extent be taken away from them, and I do not think the Legislature contemplated such a state of things when those Acts were passed. Nor do I think that the whole course of conduct, and the course of public opinion and feeling since those Acts were passed would have been what they have been, and still are, if that were so. Therefore, I say, that even if Mr. Bompas is right down to the point of the conviction of these men, I do think he was right in obiter dicta which he proceeded to enunciate from that point. This is all that I desire to say. It does not seem to me that the change proposed by this Bill is necessary. Mr. Bompas has not held what hon. Members seems to think he has held, that the refusal to work in the future with non-union men comes within the definition of intimidation at all.

*MR. FENWICK : Yes, he does.

*MR. DARLING : I do not think so, and I say this, speaking as a lawyer, that, after the point on which he convicted the defendants, all Mr. Bompas says is not to be regarded as judicial decision, but as mere obiter dicta.

*MR. FENWICK : Will the hon. Member allow me to put this point. Mr. Bompas distinctly says he is of opinion that a strike of members of a Trades Union for the purpose of increasing their wages or altering the conditions of their employment is legal, unless accompanied by violence or intimidation—

“But that a strike for the purpose of compelling employers not to employ other persons, or to alter the terms of the employment of such other persons, is illegal.”

*MR. DARLING : No doubt this is what Mr. Bompas said after he had given his decision on the facts of the case. But he went on to add, what I think was very foolish, namely, to advise the men as to what they should do in the future, which might very well have been left to the Bishops and Clergy of all denominations. This is what we lawyers call obiter dicta when in the Courts, but in the privacy of our chambers we sometimes call it nonsense.

Mr. Darling

I certainly can see no reason for inserting this clause for the protection of Trades Unions merely because of an incorrect interpretation on a particular point. Therefore, I shall not vote for this clause in the interests of Trades Unions, because I do not think those interests are affected in any way. Nor shall I vote for it in the interests of the boycotters of Liverpool and Manchester. I have no doubt that those boycotters are interested in this matter. No doubt the freedom to injure anybody is exceedingly dear to them; but, at the same time, the right of a man to do what he likes with his own property is of some value, even to an Irish cattle-dealer; and I am not inclined to assist in giving greater facilities for boycotting than exist at the present moment. I do not feel inclined to enlarge the existing opportunities for boycotting, nor to help that work in this country. If we did this, and so enlarged the area of crime, we should have to appoint additional Magistrates in different parts of the kingdom, and, as I am not inclined to alter the law of England for the sake of the boycotters of Ireland, I say that, in the interests of Trades Unions and of all who are not boycotters or patriots by profession, I offer my strenuous opposition to this Bill.

(4.45.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby) :

I will not follow the example of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down, at all events, in the length of the speech he has delivered. I do not propose to argue this question at any length. What is far more important to the people affected by this question is to know what Her Majesty's Government are going to do. This is probably a question which more largely affects the masses of the population of this country—every class of it, and not merely Trades Unions alone—than any question that has been brought forward in this House. The material point to ascertain is what course the responsible Government are going to take. There are only two points in the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman of which I shall have to take notice. First, he talked of the boycotters in Liverpool. There is nothing in this Bill which will touch the question. The Act of 1875, so far as it was used as the basis of those convictions, will remain unaltered; that I will confidently assert. I understand these convictions were upon provisions which are not altered in this Bill. That is a complete answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman's first point. Now the hon. and learned Gentleman endeavoured to get my hon. and learned Friend behind me into a sort of trap on the question of breach of contract. I am here to affirm that the question of breach of contract makes no difference whatever. I will read from the authority of one who, in former days, was my learned Friend and colleague when we fought together the Bill of 1875—my friend, Mr. Wright, who, I am happy to say, is now placed in a position he so well deserves to possess. He says—

"Agreement for breaches of contract for services in cases to which no penalty can apply seem never to have been determined to be criminal."

The true distinction is this: an Agreement for breach of contract is not punishable unless the breach of contract itself is criminally punishable. Take an example. If a family induce a man to break off a contract of marriage, is that a criminal conspiracy? If the son or the daughter is going to make a marriage they do not approve of, and the father and mother and brothers and sisters stand under an agreement to boycott, if you like, the son or daughter, if he or she make the marriage, is there any one so absurd as to say that the combination is a criminal conspiracy? The true distinction is that unless the breach of contract is in itself criminal, the agreement is nothing of the kind. Now here is an indictment brought before the Queen's Bench, one of the counts of which is—

"By divers subtle means and devices, and wicked arts and practices to injure and oppress R.P. and G.P. in their business as manufacturers, and to induce the workmen of R.P. and G.P. to stop their work with R.P. and G.P., before the period of their agreement with R.P. and G.P. is completed," and the Court of Queen's Bench would not sustain that count. That disposes of the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman, on which he wasted so much time, as to the question of agreement to act. These seem to me to be the only two points raised in either of the speeches against this Bill. Now, I think I can in a very few minutes sum up all the questions I want to put to Her Majesty's Government. This Bill has several objects. To my mind, the main and most useful is to abolish the Common Law of Conspiracy, and to substitute for it a definite Statute Law of Conspiracy, so that every man may know what is and what is not an offence under the name of conspiracy. There is no head of Common Law which has been so abused as the Law of Conspiracy. It was hardly heard of, for the purposes for which it has recently been used, until the end of the last century. And then the Judges began to import their own social and political notions, and to declare that about conspiracy which they thought to be inconvenient and wrong; and so this dangerous and vague law. The hon. and learned Gentleman says he likes the vagueness of the Law of Conspiracy. That is a very good and profitable doctrine for the lawyer, but it is a very bad doctrine for the subject, who likes the law not to be vague but to be clear and distinct, that he may not be caught in this net of conspiracy. Therefore, I plead the cause of the people of this country against the hon. Member, who wishes to bring them all under the harrow of this vague law. And if there ever was a reason for carrying on this Bill it is the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman for Deptford. This is the first question we have to ask Her Majesty's Government. Their predecessors in the year 1879-80 adopted the Report of the learned Judges of that time. A gentleman we all remember with respect, Sir John Holker, introduced a Bill, of which the 6th, almost the earliest clause, contained the declaration that there should no longer be any Common Law of Conspiracy in this country. It used the words, "shall not be proceeded against in England at Common Law." That was the basis of the Code. It then proceeded to reserve certain heads in which the Law of Conspiracy could subsist, and in which it was defined. My hon. and learned Friend in his Bill has reserved every one of those heads, and every head of conspiracy reserved in the Code is reserved in this Bill. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Bruce) read the article on the subject of breach of the peace and sedition. That is expressly reserved in this Bill, and it will remain exactly as it is now. And so with every head of the Law of Conspiracy which the Commission thought ought to be reserved. We leave the whole law in that respect untouched. I ask the Government are they going to depart from the principles which they adopted in 1880? If so, why? We must have an answer to that question. I now come to the Act of 1875, for the protection of Trades Unions. This Bill proposes a certain alteration in that Act, not because we desire to pass from any doctrine that a Tory Government professed, but because we wish to restore the Act of 1875 to the condition in which it was introduced by Sir Richard Cross, in which it was supported by the Tory Government, and in which it was, according to the unhappy tradition of this country, mutilated and destroyed by the House of Lords. It was against the will of the House, and even a Tory Government, that the House of Lords set to work to mutilate the Trades Union Bill of 1875. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury, foreseeing the use that would be made of that mutilation, protested against the Amendments of the House of Lords. He was supported by my right hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale. Ah! they are not here to-night to support this Bill. Their sympathy for these questions has disappeared with other things. If they were here to-night I should ask them to do as they did on the 6th of August, 1875, that is, to restore the Act of 1875 into the position in which it was when introduced first by the Tory Government, and before it was mutilated in the House of Lords. Now, that is my second question. I ask you, firstly: Why did you not act on the principle of your own Code? Secondly, why will you not amend the Act of 1875 and bring it back exactly to the condition in which it was introduced and carried through this House? Then, with reference to this judgment of Mr. Bompas. On all points I think that judgment was wrong, and it could not have been passed had not the Act of 1875 been mutilated by the House of Lords. The judgment of Mr. Bompas is a direct consequence of the mutilation by the House of Lords of the Act of 1875, and of the Tory Government acquiescing in the mutilation without protest. I have risen to put these questions to the Government, and I ask them what course they intend to take? The Bill is founded in every part on a principle to which the Government have themselves been parties, founded on their own code, in respect to the application of the Common Law of conspiracy; it saves all that the Code saves, it replaces the law as they said it ought to be, and as it would have been in the original Bill of 1875. I cannot help hoping the Government will accept the Second Reading, leaving oversights to be remedied in Committee. It is a matter of immense importance. I will venture to say it more largely affects the interests of masses of people of all classes than any that could be brought forward.

Sir W. Harcourt

*(5.1.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): I do not deny the interest of the subject to which the Bill refers, and am aware of its importance, but I do deny that it has any such dimensions and importance in its results as the right hon. Gentleman has suggested. We did not need the solemn tone of exhortation adopted by the right hon. Gentleman to give our advice to the House that the Second Reading of this Bill should not be accepted. I will discuss it at no great length, but with the respect due to the views expressed, and the arguments used in its favour. First,

I wish to point out to the House that there are two separate and distinct questions raised by the Bill, and the question in which Trade Unions are deeply interested, is dealt with in the fourth clause. The rest of the Bill does not refer to or interest Trade Unions at all, because it proposes to deal with a law from which, so far as their action in trade disputes is concerned, they are completely exempted by the Act of 1875. The question of conspiracy dealt with in other clauses is one as to the importance of which I shall say a word presently, but I should like at once and finally to get rid of the question of the interest that Trades Unions have in the Bill, and to point out why it is unreasonable to ask the House of Commons to accept this fourth clause. The Act of 1875 has now been in operation for 15 years, and from 1875 until a few months ago there has been no decision of which the Trade Unionists have anything to complain. If hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite had had to speak in September last year of the administration of the Act they would have had no fault to find. There is no single decision to be found from 1875 until November 1890 of which Trades Unionists in the country have any reason to complain, nor has there been any challenge in this House or elsewhere, so far as I am aware, of decisions given under that Act. Two recent decisions have no doubt attracted a good deal of attention in Trade Union circles—the decision of Judge Digby Seymour in November and the decision of the Recorder of Plymouth in the early part of the present month. There is much force in the observations of the hon. Member for Deptford with regard to the latter judgment; but that judgment ought not now to be discussed. I express no opinion on that judgment for this reason—the learned Recorder has granted a case, and the judgment will come up for review before a superior tribunal. What the decision of the superior tribunal may be I will not pretend to forecast. The right hon.

Gentleman has ventured to say the judgment was wrong throughout. Well, Sir, by and bye a decision of the High Court will be pronounced upon it, and if the decision should be against the judgment from end to end, we will then congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the unexpected accuracy of his law.

SIR W. HARCOURT: When I said the Judgment was wrong from beginning to end, I said it was wrong according to those principles upon which we proceeded in 1875, upon principles for which we are arguing the Bill now. I spoke as a Member of the House of Commons. I say the Judgment given is one that ought not to be allowed to prevail, and I spoke in support of a Bill that would make that impossible.

*SIR E. CLARKE: I make no comment on this interruption. As I have said, I feel debarred from debating the accuracy of the Judgment given; but I do say this, that it is not right and fair to the House of Commons when a decision is actually pending as to the meaning of an Act passed 16 years ago, and a question as to its interpretation has only arisen within the last month or two. There is no justification, I say, for a sudden attempt to ask the House of Commons to read a second time a Bill which assumes that the decision given is the correct one. If the decision is incorrect, then it is going to be corrected, and there is no reason for this Bill on the Table; no reason to ask the House of Commons to read a Bill which assumes that the interpretation challenged is the correct one. That is an unreasonable proposal to make. Now, with the other part of the Bill Trades Unionists have no sort of concern. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the Law of Conspiracy is an important and interesting matter, but I dissent altogether from the extravagant terms in which he has spoken of its importance. He has referred to it as "more largely affecting the mass of the people of this country of every class, than any other question that can be raised." This is the right hon. Gentleman's estimate of the grievance. Now, I will give him this challenge. No one can produce instances of persons convicted and punished for conspiracy within late years, say since 1875, with regard to whom it can be contended they were not properly punished for the offence committed. That is a large challenge, and I make it broadly. The law has been in a somewhat undefined and doubtful condition, and the hon. Gentleman opposite has read from the well-known book by Mr. Justice Wright some very technical cases in which indictments were preferred — for instance, the Rowlands case in 1851. In that case the charge was intimidating people to induce them to depart from service before the term of their agreement had expired, and it has been said the Court expressed no final Judgment, but these were the 16th, 17th, and 19th counts in a long series of counts, many of which were good, and upon these three it was not necessary that the Court should express its Judgment. So far as the decisions or the Law of Conspiracy have gone, vague and indistinct as it may be in definition, the administration has been useful and effective. I do not know of a case in which a person has been indicted and punished, with regard to whom any Member of this House will contend such person was not a proper object of criminal prosecution. Now, the right hon. Gentleman asks are the Government going back to the provisions of their own Code? It was not the Code of the Government, but a Code proposed by the Commissioners. I know my dear friend the late Sir John Holker had accepted that Code and was anxious to pass it into law, but there is a difference between the proposal made by the Commissioners and the proposal now made. No doubt the Commissioners who inquired into this subject reported that it was unwise to leave the Law of Conspiracy undefined, and they proceeded to substitute for the undefined Common Law of Conspiracy a certain number of sections of a proposed Code. I am bound to say I do not think these sections were a sufficient substitute, and I think the provisions of the Code would have to be considerably enlarged before the law would be adequate to the many useful purposes it was intended to serve. The hon. and learned Gentleman says the main and most important object of his Bill is to abolish the Common Law of Conspiracy, and substitute for it defined and explicit provisions. But this Bill does nothing of the kind. So far from abolishing the Common Law of Conspiracy, the Bill leaves the law untouched in regard to large and undefined areas of the Criminal Law. It provides that—

Sir E. Clarke

"Nothing in this Act shall affect the law relating to riot, unlawful assembly, breach of the peace, or sedition, or any offence against the State or the Sovereign, or to conspiracies to bring false accusations, conspiracies to pervert justice, conspiracies to defile women, conspiracies to defraud, or conspiracies to prevent by force the collection of rates and taxes."

But each of these conspiracies is left undefined, and therefore it is that I assert that this Bill proposes to leave large, undefined areas untouched. I think I have shown that we are not going back from the decision of the Government of 1880. We are not departing from their proposals with regard to a Code. I confess that to me the attractions of codification grow less as years go on. When one is young there is a great fascination in the vision of a complete code where everything is comprehensively set down and which people may readily read and easily understand, but as time goes on one finds that there are not only great difficulties about the process of codification, but one has reason to see in the experience of other countries grave reason to doubt whether the codification of the law is of great advantage to a country. I do not say that I have abandoned my idea that branches of the law should from time to time be codified, but it is a disputable point whether it is desirable to codify the law with regard to all offences, and there is a great deal to be said in favour of the proposition that the uncertainty of the Law of Conspiracy is in itself useful in deterring people from doing that which is injurious to their fellows. If any definition of indictable conspiracy is to be given it should be much larger than that in the code of 1879. If there is an intention to do an injury to a person, and combined action for the purpose of carrying that intention into effect, then, in whatever form, and for whatever purpose, the injury is intended to be inflicted, I think that should constitute a criminal offence and be punishable as such. Whether that be too large a definition or not, the one advantage of codification, if it is to be of popular benefit, is absent from this Bill. The question raised by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling) has not been fairly met. He contended that if this Bill passes there would disappear the law which enables the indictment of boycotters of cattle at Liverpool or Manchester. There is no answer to that. You cannot find in any of the excepted cases contained in Clause 3 that which would enable you to apply the law of conspiracy to boycotters, where you find a combined intention and action to prevent a man from freely going about his business and disposing of his goods or labour, or conducting the ordinary business of life. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has endeavoured to put the Government in a dilemma with regard to this matter, by appealing to what took place in 1875 with regard to Trade Unions, and to what took place in 1880 with regard to a Criminal Code, and he concludes that the Government are in a manner pledged to assent to this Bill. It is not a question simply whether it would, or would not, be desirable to substitute for Common Law Conspiracy a series of definitions which would cover the whole of the matters with which we all desire to deal. If the House of Commons were in a position, in regard to business, to make it desirable to do so, and if circumstances had occurred to show that the Common Law was wrested to purposes to which it should not be applied, and used in inflicting penalties on persons who ought not to suffer, there would be good reason to ask the House of Commons to consider and put in force so much of the Code of 1880 as would be applicable to the matter. It is a great advantage to have such carefully considered proposals as are contained in the Code, to refer to them if necessity arises for legislation upon a subject like this. But when we point out that the framework of the Bill is entirely different from what it would be if we were going to substitute the Code for the existing law; when we point out that only part of the Bill deals with the law at present in dispute, and that with regard to the part dealing with the law as to which any acute controversy is raised, the Bill does not afford even the framework of a measure for its Amendment in a proper way, then it is the duty of the Government to ask the House to reject the Second Reading of the Bill. We do ask the House to reject it, upon the ground, first, that there is no mischief under the existing law and its administration that requires the interposition of the House; and, secondly, that if there were such a mischief, and the House desired to interpose, it would be necessary to interpose with a very different measure—a measure containing in itself large and adequate provisions for dealing with the mischief the Criminal Law ought to check. I doubt very much if we were framing such a Bill, and had to deal with the definition of conspiracy, with the sincere desire of making it clear that every combined action with the intention to injure other persons ought to be checked and punished by law. I doubt if we could do that without introducing words so large in defining the crime as would expose us for a very long time, at least until the words received judicial construction, to at least as much doubt and difficulty as it has been suggested exists at the present time. When my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Darling) spoke of the advantages of vagueness, the right hon. Gentleman opposite, with sarcasm which sounded like a sneer, said that lawyers, of course, liked the law to be vague. Well, it is not the vagueness of the law which causes litigation. If you sought how to reduce into terms and put into sections of a Code the whole Law of Conspiracy as you desire it to exist, and be effectual in this country, you would be compelled to resort to phrases on which no judicial interpretation has ever been put, phrases that would, therefore, involve a long course of judicial interpretation before they could be accepted as satisfying the desire of people to have a clear definition of the law. I hope I have answered the questions put by the right hon. Gentleman. I hope I have given the reasons why we desire the House to refuse a Second Reading to this Bill, I hope the House is satisfied that no real mischief exists the Bill pretends to correct; and that if such mischief were proved to exist, it would have to be met by a very different measure to this.

*(5.26.) SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I regret that there is so short a time left for the debate of the very important questions raised. I regret it for two reasons—first, because I should have desired some opportunity of exposing the fallacies (as I conceive) underlying the speeches made from the opposite side of the House; and, secondly, because, looking to the course which the Government have lately pursued, and especially in reference to their Solicitor General, I am by no means sure that if the Debate were protracted a little longer we might not find the leader of the House assenting to the Second Reading of the Bill. We recollect the course pursued by the Government last Session on the question of Breach of Privilege, and the course taken by them last night, when the Solicitor General was put up to make, and did make, a very effective no-surrender speech. But after he had shown the serious consequences that would flow from the effacement of a Resolution arrived at by this House, we had the leader of the House meekly submitting. The Solicitor General said, or insinuated, that my right hon. Friend was rash or wrong in his statements of law. But I think the Solicitor General, of all men, should be cautious how he indulges in twittings of this kind. I am not aware that my right hon. Friend has been found guilty by the Superior Courts of the land of expressing any legal opinion which has proved to be erroneous, whereas the Solicitor General, on a celebrated occasion in relation to the Licensing Laws, did express an opinion, as many lawyers have in their day, that was found to be not in accordance with law. The Solicitor General has pointed out with considerable force I admit, that there is no definition of the crime of conspiracy in the Bill. That is true; but it is equally true that a step in that direction is taken, because there is a narrowing of the area over which the subject matter of conspiracies can extend.

Sir E. Clarke

(5.29.) Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

(5.30.) The House divided:—Ayes 143; Noes 179.—(Div. List, No. 20.)

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

MOTION.

ELECTION (PERSONATION AGENTS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Byron Reed, Bill to amend the Law relating to Personation Agents at Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Byron Reed, Mr. Maclean, Mr. Macartney, Mr. Grotian, Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Smith-Barry and Mr. Bruce.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 174.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.

SE OF LORDS,

Monday, 29th January, 1891.

NEW PEER.

Right Honourable Sir James Knight, President of the Pro-vance, and Admiralty Division of Court of Justice, appointed a appeal in Ordinary under the of the Appellate Jurisdiction with the dignity of a Baron
the style and title of Baron of Burdock in the county of
Was (in the usual manner) in-

ANCE SURVEY OF IRELAND.

UESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

EL OF BELMORE: My Lords, ask the noble Viscount the of State for India the question
I have given notice, namely, press has been made with the Survey of Ireland on the 25-inch l whether any particulars with counties can be given concern-

ECRETARY OF STATE FOR Viscount (GROSS): My Lords, mation that I have received subject is to the following ie Ordnance Survey of Ireland
-inch scale has been in progress unties of Roscommon and Gal-the County of Roscommon, on December last, 550 square miles surveyed; the manuscript maps quare miles have been prepared, aps for 52 square miles have ished. In the County of Galsiderable progress had also been the survey. The counties are for survey in the order in which required by the Irish Valuation nt.

se adjourned at twenty-five minutes
efore Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 29th January, 1891.

SELECTION.

Ordered, That the Committee of Selection do consist of Ten Members :—
Dr. Cameron, Lord Frederick Cavendish,
Mr. Cubitt, Sir Archibald Orr Ewing,
Sir Robert Fowler, Mr. Illingworth, Mr.
Justin McCarthy, Sir Hussey Vivian, Mr.
Whitbread, and the Chairman of the Select Committee on Standing Orders were accordingly nominated Members of the Committee.—(Sir John Mowbray.)

INFECTIOUS DISEASE (NOTIFICA-TION) ACT, 1889, INFECTIOUS DIS-EASE (PREVENTION) ACT, 1890, AND PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS AMEND-MENT ACT, 1890.

Returns ordered—

"Showing—

- (1.) The names and population ('881) of the Sanitary Districts in England and Wales in respect of which the Local Government Board on the 31st day of March, 1891, have received copies of resolutions adopting "The Infectious Disease (Notification) Act, 1889; and the dates on which such resolutions were to take effect; also specifying in any case in which diseases have been added to those notifiable under the Act the names of such diseases and the date at which they became notifiable; also stating the names and population (1891) of the districts in which the notification system is in force under local Acts, specifying the dates of such Acts and the diseases notifiable in each case;
- (2.) The names and population (1881) of
Sanitary Districts in England and Wales
in respect of which the Local Government Board on the 31st day of March,
1891, have received copies of resolutions
adopting any portion of "The Infectious Disease (Prevention) Act, 1890;" of the particular sections adopted in each case,
and of the dates on which such resolutions were respectively to take effect;
- (3.) The names and population (1881) of
Sanitary Districts in England and Wales
in respect of which the Local Government Board on the 31st day of March,
1891, have received copies of resolutions
adopting any portion of "The Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890;" of the particular parts adopted in each case,
and of the dates on which such resolutions were respectively to take effect."—
(Mr. Knowles.)

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (SCHEMES OF CHARITY COMMISSIONERS).

Return ordered—

“By Counties, of Schemes made by the Charity Commission since the year 1870, in which Charitable Funds have been applied to Elementary Education, showing:—

1. The Name and Denomination of the School;
2. Date of Foundation of the Endowment;
3. Objects of the Endowment by the Foundation;
4. Date of Scheme of Charity Commission;
5. Application of Endowment under the Scheme, Specifying the Amounts applied to Elementary Education—
 - (a) for General Maintenance;
 - (b) for Scholarships or Free Education;
 - (c) for Buildings;
6. Constitution of Governing Body under the Scheme.—(Mr. Mundella.)

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (SCHEMES OF CHARITY COMMISSIONERS).

Return ordered—

“By Counties, of Schemes for Schools, made by the Charity Commission, since the year 1870, in which Charitable Funds have been applied to Elementary Education, showing—

1. The Name of the School;
2. Date of Foundation of the Endowment;
3. Date of Scheme of Charity Commission;
4. Application of Endowment under the Scheme, specifying the amounts applied to Elementary Education—(a) for General Maintenance; (b) for Scholarships or Free Education; (c) for Buildings;
5. Constitution or Governing Body under the Scheme;
6. The numbers and composition of the Body of Governors.”—(Mr. Mundella.)

QUESTIONS.

THE DUM DUM MURDER CASE.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he proposes to take any and what steps in connection with the Dum Dum murder case, in which the murder of a native, having been proved by the clearest evidence, against a party of English soldiers, and one of them having been found guilty and sentenced by Mr. Justice Norris, the case was subsequently brought under review, and the sentence quashed on the plea of a mere technicality; and whether it is the fact, as stated by Mr. W. S. Caine, in a recent letter from India, that, in the interval, the regiment to which the said soldiers belonged became mutinous, and threatened extreme measures if their comrades were punished for “shooting a nigger”?

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg also to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether any information has yet been received of any steps taken by the Military Authorities in regard to the state of indiscipline in one of Her Majesty's regiments disclosed in the case in which a party of soldiers at Dum Dum broke out of barracks with their rifles, committed various outrages, fired many shots, killed a native, and came home in the morning in a cart, but in which the regimental authorities failed to identify any of the offenders, and the crimes committed have in consequence remained entirely unpunished?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State does not propose to take any steps in relation to the Dum Dum murder case. He has no authority to revise or interfere with the decision of the highest judicial tribunal in Bengal. The statement of Mr. Caine is not correctly quoted in the question, but the Secretary of State has no information which corroborates the statement, either as made or as suggested. In reply to the question of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell), I have to say that the Military Authorities made a careful inquiry into the alleged disorders, and have taken such steps as they trust will prevent their recurrence.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Is it true that the sentence was quashed upon a mere technicality?

*SIR J. GORST: I have no information upon that matter at all; but from what I have read of the case I find that Justice Norris, who tried the case originally, was a member of the Court of Appeal, and that he concurred with the Judgment of the Court which quashed the conviction on the ground that the evidence was not sufficiently satisfactory to proceed upon.

THE BOMBAY SALT ACT.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to two recent convictions under the new Bombay Salt Act, in one of which a native woman who was convicted of the charge of manufacturing salt, and punished with a fine of 10 rupees or eight days' imprisonment, had done no more than boil down some salt on which her little child had accidentally upset some water; and in the other of which a native woman, who bought some dirty salt and refined it, was fined 15 rupees with the alternative of 10 days' imprisonment; whether it was proved at the trial that neither of these criminals knew anything about the new Act; how long has the new Act been in force, and what steps have been taken to bring its provisions to the notice of the native population; whether any definition of the manufacture of salt is contained in the Act which would convey to the native mind that such offences as the above are punishable with fine and imprisonment; by what Court, and how constituted, were these sentences imposed; and if he proposes to take any steps with regard to these cases?

*SIR J. GORST: In answering paragraphs 1 and 2 of the hon. Member's question, I have to say that records of judicial proceedings are not furnished officially to the Secretary of State, and the reports he has seen of the two cases referred to do not enable him to answer these two questions fully. The new Act has been in force since June, 1890, but the manufacture of salt has been prohibited in Bombay for many years. The Act was published in the usual way in the vernacular languages of the Presidency. A reference to the Act will show the definition of the manufacture of salt. The provisions relating thereto are such as to make it clear to natives that offences of the kind are punishable with fine and imprisonment. The sentence of the native Magistrate who imposed the fines in the first instance was, as I understand, referred to the High Court by Mr. Woodward, District Magistrate of Kanara, for revision. The High Court reduced one fine from 15 rupees to 8 annas, or one day's imprisonment; and the other from 10 rupees to 1 anna, or one hour's imprisonment. This revision of the original sentences seems satisfactory, and the Secretary of State sees no reason to interfere.

OPIUM TRAFFIC IN INDIA.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbrightshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he will have printed and laid upon the Table the Papers referred to in the following extract from the Report of the Excise Department of Lower Burma for 1886-87, para. 6, page 4:—

"There was some discussion during the year concerning the principles which should regulate the opium and excise administration. The opinions of selected District Officers were obtained, and towards the close of the year 1886 Sir Charles Bernard submitted to the Government of India a comprehensive Report, with his recommendations for dealing with the several questions involved"?

*SIR J. GORST: The precise Papers described in the hon. Member's question are not in the possession of the Secretary of State, and therefore cannot be laid on the Table. I shall be happy to show the hon. Member a full Report from the Government of India from the Chief Commissioner and Burma officers generally, on the subject, and the Secretary of State's orders thereon. The documents have already been laid on the Table.

MR. MARK STEWART: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Indian Government has been called to the following passage contained in the Report of the Excise Department in Burma for 1889-90, para. 6, page 7 (being an extract from the Report of the Commissioner of Irrawaddy), and whether any action has been taken with a view of repressing the illegal practices therein referred to:—

"Opium legally bought from the Government is illegally sold at a high profit, sent from one district to another, and into the interior, to be retailed in towns and villages by men well known to opium-smokers, and who are, or ought to be, known to the local authorities"?

*SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State has seen the passage in question. The Burma Authorities are striving to repress illegal traffic in opium. Preventive establishments have recently been strengthened, and the Chief Commissioner has inquired if further establishments are needed. The law on the matter is clear and stringent. It is being, and will be, enforced as far as possible. The hon. Member has omitted the following words from the passage quoted:—"Illicit importation of opium is far less common than it was some years ago."

DUTY ON WINES.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the fact that there are many costly high-class wines used by connoisseurs and persons in affluent circumstances which escape the extra duty levied since the 25th March, 1888, on sparkling wines; has he any information to show whether the slight addition to the present duty of 6d. per gallon on all German, French, and Colonial wines, in cask and bottle alike, would yield a larger revenue than the exceptional duty on sparkling wines; and whether, in the interests of the Revenue, and for the more equal treatment of consumers and the different branches of the wine trade, he will consider the advisability of replacing the present extra duty on sparkling wines, by a higher duty on all German, French, and Colonial wines?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Member will remember that my original proposal was to put a small tax on all wines, but partly in deference to the consumers of cheaper wines I did not press that proposal, but substituted one on sparkling wines. I would add that the present would be a particularly unpropitious moment to suggest any change in the Wine Duties.

THE EXPLOSIVES ACT.

MR. BURT (Morpeth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of a miner at Burrador Colliery, who was fined 20s. and costs, on 6th December, at the Moot Hall, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, for having in his house 25lbs. of gunpowder; whether he is aware the quantity was 19lbs. when the weight of the box containing the powder was deducted; and whether, inasmuch as the Explosives Act permits a person to have, "for his own use and not for sale," 30lbs. of powder, the conviction was legal; and, if legal, under what section the defendant was convicted?

Sir J. Gorst

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to this case. I understand that, whatever the exact amount of gunpowder was, it was less than the amount authorised by Section 5 of the Act to be kept "for private use and not for sale." The defendant, however, admitted that he did sell some to a fellow-workman. He was not, therefore, within the benefit of the exemption, and his conviction was legal. I have, however, under all the circumstances, felt justified in advising the remission of the penalty imposed.

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware of the unanimous wish of the whole Police burghs in Scotland that the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill should be proceeded with during the present Session; and whether he can now state if it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to do so?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The hon. Member is not quite correct in saying the wish of these burghs is unanimous in favour of this Bill, as, within the last few days, I received a letter from one of them to an opposite effect. I believe, however, that the wish is general. As regards the second part of the question, I have nothing to add to the answers I gave on 13th February and 5th December, and to the observations of the First Lord of the Treasury on the 9th December of last year, and I have no reason to believe that the position of matters is in any way changed.

THE CHAPEL ROYAL, WHITEHALL.

MR. JAMES (Gateshead): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works in whom the property of the furniture, the pews, pulpit, reading desk, organ, &c., of the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, is legally vested; whether they belong to the Crown or to the Government; whether, in the event of the former, and the Chapel being closed, they become, or are likely to become, the perquisites of the Bishop of London, the United Service Institution, the Lord Chamberlain, or any other official; and whether any item of account connected with the Chapel has ever appeared in the Estimates?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): All the fittings and furniture of the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, are the property of the Government, and are not and will not become the perquisites of any person. The organ is to be transferred to the Chapel at the Tower, and the other ecclesiastical fittings will, as far as possible, be made use of in other Royal chapels. In 1835 Parliament voted £7,665 for fitting up the Chapel, and the cost of its maintenance has constantly appeared in the Estimates as an item in the Vote for Public Buildings, sub-head B. I may as well add that it is a condition of the grant of the old Banqueting Hall to the Royal United Service Institution that, in the alterations which may be necessary for preparing the building for their purposes, there shall be no material interference with the architecture of the structure, either in the exterior or the interior, and that the fine ceiling with paintings by Rubens shall be specially and carefully maintained, and it will be the business of the Office of Works to see that this condition is faithfully observed.

*MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): May I ask who is to have the care of the valuable painted ceiling by Rubens?

MR. PLUNKET: The Institution.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS AT POLLOK-SHIELDS.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the recent appointment of a licensed grocer as postmaster of a branch post and telegraph office at Pollokshields, near Glasgow, and the fact that the work of the post office is carried on on the same premises as the licensed grocer's business, have caused grave dissatisfaction in the district; whether he can see his way to give effect to the public feeling in the matter by removing the post office referred to from its present location; and whether he will lay on the Table of the House a Return of all the post offices in Scotland that are carried on on licensed premises?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The hon. Member is probably aware that I have made it a practice not to appoint licensed grocers in Scotland to the situations in question, except in cases where the exigencies of the Service render a departure from the practice necessary. I am aware that the recent appointment of a Receiver at Pollokshields is not considered satisfactory by a certain section of the inhabitants of the district; but, after full consideration of all the circumstances, I have not seen fit to cancel the nomination of Mr. Izat, which was made by the Lords of the Treasury. I have no objection to lay upon the Table such a Return as that described in the last paragraph of the hon. Member's question if desired by the House; but I scarcely think that any useful result would be attained by such a step.

H.M.S. MOHAWK AND SANDFLY.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if it is correct that the machinery of the new third-class cruiser Mohawk, when recently under trial at Sheerness, was unsatisfactory, and that she broke her port eccentric rod; whether the guns originally fitted on the fore sponsons have been removed and replaced with others of lighter calibre, for the purpose of avoiding the danger attending the plunging of her bows under water; and whether it is correct that vessels of this and the Sandfly class are all overweighted, thus limiting the utility of their guns even in a moderate sea?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The port "eccentric," not "eccentric rod," of Her Majesty's ship Mohawk was found cracked at the recent trial underway. This accident was due to an old flaw. The purpose of these trials is to discover such defects as may have escaped observation during repair. No change has been made in the armament. As the result of experience at sea it is not considered that vessels of the Mohawk and Sandfly classes are overweighted with armament to an extent which limits the utility of their guns in a moderate sea, or prejudices their seaworthiness.

H.M.S. BARRACOUTA.

MR. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is true that the repairs and alterations arising out of the defects in the new cruiser Barracouta have extended over a period of nine months, and that the Admiralty have accepted the ship with a speed, under natural draught, of 13 knots, in place of 16·5 knots, as originally designed and contracted for; if so, whether any, and what, reduction has been obtained from the contract cost; and if, in consequence of the danger attending the working of forced draught to ships and men, the Admiralty intend abandoning the system?

LORD G. HAMILTON: With regard to the Barracouta, the interval between the time at which she satisfactorily passed her trials and the accident which occurred at her first trials was 11 months. The delay was owing to the Coroner's inquiry after the accident, and to the time required to carry out experiments with boilers of a similar type to those of the Barracouta, which resulted in certain alterations being made in her boilers. The Barracouta's natural draught trial, as it is termed, developed a horsepower estimated to drive her at 14½ knots, or a quarter of a knot under the original estimate. It is not intended to abandon forced draught, but only to more strictly regulate and limit its application.

RAILWAYS AND TELEGRAPHIC MESSAGES.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the judicial decision respecting the railways and telegraphic messages to which he alluded in Committee of Supply 23rd July, 1890, has now been given; and, in that case, what steps he proposes to take to remedy an arrangement which has turned out to be so financially detrimental to the public?

MR. RAIKES: A decision on the question referred to by the hon. Member has not yet been given; but my legal advisers are now preparing some proposals which may, I trust, enable me to take action in the direction which he indicates.

SALE OF OPIUM IN HONG KONG.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the annual increase of revenue (246,325 dollars on a present total of 477,600) derived from the sale of opium in Hong Kong, as stated in the Report on the Blue Book for 1889; and whether it is contemplated to take any steps to discourage the increased use of opium which such increase of revenue indicates?
Mr. Courley

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The opium farm at Hong Kong was leased for a period of three years from March, 1889, at 477,600 dollars per annum, as against 182,400 dollars per annum for the preceding three years. The farmer has the sole privilege of preparing opium in Hong Kong, not only for consumption in the Colony, but also for export, and the amount exported to China, Australia, and other places considerably exceeds the amount consumed in the Colony. The Secretary of State has no reason to think that the above-mentioned increase of revenue was due to the increased use of opium by the people of Hong Kong; but it is believed that it was mainly due to the new Opium Ordinance passed in 1887, which had the effect of preventing the smuggling of prepared opium into China.

HACKNEY CARRIAGE STANDS AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether application has been made to the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police for the appointment of hackney carriage standings near the British Museum; and whether at the present time the Commissioner is prevented from fixing the standings by the 46 Geo. III., c. 134, s. 35; and, if such is the case, whether he will take action to get so much of this Act repealed as interferes with the convenience of the public and the hackney carriage trade?

MR. MATTHEWS: The answer to the first and second questions of the hon. Member is in the affirmative. The 46 Geo. III., c. 134, was a local and personal Act, under which money was raised for the improvement of Bloomsbury Square by rates levied from the occupiers and owners of houses there; and I do not think it would be reasonable to repeal it without giving those owners and occupiers an opportunity of being heard, and without carefully balancing their claims against the amount of public convenience that might result from the repeal.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to ascertain the opinion of those interested in the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no power to do so.

ALLEGED BURIAL SCANDAL AT LLANAHAR.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a report in the Cambrian News of 23rd January, of the action taken by the Rev. E. Hughes, Rector of Barmouth, on the occasion of the burial of Mrs. Ellen Parry, an aged widow lady, who had expressed a strong desire to be buried by the side of her late husband in the churchyard of Llanahar (of which the Rector is incumbent), under the provisions of "The Burials Act, 1880," from which it appears that, in consequence of a dispute between the Rector and the executors of the deceased as to the amount of the burial fee payable to him (involving the payment of a contested half-crown), the Rector, in the alleged exercise of his right of control over the churchyard, refused to allow the deceased to be buried by the side of her husband, and directed a grave to be dug for her in a remote part of the churchyard, where suicides and bodies washed up by the sea are usually buried, and

"That it is understood that the Rector intends to further exercise his right by not allowing any inscription to be put over the grave of the deceased";

whether he is aware that the action of the Rector in availing himself of his right over the churchyard in such a manner has given rise to grave dissatisfaction in the neighbourhood; and whether, if such action be warranted by the strict letter of the law, the Government will give facilities for the passing of a measure which will prevent its recurrence?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the refusal of the Rector of Banmouth (Merionethshire) to grant burial of the remains of a lady parishioner in her husband's grave, and to his assigning for such burial a corner in the churchyard usually reserved for the interment of suicides and of bodies of unknown persons cast upon the shore; whether he is aware that a notice was given by the deceased lady's executors of their intention to avail themselves of the provisions of the Burials Act in favour of Nonconformists; and whether the Government are prepared to bring in a Bill to obviate the recurrence of such incidents?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Rector of Barmouth that the grave in question was not the property of the deceased's husband and she had no right of interment there, and it was not, in his opinion, convenient that the deceased lady should be buried in the same grave as her husband, in which there was no receptacle for a second coffin. He accordingly gave instructions for her burial in a place generally used for burying, and not in any sense reserved for suicides and cast-up bodies, but where some of the most respected inhabitants and visitors of the place lie interred. Notice was given, and the funeral conducted, in strict accordance with the Burials Act, 1880. I gather that the Rector took the course he did in the exercise of his discretion as freeholder of the churchyard. I have seen a leading article in the Cambrian News commenting on the case in a way not unfavourable to the Rector, and I am not aware whether there is grave dissatisfaction in the neighbourhood. Any friction that may have arisen was not, in my opinion, due to any defect in the law; and I am not prepared to suggest any measure by which such incidents could be prevented.

In reply to a further question by MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN,

MR. MATTHEWS said: In the answer I have given to the right hon. Gentleman I have quoted the very words of the Rector.

THE SAMOAN TREATY.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the Samoan Treaty has yet been put into force?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Chief Justice and the British Land Commissioner have been appointed and have started for Samoa. It is hoped that the High Commissioner for the Western Pacific will shortly be able to issue the necessary regulations for the enforcement of the final Act of the Samoan Conference, so far as British subjects are concerned. The Treaty Powers have agreed upon the nomination of a President of the Municipal Council of Apia.

THE REV. S. W. BAKER.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it was upon instructions from the Home Authorities that the High Commissioner of the Western Pacific removed the Rev. S. W. Baker from Tonga, and what were the reasons for his removal?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government did not direct the High Commissioner to remove Mr. Baker, but fully approved his action in requiring Mr. Baker not to reside in Tonga for a period of two years. The High Commissioner, when on a visit to Tonga last summer, made a careful inquiry into the charges brought against Mr. Baker, and found that he had been the cause of great persecution, oppression, and cruelty, and that his misconduct could only result in civil disturbance. As to Mr. Baker's conduct in the past, I may refer the hon. Baronet to the Report by Sir Charles Mitchell of May 6, 1887, in the Parliamentary Paper, C. 5,106, of July, 1887. At that time Sir Charles Mitchell had great doubts whether he ought not to remove Mr. Baker.

ENGLAND AND PORTUGAL IN AFRICA.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether the Government have received information that the Charter alleged to have been recently granted by Portugal to the Mozambique Company contains provisions hostile to British interests; and whether, having regard to the fact that the British South Africa Company had secured concessions in Manicaland and the neighbouring territories before the modus vivendi, the Government will recognise and secure the recognition of such concessions by Portugal as a basis of any further negotiations with that country?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have seen a draft Charter of the Portuguese and Mozambique Company, some of the provisions of which are decidedly unfavourable to British interests. This has been pointed out to the Portuguese Government. We have not been informed that the Charter has been signed. In view of pending negotiations, I am unable to answer the second paragraph of the question.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has received several communications from the Chairman and Secretary of the "Ophir Concessions, Limited," and from Mr. Clements, the representative of the Barberton Syndicate, Transvaal, and from other persons holding contracts from the Mozambique Company, complaining of the action of the Chartered South Africa Company, in regard to the invasion of Manica, as prejudicial to their interests, and to those whom they represent; and, if so, what reply has been made to these communications, and whether he will lay the correspondence upon the Table of the House; whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that, in Blue Book, Africa, No. 2, 1890, Mr. Consul O'Neill advised Her Majesty's Government of the establishment of the Mozambique Company of Lisbon, of their having placed a launch on the Pungue River in July, 1888, and referred to Gonvera as the "virtual ruler" of Manica, under the Portuguese Government; and whether, in any subsequent communication with the Portuguese Government, Her Majesty's Government took exception to the above reported condition of affairs; whether it is correct, as stated in the Daily News of 28th January, that early in October, 1890, Mr. Trevor, styled "acting resident" of the Chartered Company at Mutassa Krnal, issued the following instructions to all prospectors working in the neighbourhood:—

"I have been instructed by Mr. Colquhoun, the Administrator of Mashonaland, to inform you and all the prospectors at the Untali and Revire goldfields that an Anglo-Portuguese arrangement has been signed which brings all this portion of South-East Africa, including all the Manica country for a considerable distance east of Masi-Kesse, under British influence;"

whether the Chartered Company is now exercising powers of government in Manica, although the alleged Treaty with Mutassa has not yet received the approval of Her Majesty's Secretary of State; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made of the Chartered Company as to whether the concession from Lobengula, in connection with which the Charter was granted, is owned by the company, or if the company is merely a lessee from another company owning the concession, and receives one-half of the possible net profits in consideration of undertaking the obligations set forth in the Charter, and all other expenses connected with the expeditionary force into Mashonaland?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Communications have been received complaining of the action of the Chartered South Africa Company in regard to Manica, and their receipt has been acknowledged. They represent the views of the writers as interested parties, and it would not be advisable to publish the correspondence. Consul O'Neill, in his Despatches of the 10th and 20th of August and 7th of September, 1888, reported that he had heard as to the attempts of Señor d'Almeida to obtain permission from Gun gun hana for prospectors to work in his territory, and as to the endeavours of Major Paiva d'Andrade to extend by force Portugal's territorial and commercial influence South of the Zambesi. He spoke of the rumoured launch of a steamer on the Pungue, and of the purchase of other steamers, but expressed a doubt as to their destination and as to their being really owned by the Mozambique Company, which had been formed at Lisbon with an insignificant capital. He stated that De Souza, or Gouveia, was "real" Ruler of Manica, and had been induced to lend his assistance to the Portuguese Government in carrying on military operations against other Chiefs. No representations were made by Her Majesty's Government in consequence of this Report. We are not aware if the instruction, said to have been issued by Mr. Colquhoun, and stating that a certain portion of the Manica country and other territories had, by an Anglo-Portuguese arrangement, been brought under British influence, was, in fact, issued; but, if so, it was incorrect. The Chartered Company is not, to the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government, exercising powers of government beyond the line referred to in the modus vivendi. It has already been stated that Her Majesty's Government are not, and obviously should not be, responsible for the financial arrangement of the British South Africa Company, but the arrangement mentioned in the question, if it exists, would not be contrary to the Charter.

THEATRICAL ENTERTAINMENTS AT WOOLWICH BARRACKS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that theatrical entertainments are given at the Recreation Rooms, Woolwich, under the management of Major Jocelyn, R.A., to which a charge for admission is made, as much as £50 being taken on one night; that the bulk of the audience are civilians, who pay for admission, whilst applications from Non-commissioned Officers and men to their Commanding Officers for passes to admit their male friends have been refused, such refusal having been confirmed on appeal by the General Officer Commanding; whether these entertainments are subject to the Queen's Regulations, 1889, Part II., Section XV., Paragraph 75, which runs as follows:—

"No money will be taken for admission to such entertainments, and Non-commissioned Officers and men should be permitted to invite their male friends thereto;"

and, if so, whether he will give instructions that this Regulation shall be strictly complied with?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The facts are as stated in the question, with the exception that the theatre at Woolwich is quite distinct from the Recreation Rooms. When the Regulation quoted by the hon. Member was drafted it was illegal to take money in a regimental theatre if unlicensed. By the Army Annual Act of 1889 the disability was removed, and the Regulations in question should have been altered to accord with the Act of Parliament. The Regulations will be amended forthwith.

THE INTERNATIONAL MARITIME CONFERENCE AT WASHINGTON.

SIR GEORGE BADEN - POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it has been decided to circulate any more Papers recording the proceedings, including the Protocols, of the International Maritime Conference held at Washington last year?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes, Sir; further Papers concerning the International Maritime Conference of last year are in the Press, but they are bulky, and may not be ready for distribution for two or three weeks.

THE SCOTCH RAILWAY STRIKE.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that several accidents have occurred on the Caledonian and North British Railways during the present strike, resulting in loss of life, in at least one case; why no Board of Trade inquiry has been held in any of these cases; and whether, in view of his statement on Friday last that railway accidents that occur during strikes need presumably more careful inquiry than accidents that occur at other times, he will cause an inquiry to be held into the most important of those that have occurred during the last five weeks?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): There have during the last five weeks been two train accidents, resulting in loss of life, both on the Caledonian. Into one an inquiry was directed some days ago. The other was not of a nature to require an official inquiry. The Returns of the other train accidents not causing loss of life have been carefully examined, but with the exception of two cases of collision with buffer stops, which are still under consideration, they were also not of a nature to require official inquiry.

CHARITIES IN LAMBETH.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether the attention of the Charity Commissioners has been called to the recent exposures as to the Charities in the parish of Lambeth, as set forth in a Report prepared by Mr. Henry Dann, at the request of the overseers of that parish, and as published in the South London Press; whether the Commissioners have been requested to institute an inquiry into the administration of the Lambeth Charities, or any part of them; and whether they are willing to grant such an inquiry, and to consider the advisability of placing the whole of the Lambeth Charities under an Administrative Board representing the whole of the inhabitants of such parish?

Mr. Brodrick

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The Commissioners were requested to institute an inquiry into the matters mentioned in Mr. Dann's Report on the Lambeth Charities, or to nominate an accountant by whom such inquiry should be held free of charge to the Charity. The Commissioners accepted the latter alternative, and they believe the inquiry is now in progress. They have long been of opinion that the administration of the Lambeth Charities should be concentrated, as far as possible, in the hands of a single body of Trustees, largely constituted on a representative basis, and they are taking steps to procure the necessary applications enabling them to proceed in this matter.

THE TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill will apply to lands and tenements, the tithes of which have been commuted by any Act of Parliament made before the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836, in the same manner as such lands and tenements were excluded from the operation of the last-mentioned Act?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am not quite sure that I understand the question of my hon. Friend; but I may refer him to Subsection 2 of the 4th clause of the Bill for a definition of the expression "tithe rent-charge."

THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

MR. WATT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now state the decision of the Government with reference to the recommendations of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into certain matters affecting the interests of the Western Highlands and Islands of Scotland?

DR. CLARK: I beg, on the same subject, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to adopt any of the schemes proposed by the Royal Commission on the Highlands and Islands; and whether they intend to do anything in reference to the matter during the present Session?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Government have come to certain decisions in regard to the First Report of the Royal Commission on the Western Highlands and Islands of Scotland, and are now engaged in the consideration of the Second Report. We shall shortly have to ask the House to provide money to carry out those recommendations of the Commission which the Government has decided to adopt; and I think it advisable to postpone till then any statement of our intentions, as any information which I could give at present would be incomplete, owing to the serious indisposition of the Secretary for Scotland, who has taken the greatest interest in the question, but has been unable to confer with his Colleagues upon the matter since the December Session.

DR. KOCH'S DISCOVERIES.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury would Her Majesty's Government consider the propriety of communicating with other civilised Governments to ascertain if the latter would join in conferring a reasonable pecuniary reward on Dr. Koch, for the eminent services he has rendered to humanity?

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Before the First Lord answers the question of my hon. and gallant Friend, I would like to ask him whether he has also taken into account the extraordinary percentage of deaths that have occurred in connection with this alleged discovery?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure the hon. Gentleman will not expect me to express an opinion on that subject. For myself, I thoroughly appreciate the generous instincts which have prompted the hon. and gallant Gentleman to put this question; but without in the slightest degree depreciating the very great services to humanity which have been rendered by Dr. Koch, it must be admitted he does not stand alone as a learned, patient, and laborious investigator of the resources of nature for the benefit of mankind. His great reward is the evident appreciation of the value of his work by his own profession in all parts of the world, and the sense of the benefits he has conferred upon his fellow-creatures. I do not think any action of Her Majesty's Government could really add to the satisfaction Dr. Koch must feel at the reception given by the civilised world to his discovery, and perhaps I may be excused for hesitating to add a new function to the responsibilities of Government.

DISTRICT COUNCILS BILL.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): May I ask the President of the Local Government Board if it is intended to take the District Councils Bill before Easter?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): That will depend entirely upon the course of Public Business.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE CRIMES ACT IN IRELAND.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will be good enough to state what day it would be convenient for the Government to place at our disposal for the discussion of Irish administration? Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would also tell us what other arrangements he has in his mind as to the course of Public Business in this House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am glad to be able to respond to the invitation of the right hon. Gentleman. The House is in possession at the present moment of the Tithe Rent-Charge Bill. We think it right, and for the convenience of the House, that we should pass that Bill through the requisite stages before proceeding to take any other Government business. On the assumption that the Tithe Bill has passed through those stages by Monday week, I propose to place that day at the disposal of the right hon. Gentleman, if that will be a convenient day for him.

MR. J. MORLEY assented.

SCOTCH AMERICAN MAILS.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state on how many occasions, during the year 1890, the up Scotch mail trains carrying American correspondence missed connection with the Irish mail trains, so that the Scotch letters did not reach Queenstown in time for the steamers by which they should have been despatched; whether he is aware that, notwithstanding the serious complaints of the loss and inconvenience caused to Scotch merchants and exporters by the failures to make connection between those trains in the early part of the year, such failures again occurred on 8th October and 10th and 31st December; whether the Railway Companies, by their contracts to carry the mails, are subject to any penalties when they fail to deliver them in due time; and, if so, whether such penalties are enforced; and whether it is probable the Scotch mails for the United States will be forwarded hereafter with greater regularity?

*MR. RAIKES: I have ascertained that the failures to which the hon. Member refers occurred on eight occasions during the year 1890, including those specially named. The Railway Companies are not, under their contracts for the conveyance of mails, subject to any penalties for delay in delivering them; but my Department is in constant communication with the companies relative to the working of the mail trains, and suitable representations are always made to them respecting any serious delay that appears to have been avoidable. I am sorry to say that during the present month the unusual difficulties attending the conduct of railway business in Scotland have had a prejudicial effect on the mail service generally, as well as upon the communication from Scotland to the United States; but I trust that these irregularities will soon be terminated, and the hon. Member may rely on the Post Office doing its utmost to prevent delay to the mails.

Mr. W. H. Smith

IRELAND—CONDUCT OF POLICE AT EVICTIONS.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, in view of his statement that the stone throwing by the police, at the eviction of Mrs. McGinley at Meenacaddy on 15th November, was done in panic, whether he is aware that the police threw stones continuously from the time they commenced the attack on the house until the house was entered, and that the bailiffs made no serious attempt to get into the house at all; and whether the attack by the police, with the assistance of a ladder on the roof of the house and by the throwing of stones, was almost simultaneous with the attempt at entry by the bailiffs?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension. I did not state that the stone throwing was the result of a panic, but that it was resorted to in self-defence. The premises were entered by the police, and while they were engaged in the performance of their duty stones were thrown at them. It is not the fact that the police threw stones continuously.

MR. DALTON: Is it not the fact that the Commissioner of Police swore at the trial that he had not a good view, and only saw one stone thrown?

MR. MADDEN: I believe the Commissioner did say that he saw stones thrown.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— CONSTABLES WATERS AND O'SHEA.

MR. WEBB: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether there would be any objection to laying before the House the grounds of the release, by order of the Lord Lieutenant, after about 10 days' imprisonment, of the two constables of the Royal Irish Constabulary, named Waters and O'Shea, who last October were by Mr. O'Donel, Chief Magistrate of the Dublin Police Courts, sentenced to terms of one month and three months' imprisonment respectively, with hard labour, for assaulting two members of the Dublin Metropolitan Police, who had remonstrated with them for using obscene language in the public street?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The sentences referred to were modified on a Memorial submitted by the men, who appealed to their previous good conduct, and to the fact that the occurrence had arisen suddenly and without premeditation. This Memorial came before the convicting Magistrate, who, in view of the facts, approved of the substitution of fines. This was accordingly done.

DISTRESS AND RELIEF WORKS.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he could now state if works of the class mentioned in the Relief of Distress Act would soon be started to relieve the distress in the Tuam and Glenamaddy Unions?

MR. COX: I have also to ask the Chief Secretary whether he will state the number of relief works he has approved of in East Clare, and if any of these are now in course of construction?

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether any relief works will be opened up in the Inchigiela and Clondrahid district to provide work and food for the labourers; and whether attention will be paid to the appeals of the Rev. Fathers Hurley, P.P., and Aherne, P.P., "that the condition of the labourers in these districts demands instant attention"; also whether his attention has been called to the statement of the Rev. Father Lyons, P.P., of Myross, made before the Skibbereen Board of Guardians, and supported by Dr. Levis, J.P., and the words of Father Lyons—

"That the people of Castlehaven and Toehad are starving, many of them during the past week living on boiled turnips and, in default, garbage shockingly unfit for human use. Let them, in God's name, get outdoor relief as they cannot get work";

whether he is aware the Board have adopted a resolution—

"Again calling on the Government to immediately send relief in food and money, as otherwise we tremble to contemplate the result. Not a single day should be lost"; and what steps will be taken to prevent disaster? I have further to ask if the proposed Donoughmore and Blarney Line of Light Railway will, in view of the grave distress owing to the failure of the potato crop in the district, be granted such material support as will help to assist the unemployed and distressed by promoting a useful public work?

On the first of these questions being put,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: With the permission of the House I shall now also reply to the questions of other hon. Members on this subject. A full opportunity will be afforded before Easter of discussing the whole relief policy of the Government. In the meanwhile, all representations made, from whatever quarter, will be carefully considered; but I hope hon. Members will not endeavour, by questions across the floor of the House, to put Parliamentary pressure on the Government to start out of public money in their constituencies works for the construction of which their constituents are naturally desirous. It must be recollected that the ordinary means of relief through the operation of the Poor Law are available to all, and that public works are an exceptional means of meeting an exceptional crisis, which should only be sparingly employed, and in cases of undoubted necessity.

COLONEL NOLAN: Will not public works be pernicious, in so far as they interfere with seed sowing?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not believe that any of the works started by the Government, and the rate of remuneration paid, will divert labourers from other occupations.

COLONEL NOLAN: Has the right hon. Gentleman received Reports from any responsible officials stating that that will not be the case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I spend my life in conversation with officials on these points, and, on the whole, considering what is the remuneration offered to not more than one member of a family, I do not think the works will be a serious temptation such as would induce people to leave other work. Further, if I found real evils resulting, it would be in my power to take action at a moment's notice.

COLONEL NOLAN: I do not see how the evil is to be avoided if the works are not started before the time for seed sowing.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Relief works cannot be started until they are necessary.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): At what time before Easter will the Vote be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, the Vote will have to be taken before the close of the financial year. Any date that is convenient to the House will be convenient to me.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the leader of the House whether he will put down Supply for the earliest available day, so that the Vote may be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not able to give the absolute assurance desired. It is possible that developments in Ireland may render it desirable that further information should be obtained before the Vote is asked for; but ample opportunity will be afforded to all Members interested to express their opinions on the subject.

DR. TANNER: May I ask for an explicit answer to the question whether consideration has been given to earnest representations from clergymen that the condition of labourers in Inchigiela and Clondrahid demands instant attention, and whether relief works will be opened?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: All representations made by responsible persons, such as the clergy are, receive careful attention.

DR. TANNER: How soon may I hope to receive a satisfactory reply?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is difficult to know what reply the hon. Member would consider satisfactory. The House, however, will feel that it is no unreasonable request I have made that pressure should not be put upon me with respect to isolated localities by a succession of detached questions.

DR. TANNER: I must press for an answer to the question relating to Skibbereen.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Relief works have been started there for some time.

DR. TANNER: Will the proposed Donoughmore or Blarney Line of Light Railways, in view of the grave distress owing to the failure of the potato crop in the district, be granted such material support as will help the unemployed and distressed by promoting a useful public work?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The proposed line referred to has, I understand, passed the Grand Jury and the Privy Council, with a guarantee under the Tramways Act of 1883, and the consequent Treasury contribution under that Act. The promoters of the line, upon taking out their Order in Council, can proceed with the works forthwith.

In reply to questions by Mr. Cox,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: There are no relief works in East Clare. Reports have been received indicating that, largely owing, as I understand it, to the severe weather, employment has been scarce in Ennis. This is much to be deplored; but it is not to meet cases of this kind that so exceptional a course should be taken as that of starting relief works out of Imperial funds.

THE STRANORLAR-GLENTIES LIGHT RAILWAY.

MR. DALTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland the cause of the delay in commencing the work of the Stranorlar and Glenties Railway; and whether he can give any assurance that the work shall be commenced without delay, as there is great distress but no employment in the district?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Everything that it is in the power of the Government to do to expedite the construction of this line has been done. The delay has not been with them. But, as the hon. Member is aware, it is of the greatest importance to the district to make such arrangements with a working company as may relieve it of all possibility of charge after the line has been finished.

IRISH JURORS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware of the hardships entailed upon jurors under the present system, by which men are summoned from various parts of their respective counties with no prisoners to try; and if he will consider whether some plan can be adopted to obviate occurrences of this kind?

MR. MADDEN: I fully appreciate the inconvenience experienced by jurors under the circumstances mentioned by my hon. Friend in his question, and I shall gladly consider any plan which may be suggested which would have the effect of preventing their occurrence. I may point out that the difficulty in dealing with the question is caused by the fact that cases may be sent for trial up to the last moment, while, in the interests of the jurors themselves, it is right that they should receive reasonable notice beforehand that their services will be required.

THE IRISH CHURCH SURPLUS.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many years' purchase of the interest on the £1,500,000 of the Irish Church Surplus is charged upon that Surplus by the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, and included in Return No. 134 of 1890?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR referred the hon. Member to the Return published. He would there see that the rate of interest was calculated at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., and by a very simple arithmetical calculation, the number of years' purchase could be ascertained.

IRISH CONSTABULARY FORCE FUND.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any steps are being taken to wind up the Constabulary Force Fund; and, if not, whether there is any intention on the part of the authorities to meet the wishes of the Constabulary pensioners interested in it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The position of the Government with regard to the Fund mentioned is fully stated in my reply to a question on the subject put by the hon. Member for West Belfast, on August 11 last, to which I now refer the hon. Member. He will there observe that it is not intended to take any step for the closing or winding up of the Fund, other than is provided in Section 11 of the Constabulary and Police (Ireland) Act, 1883, whereby the insurance or benefit branch of the Fund is in course of gradual extinction. The Government has undertaken, in order to make this branch of the Fund solvent, to aid it with a considerable grant of public money.

MR. SEXTON: What steps do the Government propose to take to insure that the arrangement which they intend to make will be satisfactory to the contributories?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think there will be no doubt the arrangements will be satisfactory to the contributories. All that they can desire is that the Fund shall be made solvent, and that the benefits they have been led to expect will be secured. That result will be arrived at by the arrangements to be made.

ENNIS POST OFFICE.

MR. COX: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been directed to a resolution, adopted by the Ennis Board of Guardians at their last meeting, calling on the contractor of the new post office about to be erected in Ennis to commence the work forthwith, in order to give employment to the poor labourers of the town who are destitute from want of employment; and whether, in view of the great distress prevailing amongst the labouring classes in that town and district, he will issue instructions to the contractor to commence the work at once?

*MR. RAIKES: The construction of the new Post Office building at Ennis is being carried out under the charge of the Board of Public Works in Ireland, and not of the Post Office Department. I have received no intimation of the resolution mentioned by the hon. Member; but I shall be very happy to convey to the Board of Public Works any communication which may reach me from the Ennis Board of Guardians.

THE SHANNON NAVIGATION.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Shannon navigation is controlled by the Irish Board of Works; whether he is aware that no lights are provided by the Board in connection with the Shannon navigation, to enable steamers, boats, &c., to travel at night; and whether the Board will conform to the English practice, namely, that of the Harbour Department of the Board of Works, by providing suitable and sufficient lighting accommodation to enable vessels to be navigated on the waters under its care?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): The Irish Board of Works only controls the navigation of the Shannon above Limerick, and I am not aware that they are under any statutory or other obligation to light that portion of the river. As regards the English practice, I understand that the Board of Trade have nothing to do with lighting the non-tidal parts of rivers.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY

BILL.—(No. 110.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

(4.25.) Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 3, at end, to add the words—

“Nothing in this Act shall impose or constitute any personal liability upon any occupier or owner of lands for the payment of any tithe rent-charge, or any other sum which by this Act is made recoverable as tithe rent-charge, and the Court shall not, by virtue of this Act, have any power to imprison any such occupier or owner by reason only of the non-payment of such tithe rent-charge or other sum.”—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

(4.26.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I entirely approve of the Amendment, but I would ask the right hon. Gentleman who has put it on the Paper whether he has any objection to include in its terms the question of costs, which naturally belongs to it? The question has been raised of personal liability with respect to the person against whom the judgment is levied. If there is to be the personal liability of the individual, that complicates the whole question of tithe rent-charge, because there has always hitherto been the unbroken principle that there should be no personal liability imposed. The question of costs is a very important one, as the costs may amount to more than the sum to be levied.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is now discussing his own Amendment which is on the Paper. He is entitled to ask a question with regard to the Amendment now before the Committee, but not to discuss his own Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I was proposing to do away with the necessity of my own Amendment if the right hon.

Sir H. Maxwell

Gentleman would consent to my proposal. I was making these remarks preliminary to moving an Amendment to that of the right hon. Gentleman, but I would rather that the right hon. Gentleman would do it himself. If necessary, however, I will move an Amendment including the question of costs. I have taken the course I have entirely with the view of saving time.

*(4.29.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. Hicks Beach, Bristol, W.): I was under the impression that this Bill would have the precise effect which the right hon. Gentleman desires to secure by his Amendment, and with verbal Amendments I have no objection to the words being inserted. I thought, however, that the question of costs was not raised at all by the present Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT: What is wanted is a declaration as to personal liability.

*(4.30.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): If I might suggest it to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, the difficulty would be met by changing three or four words in the Government Amendment, and the question of costs clearly defined thereby. The Amendment I suggest is the omission of the words “which by this Act is made recoverable as tithe rent-charge” in the third line, and the insertion, instead thereof, of the words “recoverable or payable under this Act,” and the omission of the word “only” in the last line but one. The Amendment would then read as follows:—

“Nothing in this Act shall impose or constitute any personal liability upon any occupier or owner of lands for the payment of any tithe rent-charge, or any other sum recoverable or payable under this Act; and the Court shall not, by virtue of this Act, have any power to imprison any such occupier or owner by reason of the non-payment of such tithe rent-charge or other sum.”

If this Amendment is adopted, I shall be pleased to withdraw my Amendment dealing with the same matter.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the words “which by this Act is made recoverable as tithe rent-charge,” and insert the words “recoverable or payable under this Act.”—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

(4.31.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I am in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman. Possibly it would be more convenient thus to amend his Amendment than to deal with the question of costs in a separate proviso.

*(4.32.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): My own impression is that the existing provision of Section 2 is quite sufficient to prevent any question arising over the words "recoverable as tithe rent-charge." I do not know that any Amendment is necessary, but if it be thought better, I should be willing to add the words the hon. Member has suggested. I agree it is desirable to deal with the whole question in one proviso.

*(4.33.) MR. S. T. EVANS: May I point out that as the section stands the words "or any other sum by this Act recoverable" would seem to apply to the sum recoverable from the tenant by the landlord only.

*(4.34.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): Supposing the tithepayer does not pay the tithe, and is made bankrupt, and in the course of the bankruptcy proceedings declines to answer a number of collateral questions, can he be committed for contempt of Court? That has happened in Ireland, and may happen in England, if we are not careful.

*(4.35.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): He cannot be made a bankrupt, for no personal liability is imposed under the Act.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

Another Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 5, to leave out the word "only."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'only' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

*(4.36.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not see any reason for leaving out this word. If a man resists a bailiff or County Court officer he is amenable under the County Court Act, and liable to a fine not exceeding £5. I think the word is necessary, to make it clear that imprisonment cannot be imposed for non-payment of either tithe or costs.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: No one would argue that if a County Court bailiff were assaulted the person assaulting him should not be amenable to justice. But it seems to me that if the word "only" is retained, although you cannot imprison a man for non-payment of tithe or costs alone, you can do so for that non-payment in conjunction with something else.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I am satisfied that the word is necessary, in order to call particular attention to the absence of the power of imprisonment in respect of a refusal to pay tithe or costs.

(4.37.) SIR W. HARCOURT: It must be remembered that the tithepayer is not to be put under new penalties. The tithe owner will reap great benefit by reason of the use of the County Court bailiff, and we must take care that the tithepayer is not made liable to any heavier penalty than he is at present. Why should he be made liable to a heavier penalty simply because the County Court bailiff is substituted for the tithe owner's agent? For resisting the latter he was liable to a fine of £1, for resisting the former, you propose to make the penalty £5. Do you wish to make him subject to imprisonment for doing that for which he cannot now be imprisoned?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Certainly not.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then leave out the word "only." You must take care you are not giving any additional jurisdiction under this Act. I have looked upon this Bill as transferring the duty of tithe payment from the tenant to the landlord, and as substituting the County Court bailiff for the tithe owner's agent. These are the only two things the Bill professes to do. You ought, in my opinion, to leave the tithepayer in the presence of the County Court bailiff exactly as he is in the presence of the tithe owner's agent. You ought not to make his position worse. I cannot see why you should not omit the word "only." If you have not the power to imprison the tithepayer now, you ought not to acquire it under this Act.

*(4.41.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I should like to know whether the Attorney General contends that if a tithe payer assaulted a bailiff, and immediately afterwards paid his tithe, that such payment would free him from liability for the assault? I take it the omission of the word "only" would not touch the question of assault upon an officer of the Court in the execution of the order of the Court.

(4.42.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): If the Attorney General sees no such contingency possible as we fear, why will he not strike out the word and leave the matter to be dealt with by the ordinary law?

*(4.43.) SIR R. WEBSTER: Assault is not the only case that might arise. Take the ordinary case of a man resisting the bailiff, and doing something short of assault; you cannot deal with that offence by imprisonment unless you bring it under the ordinary County Court Act. If anybody can show that the retention of the word does any harm I will consider the matter further. I am convinced its omission will do harm, for I think we ought to be sure that the clause is so framed as not to give an opportunity for argument.

*(4.44.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I will put in one sentence, my objection to the word "only." If anybody reads the clause with that word in, he cannot but come to the conclusion that although a man cannot be imprisoned simply for the non-payment of tithe and costs, he may be imprisoned partly for that and partly for something else, e.g., resisting the bailiff. Any other offence for which he may be made amenable to the law should be entirely distinct from the non-payment of tithe. I think the above would be the conclusion arrived at by any layman.

(4.45.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I have a very important question to put to the Government. Is this clause intended to reserve to the County Court Judge the power of committal to prison for contempt? The Amendment places in the hands of the Court the mere operation of distress, but the question is, does it carry with it the very indefinite and oppressive power of committal for contempt. We are now handing this matter over to the Court, and we ought to know precisely what powers the Court will possess. In my opinion we ought to insert words excluding the power of committal. If under the present Act a man is sent to prison for contempt, no one knows when he will come out again, and, therefore, if you are not careful you will be putting the tithepayer in a very uncertain and dangerous position.

Mr. J. Bryn Roberts

*(4.46.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The right hon. Gentleman appears to have forgotten the statement I have twice made. The tithepayer is not made subject to contempt for non-payment, and this clause will distinctly prevent any such point ever being raised as far as the County Court is concerned. But suppose that a bailiff is sent to serve the order of the Court, and the tithepayer bars his house, or is guilty of the violence which prevents the bailiff executing his duty, then he is amenable to the ordinary law, under which the County Court bailiff can summon a man so acting, and take him before the County Court Judge. He may, too, proceed against him for assault. We intend the same remedy shall apply in the case of the tithepayer. I am perfectly candid with the House. I repeat there will be no imprisonment for non-payment of tithe or of costs, but I cannot imagine that any reasonable person would wish that the bailiff shall be subject to a different rule while executing his duty under this Act, than the one which applies to the performance of his duties under the ordinary Act.

*(4.48.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I do not think that this Amendment carries out the views either of the Government or of my hon. Friend, and I am sure the wording of it will have to be carefully studied before the Report stage. For instance, you have in it the words "the Court shall not by virtue of this Act." The Court will have no power "by virtue of this Act" to imprison, but is it to have the power by virtue of any other Act? Surely, the Attorney General will agree there is reasonable doubt on that point, and that it might involve litigation. We ought to make perfectly clear the meaning of the Government.

*(4.50.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The reason why those words have been inserted is that this Act for the first time brings the matter into the region of the County Court, and that being so, we thought it right to indicate that the County Court Judge had no power of committal under it. It may, I admit, be necessary to omit the words "by virtue of this Act." But I do urge that the word "only" is necessary to show we are dealing with the question of non-payment as distinct from that of misconduct.

*(4.51.) MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I think that is an additional argument for the omission of the word "only." If a man be guilty of violence he is subject to imprisonment under the ordinary law, if the offence be of a criminal character. But you are introducing a composite offence. You may couple with the non-payment the offence of resisting the bailiff, and for that this clause will give the power of committal. If a man bars a window, or does any act of that kind, it may be a guilty, or it may be merely an unnecessary act. If it be a guilty act, by all means let him be punished; but you ought not to make the barring of a window and the refusal to pay a composite offence. If the former act is an offence at all it can be dealt with under the ordinary law, and it does not need an Act of Parliament to make it punishable, but if it is not an offence under the ordinary law you ought not to make it so now by reason of coupling an equivocal act with the refusal to pay. Again, the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton as to the words "by virtue of this Act" had struck me. If they convey no hostile intention, they certainly seem to leave the way open to grave misapprehension.

(4.54.) MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): It seems to me the retention of the word "only" clearly violates the rule laid down to guide us—namely, that you cannot by this Bill put any fresh penalties on the tithe-payer which are not embodied in the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836. You are now substituting the County Court bailiff for the tithe owner's agent. If the latter were assaulted when collecting the tithe he had his remedy at Common Law, but because the duty is now to be performed by an officer of the County Court you are adding the penalty for contempt of Court, despite your pledge that you would not do so. I shall certainly support the Amendment.

*(4.55.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: Has the hon. and learned Gentleman conceded the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I have undertaken to consider it.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: Then I think I need not dwell upon that point. But I must say I do not think it desirable in these days to increase the power of the Court to commit for contempt. It is perfectly clear that if you pass this clause in the form in which it now stands you will extend that power. At present, if a farmer refuses to pay, and actually resists the distress, the only remedy is to try him before a jury. Now, you propose to give the County Court Judge the power to commit. See how extensive is that power. If any officer or bailiff of the Court be assaulted in the execution of his duty, the person assaulting him is liable to a fine not exceeding £5, on summary conviction, and it is also lawful for the bailiff to take the offender into custody with or without warrant. There was no such power or remedy before. We have been told that the remedies under this new Act are not to be heavier than those under the old, but by leaving the clause as it at present stands you are violating that promise. I do hope the Government will agree to omit the word "only."

*(4.57.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The right hon. Gentleman has exposed the fallacy of the whole argument in favour of the omission of the word. We are not making the penalties heavier. But will any reasonable man say that if a rescue is attempted in the case of goods seized under a judgment of the County Court for tithe, the person so acting is not to be subject to the same jurisdiction and punishment as in any other case of rescue. Surely this is only a reasonable method of protecting the County Court bailiff. For mere non-payment of tithe the clause clearly provides that there should be no imprisonment. I repeat, I think the word "only" must be retained to make our meaning clear.

(4.59.) SIR W. HARCOURT: You may depend upon it there will be very great prejudice against what is called "County Courting" yeomen farmers in these matters. When the previous Bill of the Government was discussed, nothing caused more unpopularity than the provision for introducing the County Court system. It was called a Bill for County Courting farmers. If tithepayers think this Bill is to be used for the purpose of County Courting them, it will cause the greatest odium, and there will be the greatest resistance to it. I see the Postmaster General smiling. I do not suppose, in view of the orthodoxy of his sentiments, that he would have any indisposition to County Courting the yeomen of Wales. They, however, have an objection to the County Court process. This Bill is one for County Courting for the first time the yeomen of Wales. What the Government have, I think, wisely done by this Amendment, is to try and explain to them that they will be no worse off by being County Courted than they were before. You must show that there will be under this Bill no process against them more severe than exists at present. The argument of the Attorney General just now amounted to this: if you County Court other people, why not County Court these people? That is just what we are contending against. At present a tithepayer cannot be taken up without warrant and fined £5, as he can be under Clause 48. It is quite true that Clause 48 has nothing to do with contempt, but has to do with resistance to the levying of tithe. If there be resistance to the levying of tithe, as, for instance, by the driving off of cattle, Clause 48 will come into operation, and the man may be taken up without a warrant and fined £5. This being so, you make tithe recovery a County Court process. Unless you make this Amendment full and complete, so as to remove any extraordinary operations of the County Court process, you will still remain subject to the charge that you have County Courted people who were not in a position to be County Courted before. I quite recognise that, as far as the non-payment of debt is concerned, the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman tends to remove any misapprehension; but I say that if you are to remove from the minds of these people the fear that they are to be County Courted, you must show that the operation of the Bill will not be heavier than is that of the present law.

(5.5.) MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): As I am not a lawyer, the Committee will pardon me for asking a question. Are we to understand that for such an offence as barring the door or removing cattle you are going to make these people liable to imprisonment or fine? The Attorney General asks why these people should be dealt with differently from other people. There is every reason why they should be. In ordinary cases where these provisions of the law are put in force men have broken contracts or have contracted debts. Here things are entirely different. There are thousands of cases in South Wales that might be brought forward. In one parish you find clergymen receiving stipends of £100 a year, and going to another parish for service. In another parish you find no clergyman and no Church, and in another you are told that the vicar has never been seen there. Is it reasonable to ask that men in such parishes, when they receive nothing for the payment imposed upon them, should be dealt with in the same way as those who ordinarily come before the County Courts?

Sir W. Harcourt

(5.6.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: This matter has assumed a very important bearing. The question has been asked: What is to bring the recalcitrant tithepayer under the provisions of the 48th section? Take the case of a neighbour of mine in my own parish who has persistently refused to pay tithe because he will not admit the justice of the claim of the tithe owner. He is supported by sympathising friends. The County Court bailiff may take it into his head to say—"You are resisting the officer of the law, and I will take you into custody." Well, we have had over and over again tithe disturbances in Wales dealt with before a jury, but we have never hitherto seen placed in the hands of a County Court bailiff the power, on his own initiative, of taking a tenant farmer into custody, and having him tried there and then without a jury. This is, as I have said, a very serious matter. We have 40,000 small yeomen who, as soon as this Act is passed, will renew their protests against the payment of tithe, and who will certainly object to having that protest stamped out by a County Court bailiff.

(5.9.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I think we are entitled to some answer as to whether the effect of this clause is to take away the protection of a jury from the tithepayer. If so, and men are to be simply taken up by a bailiff and fined or imprisoned by the County Court Judge, it is a very serious matter indeed. It comes dangerously near the Acts we have applied to Ireland. If you remove the jurisdiction from a jury, as it would now be, and allow the County Court Judge, without a jury, simply on the allegation of the plaintiff, to say that the case is one which should involve imprisonment, it is a serious matter indeed. I should be glad to hear from the Attorney General whether, in his opinion, cases which now go to a jury would, in the future, be dealt with solely by the Judge? I put to him the case of a riot, and ask him whether the rioters could be dealt with in that way? Instead of proceeding against them for riot, could each individual be taken up, fined, and imprisoned under the 48th section?

*(5.12.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I did not rise with reference to the question of the hon. and learned Member below the Gangway, because his observations were not germane to the Amendment. We are not now dealing with riots or disturbances, or any matters of that kind, but with the specific matter as to the person who ought to pay for rescuing the goods. I maintain that that particular person could be summoned under Section 48. But to say that the effect of that section would be to do away with a jury in proceedings for riot, or would render it possible for 10 or 15 or 20 people to be taken before the County Court Judge, is putting a case which never could have occurred to anyone except for the purpose of endeavouring to show that the clause had some latent vice in it. The clause does not touch the case of riot or general disturbance, or the case of shouting, or anything of that kind. That belongs to the general law, and the clause merely deal with a rescue of goods or an assault on the bailiff.

(5.15.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Gentleman cannot ride off in that way. If he would read the clause he would argue the matter more carefully—and he will do so if he wishes us to assent to the Bill. He says the clause only applies to the conduct of the individual against whom the claim is made, and cannot be applied generally to a number of persons who may have been concerned in the rescue of goods. But the clause says—

“If any rescue shall be made, or attempted to be made, of any goods levied under process of the Court, the person so offending,” and so on. It applies not only to the person against whom the claim is made, but to every man who is present on the occasion of the rescue of the goods. It does not require a lawyer to understand that; therefore the hon. Gentleman should be more careful in his language. The clause says—

“Under process of the Court the person so offending shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £5, to be recovered by order of the Judge or on summary jurisdiction, and it shall be lawful for the bailiff of the Court to take the offender into custody and bring him before the Judge.”

I say that applies to every one who may be concerned in a case of this kind. The right of a number of people to have their cases brought before a jury will be taken away; and unless the Government are prepared to remove this difficulty, I shall strongly oppose the establishment of County Court jurisdiction at all. It has been understood that the principle of the Bill is not to place the tithepayer in a worse position than he is in now.

*(5.16.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: Let me put a case which is constantly occurring. Supposing 25 persons join in a rescue, will the Attorney General say that the bailiff and other officers cannot arrest everyone, and have them each fined £5, or, in default, have them imprisoned?

(5.17.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): The argument comes to this: that if the officer of the Court is attacked by 20 people the Court is not to protect him.

*(5.17.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: After the clause read by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, I would ask whether the Attorney General is of the same opinion? When I put the case of an assault happening, the Attorney General admitted that the exclusion of the word “only” would have no effect. If an assault is committed, a person would be liable for having assaulted the bailiff, and could be imprisoned, notwithstanding that the account was paid. The Attorney General suggested that there might be other charges. There is only one other thing that could be made the subject of this procedure, and that is a rescue, which stands on the same footing. If, as the Attorney General asserts, the retention or omission of the word "only" is immaterial, the Government should concede the omission to those Members of the Opposition who do not regard it as immaterial from their point of view. Whose interest is it to get the Bill passed without delay? If it is that of the Attorney General, surely he should give way on this point.

(5.20.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 189; Noes 138.—(Div. List, No. 21.)

Words, as amended, added.

(5.35.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I now beg to move the next Amendment standing in my name. I may here say that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has kindly shown me another sub-section which he has had drawn up, and it is so satisfactory that if the right hon. Gentleman will move it I shall be glad to withdraw my proposal.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 3, at end to add—

"All rules made under this section shall be laid before Parliament within three weeks after they are made, if Parliament is then sitting, and, if Parliament is not then sitting, within three weeks after the beginning of the next Session of Parliament, and shall not have effect until after the expiration of one month after they shall be so laid."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I propose to submit the sub-section referred to by the hon. Gentleman. I should state that the present County Court rules are not laid before Parliament, although those of the High Court are. What I propose, is to place the rules under this Act on the same footing as the rules of the High Court.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Another Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 3, at end to add—

"Every rule of court made for the purpose of this Act shall be laid before each House of Parliament within forty days next after it is made, if Parliament is then sitting, or, if not, within forty days after the commencement of the then next ensuing session, and if an address is presented to Her Majesty by either House of Parliament within the next subsequent forty days on which the said House shall have sat, praying that any such rule may be annulled, Her Majesty may thereupon, by Order in Council, annul the same; and the rule so annulled shall thenceforth become void and of no effect, but without prejudice to the validity of any proceedings which may in the meantime have been taken under the same."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

Mr. J. Bryn Roberts

Agreed to.

MR. S. T. EVANS: I now beg to move the following Amendment—namely, to add at end of line 3 the words—

"Provided always that the total costs to be allowed to the tithe owner in any case within Sub-section (2) of this section shall not exceed the costs specified in the Schedule to this Act."

I would remind the Committee that on Monday I had an important Amendment, and a suggestion was thrown out then by the right hon. Member for Bury to the Government, namely, that in the case of persons such as the small freeholders, the Government should put the costs to be incurred under this Act in a Schedule. It was said to be impossible that the costs should be the same under this Act as under the existing Acts, because the proceedings will not be similar to what they have been, but I think a Schedule which I have prepared will meet the difficulty. That Schedule is as follows:—

SCHEDULE.

On all proceedings for the appointment s. d.
of an officer under Sub-Section (2) of Section 2—

If the sum ordered to be recovered does not exceed £5	2	6
If the sum ordered to be recovered exceeds £5	5	0

Upon every distraint by such officer—

If the sum ordered to be recovered does not exceed £5	2	6
If the sum ordered to be recovered exceeds £5 but does not exceed £10 ..	3	6
If the sum ordered exceeds £10 ..	5	0
For every day possession is lawfully kept	2	6

Upon every sale under such distraint, for every £1 or part thereof distrained for	1	0
---	---	---

I think the Committee are strongly of opinion that the small freeholders should not be placed in a worse position than before, because the distraining tithe owners have to go to the County Court. It is conceded that the main object, and almost the sole object, of the Bill is to make the landlords primarily liable to the tithe owners. In order to effect this object there need really have been no alteration in the procedure in the case of occupying holders. And

I do not think that hon. Members opposite will be inclined to vote for a proposal to increase the cost to the small freeholders, especially seeing the period of distress through which they have had to pass, and therefore I hope I shall obtain considerable support for the proviso I now venture to propose.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 3, at the end, to add the words—

“Provided always that the total costs to be allowed to the tithe owner in any case within Sub-section (2) of this section shall not exceed the costs specified in the schedule to this Act.”—(Jr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, “That these words be there inserted.”

*(5.40.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am sure the hon. Member opposite will see that it is absolutely impossible for me to deal with a schedule of this sort, which I have only seen five minutes ago. If he had been able to place it on the paper a day or two ago I might have given a definite expression of opinion in regard to it. I am anxious to make a statement on the subject, because since the discussion which took place the other day I have carefully considered the matter, in conjunction with those who are responsible for the framing of this Bill. This is what appears to me to be the position of the matter. The hon. Member on Monday last moved a proviso—

“That the total costs of orders and proceedings in any case within Sub-section 2 of this Section, shall not exceed the amount of costs recoverable in a like case under the Tithe Acts now in force.”

I was unable to accept the proviso, because as I then pointed out, the procedure under this Bill is different to that under the existing law, and therefore it is not possible to say that the fees should be the same. Under the present system the first fee charged is 2s. 6d. for the notice, but under the system proposed by the Bill, the first fee charged would be 1s. in the pound for the plaint in the County Court, and then there is 2s. in the pound for the hearing. These are different charges, and cannot be governed by the same scale of fees. I think it would be only right to leave this matter of fees, as far as regards the initial proceeding, to be governed by the existing County Court rules. [“No, no.”] Hon. Members dissent from this; but let me point out that there would be no real loss to the tithepayer or the tithe owner by this being done. I must say that it does not appear to me to be a matter injuriously affecting the tithepayer more than the tithe owner. He has to bear the costs in the first instance, and although he may obtain a judgment to recover, he may find it impossible to do so. He runs some risk of losing his tithe, and it appears to me that it is only right that he should be considered, and that, in the interests of both parties the costs should be made reasonably low. Take the lowest of all, a case under £1. There the initial fee under the present system of notice would be 2s. 6d., while under the County Court system it would be 3s. But you may say, take a case of £2. There the initial fee would be 2s. 6d. under the present system, and under the County Court process it would be 6s.; but you must remember that the tithepayer gets a quid pro quo for any excess in the fees for the initial proceedings, because now the tithe owner may distrain after 21 days, by giving a 10 days' notice, so that he may be required to pay within 31 days. Under this Bill he gets three months before any proceedings are instituted, and then there is the chance that the County Court may not sit for a little time after the three months, so that there may be some further delay. Therefore, he will obtain a very considerable delay in the payment of the debt and costs, as some return for the increased fees. But when the plaint has been made, and the hearing has taken place, of course the next process would be distraint under the existing law. What we might do is this. We might lay down in the Bill that the fees, charges, and expenses, in or incidental to any distress under Sub-section 2, to which the hon. Member refers, should not exceed those which for the time being are by law chargeable in cases of distress under the Tithe Act. You would in that way, I think, materially reduce the cost in many cases, as compared with what might be the cost under the present County Court system of poundage. The hon. Member has suggested that the cost should be laid down in a Schedule. It appeared to me there is the objection that it stereotypes the cost, which would be exceedingly inconvenient. It is contrary to the action Parliament has recently taken with regard to the matter. By the Act of 1888, amending the law relating to distress for rent, the Lord Chancellor is empowered from time to time to alter the Court rules in regard to the fees, charges, and expenses incidental to distresses.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: That is distress for rent.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am advised that it would apply to cases of distress for tithes as well as cases of distress for rent. I think if some words were introduced into this Bill by which the fees and charges incidental to distress for tithe could be thus regulated, it would be far more convenient than attempting to fix it by schedule. I have shown that it is in accordance with what Parliament has already done. I believe that what I have proposed would relieve the tithepayer from undue costs, and would meet the point raised by the hon. Member himself on Monday, so far as that point can be met consistently with the adoption of the County Court process. Therefore, under the circumstances, I hope the hon. Member will not press his Amendment.

(5.50.) SIR W. HARCOURT: We should be glad, now that the right hon. Gentleman is here to-night, to hear him before this discussion is ended. However suspicious characters we may be, at all events, he is one of the great defenders of law and order, and it cannot be supposed that the Amendment is proposed in the interests of disorder. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir M. Hicks Beach) has used a very curious argument. He has said, it is true, that the yeoman farmer may be mulcted in these fees, but he has a great advantage from the delay attending the County Court process. This additional burden is to be placed upon the tithepayer, who in Wales may have to walk miles and miles to a County Court. What is it the right hon. Gentleman offers as a great concession?—that the costs of distraint shall not be greater than at present. That does not touch the objection raised. The objection is to the costs before the distraint. The cost now is half-a-crown, and no more. What the costs are going to be we do not know. We only know that the minimum is to be 3s. in the £1. The right hon. Gentleman has kept his figures very low, so as to keep them near the half-crown. But if you take tithes for £10, the costs would be 30s. and you might easily go up to £5 and £10, without any exaggeration at all; and the costs will often be twice as much perhaps as the amount of the tithe levied. By Clause 3, 5th subsection, you are going to summon not only the owner, but the occupier, who will have to travel over the mountains of Wales to the County Court. There will be all the trouble and expenditure which is now represented by the simple payment of half-a-crown, which is levied with the tithe rent-charge. Unless the Government are prepared to put the matter straight, we have no option but to vote against the County Court jurisdiction altogether. It is quite clear that this would be a case of the greatest possible injustice. The tithe owner will benefit by having a low Schedule, because he will not have to advance the money. Let me point out how careful the Legislature was in former times. The costs in the case of tithe have always been put on an exceptionally low scale; and where a man succeeds, he receives half as much costs as he would in the case of a distraint for rent. The Legislature has always considered that the costs in connection with the recovery of tithe charge should be exceptionally low. We ask you to take care that it shall be so by Schedules to this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has said that Schedules are not convenient things, but I would remind him of the very valuable Schedule to the Corrupt Practices Act introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury. If you intend to keep these charges down, you must put the maximum for them in a Schedule. If you do not wish to use these Courts as a screw, if you desire that the costs should be minimised, if you have really at heart the interests of the tithepayer and the tithe owner, then you will put in a Schedule a maximum that will keep down these charges. Otherwise, the object of the hon. Member for Maldon will be defeated, because the costs will amount to more than the percentage which he proposes to take off. It may be that the land will not yield the tithe charge plus the costs. This is a question both of the tithe owner and the tithepayer. The Government, if they like, may make out their own Schedule. We do not assert, as I understand from my hon. Friend, that this Schedule is perfect. We are quite willing that the Government should present their own views in their own Schedule, but all we ask is that fair and proper terms should be settled.

Sir M. Hicks Beach

(5.55) MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): May I suggest, as this question of costs is likely to give rise to considerable difficulty, that the Government should promise to give, later on in the Bill, some substantial compensation to the tithe payer in respect of the costs incurred by the County Court process. It seems to me extremely unfair that the tithe owner is to have everything in this Bill, and that the tithepayers are to be saddled with extra costs. Unless the Government can give us some compensation, I, for my part, shall resist this chance of extra cost.

*(5.56.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: The suggestion of the hon. Member is well worthy the consideration of the Government. What I want to point out is that this matter does not lie between the tithe owner and the tithepayer, or the clergyman and the farmer; it is a question between the public and the Treasury. We must take it out of this local dispute, so to speak, as between the tithe owner and the tithepayer, and put it upon its true footing. I think if the Committee will look at this from the position of the hon. Member who has just spoken, it will be seen that it is not fair to add this additional burden to the tithepayer. Of course I feel the force of the objection that the Government cannot settle the question off-hand; but if they accept the principle that a Schedule shall be inserted, then Members on either side will have time to consider the scale, and the Treasury Authorities will consider what would be a proper and legitimate sum to charge. At present County Court fees are exorbitant. I am quite sure my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) will be prepared to support the proposal for a Schedule.

*(6.1.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks Beach) admits there is hardship in the increase of costs, because he says there is an equivalent in the Bill for the tithepayers, inasmuch as the tithepayer will have the use of his money for an extra three months. Whereas the right hon. Gentleman says the money can now only be recovered in a month, under the provisions of the Bill it cannot be recovered for four months. But what is the value of this equivalent when we come to examine it? Take the illustration of a man being sued for £1, the costs would be 3s. simply for Court fees, and there would still be the cost of witnesses, one of the witnesses being probably a clergyman, who under the present County Court regulations would be entitled to £1. So there at once is a sum of 23s. As an equivalent the right hon. Gentleman says there is the use of the money for three months more than now; but taking it at its highest the interest on the £1 for three months would only be 4d.

*(6.2.) SIR R. WEBSTER: There is some misapprehension in the minds of hon. Members; the question of witnesses in no way arises upon the stage we are now considering. If the tithepayer desires to dispute the charge, he will do so at the first stage, and if he desires, he can call witnesses; but witnesses will not be necessary, and a hearing will not be necessary to empower the County Court to authorise a levy of distress.

*(6.3.) MR. S. T. EVANS: If the Attorney General thinks no witnesses' costs can be added to the County Court proceedings, he is wrong. The plaintiff is entitled to be there, and his agent, and you must have somebody there to speak to the assessment. Perhaps the Committee would like to hear what the costs were in a very small County Court action which actually occurred. The amount of £1 10s. 10d. was sued for in a County Court, and the amount being under £2 there were no solicitors' or barristers' expenses; there were simply costs to witnesses and Court fees, yet the costs amounted to £11. It was a case in which witnesses came from Brighton to attend a County Court in Wales, and so it might happen in a case under this Bill, and without professional expenses the total costs may amount to eight times the sum sued for. The right hon. Gentleman went through the plaint fees and the hearing fees, but I do not see why there should be either; this is not in the nature of proceeding or judgment for a particular sum, but an application for the appointment of a receiver or officer under the sub-section with which we are now dealing; it is not like a case of entering a plaint to recover a sum due, it is simply an application. Of course disputes may arise, but it is in a simple case an application to appoint an officer of the Court to distrain. The right hon. Gentleman says the proceedings subsequent to the application to the County Court will not be more costly than the process now is, but all the County Court proceedings will have taken place before, and heavy costs we are afraid will be saddled upon small owners. I am sorry that a copy of the Schedule was not handed to the right hon. Gentleman, but here is one I will hand him now. I shall be satisfied if the Government will concede the principle that costs shall be specified in a Schedule of the Act, so that the Committee may take care they shall not be exorbitant. I suppose there will be no difficulty in postponing the consideration of the Schedule? The Schedule I have prepared may not be perfect, but it is a Schedule applicable to the case, and I have not heard of anything that I have not taken into account. I only ask for the concession that there shall be such a Schedule, and that the Committee shall have control over the costs. I do not want to cause delay, but we must fight out the question of costs on every stage. The Government have been reasonable until now, and after the moderate speech of the right hon. Gentleman, I hope the concession will be made.

*(6.10.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: My objection to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is that it did not go far enough, that he only touched the fringe of the question. The costs will certainly be very much larger than he has suggested, though the 1s. in the £ for plaint, and 2s. hearing fee, is no inconsiderable sum, 15 per cent. of the sum claimed. The Attorney General says there will be no hearing; but I do not see how he can say that in the face of the Bill. The Bill says—

"Before any order under this section is made, there shall be such service on, and hearing of, the occupier in addition to the owner, as may be prescribed."

If the titheowner is to be heard, how can you escape from the costs of a "hearing"? And those acquainted with County Court procedure know that hearing will involve substantial costs. A man will be very foolish if, in a case, say, of £20, he does not employ a solicitor, and the costs of such employment will probably amount to £10.

(6.12.) MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.): There are two grounds upon which I may appeal to the right hon. Gentleman that he should give favourable consideration to the proposal for a Schedule. In the first place I would point out that an entirely new and exceptional duty is being cast upon the County Court, a duty entirely foreign to any the Court has now to discharge, and therefore there is no reason why the scale of costs applicable to the ordinary business of the Court should apply to this exceptional process. Then another ground is this: In fixing costs for recovery of tithe by Act of Parliament we shall be following precedent. It has always been so fixed; it has always been considered a special matter, and there is no reason why we should depart from the practice now. This is an initial stage the appointment of an officer to distrain, and a small sum should be fixed. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will see this is an exceptional and special matter, to be dealt with from a tithe point of view, and not from the County Court point of view.

(6.14.) MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): Although we desire security for the tithe, we do not want to inflict a penalty in the way of costs. Without expressing an opinion as to the scale, I hope it is possible to give an undertaking that a Schedule shall be added.

*MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS: I quite agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Warming-ton) there is precedent for fixing the scale of costs in these proceedings, and I see no difficulty in so doing. As to the analogies relied upon by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir M. Hicks Beach) with regard to fees in cases of distraint being fixed by the Lord Chancellor, that is only an alternative method to adopting a Schedule. A Schedule has been adopted in other cases. The reason for empowering the Lord Chancellor to draw up a scale of special fees was, that under the old practice it had been left very much to individual caprice or local custom to regulate charges. The avowed object of giving the Lord Chancellor the power so vested in him by legislation was to decrease the expense of levying distress. No one pretends here that the cost of proceedings will in any way be lessened, therefore it seems to me the analogy upon which the right hon. Gentleman relied entirely fails. There has been an absence of support to the position the right hon. Gentleman has taken, and indeed, I think, the right hon. Gentleman expressed no more than a vague belief. I hope, in view of the evidence given and influenced by precedent, he will give up that belief, and listen to the proposal that a Schedule should be forthcoming at a later stage.

*(6.16.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: It is a fallacy to suppose there will be no costs unless the tithepayer resists the claim; the plaintiff must prove his case and must have his witnesses. When a tithepayer is unable through poverty to pay the money, he will as usual with a defendant in that position, let the proceedings go by default, not adding to the costs by appearing and losing his time. A schedule, undoubtedly, would minimise costs, though the details of that schedule we cannot now discuss.

*(6.17.) COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): It seems to me there is considerable misapprehension about this sub-section. It does not refer to plaint or hearing; so much of the discussion on the proposed Amendment as refers to costs prior to judgment is therefore irrelevant. Sub-section 2 provides that the order shall be executed in the usual way when the land is occupied by the owner, so first there is the order of the Court, and then in this Sub-section 2 we deal with how the distress is to be levied. Therefore all the discussion of the cost of proceedings up to the time of hearing has nothing to do with Sub-section 2. Should we not confine ourselves to Amendments proposed to lessen the expense of procedure after the order is issued?

(6.18.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I understood we were dealing with the costs as a whole, but this technical objection ought to have been taken to the first Amendment, for that raised the whole question. Surely it is better now to dispose of this question of costs.

(6.19.) COLONEL HUGHES: The Amendment proposes that the total costs to be allowed to the tithe owner in any case within Sub-section 2 of this section shall not exceed the costs specified in the Schedule; but the costs under Sub-section 2 can only be costs arising after the order is issued.

*(6.20.) MR. S. T. EVANS: The hon. and gallant Gentleman is entirely mistaken. How are you to get the order? The order is to be got by application to the County Court, and then the sub-section says the order being given is to be executed in a certain manner. There must be an application to the Court, and you must go to the Court for the order in Sub-section 1.

*(6.22.) SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I have not answered the numerous appeals made to me, because I feel that the occupants of this Front Bench ought only to occupy a certain amount of the time of the Committee, and I think so many demands have been made on that time that I did not wish to add to the claim. I do not hesitate to say that I adhere to the view I expressed on Monday last, and that I think the Government would be well advised if they accepted the solution of the difficulty that has arisen in respect to costs. We are not now discussing the amount of the costs, or what should be in the schedule, but I think, in the interest of everyone concerned, there should be some limit placed upon costs. There is a special reason why limitation should be made by schedule. The public certainly will be benefited by the Bill in the avoidance of scenes necessary to be avoided, and if the public are benefited then the public can make a little sacrifice. The result of the limitation of Court fees in the schedule will only be a slight diminution in the receipts of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who represents the public. But nobody will suffer. The charges in the County Court are high; they are now a profit to the public, and if you diminish them in the interest of the public nobody will suffer and everybody will gain. I do not see how the House can take charge of the matter without the introduction of a schedule; and I would ask the Government to consider whether, in the interest of the public, they could not take this method of meeting the wish that the costs should be made as small as possible?

*(6.25.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I endeavoured to point out the objections that appeared to me to exist to framing a schedule of costs in reference to the Bill, and I felt other objections I did not mention. There was the possibility of a discussion occupying a large amount of time on the matter of shillings and sixpences in a schedule of costs. I am very anxious to meet the wishes of the Committee in dealing with this Bill, and I think I have shown it. If I understand, as I hope I am to understand, that Members on both sides will approach this question of a schedule of costs, not with the desire of using it as a means of obstructing the passage of the Bill, but with a desire to frame a schedule which shall be fair to the public at large, and to enable the new system of tithe recovery to be properly worked, I am very willing, on this understanding, to meet the desire for a schedule. But I would suggest to the hon. Member for Glamorgan that the schedule he refers to would raise very considerable difficulty, and I do not wish in any way to be understood as accepting the principle upon which it is based. He makes a difference in the fees he proposes should be charged for the initial proceedings for sums over and under £5, but there he stops, excepting that with regard to fees for an order for distraint he goes up to £10. I think he will see this will be a complete divergence from the present County Court system. I will do my best—before the Report—to consult the authorities who have charge of this matter, and place a schedule on the Table for the consideration of the House. I hope the hon. Gentleman will be content with that assurance, and that he will not press his Amendment, which would come in very awkwardly at this point.

*(6.31.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's assurance in satisfaction of my Amendment, and am prepared to withdraw it for the present.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I presume the schedule will apply to all costs, and not merely to the costs arising under Sub-section 2?

Sir Henry James

(6.32.) MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): I am not quite clear as to whether the schedule will be limited to the costs recoverable by the tithe receiver from the tithepayer. I understand the pledge of the right hon. Gentleman to apply to the County Court fees, and to have no reference whatever to the costs recoverable by the receiver. Furthermore, it seems to me remarkable there should be a reduction of County Court fees in favour of the tithe-payers only. I trust that if there is any reduction at all it will apply generally, for it would be very hard indeed that the poor debtors—tradesmen and others—should be called upon to pay higher fees than the tithe-payers.

*(6.34.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I would suggest that, as many of the amounts payable are very small, there should be some system of grouping devised, and a scale of costs applicable to the grouping drawn up. I find, from a Report I hold in my hand, that in the case of some tithes lately sold four landowners paid tithe which in the aggregate came to only 14s. One landowner paid 5s. 6d., another 2s., and so on. In cases of that kind it is very necessary that a very low scale of costs indeed should be adopted, and that where proceedings are taken for the recovery of several of these small tithe rent-charges in one parish, one proceeding only should be taken and made applicable to the recovery of all the sums. These small tithe rent-charges are very numerous. I could mention a case where there are 573 tithe rent-charges in one parish not exceeding 20s., and 371 charges less than 5s. When you are to recover small amounts like these by the process of receivership through the County Court you are met with very great difficulties, and in fixing the costs it is very desirable they should be kept as low as possible.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(6.36.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: May I ask whether it would be open to me to add, as an addendum to the schedule, that in no case shall the total amount recoverable exceed 5s. in the £1?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Before you answer the question, Sir, may I say it would be much more convenient if the hon. Gentleman waited until he sees the schedule.

*MR. BRYN ROBERTS: I am afraid I should be precluded.

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot say now whether it would be in order on the schedule for the hon. Gentleman to move such an Amendment.

(6.38.) MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): The County Court has power, if it certifies that a case is one of public interest, to award costs under Scale C. Those costs are extremely large. For example, in one case, where the amount recoverable was three guineas, the costs amounted to £19 10s.; in another case, where the amount was £5, the costs were £34; and in the third case, where the amount in dispute was £5, the costs were £41 5s. Will the Government take into consideration Subsection 119 of the County Court Act, and practically make it inoperative?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: No definite pledge can be given. Of course, what is inserted must depend upon the form of the schedule, but the point the hon. Gentleman has raised will not be overlooked.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

*(6.41.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: While the clause was under discussion I did my best to improve it. I regard it as a settled principle that when the principle of a Bill has been approved on the Second Reading it is the duty of every Member in Committee to make the measure as good as possible. But now that the clause has been amended, I am bound to say I retain the opinion that this substitution of the County Court for the old process of distraint combines the maximum of irritation with the minimum of result. That is not only the opinion of the tithepayer, but of the tithe owner, as expressed in a paper issued under the direction of the Council of the Tithe Owners' Association. A good deal has been said about costs. I gratefully acknowledge that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has made concessions; but to talk of this Bill, as far as Wales is concerned, as a measure of conciliation, as the hon. Member for West Kent did, is foolish. What will happen in Wales when this Bill comes into operation? It is quite true you will not have the scenes you have at present, but you must remember there are 40,000 freeholders who are also occupiers. Most of them, if not all, are Nonconformists. I suppose it is agreed that some of them are conscientious persons who will refuse to pay tithe upon the same ground as their fathers refused to pay church rates, namely, that they object to the application of the tithe. Do you think that when this Bill passes such people will be more ready or willing to pay, or that the Bill will improve the relations between the parson and his parishioners? If there is one thing which a Welsh farmer, in common with a good many other people, dislikes more than another it is to be County Courted. Again, it is to be borne in mind that County Courts are held in towns where it is much easier than in the country districts to organise hostile demonstrations. Tithepayers will be summoned long distances, and when you have got a judgment of the Court against them, you will be exactly in the position you are in now as regards the enforcing of that judgment, except that the tithe will be collected through the County Court instead of through the agents of the tithe owner. I venture to say there never was a time when the relations between Nonconformists and Churchmen were so strained as they are at the present moment. You cannot, by a Bill like this, remove that strain. So far from the Bill improving the relations between the Nonconformists and Churchmen in Wales I believe it will only make matters worse, and sooner or later bring about the disestablishment of the Church, which the vast majority of the people of the Principality demand.

(6.48.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 195; Noes 140. — (Div. List, No. 22.)

Clause 3.

*(7.0.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: The object of the Amendment I have to propose is to provide that the reduction in the amount of the tithe, whether it be two-thirds or one-half, may take place without the necessity of an application to the Court. I do not now wish to raise the question what the amount of the reduction should be, or whether it should be Schedule A or Schedule B.

The principle of the Amendment is simply this: as the Bill now stands recourse to the County Court is necessary before any remission of tithe can take place. The words of the section run—

“Where a sum is claimed on account of tithe rent-charge issuing out of any lands and the Court is satisfied, that if the sum claimed is paid, the total amount paid on account of the tithe rent-charge for the period of 12 months next preceding the day on which the sum claimed became payable, will exceed two-thirds of the annual value of the lands as ascertained and entered in the assessment for the purpose”—

then there shall be a reduction. I desire that on the production of a certificate from the Surveyor of Taxes the reduction shall be made there and then, without recourse being had to the County Court, this not being necessary where there is no dispute between the parties. Possibly it may be said if the parties agree to the reduction there will be no necessity to apply to the Court, but that is not so under the Bill, the tithe rent-charge becomes chargeable, though it is not exacted. I do not see why the remission should only be made when the Court is satisfied. If a tithe owner wrongly refuses to allow a remission, yet the tithepayer will have to pay the costs of going to the County Court, because recourse to that Court is necessary before a remission can be made. I do not wish to raise the question, as to whether the standard should be a half or two-thirds, or whether the assessment should be for the purpose of Schedule A or Schedule B; my object is to render recourse to the County Court unnecessary for the purpose of obtaining a remission. That can be done by accepting the certificate of the Surveyor of Taxes, as fixing what the tithe should be. I hope, therefore, Sir, you will put the question in such a form as will permit the subsequent Amendments raising the questions as between Schedules A and B, and as between remissions of one-half or two-thirds, to be moved.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 4, after the word “Where,” to leave out to the end of sub-section (1), and insert the words—

“The tithe rent-charge issuing out of any lands in any year exceeds one-half of the annual value of the lands, as ascertained and entered in the assessment for the purpose of Schedule A to ‘The Income Tax Act, 1853,’

Mr. J. Bryn Roberts

the tithe owner, on production of such certificate as hereinafter mentioned, shall remit the excess of such tithe over one-half of such annual value, and such excess shall not be recoverable.”—(Mr. J. Bryn Roberts.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

*(7.6.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It is most inconvenient that the Amendment should be moved in this form, because, although the hon. Member says he does not wish to raise the question of the half or two-thirds, or of Schedule A or Schedule B, yet his Amendment distinctly raises both those questions. I would suggest he should not press this, but raise his point upon a Motion to omit the words “and the County Court is satisfied.” But, however, not dealing with the questions of schedule or proportions of remission, but simply with the question whether the remission shall be by the Court, the hon. Member must recollect it is perfectly possible for tithe owner and tithepayer to come to an agreement without the intervention of the County Court at all. Both will know by the fact of the surveyor's certificate having been given what the position is and what the amount of the tithe ought to be; and the tithe owner would not be such a fool as to take the tithepayer into the County Court for a debt he could not recover, because he would undoubtedly be saddled with the costs. If, however, there is any question in dispute between them as to whether there should be any remission or not, then the County Court must decide. Under Sub-sections 5 and 6 any questions which might arise as to a special apportionment of the tithes, or as to two or more rent-charges issuing out of the same lands, would have to be decided by the County Court. Also under Sub-section 7 arises the question of lands used or laid out for the purpose of building. There are Amendments on the Paper desiring to enlarge this exception from the clause. It is, therefore, obvious that the Court, having these functions to perform, must interfere if there is any question at all between the parties. If there is no question, if they agree, then the matter can be settled without intervention of the Court.

*(7.11.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: I do not wish to press the Amendment, but I desire to avoid unnecessary reference to the County Court. My position is this: That under the Bill as it is drafted the tithe is due until an order of the Court for the remission is made.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The tithe-owner can give a receipt in full for it if he chooses.

*MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: No; the amount remains until the remission is made by the Court. My only desire is that it should be made clear that only that amount is due which the County Court is directed by law to declare. If there is any dispute as to the amount, of course the decision of the Court must be invoked. Of course, the other sub-sections referred to by the right hon. Gentleman would have to be altered if my Amendment were carried. But inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman seems to think that reference to the County Court would not be compulsory, I am content to withdraw my Amendment.

(7.12.) MR. H. GARDNER: In reference to the assessment of the Income Tax Commissioners being taken as the standard of reduction, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman what would happen in a case of the description I am going to put before him, for on the view taken depends whether I shall consider it necessary to propose an Amendment? As I understand, the case for reduction is to be based on the assessment of the Income Tax Commissioners. I speak now of the case of a small yeoman or small owner cultivating his own land. If he is assessed under Schedules A and B, and has proved to the satisfaction of the Income Tax Commissioners that he has made no profit, the Commissioners are constrained, and in frequent instances they do so, to remit the Income Tax for the year. Now, the whole of this clause turns on the assessment of the Income Tax Commissioners; and I ask the right hon. Gentleman, in a case where a man proves to the satisfaction of the Commissioners, that he has made no profit on the land, and the Commissioners have therefore remitted his Income Tax, whether that will be taken into consideration by the County Court in the reduction of the tithe rent-charge?

It must be obvious to the right hon. Gentleman that if the assessment under Schedules A and B is taken as the foundation of the tithe rent-charge and that assessment has afterwards been set aside, the Income Tax being returned by the Commissioners, then it is obvious that you are going to make the reduction of the tithe rent-charge on an utterly false basis. I have known such cases, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman when such cases occur will these facts be considered in the reduction of the tithe rent-charge?

*(7.15.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not think it would be possible to consider that case. The remission of Income Tax is made to a person not as owner, but as occupier. He pays the tithe as owner; the interests are different altogether. It is not as owner he obtains remission of Income Tax under Schedule B. Of course, if the circumstances were such that not only was a remission given, but the assessment was reduced, then he would obtain a reduction in the tithe rent-charge.

(7.15.) MR. H. GARDNER: The right hon. Gentleman has not apprehended the facts. Here I have a letter, the writer of which is occupier as well as owner in Hampshire, and he says for the last three years he has had his Income Tax under Schedules A and B reduced, because he had made no profit or rent.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): One matter I should like to point out. The object the hon. Member has in view by his Amendment, leaving out the two matters he has not dealt with, is that in as few cases as possible recourse should be had to the County Court. It is obvious on the face of it that the tithe-payer will be in a position of humiliation if he has to seek relief from the County Court. The right hon. Gentleman says that an amicable arrangement may be arrived at, but it must occur to him that amicable arrangements will be more frequent when the tithe owner is an individual than when the tithe owner is a corporation, therefore it is with a view to meeting the cases where the tithe is owned by a corporation that some such Amendment is highly desirable. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to consider this view before Report stage is reached, in order, if possible, to exclude the intervention of the Court in as many instances as possible.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I cannot preclude the operation of the County Court where there is a dispute between the parties, whether they are private individuals or Corporations.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(7.18.) MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): Whether the Committee may agree to the Amendment, which stands in my name, or not, at any rate the Committee will not be surprised that those of us who think that under exceptional circumstances consideration ought to be given to tithepayers, are making strenuous efforts to get their view recognised in this Bill before it becomes an Act of Parliament. We have been told throughout the numerous discussions on this difficult tithe question during the present Parliament that at any rate the Government would allow free discussion of all points suitable to the Bill. Many of us have not been so determinedly opposed even to some parts of the Bill we thought were wrong, because we trusted that the opportunity would arise of placing our grievances before the House, in the hope that some further relief might be given to the tithepayer under exceptional circumstances beyond what the Bill proposes. I am sanguine that there are many Members in the House at the present time who think that perhaps after all I am not a spoliator, not anxious to rob the Church, not desirous of acting in any unfriendly spirit towards the tithe owner and the clergy, and perhaps there are more Members now than there were on former occasions when I pleaded from this point of view, who feel that some relief might be given to tithepayers. To hon. Members who agree with me I think I may say we may congratulate ourselves upon having advanced at any rate so far as that, for some reason or other we have a clause in the present Bill, a clause we may spare a moment or two to analyse presently, which provides that under certain circumstances there shall be a revision of tithe. That has broken the ice. There was a time when all our arguments were met with—"You made a bargain in 1836 and are in honour bound to abide by it." I always thought that an extraordinary argument to use when at the same time a Bill was introduced which certainly tore up one part of the bargain of 1836, there can be no doubt about that. But still there remains force in the impression there is, that generally speaking, it is wrong to run back from bargains made. No doubt there is a great deal to be said about bargains that have been made, but I have before endeavoured to show to the House that tithe rent-charge is not in all respects on all fours with a mortgage, or an ordinary rent-charge, and I think that I have succeeded in doing so. I dare say it may be described from a legal point of view as a first charge upon the land; but there is this about it, that it was never intended—I am certain of this, and I am strengthened in making the assertion by something the President of the Board of Trade said the other day—I am certain that neither the original donors or the framers of the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836 ever intended, or dreamed I might say, that tithe would occupy the relative position it unfortunately does to day to the income many landlords derive from many of those unfortunate farms to which I am alluding. Now, why I said I was strengthened in the feeling that I was right beyond dispute in making my assertion, was, because the Member in charge of the Bill, the President of the Board of Trade, in his speech in December last, in moving the Second Reading, said this:—

Mr. F. S. Stevenson

"I must say that, in my opinion, neither those who originally gave the tithe, nor those who framed the Act of 1836, intended that the tithe rent-charge should deprive the owner of the land of all interest in his property."

No doubt the right hon. Gentleman will say, "Yes, but that is quite different from your Amendment." Well, there may be a difference; but I am sure that if we put the Government on their defence, and ask them to show that under this clause as it stands the existing state of things would not to a great extent continue, I think that it would require all the talent of the Front Bench to prove that assertion. It would be very difficult for the Government to prove that if it were passed as it stands there would not be a certain number of cases in which the tithe rent-charge would swallow up the entire annual pecuniary interest in the land from which it is derived. If that is so I do not think I ought to be considered too sanguine if I hope that by and by when the question has been sufficiently debated some Member of the Government will rise and say my Amendment is accepted. Because I have got this admission from the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill. I find my task much easier than before I had such an admission. If the clause is passed in the form in which it stands, let me give an illustration of what will certainly take place. Suppose a small farm owned and occupied by a yeoman farmer. There are buildings and so on put up by him; this means money, and we must give consideration to this state of things. Supposing the assessment, under Schedule B, on this little farm is £15, and that is the annual value. Suppose this is made up of £10 tithe, and £5 is what is usually called in connection with this subject "beneficial" rent. Under these circumstances there would not be a farthing of relief for this man. Now, can the President of the Board of Trade, can any Representative of the Clerical Party, can the noble Lord (Lord Cranborne), who speaks so forcibly, pretend that this wretched £5 would leave any pecuniary interest, any income after the necessary repairs to buildings, and the incidental expenses always connected with ownership of land, and especially where the man is the cultivator of his land? When this £5 has to do all, will you say that in such a case regard is paid to the intentions of the original donors or the framers of the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836, which attracted the respect of the President of the Board of Trade? I might talk about larger farmers, but I know if I wish to appeal to the sympathies of hon. Gentlemen opposite I had better rest my case on the yeomen farmers and small owners. I want to interest those hon. Members who think that large landlords should be ignored on all possible occasions. The hon. Member for Leicester regards the landlords as first cousins to the red-coated barbarians he talked about in a former Debate, but I appeal to the hon. Member, does he think it is well for the House after these numerous and protracted Debates on this tithe question—it is no good mincing matters, we have discussed every possible suggestion over and over again—is it well to leave the small owners to this position? We may be perfectly certain that if the House determines to pass Clause 3 as it now stands, that the point of relief fixed in the Bill is the last inch the Government will give way, we may be perfectly sure there will be no chance of reopening the question for these yeoman farmers for many long years. For this reason I propose my Amendment—not that my sympathies are confined to the small farmers—but because practically this is the last chance. The House has discussed the question now in all its bearings, and if the clause is passed, and we determine after all that the tithe owner shall be allowed to take his very last pound of flesh, then on little farms only this miserable pittance of £5 will be left for repairs and all the incidental expenses of ownership. I know I shall have the heavy artillery bearing upon me presently. I shall be told I am still harping on spoliation and so on, but I am not submitting anything so extreme as a proposal which has been made from the Government Bench itself. Then there was another proposal—one that would have gone much farther than that which I propose. There was the proposal which came from the Front Ministerial Bench when the Government had to face the difficulty as to how the larger sum should be taken from the lesser. The Attorney General, when a former Tithe Bill was in extremis, got up and said he would take as the test of relief, or of what the tithe should be, net profit in the case of men farming their own land. Spoliator as I am supposed to be, I should never, upon my own suggestion, have thought of proposing anything of that kind. According to that plan, whenever the annual balance-sheet showed no balance on the right side, the whole of the tithe would be swept away. No doubt we shall see once more trotted out the old argument that by accepting the Commutation Act the tithe owners gave up innumerable millions, but that argument, I am quite sure, has never been substantiated. I will not go into that now. If there is anything in the argument, my hon. Friend the Member for Dorsetshire can cap it, by showing what the tithe owner gained by the arrangement as to rates. I know of a place in Essex where the tithe was apportioned at £892, and to that was added £537, to enable the tithe owner to pay the rates, and it must be remembered that in those days they had been accustomed to having rates run up to 10s. and 15s. in the £1, and even more than that. I am stating this to show why it is fair that we should ask for more extended relief than that proposed in the clause. There are lots of other cases of that sort, and they will be the most useful arguments to be brought forward as little additions to anything we may hear to-night about the great loss the tithe owners had to put up with through the Tithe Commutation Act. I do not desire to take up the time of the House unnecessarily, but I recognise this as almost my last chance on the point now before the Committee. If we do not carry this, we shall be giving our consent to a principle which is quite contrary, in the admission of the President of the Board of Trade himself, to the intentions of the original owners of the tithe and of the framers of the Act of 1836.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 8, to leave out the words "two-thirds," and insert the words "one-half."—(Mr. Gray.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'two-thirds' stand part of the Clause."

(7.38.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): The hon. Member opposite addressed a compliment to us on this side of the House when he said that we were most of us interested in the small owners. He was quite right in the remark, but at the same time we are all more interested in the many than in the few. We are more concerned with the interests of the nation than with those of individuals, and it is on that ground that a good many of us believe that the Government have gone too far in this clause. It strikes me that they are digging a pit for themselves which will occasion difficulty hereafter. The hon. Member expects to hear a good deal of useless iteration as to the settlement of the tithe in 1836, and he says there is no bargain which is beyond the possibility of reconsideration. That may be, but we have to remember that on this occasion you have the nation on one side and individuals on the other. I say that no lapse of time can lessen the claim of the nation to property which has been affirmatively acknowledged to be national. No circumstance ought to stand in the way of the interests of the nation, and it is because I recognise tithe as a most valuable property of the nation in time to come, that I am opposed to the clause as it stands, and to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maldon. Perhaps, however, enough has been said on that point. I should like to call attention to some practical difficulties which may arise if this clause or the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maldon should be carried. The hon. Member has spoken of the annual value. What makes the annual value? Surely, good farming makes it, and bad farming detracts from it. Well, if a man by bad farming reduces the annual value of the land considerably, and if it is found that, in consequence of that, the tithe has proportionably risen to more than half the annual value, is the nation to suffer on that account? The probability is that litigation would arise in regard to the cause of the depreciation. No man would see himself robbed through the idleness, or want of enterprise, or want of skill, shown by the occupier of the land. How are you to deal with experimental farms and charity farms, or farms belonging to industrial schools and lunatic asylums? There is a great charitable scheme now being started by the General of the Salvation Army which will require a number of farms to be taken. I see in Sub-section 3 it is proposed that the Income Tax Commissioners shall, on the application of the occupier or owner of the land, ascertain the annual value under Schedule B, and inform the applicant of the same. Well, when these lands are devoted to charitable purposes there is no annual value at all. Again, there are many farms let for three years, or even longer, at a nominal rent, the owner expecting to get an increased amount afterwards. The value of the land is small, and the tithe in these cases can easily rise beyond half or even two-thirds. I do not see any mode of dealing with these cases, and I think these are practical difficulties which ought to be encountered. I return to the point that the Act of 1836 gave to the people of this country a certain share and interest in national territory which is to hold good for all time, and I maintain that no change of circumstances ought to deprive them of it. We hear a good deal said about depreciation of agriculture, but this is not the time to argue the matter. All I will say is that I do not admit that the depression of agriculture is inevitable or permanent, or that it is necessitated by the position of this country. Holding these views, I protest against the two-thirds standard as laid down in the clause, as well as against the Amendment.

Mr. C. W. Gray

*(7.46.) SIR W. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North West): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down declares that tithe is national property, and should be treated as such. I deny that doctrine, interpreted as it is by the hon. Gentleman. Tithes belong to the Established Church of this country, and are meant for Church purposes. To apply them to other purposes is, I maintain, spoliation. I support the Government in the matter of this clause. No doubt many tithe owners have thought the clause a severe one, but is there not a good reason for it, and one that has been given by some hon. Gentlemen opposite—that we must look to the interests of the nation as well as those of persons? Well, looking at the interests of the nation, I believe my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is wise and right in proposing this clause. He is wise and right, because he hopes that even the small modicum of relief which is to be given by this clause will prevent land from going out of cultivation. The hon. Gentleman opposite has no idea of the condition of many parts of England. If he will go down even to Kent, to Essex, and other counties in the east, and especially to the small holdings in Lincolnshire, and to Hampshire, Berks, and Wilts, he will see a state of things that will surprise him. There he will see land that once paid so well in wheat, but on which it does not now pay to grow wheat at all, and, as I understand, my right hon. Friend endeavours by this clause to keep that land in cultivation and to encourage owners of land not to throw it up but to hold on to it, even though they can only get a small amount from it—only sufficient to pay the necessary expenses of repairs. The hon. Gentleman does not know what are the necessary expenses in regard to land. Does he realise the efforts being made by landowners in regard to labourers' cottages? Does he know that labourers are infinitely better housed than they used to be? Will anyone take a farm nowadays, unless the buildings on it are sufficient, and in good repair? The Government are anxious not to destroy in any way the power of the owner to continue this work; nor to destroy in any way the solemn right to pay tithes; nor to deprive the clergy of any part of their income, unless under the circumstances described by my right hon. Friend. Had the Government thought fit to go as far as the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Gray) that might have been another matter. I understand that the Government feel that they cannot go beyond the lines of the Bill; but whatever their decision I shall gladly support them, because I believe they are showing an anxious desire to do what is in the best interests of the tithe owners. It cannot be for the interest of the tithe owner that land should go out of cultivation, for then he will get nothing. I am fortified in this view I take by a Memorial I hold in my hand—a Memorial sent to my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade as well as to myself from the Chichester Diocesan Conference. A Committee was appointed to inquire into this question, and in their Report they say—

“This Committee hereby express their approval of the Tithe Bill, and their gratitude to Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Bart., M.P., and the Government for having introduced it; and they would strongly and respectfully urge upon the Government the desirability of holding fast to its provisions in all particulars, thus carrying the Bill as it stands into law.”

This is countersigned by no less an authority than the Bishop of Chichester. I mention this Memorial to show that there are clergy who think this a fair and right proposal looking to all the various circumstances of the case. We are anxious that, if possible, a fair and right settlement should be come to, and we shall feel in passing this Bill that we are doing justice to the tithe owner and to the tithepayer. I hope, therefore, that my right hon. Friend and the Government will stand firm by their proposals.

(7.55.) SIR W. HARCOURT: This is a very interesting Debate. There is considerable diversity of opinion on both sides of the House, and therefore I think the matter is favourable for a satisfactory settlement. My hon. and gallant Friend has made a speech which, I think, contained all the conflicting views, but I am quite certain what his own view is. He has come to the conclusion that he will support the Government, whatever they propose. That is his view, quite irrespective of the principles involved. My hon. and gallant Friend began by an indignant attack on my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester for holding that tithe is national property and ought to be preserved as such. The hon. and gallant Gentleman thought that a very wicked doctrine, and thought it involved the principle of spoliation. But I adhere to that wicked doctrine. I would, however, remind my hon. and gallant Friend that the author—I will not say the original author, but, at all events, a most distinguished promulgator of that doctrine—was my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale, who delivered himself of those sentiments in the town I have the honour to represent. My noble Friend was afterwards attacked by a posse of bishops, archdeacons, and other clergy, who demanded of him what he meant as a great Unionist statesman by enunciating such an abominable doctrine; and my noble Friend wrote a letter a few weeks afterwards endeavouring to explain away the mortal sin of which he had been guilty. Therefore, I hope that under the circumstances my hon. and gallant Friend will have some charity and mercy towards the hon. Member for Leicester. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has read a document purporting to come from the Diocese of Chichester. They are all most amiable people, as I know, in the County of Sussex, but I would appeal to the hon. Member for Maldon to tell us what the clergy of Essex have said on this subject. I have seen a statement in which they denounce this Radical Government as more atrocious in their conduct than any Government that ever existed in this country. In fact, if this meeting of Essex clergy had taken place in Ireland, I am not sure that it would not have been proclaimed and suppressed. It certainly would not have been allowed to take place on the stage in Paris. My hon. and gallant Friend, who is a great vindicator of the Church, approves altogether of the principle of this clause, and says the Government would willingly have gone further, but, I suppose, they had the fear of the bell, book, and candle before them, and that it was only a certain length they dared to go, so as not to appear before the world as the jackdaw did in the Ingoldsby Legends.

Sir W. Harcourt

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: "And nobody was a penny the worse."

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg your pardon. I have seen a picture of the jackdaw, and he certainly looks as badly off as other people might be supposed to look if, instead of being excommunicated, they were dissolved. I understand from my hon. and gallant Friend that the principle of this 3rd clause is that it robs the Church moderately. The only question is, how much is it right to rob her? That has always been in the history of this country a moot question. The position of the landlords, historically, has been that they will support the Church on the condition that they may be allowed to rob it moderately. You find that the history of Church property has been a history of moderate robbery inflicted upon it by the landed interest which supports it. One of the things done in the interests of the Church was the legislation which took place in reference to leases, and which ended in great advantage to the Church; but in the House of Lords the landlords came forward and demanded compensation, or a renewal of the leases. Well, that was a very moderate robbing of the Church. Therefore, I say, do not let my hon. and gallant Friend ride the high horse in this way when he says, "I am for the Church, do not let the Church suffer." He is only for robbing it to the extent of one-third. That is the extent to which my hon. and gallant Friend's conscience goes; but, on the other hand, the hon. Member for Maldon would rob the Church to the extent of one-half, and even he is more moderate than those who would rob it to the extent of two-thirds. The difficulty seems to be in what way we are to get at the exact amount. Now, Sir, what the House has to determine on this occasion is what should be the exact measure. I was a little astonished to find that people engaged in politics should have become so demoralised, that even the innocence of the noble Lord the Member for Darwen (Lord Cranborne) enables him to assent to this Church robbery to the extent of one-third. It only shows that he assents to this proposal of the Bill, against which he has hitherto had nothing to say. The only question is to what extent we shall go. There is my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, who, with a virtue little short of that of Cato, is interested in the reversion of the tithes, and he says that, under all the circumstances, the tithes must be executed in favour of that reversion. Now, I am sorry to say I am not quite capable of that extent of virtue, and I do think that in this question of the tithe, the agricultural interest is entitled to some consideration. I should therefore like to know what are the views of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture on this subject. It would be very interesting to know what his notions are as to the exact extent to which this robbery should be carried in the agricultural interest. I apprehend that in the exercise of his function in regard to agriculture, rather than of any episcopal function in looking after the interests of the Church, he will tell us what are the exact principles on which the Government have come to the conclusion that one-third is the exact amount which ought to be taken from the Church—one-third, neither more nor less. Doubtless, he can explain the recondite and profound principles which have induced the Government to arrive at this conclusion. My hon. Friend the Member for Essex has referred to the question of agricultural values, and has made allusion to Hants. I reside in Hants, and speaking as to the small amount of land with which I am personally acquainted, all I can say is that I do not see how, in the case of a man with land occupied by himself, upon which he loses and cannot gain, you will be able to deduct two-thirds of the annual value. But putting aside the rather high-flown, although logical, principle of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, and looking merely at the justice of the case, I do think that when the tithe exceeds the value of the land it departs altogether from the popular and natural understanding as to what the tithe was. The tithe never was understood to be the whole value of the land, and even Melchizedek would have been astonished at hearing of a tithe which absorbed the whole value of the land. Therefore, I say some reasonable deduction ought to be made where the tithe is so excessive and the value of the land is so small. This may be a perfectly logical principle, but at the same time it is fair in dealing with those matters; and unless I am convinced by the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture that the agriculturists are not entitled to this consideration, I shall certainly vote with the hon. Member for Maldon.

*(8.7.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I think we may be quite certain about one thing with regard to the right hon. Gentleman opposite—namely, that he will always make a very humorous speech, that he will always speak in opposition to the Government, and that generally we shall find him speaking more or less away from the point. With regard to the condition of agriculture, I think I can reassure the right hon. Gentleman on that point. I do not believe that even in Hants the state of things is anything like what he wishes us to suppose. Doubtless we have passed through a period of great distress. He does not seem to have had the opportunity of judging what the condition of agriculture really is. Perhaps he has lingered too long by his fireside to know what the condition even in Hants has been. For my own part, I propose to say one or two words upon the Amendment now before the House. A great deal has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon about the intentions of the Act in 1836.

MR. C. W. GRAY: The original donors of tithes.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: That would be going back a very long way indeed. I am content to go no further back than the Act of 1836. It is said that the framers of that Act never could have intended that the condition of agriculture should reach such a point that the tithe would swallow up all the profits of the land. But it is impossible for us to ignore the state of things which has been brought about, nor to overlook the legitimate expectations of those now alive or their immediate successors. The real question for our consideration is, what are the legitimate views and expectations now entertained? I should not for one moment shrink from going into the question of how much the tithe has gained or lost from the cases that have been referred to. But this has already been gone into, and therefore I do not propose to trouble the Committee upon it especially, as I have already dwelt upon it on two previous occasions. What I will submit is that we must have some consideration for the poor tithe owners. In many cases the tithe owners are but poor men, and we ought not to take from them a single penny more than is just. Justice we are bound to do in this House to all parties, and we have no right to be generous with the tithe owners' money. Looking at it from the point of view that the tithe is national property, we must not be generous with the property of the nation, even for the purpose of benefitting the tithepayer. Therefore I submit that my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sussex was perfectly right in saying that the only good reason for making a remission of the tithe is in order to keep the land in cultivation. It is obviously to the disadvantage of the tithe owner, as to everyone else, that the land should go out of cultivation, and I am prepared to go all lengths to keep the land in cultivation, even although by doing so I might for the time being diminish the revenue of the tithe owners. That, as I understood it, was the spirit in which the Government introduced the Bill of last Session. What was preserved was the full profit of the tenant, and so much of the profit of the landlord as was necessary to keep the land in cultivation. The Government had now gone further. In my humble judgment they have gone a little too far. I am sorry they have gone to the length of the remission to the extent of two-thirds, but I may say this in their behalf, that under the Bill of last year there was not sufficient margin to cover the cost of cultivation to the landlord. Perhaps I have just used a wrong word. What I mean is that the landlord's legitimate expenses in keeping the land in cultivation probably amount to so much that the remission clause in the Bill of last year would either have left him or the tenant out of pocket. At the same time, I think the fraction now fixed by this Bill is rather too high. On this side of the House we held different views last Session, but the Government has established a sort of half-way house between us. They have proposed a sort of compromise; and I do not think my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon should be always asking for more; he ought to be satisfied, I venture to say respectfully, with the compromise. It seems to be a fair arrangement which commands nearly universal support on this side of the House; and considering the extreme poverty of the tithe owner, and the way in which the Government have endeavoured to meet my hon. Friend, I hope he will withdraw his Amendment and allow this part of the Bill to be passed.

Viscount Cranborne

*(8.17.) SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): Sir, in my opinion this tithe belongs to the Church. I am not a member of the flock that meets there, but I go heartily with the Church on this occasion. This property belongs to the Church. ["To the nation."] The Church is for the nation. You propose to confiscate it for whom? For the benefit of the landowner. The hon. Member asks us to legislate for the extreme cases of a certain number of insolvent landowners. They must do as other insolvent landowners have done before them—sell their land and invest the money in some more profitable way. I do not see why we should rob the Church for the purpose of benefitting in many cases improvident landowners. Many of these landowners have bought their property within the last 20 or 30 years, subject to this obligation of tithe. They were prepared to meet the liability then; and now, when that liability is somewhat onerous, they come to Parliament for relief. I see no reason for doing so. I believe, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby has said, that it is an absolute case of robbery. With regard to the gentleman who owned gardens, may I remind the right hon. Gentleman that he has forgotten an ancient principle of his own. I remember once showing him the balance-sheet of a farm, and it proved that I, the owner, was not farming profitably. I remember that the right hon. Gentleman remarked that I had put nothing down for enjoyment of the farm, and that had I done so, he believed the balance would have been largely on the other side. Why I mention this is that I believe farming very often depends on the fancy of the individual. One individual may cultivate in such a way that there shall be no profit, and then, if there is no profit, he is to be relieved of one-third of the tithe at the expense of the Church. ["No."] It is so. The whole charge is now to fall on the landowner, and the tenant farmer will take land irrespective of the tithe paid by the landlord, merely considering what rent he can fairly pay for the land he is going to cultivate. As the land owner will have to pay the tithe rent-charge, it will be to his interest to look after the cultivation of his farm where it is let, though very often, I regret to say, landlords do not trouble themselves about it. They allow the most careless cultivation you can possibly see. I am speaking in the interest of the tithe owner and the tithepayer when I say that I do not see on what principle the Government make this proposal. As the Government are prepared to take a little from the tithe owner, no doubt the hon. Member thinks it a splendid opportunity to take a little more. But I think it ought to be remembered that if there is any argument at all in favour of robbing the tithe owner, it can only be this, that you are going to place the payment upon the landowner. The consequence of that will be that the tithe owner will have much less difficulty in collecting his rents, and, the expense of collection being less, it may be said that therefore some contribution should be made to the landlord because he is hard up. I, on the other hand, do not think that we ought thus lightly to part with what is national property as long as there is the Church of the nation. I, for one, will vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member.

(8.25.) MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON: We have heard a great deal of robbing the tithe owner, but I am one of those who look upon this Bill as a great deal more robbing the tithepayer. Our arguments have never been met; in fact, the tithe at the present moment is a great deal too high. In this Bill there is no relief whatever to the tithepayer. The noble Lord (Cranborne) referred to the poverty of the owners. I dare say they are in a bad way, and very much pressed. I am sure we have every sympathy for the clergy, just as much as the noble Lord (Cranborne). But it is very cheap philanthropy on the part of the noble Lord to say, "The tithe owners are so poor, therefore pass this Bill." In other words, help them out of the pockets of the tithepayers. This two-thirds has been described as a concession, but now we know from the hon. Baronet (Sir W. Barttelot) that it is nothing of the kind, but that it is proposed to prevent land from going out of cultivation. Any hon. Member acquainted with land will know as well as I do that it costs the landlord a great deal to keep his buildings and property in repair, and when you have the tithe exceeding two-thirds of the annual value of the land, you may be assured that the remaining one-third will not be more than enough for the maintenance of the property, leaving no profit whatever. This so called concession is nothing but an inducement to landowners to become bailiffs. I do not understand on what principle this concession is made. The good landlord, who has laid out thousands of pounds in the maintenance of his property, is to have no benefit whatever under this Bill; while the bad landlord, who has neglected his property, is to be the man to whom you are going to be generous out of the pockets of the tithepayers. That is going the wrong way to work. If the tithepayer is entitled to a reduction, it is not the bad landlord who ought to benefit, but the good landlord. I believe, and I have always said, that at the present time the tithe is 25 per cent. too high. I think the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon will enable more landlords to gain what is called this concession, and as it will improve the Bill, I have great pleasure in supporting it.

(8.28.) (9.0.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): It seems to me that the ultimate destination of the tithe rent-charge is not a matter with which we need trouble ourselves at the present moment, so I can quite appreciate the motives of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, who, considering that the tithe rent-charge is national property, wishes to preserve it. The hon. Gentleman has declaimed against confiscation and spoliation. I hope he will continue in that frame of mind when real projects of confiscation and spoliation come before us. Whatever be the ultimate destination of the tithe rent-charge, whether it is to be confiscated by the nation or to remain as now, payable to private owners who have given good value for it in the market, or else to the clergy, who, in return for receiving it, have been charged with very valuable and important responsibilities, it surely is the duty of the Legislature to take care that tithe rent-charge is as easily collected as possible, and that it shall not press with undue severity upon any one in view of the altered circumstances since the settlement of 1836. Any steps taken by the Legislature to make the recovery of the tithe rent-charge more easy than it was before does not appear to me any reason why the amount thereof should be diminished. There will, no doubt, be a sentimental advantage in favour of the tithe owner, but I hope the result of the second clause will be to remove a great deal of the objection of which we have recently heard so much. In passing that clause the Government have only acted rightly in the interest of the tithe owner, the tithepayer, and the country at large. But the passing of that clause affords no reason why the third clause should not be passed. If I thought there was any moderate or immoderate robbery of the Church in this clause, I certainly would both vote and speak against it. Again, if there was any robbery of the tithepayer, I would vote against it. It is not for the Legislature to do wrong or violence to any man or any interest, but it appears to me the effect of this clause will really be in certain cases, no doubt, to diminish somewhat for a time that which the tithe owner may demand—to diminish it for a time in the hope and reasonable expectation that in future years he will get all to which he has hitherto been entitled. This reduction is not to be made invariable. It is a reduction to take place only under certain circumstances which occasionally arise; it is not a reduction to benefit bad and do harm to good landlords, as the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Gray) endeavoured to make out. The reduction has only to do with the condition of the land. The Legislature has to look at existing circumstances, and it finds that corn-growing land is not cultivated at all. The reason is that it is not worth the while of the owner of the land to cultivate it, when there is a first charge on it called the tithe rent-charge, to an amount which he can scarcely hope to produce by the cultivation of the soil. The land goes out of cultivation, and the tithe owner who seeks for his remedy by distraining can find nothing to distrain upon. If he takes possession of the land he finds he has got a white elephant. [At this point Mr. Gedge walked several yards in the direction of the Gangway. The Chairman was conversing with Mr. H. Gardner.] I am afraid I was rather interrupting you, Mr. Chairman, and, therefore, I have moved further away. [Cries of "Order!"] Well, I will put it the other way: I could not get on while the Chairman was conversing with the hon. Member, as, of course, he has a perfect right to do. [Renewed cries of "Order!"] I do not wish to say anything that is out of order, and when I have collected my thoughts I will proceed. The point I was endeavouring to put before the Committee is, that under the present circumstances the tithe owners, who are for the most part the clergy, are suffering very considerably from the land going out of cultivation. I have known land that no one would take and pay the tithe rent-charge and other givings, let alone anything to the landlord. I therefore say to my friends, the clergy, many of whom have written me on the subject: It is very much better in many cases to take half than to stick out for the whole. Holding this view, I very heartily support the clause. I confess I should have thought three-fourths was a better fraction than two-thirds, and if the Government had seen their way to introduce the fraction of three-fourths in their Bill, I should have supported them with greater cordiality than I do now. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby does not like the present plan of the Income Tax being the standard, and that he prefers that the County Court should be made, so to speak, a Land Court. That would be a very expensive process. If the County Court Judge were called upon to settle this question, experts would be called on each side, and a large array of counsel and solicitors engaged. The cost would be very great. As to arriving at the cost through the occupier's book, every one who knows anything of farmers knows that is impossible. I have never met a farmer who keeps proper accounts; and, therefore, to ascertain the profits through the occupier's books would be most difficult and costly.

Mr. Sydney Gedge

(9.10.) MR. HENEAGE (Grimsby): I desire to explain in a very few words why I prefer the Amendment to the provisions of the Bill. But before offering that explanation I am constrained to demur to the statement of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. S. Gedge) that farmers do not keep accounts. There is proof that farmers do keep books, because they very often appear before the Income Tax Commissioners and are allowed remissions on showing that they have not made any profit. But on the present occasion we are dealing with hard cases, cases where land will go out of cultivation if some reduction of the tithe is not made. I took a great deal of trouble last year to find out what is the case of tithe throughout the greater part of England, and I found that tithe represented its own name, that is, it is more or less one-tenth of the income of the land. But there are a number of very hard cases indeed, cases in which it is almost impossible to pay the working expenses of the land or to get any rent for the land after the tithe is paid. These are the cases with which the President of the Board of Trade proposes to deal in this Bill. The only question between those who advocate two-thirds and one half is which of the provisions will meet the hard cases and which will not. What is proposed by the Bill is that a discretion should be given to the County Court Judges, who will take all the circumstances into consideration, to remit in cases where the tithe exceeds two-thirds of the annual value, either the whole of the excess or any part thereof, or if he thinks proper, none at all. The supporters of the Amendment desire to extend the County Court Judge's discretion, and I assert that there are many cases where the tithe is only one-half, which are very much harder cases than cases in which tithe is two-thirds. Let us take the case of two farms, both of 100 acres. Suppose that in one case the annual value is 30s. an acre. That will be what the landlord receives. He has to pay tithe out of that. If the tithe is 20s. an acre he will pay £100 out of the £150 he receives. That leaves him a margin of £50. Suppose that in the case of the second farm the land is let at 10s. an acre, and that the tithe is 5s. an acre. In that case the landlord will receive £50 and pay £25. I ask whether the landlord with a margin of £50 is not in a much better position than the landlord with a margin of only £25. Unless the matter is to be dealt with so that all the hard cases come within the limits of the clause we had better have left it alone altogether. It is no use indicating that tithes will be remitted in some instances unless you are going to do some good by such a measure. Many of us believe that if the discretion of the County Court Judge were extended to one-half, all the cases that need abatement would come within the purview of the clause, and we think there are a great many cases in Essex and Hampshire and in other counties which will not receive any benefit whatever under the provisions of the Bill as they now stand. It is said that to make the clergy give up any portion of the tithe is spoliation and robbery. But let us look at this question from a practical point of view. All clergy are not paid by tithes; some receive their remuneration from the glebe land. What has happened in their cases? In order to let their farms they have had to abate their rent 30, 40, and 50 per cent. And yet we are told that if one of two clergymen in adjoining parishes derives his income from glebe land and the other from tithe, while one has to give up half his income, we are not to take away from the other 5 or 10 or 15 per cent., because he is paid by tithe. I deny that there is any virtue in the word tithe any more than there is in the word glebe. The only question is whether the Government will yield this point and make a good job of the clause, or whether, by sticking to their own figure, they will avoid giving satisfaction on the one hand, whilst they depart from the principle of keeping the tithe intact on the other. The question is not what the amount of tithe is, but whether, after the tithe has been abated, there is a margin left which will pay rates and taxes and enable the land to be cultivated. If there is not, there is a risk of the land going out of cultivation, and the tithe owner runs the risk of losing the whole of the tithe. Will not the Government, therefore, leave the question to the County Court Judge, who, if he finds there is no ground for the abatement, will not give it? If we cannot trust the County Court Judge in one case we cannot trust him in another. I for one am very strongly in favour of keeping intact the property of the tithe except in these very hard cases, but I say if it is worth while to depart from the principle of keeping the tithe intact we ought to take care to bring within the purview of the clause all the cases which influence us in departing from it. I would therefore press my right hon. Friend opposite to yield to the appeals made to him from all sides of this House, and extend the discretion of the County Court judge to "one-half."

(9.20.) MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I rise to say a few words in support of the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I do so with considerable reluctance, because I cannot disguise from myself the fact that those who do so may find it hard to defend themselves against a charge of confiscation of property. But if it is so with regard to the Amendment, it is also the case in reference to the Bill. I do not think that those who supported the Government in their legislation in 1887 with respect to judicial rents need be very squeamish in this matter. I support the Amendment as a Tory because I believe it to be a case of absolute necessity. I should be most unwilling to tamper with the rights of property, or to create a precedent for confiscation, but I cannot help looking at things as they are. It has been said that we are altering the Act of 1836, and that that measure was a final settlement of the tithe question. I am a laudator temporis acti, but I cannot contend that a measure passed nearly 60 years ago, and which was adapted to the circumstances of that time, must be adapted to the circumstances of the present time also. I have myself for some time believed that the ultimate settlement of the question will be found in a revaluation of the tithe, but as far as I can see there is no chance at present of that being undertaken. I regard the argument of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sussex (Sir W. Barttelot) as conclusive for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maldon. I believe the adoption of that Amendment to be necessary in order to save from absolute ruin a portion of the agricultural community. I cannot think it ever could have been contemplated by the Act of 1836 that the value of the tithe might exceed the value of the land to the extent recognised by the Government, or to the extent covered by the Amendment of my hon. Friend. Anxious as I am to maintain the rights of property, and conscious as I am that what we are doing now may be said to be injurious to those rights, I shall certainly vote with my hon. Friend (Mr. Gray) if he goes to a Division. I cannot but think, however, that the course we advocate can be pursued without any confiscation at all. I cannot see why some compensation from some source or other could not be given to those who are to be deprived of their property in this way. It has been proposed that compensation should be given from the Consolidated Fund, but that has not been generally accepted by the House. But, whether from that source or from some other, a very moderate amount of compensation might be found. It would operate only in a very small number of cases. If the Government can propose some way of compensation, they will not only smooth the passage of the Bill, but will undoubtedly earn the goodwill of those who, I maintain, have some right to consideration.

Mr. Heneage

*(9.26.) MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): In considering this Amendment, we ought not to forget the principle of the Bill, which is not to transfer any money from the tithe owner to the tithepayer, but to alter the method of recovery in a way that shall be just to all parties. It has been admitted by the mover of the Amendment that the tithe is the first charge on the land. If it is so, it seems to me, that the only justification for its remission as proposed in the clause is the public ground that the land may otherwise be driven out of cultivation. Therefore what the Government have to show, is, that the reduction they propose is necessary, in order to prevent that being done in certain hard cases. I have listened in vain for figures to show that it is necessary to give a greater reduction than is proposed by the Government. The margin proposed by the Government seems to me perfectly reasonable, and in considering the clause we must not forget what the tithe owner gives up under it. It is not merely a remission for one year, but where the land goes out of cultivation he gives up the right to recover two years' arrears of tithe on its being again cultivated. That seems a very substantial quid pro quo in adjusting the conflicting claims of the tithe owner and tithepayer. My right hon. Friend the Member for Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) has spoken of the discretion of the County Court Judge, but I would point out that the clause gives him no discretion. When it is shown what is the difference between the tithe rent-charge and the two-thirds of the assessment under Schedule B, the Court "shall order" the difference to be remitted under the clause. It is therefore imperative on the Court to make the reduction. I would further add, it is very undesirable to give the Court any discretion. It is very desirable, in the interest of peace between the parties, that tithe owner and tithepayer should know their rights exactly, that they should not be driven to the County Court in the hope that they may get some assistance from the exercise of the discretion of the Court. The Debate has shown that there is no reasonable ground for increasing the amount of reduction proposed by the Bill, and I hope the Government, in justice to both parties, will maintain the proposal they have made.

(9.31.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I venture to think that the reasons advanced by hon. Gentlemen on the other side are equally applicable to the Amendment and the clause. For myself, I shall certainly vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I confess I have some difficulty in doing so, because in that part of the country with which I and some of my friends around me are acquainted, meetings have been convened by clerical tithe owners and resolutions arrived at denouncing the proposals as sacrilegious plunder, and so on, while, at the same time, other meetings have been held by tithepayers unanimously condemning both the proposals of the Government and the Amendment as futile, reactionary, and a waste of time, both parties being in absolute unanimity in stating that they will never, under any circumstances, vote for a supporter of the present Government. I shall certainly vote for the Amendment, nor do I think it necessary to express any further reasons than those which have been given for doing so.

*(9.33.) MR. C. T. ACLAND (Cornwall, Launceston): I have always maintained, and I do so now, the principle that tithe is national property, and on that principle I cannot see why we should consent on the part of the nation to a reduction of the tithe beyond what is absolutely necessary. Why go beyond that to give relief in a very small number of cases, and a relief which in any case can only be partial? I quite believe there is reason for doubting whether the Act of 1836 still remains an adequate settlement of the question of tithe, and that if we went into the whole question good reason would be found for coming to some other arrangement than that which at present exists for ascertaining the value of the tithe. But I am certain that no increased reduction, such as is proposed by the hon. Member, will meet the case of the yeoman farmer, of whom he has spoken with so much sympathy, or any other class. I believe there are hard cases spread over many parts of England, where freedom from present heavy burdens is necessary, and I quite admit there is a great deal of land in a condition from which all who wish well to the interests of the nation desire to see it relieved. But I do not think the proposal of the hon. Member for Maldon will meet the difficulty; and I hope the Government, although they may be in a somewhat uncomfortable position between the tithe owner and the tithepayer, will stand by their proposals. In order to keep the land in cultivation, and, at the same time, in order that the tithe owner may get something, I conclude that the Government have sound reason for going the distance they have, and I shall therefore oppose the Amendment.

*(9.35.) SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): It will seem perfectly clear to anyone who has listened to the Debate on this Amendment that the difference between the proposal of my hon. Friend and the proposal of the Government is little more than the difference between tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum. ["No!"] My hon. Friend says "No;" but, as a fact, the remission in either case will refer, not to a very large number of cases throughout England, but in either case the remission will refer to cases where hardships have undoubtedly been proved. I am one of those who strongly object to any tampering with the rights of property, and I shall assent to either of these proposals with reluctance, and only on the ground of extreme hardship proved. I entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby when he most ingenuously confessed that this proposal—both of these proposals—involved a certain amount of robbery of the Church, or, as I would rather prefer to put it, of confiscation of the property of the tithe owner. It is true that in one case the robbery—or what the right hon. Gentleman calls robbery, though he votes for it—would be in a moderate degree, and in the other case in a somewhat larger degree; but still, as the Bill stands, and unless a further Amendment be carried, which I am informed cannot in order be moved, unless such an Amendment be carried involving compensation, in either case there is a certain amount of objection to the principle involved in this proposal. I am perfectly prepared to admit that if compensation were possible—if the Government would suggest that either from the Consolidated Fund or from the fund at the disposal of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or from any other source compensation could be afforded, then I would say, however this Amendment is decided, there would be no further danger in it. The proposals of the Government might be carried, or the proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon. But I do ask the Committee to recognise that in either of these proposals there is an act of confiscation, and I do think that this Legislature has never yet, with its eyes open, consented to an Act that is one of confiscation without compensation.

When we take up land for the purpose of street improvements we do not simply take that land from the owner—we give him compensation. It has been said that in such a case the principle of betterment should come in; but that does not in any way apply to property in tithe, for the remainder of the tithe does not become of greater value. The right principle is that disclosed in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) in relation to another Amendment. When he was speaking, I think with regard to the schedule of costs, he pointed out that the public itself benefited from the Bill, and therefore he said in this connection that the public might well make some little sacrifice for the Bill. I venture to suggest to the Committee that the public might make some little sacrifice, in the way of compensation from the Consolidated Fund, to obtain this valuable effect—that the land would not be allowed to go out of cultivation because the tithe presses too heavily on it. In support of this proposition, to which I claim the support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury, may I point out that whichever of these proposals is carried, the tithe owner will be mulcted in a certain amount of property, and, further, there is no doubt that the landowner will be liable for the first time to a new charge upon his property. It has fallen upon the property before indirectly, no doubt—but now there is a direct liability upon the landowner. Therefore both the tithe owner and the landowner are called upon to make some sacrifice for the public weal, and I venture to think that the public might consider this proposal for compensation in the interests of the two parties. One other consideration I venture to submit. It is an undoubted fact that the agricultural depression of the present day is mainly, if not entirely, owing to causes from which the whole of the community have derived a benefit. It is very largely owing to the free competition of foreign corn and foreign agricultural products. Therefore, I submit that the community at large does benefit, first of all, from the agricultural depression that has brought about the necessity for such a Bill as this; secondly, from the new liabilities to be laid on the landowners by the Bill; and, lastly, from the sacrifice which the tithe owner is called upon to make in these proposed remissions. If all these changes be for the public benefit in these three forms, then I say that the Government will be justified if it asks the Committee before this Bill leaves us to recommend some means of finding compensation for those who will be injuriously affected by the Bill. I, therefore, shall be prepared to support the proposals of the Government in regard to the cutting down of the tithe owner's property; but I do hope that the Government will consider the suggestion I have made in regard to compensation, and I feel certain that should they see their way to accept it they would have the approval of the community generally.

(9.40.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON: I do not propose to follow the line of argument adopted by my hon. Friend the Member for North Kensington, who addressed himself to an Amendment that he has on the Paper, but which, I think, it is not competent for him to move. The Amendment we are considering at present does not involve any question of principle. The principle is conceded by the proposal of the Government. If the Government had not made their proposal there would yet be a question of principle to decide. But this is only a small question of the difference between two-thirds and one-half, a difference of £ s. d. amounting to one-sixth of the total amount. The only question now is, which of the two proposals is most practicable and will be most beneficial. If the Committee were discussing a question affecting some distant planet, then the stern and pitiless logic of the hon. Baronet the Member for St. Pancras and of the hon. Member for Leicester might prevail. But, fortunately or unfortunately, the world is not governed by purely logical, but by practical considerations. We have to consider to what extent each of the two proposals before us is most likely to meet the special circumstances of the case. These proposals are not of a general character; they are designed for the purpose of meeting special incidents of the prevailing depression, of meeting exceptional cases which appear to call for exceptional remedies; and they must be judged from that point of view. If we look at the matter from that point of view, it will be found that the proposals of the Government are not sufficient to meet the requirements of the case. What is meant by the annual value under Schedule B? It is arrived at by adding together the rent and the tithe rent-charge, and by deducting from the sum total one-eighth of the whole. How is that principle applied to the cases which have to be considered in the event of either proposal being adopted? A paper has been circulated giving a list of 20 farms, situated in Berkshire, Hampshire, and Wiltshire. Those farms amount to 10,000 acres, with £1,700 of rent and £2,300 of tithe rent-charge. But if the proposal of two-thirds, as suggested by the Government, is adopted, the amount chargeable will really be in excess of the sum forthcoming, and there will be no remission at all. On the other hand, if the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division were carried, there would be an actual remission, and the proposal would be operative. I am not, however, particularly enamoured of either proposal. We desire not so much an Amendment of this character as the incorporation of the principle of a general revision of tithe; but of the two proposals before the Committee I prefer that of the hon. Member for Maldon. We have to deal with certain special hard cases, in which the land is actually being thrown out of cultivation. It is not a proposal which affects the larger landowners, but it affects in a special degree the yeomen farmers, the men who own their land.

(9.53.) MR. JEFFREYS: I confess I have great misgivings as to the wisdom of this clause at all. I regret that the Government have thought it necessary to insert it in the Bill, because, in the first place, it distinctly interferes with the right of property as it exists in the tithe rent-charge. Indeed, if the Committee look at the Paper they will find that the hon. Member for Northamptonshire goes even further than this proposal of the Government for interfering with the tithe, and proposes that the rent in those cases shall also be reduced. Both the tithe owners and landowners are thus being attacked; and I think it is a matter of regret that this unfortunate precedent should have come from the Conservative side. I have a great deal of sympathy with the poor tithepayers; but I wish that the Government could have found a plan of relieving them in some other and better way, as, for instance, by a different manner of calculating the corn averages. It seems to me that the last speaker did not make a sufficient difference between the proposal of the Government and that of the hon. Member for Maldon. It is said that Schedule B is Schedule A plus the tithe, and the proposition of the Government is that when the tithe exceeds two-thirds of that sum then remission is to be given; but the hon. Member for Maldon says that whenever the tithe equals or exceeds Schedule A then the remission is to be given. So I understand the proposition. It is perfectly clear there is a great difference between the two proposals, and, as the lesser of the two evils, I shall support the plan of the Government. There are, I am sure, few cases where the remission will be necessary, and their number may be easily ascertained. There is not sufficient ground shown for the interference with the rights of property, and I regret the Government should have introduced the proposal.

*(10.0.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: In my opinion, we Radical Members are bound to vote against this Amendment, and we shall stultify ourselves if we do not. We have been contending throughout these discussions that tithe is the property of the nation, and that, with due regard for existing interests, it ought to be applied to public purposes. A proposal has been made by the Government for alleviating the pressure of tithe in certain hard cases, and we did not object; but now there is a further proposal which means, if it means anything, an unnecessary whittling down of the public property. The landowner is in a fortunate position in respect of tithe. If tithe were an ordinary rent-charge, and it were not paid, the land would be sold to provide for it. In regard to tithe the land cannot be sold, and distress can only be levied on the produce of the land. Now, when the landowner is in difficulties he comes and asks for abatement and consideration. There is a disposition to grant an abatement to a certain extent, and he ought not to look a gift-horse in the mouth. After all, the proposed remission is nothing more or less than a concession. We are providing machinery by which the rent-charge shall be recovered from the landlord, and to propose to reduce the charge further than is suggested out of generosity by the Government is to take unjustifiable advantage of the desire to treat the landlords leniently. We have got to face in the future the large question of tithe redemption—the sale of the tithe to the landlords—and we must bear that in mind when we are asked to make concessions. It has been well said by previous speakers that no such cases of absolute hardship have been made out as to justify any concession beyond that proposed by the Government; and it seems to me that we should display an amount of generosity that would be unjust to the public at large if we acceded to the Amendment. I differ from gentlemen opposite who say that the tithe is the sacred property of the Church, and ought not to be touched. It is public property, and has been declared over and over again to be public property. If you go back to distant times you will find that tithe was largely applied to other than Church purposes. The poor had a large interest in it, and it was devoted to other secular purposes. I shall support the Government on this point, and I trust that my Radical friends on this side will not allow any desire they may have to punish the Government in the forthcoming Division to induce them to desert the principles they have so frequently expressed.

Mr. Jeffreys

*(10.5.) MR. BEADEL (Essex, Chelmsford): I am not disposed to admit that tithe differs from any other kind of property. I should be very much indisposed to take land or Consols or any other property from individuals on the assumption that they were national and we have no more right, in my opinion, to attack tithe than we have to attack any other description of property. I was much struck by the observations made by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton). Certainly, as far as I can form an opinion, the hon. Member never used a spade, even in his younger days at play on the seashore, and never possessed an acre of land in his life, or he would not have made some of the observations he did.

Those who are acquainted with agricultural land know what sufferings landowners have undergone, and what efforts they have made to keep tenants on their estates. I admit they have done so from a selfish point of view, knowing that if they let the land go out of cultivation they lose more than their rents; but the effect of their action has been that the largest amount of labour has been employed on the land, and the greatest amount of good has been done to the community at large. I know Members opposite glory in thinking that the landed interest has been reduced to such a low ebb. [Opposition cries of "No!"] I have heard many of them say they rejoiced to see it, and that rent ought to be the very last consideration. I have heard the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) say that rent was simply the surplus. ["Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.] Hon. Members cheer that. Then they agree with him that the landlord is not worth any consideration, and that the great object should be to take that which he had hitherto possessed and give it to someone else. I am not prepared to approve of such a view. If I may do so, I would ask the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Gray) not to press his Amendment to a Division. I feel as strongly as anybody the difficulties in which the small farmers are placed with regard to tithe. I know that the result of the free importation of corn in Essex and other counties has, in many instances, been to put wheat-lands out of cultivation altogether. I could quote a case of a farm which used to let at £300 a year, and now cannot be let at all. Such instances could be multiplied over and over again. I do not approve of the Tithe Bill, and wish the Government had never brought it in; but, still, I think it my duty as a loyal supporter of the Government to vote against this Amendment, because I believe they must sooner or later be convinced that it is of no use to trifle with this question of the land, and that they must bring forward some measure with the object of putting the farmer in a better position. Before I sit down I would appeal to the hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. H. Gardner) on this question. Nobody knows better than he does the position of many of the tenant farmers in his Division, and I think he will shake in his shoes when he comes to meet them face to face.

*(10.12.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I think it is high time, after the speech we have just heard, that some one should make clear the attitude of the Welsh Members on this question. The form, Sir, in which you will put the Question will be "That two-thirds stand part of the Clause." On that Question we intend to vote "No" with the hon. Member for Maldon. Judging from the aspect of the House, I cannot help thinking that we shall be successful. If we are it will then be open to us, holding as we do with my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Bolton) that tithes are a national asset, to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Carnarvon Burghs, or the hon. Member for Merthyr, against the whole clause. Before I sit down, I would express a hope that we may get some words of light and leading from the Treasury Bench on this question. It looks to me very much as though there is a conspiracy of silence in that quarter of the House.

(10.14.) MR. H. GARDNER: An appeal was made to me just now by an hon. Member opposite (Mr. Beadel), who said I should shake in my shoes when I met the farmers of my Division. I can assure the hon. Member I stand firm on my feet with regard to these farmers, and that I shall stand still firmer when I have voted for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maldon. Every impartial person who has listened to the Debate, when he considers the technical nature of the subject, and the diverse opinions which have been uttered, though he will be somewhat confused, will come to the conclusion that the Amendment of the Government is universally condemned. The Amendment especially interests hon. Members who come from agricultural parts of the country—and I particularly notice that hon. Members on this side who have opposed the Amendment do not represent any county constituency; if they did, I fancy they would take a wider view of the subject. The hon. Member for Leicester talks about tithe being national property. Well, I do not yield to anyone in my advocacy of that principle, and in contending that it is in the power of the nation to allocate it to any other purpose when it chooses. I shall, therefore, on this, as on all other occasions, do my utmost to prevent the tithe from falling away from the nation altogether. But I would point out that there is such a thing as agricultural distress. I am aware that the noble Lord the Member for the Darwen Division has re-assured the House as to the condition of agriculture—that is to say, he re-assured himself; but I doubt if he re-assured the hon. Member for the Maldon Division, or the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture. I should like to hear something on the subject from a higher authority than the noble Lord. We assented with pleasure to the creation of a Board of Agriculture, and I do think that on a subject like this, which so nearly touches the interests of the agricultural constituencies, we ought to hear what is the opinion of the President of that Board. Hon. Members who look forward to the creation of a peasant proprietary in this country should not overlook the possible effect of an increase in the number of cultivators upon the continuance of tithes and the probability of their being abolished altogether, as they have been in other countries. For my part, I agree with a good many hon. Members who have spoken this evening in condemning the clause of the Government altogether, and I do so for the reason that it stereotypes tithe, and pledges us, as it were, to the admission that two-thirds of the annual value is legitimate tithe. I speak for the farmers of Essex, when I say we do not admit that two-thirds of the annual value is fair tithe. It has been said, over and over again, that tithe should not be one-fifth the annual value. The Government, however, ask that we, as a Legislative Body, should agree with them, and put it on record that we who represent agricultural interests consider that two-thirds of the annual value is legitimate tithe. With that proposition I entirely take issue. The cases which will be affected by the proposal are few in number. An hon. Member mentioned 100 as being the probable number that would be affected, and I agree with that estimate. I believe that if you adopt two-thirds of the annual value as your criterion, you are leaving out a large number of cases of hardship which should be attended to. And I do not agree with your taking the Income Tax assessment as a standard at all. I should think it a much wiser course to have some Court of Appeal, as the Attorney General suggested in 1888, when he proposed that the County Court should have the power to consider what charge land would bear without being put out of cultivation. To adopt the Income Tax assessment would be to prejudicially affect many thousands of yeomen farmers who have made no profit during last year. In Kent alone, the number of small cultivators cultivating their own property is very great, and these persons, I am sure, are a class which we all wish to maintain in its present position. In the case of these persons, when they can prove to the satisfaction of the Income Tax Commissioners that they have made no profit from cultivating their farms during the year their Income Tax is remitted, but you still take that assessment in carrying out this clause and estimating what tithe should be paid. I ask the Government what they propose to do to remedy what appears to me to be a flaw in their proposal for dealing with the small yeomen who cultivate their own land; and I trust that before the Debate closes we may have some statement on the point from the President of the Board of Trade or the President of the Board of Agriculture. I said I was opposed to the clause altogether, and I see that I am in good company in that matter, for I find that gentlemen on both sides of the House condemn it in every way. A colleague of mine opposite referred to a meeting which had taken place in Essex—a county in which, as everyone knows, this tithe question is of pressing importance. It is in that county where there is so much derelict land—and if anyone who doubts the fact of land being over-burdened with tithe will do me the honour of giving me an hour or two in conversation, I will give him any number of instances to prove the truth of my case. Well, the Chamber of Agriculture of that county have passed a resolution absolutely condemning the proposition of the Government. That was on the side of the tithepayer, but how about the tithe owner? I find that the clergy have held a stormy meeting, in which this 3rd clause of the Bill was strongly condemned, one reverend gentleman describing it as iniquitous, and declaring that, "It would fan the fire of tithe agitation in Wales, and help to kindle it in England." I have not the slightest doubt that that gentleman was a strong supporter of Her Majesty's Government. I think we may take it, therefore, that this clause of the Government has been condemned on all sides alike, whether by tithepayer or tithe owner. Under these circumstances, I shall certainly vote with the hon. Gentleman opposite, though I will not for a moment admit that the road he takes is absolutely the true one. He may be right in some cases, but he is wrong in others; and, altogether, this shows the slipshod method in which the Government have dealt with a very difficult question, and how much wiser it would have been to have adopted the course suggested by their own Attorney General in 1888.

Mr. H. Gardner

*(10.28.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: In the remarks in which the hon. Member for Maldon introduced this proposal he made considerable reference to the position of the yeoman freeholder, and appealed to the Government in his interest. On the other hand, we have been appealed to on behalf of the poor clergyman and the tithe owner, and, for my part, wishing to decide the matter without regard to sentiment, I believe that the clause strikes a middle course, and does justice, as far as possible, between tithe owner and tithepayer. I have listened carefully to the Debate, and have considered many communications that have reached me from all quarters of the country, and I believe that the Government propose to do what is just as between both parties. One evidence of that is that the extreme advocates on either side do not agree with the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), in the very amusing observations he made at an earlier part of the evening, said that this was no Party question, and I think he was quite right. He went on to show that, being no Party question, it was one on which he was able to give an unbiased judgment. In giving that judgment, he first declared that both the proposal of the Government and that of the hon. Member for Essex were robbery of the Church; but later on he announced himself as a greater robber of the Church than we were, and justified himself on the ground, which appears to be a perfectly adequate ground for the proposal in the clause, that he is in favour of preserving the corpus of the tithe, while making the necessary revision in case of hardship. That is a very sound opinion; but what then becomes of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman as to robbery of the Church? The Government have endeavoured to carry out what appeared to be the general desire of the House of Commons, namely, that the tithe rent-charge should not exceed the net profits derived from titheable lands by the landowner. Adopting that principle, we have had very considerable difficulty in making such proposals to the House as would carry it into effect. In the present Bill we propose that the gross assessment under Schedule B of the Income Tax shall be the basis of the calculation of what the net profits of titheable land are. Some hon. Members object to such a proposal as giving too much to the landowner. But it must be remembered that the assessment under Schedule B is a gross assessment, and if we are considering the net profits of the landowner it would be obviously unfair to take the gross assessment as the criterion of that matter. Therefore, the Government propose to deduct 33 per cent. from the gross assessment as a rough estimate of the cost of repairs and management of the estate. It is obviously to the interest of the tithe owner himself, as well as of the landlord, that the tithe should not exceed this point, because if the landlord be not able to keep his land and the buildings on it in such a condition as to hold the land in cultivation, the tithe owner would be in a very awkward position. He might lose very much more in such cases than he would do under the provisions of the Bill; in some cases he might lose even the whole of the tithe rent-charge. Several hon. Members have argued that the deduction which the Government propose is not enough; but I have heard nothing to convince me that the proposal does not do enough for the end which the Government have in view. If hon. Members wish to take the gross rent of the land, and make a division of it between the tithe owner and the landowner, then there would be reason for the more far-reaching proposal of my hon. Friend. But that would be an extremely dangerous principle for my hon. Friend to adopt. It would certainly lead to such a proposal as that placed on the Paper by the hon. Member for Northampton for a division of the rent between the landlord and the tenant. I do not desire, I am bound to say, to give the slightest justification in anything we may propose to the House for a measure of that kind. The hon. Member for Kent, in supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Essex, said that he did so with some idea of compensating the tithe owners to some extent from public funds for the tithe rent-charge which they would lose. I hope no hon. Member who votes for the Amendment will endeavour to salve his conscience with that idea. It would be utterly impossible to make successfully a proposal to the House of Commons which would involve charging the taxpayers with payment for the losses of the tithe owners. I hope the Committee will adhere to the proposal made by the Government. I would venture also to point out to hon. Members behind me that if they are successful in defeating the Government's proposal they will do so with the aid of votes which will be turned against them in the next Division. I would suggest to my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon that half a loaf is better than no bread.

(10.37.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I think that the last sentences of the right hon. Gentleman are an admirable commentary on his statement that the question is not a Party question. A more distinct Party appeal to settle a question, which he said was not a Party one, I think I never heard in this House. The right hon. Gentleman has put forward a singular claim for the merits of his proposal. It is that, inasmuch as everybody has disapproved of the proposal, it must be a good one.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I said the extreme advocates on either side.

SIR W. HARCOURT: In that case every hon. Member who has spoken this evening from either side of the House is an extreme advocate. The right hon. Gentleman accused me of having formerly taken a different view as to the diminution of the tithe. But in the proposal of 1889, which I supported, the net profits from the land were to be assessed by the County Court Judge. Does anybody pretend that that proposal would not have done much more good than the present one? How many hundreds and thousands of people would have gone before the County Court Judges to prove that there were no net profits whatever on their farms, and the tithes would then have gone by the board? I very much regret that we have not had the views of the President of the Board of Agriculture. He represents that great interest in every sense of the word, yet upon this proposal he has not had a word to say. Why, he might have risen and with his eloquence tamed the rebellious spirit of his supporters. He might have enchanted them, like Orpheus with his lyre. I appealed to him, for he was here until very lately; but now that the time has come to defend the policy of the Government, exit the Minister. I am very often convinced by the speeches of the President of the Board of Trade, but I am not upon this point. He tells us that this figure of two-thirds which he has hit upon is exactly so much of an allowance as will enable the landlords of England to keep the land in cultivation, and from that point of view it will be of benefit to the tithe owner. That is the only justification which has been offered for this proposal. Will it do what is expected? Everybody knows it will do nothing of the kind. My hon. Friend the Member for Southwark, in his very clear statement, has given us some figures which show that in the cases of hardship he has adduced in regard to certain farms which he has taken as models of injustice the tithe greatly exceeds the rent, and that in those cases the proposals of the Government make no reduction in the tithes at all. Everybody knows that this must be so in a great number of cases. What, then, becomes of the "live and let live" principle on which the Government propose to come between the tithe owners and the tithe-payers? The right hon. Gentleman will excuse me if, in selecting between the two robbers—or, perhaps, the hon. Gentleman behind me who supports the proposal would rather I should say the two confiscators—I prefer the confiscator who does some good to the one who does none; and if the principle maintained by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade be a good principle—that is to say, if it be a principle that will allow the land to be kept in cultivation, I think the proposal of the hon. Member for Maldon is a better one than that of the right hon. Gentleman, because it will at least do something towards contributing to the end which the right hon. Gentleman says he has in view. I do not wish to delay the Committee longer. So far we have had a very interesting Debate, and we have now to vote on the question whether we approve the proposal of the Government. When we have expressed our disapproval of that proposal we have a large choice of the courses we ought to take. In fact, I never knew so large a choice offered to the House. We have every kind of proposal before us. The hon. Member for Leicester does not propose to cut down the tithe at all, and he would vote against the Government, and probably will vote against the hon. Member for Maldon. In this way we have all kinds of permutations and combinations to choose from. This is the result of the Government breaking down a principle. The Government have the landowners behind them, and when they do get the landowners in that position they feel that they are bound to give “a sop to Cerberus” of some kind or other. But the sop they have thrown has not put Cerberus to sleep, and that is the only object of the sop. This is a great question—in fact, I may almost say there is no larger question than the tithe question. Her Majesty’s Government have endeavoured year after year to deal with it, and they have done so by wretched expedients, propounded one after the other, and all inconsistent with each other; and now, having broken down the principle of the Act of 1836, and determined to take a little slice off the tithe for the benefit of the gentlemen with whom they act, they propose to take off a slice which, as far as we can see, is not big enough. But we are not responsible for this, and I will conclude by saying that in the Division which is about to take place I, for my part, shall vote against the proposal of the Government.

Sir M. Hicks Beach

(10.49) MR. LA ZOUCHÈRE (Northampton): My hon. Friend has asked why the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture is not here, and why he has not made a speech on this subject. Well, Sir, I can explain why the Minister for Agriculture is not here. He is one of the extreme men who were denounced just now by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. Probably the Minister for Agriculture goes even further than the hon. Member for Maldon, and would have a larger slice of the cake if possible; therefore, he does not like to speak against the hon. Member for Maldon, and I shall look with the greatest interest to see whether he gives a silent vote against him. Last year I put an Amendment to the Estimates on the Paper to reduce the salary of the right hon. Gentleman; but I did not happen to be in the House when the Vote for the salary of the right hon. Gentleman came on, and so he got his salary. But certainly if when a question like this is being discussed the right hon. Gentleman does not favour the House with his opinion, nor give it his advice, I consider that we ought not to pay him £2,000 a year in order that he may be at liberty to slink out of the House when his assistance is needed, or to give a silent vote. Really, Mr. Courtney, I thank my Maker—[Laughter]—well, I have a Maker—I say I do thank my Maker we have at least a Septennial Act, and, therefore, that this Parliament will come to an end at some time. But I believe, when I consider the divers blundering proposals that are here submitted, that if this Parliament were to go on to the extent of the Long Parliament we should not have a shirt on our backs, because we should give everything to the country gentlemen and those who support Her Majesty’s Government. I confess I have not got up in defence of the Church of England; indeed, I should like myself to take away every farthing at present owned by the Church, because I regard it as national property; but I cannot help smiling when I observe the friends of the Church and the friends of the landlords falling out about the plunder. They plunder the public as long as they can, but now they find that an election is not far off, and that it is dangerous to attempt to plunder the public any longer, they try to plunder each other. We are told when any raid is committed in Africa it is to put an end to slavery, and when any proposal is made to benefit the landowners the yeomanry of England are trotted out. We are, therefore, told that this is to benefit the yeomanry; but, if so, why does not the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade tell us he will limit his proposal to the occupying owner? If he did that there would be some point in it; but that is not the object of Her Majesty's Government. What they want to do is to benefit the landlords of the country; it is as clear as possible. He tells us that the land will be thrown out of cultivation, and that it is thrown out of cultivation on account of the tithe, and that when the rent does not amount to one-third of the amount of the tithe the tithe is to be taken—out of whose pocket? The tenants'? Not a bit of it. It is taken to fill the landlord's pocket. Take the case of a £50 farm, let to myself, and say the tithe comes to £40. The right hon. Gentleman says that a portion of the tithe shall be taken from the tithe owner; but when he finds that his ancestors bought this estate, he finds also that they bought it in order to have a second charge on the land, and not the first charge. The first charge must be the tithe, and belongs to the country. A great deal has been taken away from that first charge already. It was much higher at one time, but has been reduced by landlords' Parliaments. To tell me that because a middleman who stands between the owner of the estate and the tenant of the land has not enough they ought to reduce the first charge is merely to say that they ought to reduce the interest on the mortgages on their property whenever they have not sufficient margin to keep themselves after paying the mortgage. Now, why do I oppose this proposal? It is not, as I have said, in the interest of the Church quoad Church, but because this property belongs to us. We look forward to the time when we shall have a majority in this House, and shall be able to lay hold of the whole of these tithes. We consider they belong to the public, and we object to any part of our property being reduced, because it goes into bad hands at the present moment. For my part, I intend to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maldon. What is that proposal? It is that the words "two-thirds" be left out. When that vote is carried, if it be carried, and someone proposes other words be put in, I am not sure that I shall vote for them. In fact, I should prefer to leave the sentence as it then would be, namely, nonsense. To the end I shall vote against the clause entirely. That is the view which I think ought to be taken by every intelligent Radical who is utterly opposed to the Bill, utterly opposed to the proposal of the Government, and utterly opposed to the proposal of the hon. Member for Maldon.

Mr. Labouchere

(10.57.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I mean to support Her Majesty's Government on this question. I think the hon. Member for St. Pancras took a very practical view of the matter. I believe that if we defeat the Government the result will be to set up the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maldon, and it is because I strongly object to that that I support the Government, whose proposal is not in itself an unreasonable one. The bargain of 1836 was a very favourable one for the landlords, as under it they obtained a settlement of the question whereby the tithe has not only decreased, but decreased in the sense they desired in 1836. There are certain exceptional cases in which the tithe falls extremely heavily; and I think the President of the Board of Trade has put forward a reasonable proposition when he says it has reached a point which renders it impossible to cultivate the land. I regard the proposal of two-thirds as a reasonable one, and on that ground intend to support the Government.

*(10.59.) MR. C. W. GRAY: I congratulate myself on the course taken by this Debate, because although it has been upon one of those questions which are very likely to cause some warmth of feeling, I think everyone will agree that it has been discussed without a shadow of ill-feeling. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill, in his concluding remarks, asked me to accept the proposition of the Government rather than the means aimed at in my own Amendment, and he suggested that if I succeeded in carrying the Amendment the votes which helped me then might be turned against me in the next Division. I am not to be frightened by a bug-bear of that sort. I choose to answer that request in the words which the right hon. Gentleman himself used the other night—words that bid fair to become famous. Parliamentarily speaking—"I mean business." I intend going to a Division upon this Amendment. At an early stage this Debate was thrown into confusion by the varying meanings attached by different speakers to the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby declared it to be an endeavour to deprive the tithe owner of one-half of his property, while the Government propose to deprive him of two-thirds. I hope that no one, be he champion of the tithe owner or of national property, like my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, will for one moment think I am proposing to take away one-half of the tithe owner's property. I did not think it necessary to enter into any lengthy explanation of the Amendment, because I thought it was generally understood that what I meant was that the tithe owner's income out of the land should not exceed that of the landlord. The Government proposal allows it to be double—a proportion which, I think, is very excessive. Take the case of a farm the tithe on which is 5s. per acre, and the beneficial rent to the landlord 2s. 6d., any one would ask, will that be affected by the Government proposal or by my Amendment? I answer emphatically "No;" neither proposition would touch that. Although the rent of a farm may have been 30s., and has sunk down to 2s. 6d., while the tithe remains at 5s., it is not proposed to give any relief in that case. My proposal is simply this: In a case where the rent is below 2s. 6d. and the tithe is 5s. I propose that the two sums shall be put together and divided, so that the tithe owner shall not take a larger share than the landlord. I am not proposing to touch the corpus of the tithe, and I hope the hon. Member for Leicester will bear that in mind. We only touch the question in these extreme cases, and for the year only, as directly the annual value of the farm rises the original arrangement is reverted to. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade alluded to what he thought was in my mind when I put my Amendment on the Paper. But he did not accurately describe what was in my mind, because I do not desire it to be believed for one moment that I thought this was a good way of meeting the extreme cases. I am not at all fond of Clause 3; I hardly know whether it is possible to point to an hon. Member who is in favour of it. But from the very first time this vexed question was talked about I was led on to hope that there would be in the Bill some point at which I could argue in favour of relief in these extreme cases. I hold that the principle of relief should have been very much wider. If my Amendment is passed there will be thousands of cases of excessive hardship left, and these will not be nearly touched by it. But I, as it were, made a bargain with the Government that if they put in a clause of this sort I would not oppose the Second Reading of the Bill. This promise I made in the course of the Second Reading Debate. I do not like the way in which the relief is proposed to be given, but I must put up with it. The hon. Member for Leicester opposite has approached this question from a national point of view. He declares that tithes are national property. I do not dispute that a great deal of tithe rent-charge was years ago given by generous donors to the Church; but I would call attention to one fact—that there is a great deal of land in England to which this Amendment will apply—land which has been reclaimed, and which has only been subjected to tithe by legislation. I am told by good authority that in the Fen districts of Lincolnshire, Cambridge-shire, and Norfolk, there is something like 1,000,000 acres of land which have been brought into cultivation in this way, and on which tithe has been imposed by Parliament. My Amendment would apply to cases like these, and certainly it cannot be said that in such cases we are disturbing any gifts made by original donors. I regret very much indeed that I cannot accept the request made by my hon. Colleague the Member for Mid Essex, that I should withdraw my Amendment. I know perfectly well, were I to do so, that I should be falling back from the position I have taken up in the County of Essex on this question over and over again. I may be right, or I may be wrong; but I am determined, so long as I have the honour of representing an agricultural division, to try and represent honestly the interests of a large class of farmers in the Eastern Counties, who are affected by this question. If I lose the Amendment through the action of the hon. Members for Leicester and Northampton, all I can say is that I should advise those hon. Members when the General Election comes round not to devote their talents to try to persuade the voters in the Eastern Counties that they have adopted the right policy.

*(11.13). SIR JOHN SWINBURNE: The Committee have heard a good deal as to in whom the property of the tithe is vested. Some hon. Members say it is Church property; others claim that it is national property. But to whomsoever it belongs no reason exists why there should be an unfair or unjust application of the money. Remember that the landed proprietor does not want this Bill at all, and I am sure my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester does not desire any dishonest application of the tithe. The tithe owner will benefit because he will get his tithe collected free instead of having to pay, as he has done in the past, 5 or 6 per cent.; but the landlord will have the burden transferred to his shoulders, and he will have to pay this percentage for collection from his tenants where they are under agreement to pay the tithe. Now, my opinion is that originally one-third of the tithe was devoted to educational purposes, one-third to the support of the poor, and the remaining third to the Church; but during the last 54 years all had gone to the Church.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I do not observe that the hon. Member has approached the Amendment.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: I am happy to be able to support the Amendment. I think it most undesirable that land in Essex or anywhere else should be thrown out of cultivation. We have seen the evils of derelict farms in Ireland. I hope that before the Division is taken the President of the Board of Trade will send for his Colleague the Minister for Agriculture, as the Committee is entitled to an expression of opinion from him.

Mr. C. W. Gray

(11.19.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 178; Noes 124.—(Div. List, No. 23.)

*(11.32.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I beg to move to leave out from "and" in line 9, to "mentioned," in line 11, and insert "an Assessment Committee appointed by the County Council of the county in which the lands are situate." The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who are the tribunal to whom the Government have entrusted assessment for the purpose of this first sub-section, belong to one class. I find, from a book which is an authority on the Income Tax Acts, that the Commissioners are taken from the Land Tax Commissioners, and that such Commissioners are persons who act as Justices of the Peace. So far as the Principality of Wales is concerned the County Justices are not a satisfactory tribunal for assessing the value of land where the landlord class, to which they belong, have a direct interest. The object of the Government is to make an abatement in favour of the landlords, and we think an authority like the County Council would be better able to decide the points in dispute, and the County Councils in the Principality will probably in a short time be the owners of the tithes. Notwithstanding the importance of the Amendment, I will not further detain the Committee at this late hour.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 9, to leave out from the word "ascertained," to the word "the," in line 11, and insert the words—

"By an Assessment Committee appointed by the County Council of the county in which the lands are situate."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'and entered in the assessment for the purpose of Schedule' stand part of the Clause."

*(11.34.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It is well we should bear in mind that the County Council, or the County Rate Committee as it at present exists, never has been in the habit of dealing with such matters as are contemplated in the sub-section. It is very probable, too, that the Members of such a Committee as the hon. Member suggests would not have sufficient local knowledge of the value of the particular land which is required to enable them to make a fair assessment. There is another fact which should not be forgotten, and that is that the Commissioners of Income Tax are largely guided in their decisions by the Surveyor of Taxes, who certainly is entirely independent of any influence of the County Justices. I trust that, under the circumstances, the hon. Member will not press his Amendment.

(11.35.) MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS : I cannot give a silent vote in favour of the Amendment. I feel that any tribunal that is to determine anything in connection with this exceptional legislation should command the confidence of the country. I thoroughly endorse the observations made by my hon. Friend (Mr. S. T. Evans), that however estimable the County Justices may be, personally they will not command the confidence of people in making any assessment in matters in which they are themselves directly interested. Whether rightly or wrongly, the spirit of the times has been rather to take away from the jurisdiction of the County Justices, therefore I extremely regret that the Government should think it right to place in the hands of the Justices so important a duty as determining the valuation of the land. The difficulties which the President of the Board of Trade sees are only difficulties in detail. I venture to think the collective wisdom of the House would be equal to the task of so arranging the details necessary to carry out the hon. Member's Amendment.

(11.37.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS : I hope the Government will seriously consider the suggestion of my hon. Friend. You are about to place the landowner and the tithe owner in a very awkward position, for in every county you are going to give a Committee of Landowners the absolute discretion to consider and decide, without appeal, whether they will or will not whittle away the tithe. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that the relations between the clergy and the squire will become extremely awkward unless you set up some better tribunal for the consideration of this very delicate and important question of the assessment of the land.

*(11.38.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS : I demur to the suggestion that the Assessment Committee proposed by my right hon. Friend have not the local knowledge which is possessed by the Justices of the Peace. I believe an Assessment Committee appointed by the County Council would have a great deal more knowledge than the County Justices. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the County Justices are largely led by the surveyors. They are so led because they have not the local knowledge which the surveyors have. On the other hand, the County Councillors come from all parts of the county, and are elected by men who know the value of the land of the county.

*(11.39.) MR. S. T. EVANS : On the question of local knowledge allow me to point out that in their Bill of last year the Government suggested that the County Court Judge, who has no local knowledge of any kind should fix the value of the land.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH : The tribunal fixed by the Bill of last year was the Assessment Committee of the Union.

MR. S. T. EVANS : Then it was the Bill of the previous year. There have been so many Bills that I really forget in which the County Court Judge was constituted the tribunal. I maintain there will be found no difficulty in the appointment of an Assessment Committee as suggested in the Amendment. The County Councils now assess the counties for the purpose of the County Rate. If they are competent to frame assessments for rating purposes, surely they are competent to appoint a small Committee of their number with local knowledge, in whom the people who have elected them will have confidence, and who will form a very much better tribunal than the Government are setting up.

(11.43.) MR. LABOUCHERE : What is the practical effect of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman ? He proposes that these Assessment Commissioners should consist of gentlemen holding good positions in the county, men who are appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, or by the Executive. Hon. Gentlemen opposite are only consistent in one thing, and that is their hatred of every species of representative Government. My hon. Friend proposes that the County Council should appoint this Assessment Committee. The County Council stands between the squire and parson. It is independent. It is elected by the people of the county. Of course a Committee appointed by the Council commands the respect of the county. But would a Committee consisting of Magistrates command respect? I know there are many like me, and I have not the slightest respect for any Magistrate in the country. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I mean the Great Unpaid of the country. I have no respect for them. I have no respect for their decisions, and I think it a monstrous thing that they should sit on the Bench as Magistrates. That view is shared by the majority of the inhabitants of the country, and yet the Government actually come forward and propose that this Committee should consist of these Magistrates plus a number of persons appointed by themselves. This is the Government who passed a County Government Bill. They talked about giving Local Government to the country, and they go swaggering about and saying how honoured the country ought to be by having such a great Ministry. [Laughter.] Oh, they have said so, and you have said so. People can say anything—the question is, who believes them? Self praise is no recommendation. We see what this best and noblest of Governments do in regard to representative government. They absolutely refuse to make use of the very County Councils they brought into being. They prefer to use the County Magistrates and nominees of themselves in a matter which essentially concerns the county. There is only one reason why I hesitate for a moment to vote with my hon. Friend and that is that I shall have to vote against the Government. The tribunal under the Bill is to consist of country gentlemen, and I am satisfied that their decisions will sow discord between the squire and the parson in every parish. I should like to sow discord between the squire and the parson. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, and then I think the poor labourers and others would get their rights. The reason why I am not influenced by these considerations to vote in favour of the Government and against my hon. Friend, is that I want, as far as I can, to preserve intact the rights of the people in these particular tithes. I believe there would be the grossest jobbery on the part of these country gentlemen. Everyone looks after his own interests in the world, and I do hope my hon. Friend will go to a Division in order that we may discover who are for and who are against representative Government.

Mr. Labouchere

(11.52.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 162; Noes 94.—(Div. List, No. 24.)

It being after midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make a Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

ROADS AND STREETS IN POLICE BURGHS (SCOTLAND) BILL. (No. 12.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday, 3rd June.

MOTIONS.

WOMEN'S DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Haldane, Bill to remove the Disabilities of Women, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Haldane, Sir Edward Grey, and Mr. Howarth.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 175.]

FARM SERVANTS' WAGES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Haldane, Bill to amend the law relating to the payment of the Wages of Farm Servants in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Haldane, Mr. Marjoribanks, and Mr. Munro Ferguson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 176.]

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SPIRITS.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to consider whether, on grounds of public health, it is desirable that certain classes of Spirits, British and Foreign, should be kept in bond for a definite period before they are allowed to pass into consumption, and to inquire into the system of blending British and Foreign Spirits in or out of bond, and into the propriety of applying the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts and the Merchandise Marks Act to the case of British and Foreign Spirits, and also into the Sale of Ether as an Intoxicant.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of,—Sir Lyon Playfair, Mr. Somervell, Sir Henry Roscoe, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Board, Sir Edward Harland, Mr. Flynn, Colonel Hill, Mr. Hozier, Mr. M'Ewan, and Mr. Jackson.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Sir Lyon Playfair.)

LIGHT RAILWAYS (IRELAND)

ACT, 1889.

Return ordered—

"Of Copies of Orders in Council, and Agreements made under 'The Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889.'"—(Mr. Jackson.)

ARCHDEACONRY OF CORNWALL BILL

[LORDS].

Bill read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [No. 177.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion for Adjournment,

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): When the Irish Bills were postponed just now I endeavoured to elicit the information whether it was really intended to proceed with them on the day for which they were set down, Monday. I put the question, I hope, in a courteous way, and it is for the convenience of Irish Members that they should know.

*(12.11.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. Jackson, Leeds, N.): I hope the hon. Member will not think I was guilty of any discourtesy to him or to the House, but it is impossible for me to say if the Bills will be taken on Monday or not.

DR. TANNER: It would be of great convenience, and save some expense to Irish Members, if they had due notice of when Irish business will be taken.

(12.12.) MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I am sorry to find that both the Ministers who have the Tithes Bill in charge are absent, but perhaps the Secretary to the Treasury can answer my question. The Committee stage of the Tithes Bill was set down just now for resumption to-day [Friday], but I hope that was merely formal? The Bill interests Welsh Members in a high degree, and they have paid close attentions to the discussions. I trust they will not be kept in uncertainty as to whether the Bill will be proceeded with, and that the Government will take the usual course, postponing the Bill to the next Government night.

*(12.12.) MR. JACKSON: Friday is a Government night, and the Bill has been set down in the hope that it may be reached.

(12.12.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): It will be for the interest of the Government and the convenience of the House to frankly say the Bill will not be taken to-day. It is true that Friday is nominally a Government night, though it is not so in reality, and the right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well it is not recognised as a Government night. Notice is down of a very interesting subject for discussion on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply, and the only effect of this vagueness as to whether the Bill will be brought on will be that a good many gentlemen will be induced to enlarge the horizon of the observations they may wish to make on that subject.

(12.13.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): If the Government really intend to make progress with business, the true course would be for them to set down effective Supply for to-night. I have not the slightest doubt that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) will be in his place to move the Motion of which he has given notice, but even if he should be unable to do so, it is well-known that any Member of the House can speak to the subject matter of that Motion, or on the general question of grievances, on the Order for the Speaker to leave the Chair. It is rather hard upon our Welsh friends, several of whom desire to get away until Monday to visit their constituents, to find that the Government have a design to seize Friday to make progress with the Bill in which those Members are greatly interested, when we know perfectly well the true course for the Government to pursue, if they anticipate that the preliminary Motion will not occupy the whole Sitting, is to put down effective Supply. Very often we hear towards the end of the Session that the Government are pressed for time for Supply, and here is a possible opportunity for taking Supply in the month of January, and yet the Secretary to the Treasury is not ready with it, but intimates an intention of taking the unusual course of going on with this Bill. I have never known a Government attempting this on a Friday night unless they have had the whole time of the House at their disposal. I do not imagine for a moment that the Government will have the slightest chance of making progress with their Bill if they put it down, but it is unfair to the Welsh Members that they should be kept in uncertainty, when, in the usual course, they would be enabled to relax their attention and have a day off.

*(12.16.) MR. S. T. EVANS: Another reason why the Bill should not be taken arises out of what took place in Committee this evening. The Government accepted a proposal that a Schedule should be added, and this they did after considerable argument against the proposal. When the Government yielded, it was agreed that time would be required to frame the Schedule, and clauses would have to be reconsidered. I am not strictly in order, I am afraid, in referring to this, but I only want to show that the Committee stage cannot profitably be taken to-night, and even if it is put down, the Committee stage cannot be finished, but must still be carried over to Monday. Would it not be better then at once to set down the Bill for Monday, when I apprehend there will be no difficulty, so far as I am aware, in disposing of the Committee Stage?

*(12.18.) MR. JACKSON: Only by the consent of the House can I speak again. In reply to the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Longford I have to say that the course he has indicated would be the right one if we had effective Supply ready. But bear in mind the House has only been sitting a week.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Oh, no; since November.

*MR. JACKSON: But the hon. and learned Member knows perfectly well it is impossible to prepare the Estimates in November. An endeavour has been made to get the Estimates ready at least a fortnight earlier than the usual time, and I had hoped until this morning that it would have been possible to have circulated at any rate one of the classes for to-day. Clearly it is the duty of the Government to provide Government business on a Government night, and having no effective Supply we put down a Government Bill. I cannot carry the matter further. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman will put a question to the leader of the House to-morrow at question time—or as I observe my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has now entered the House he can give an answer.

Mr. T. M. Healy

(12.20.) MR. DILLWYN (Swansea): I venture to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman that he will listen to the appeal of the Welsh Members and for convenience, and to allow time for the preparation of the Schedule will let the Bill stand over to Monday.

*(12.22.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The only reason for putting the Bill down for Friday was that I was informed that possibly the Motion, of which notice has been given, would not be brought on, and so an opportunity offered for continuing the discussion on the Tithes Bill, but to meet the convenience of Members I shall be quite willing to postpone the further proceedings in Committee on the Tithes Bill until Monday, on the understanding that they will be completed on that day. I understand that an undertaking of that kind has been given.

*(12.23.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): We cannot come to any arrangement of that kind.

*(12.23.) MR. S. T. EVANS: With your leave, Sir, I may be allowed to say that so far as Welsh Members are concerned there is no desire to protract the Committee stage of the Bill beyond Monday. I said I saw no difficulty in finishing on that day, and I have since consulted with some of my hon. Friends and can confirm what I said, though of course I am unable to speak for the English Members.

*(12.24.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Very well, Sir, that is quite enough for me. I am quite sure the hon. Member for Lichfield will not go against the general feeling.

MR. LABOUCHERE: But, Sir, may I be allowed to say—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman has already spoken.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 30th January, 1891.

TRAMWAYS ORDER IN COUNCIL (IRELAND) (ATHENRY AND TUAM RAILWAY) BILL.—(No. 19.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK: My Lords, the object of this Bill is to confirm an Order of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in Council relating to the Athenry and Tuam and Clare Morris Railway. It provides for the extension of a line to Clare Morris. It has passed without opposition through the other House of Parliament, and has come up to your Lordships, and I trust your Lordships will give it a Second Reading.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 30th January, 1891.

STANDING ORDERS.

(3.10.) SIR R. FOWLER (London), in the absence of Sir J. MOWBRAY (Oxford University), moved—

“That the Select Committee on Standing Orders do consist of Thirteen Members:—Mr. Barclay, Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Sydney Buxton, Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Arthur Elliot, Sir Thomas Esmonde, Mr. Halsey, Mr. William Lowther, Sir John Mowbray, Colonel Nolan, Sir Lyon Playfair, Mr. Stansfeld, and Mr. Whitbread.”

On the name of Sir Thomas Esmonde being put from the Chair,

(3.12.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I have no objection to the appointment on this Committee of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Dublin

(Sir T. Esmonde). I am sure that he will be a very valuable member, but I wish to call attention to the circumstances under which the hon. Baronet has been nominated. There were two Committees down for nomination yesterday—the Committee of Selection and the Standing Orders Committee, and they are usually bracketed together. They are always presided over by the same Chairman, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir J. Mowbray), and they generally run together in double harness. The two Committees, although divided, are practically one. Yesterday there were three Irish Members on the two Committees—the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. J. McCarthy) on the Committee of Selection, and the hon. Member for North Kildare (Mr. Carew), together with myself, on the Standing Orders Committee. I think I may safely say that, although both Committees are considered to be important Committees, the Committee of Selection is the more important of the two, having very great and important duties to discharge. It is an unfortunate fact—already well-known through the ordinary channels of information—that there is at present a temporary schism among the Irish Members, and as one result it has been arranged to strike off from the Committee of Selection the name of the hon. Member for North Kildare, and to substitute that of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Dublin. The effect is that one of the two Irish Parties, not satisfied with having one-half of the representation of the Irish Members upon the two Committees, will obtain two-thirds of it. That is a proceeding which I strongly deprecate, and it manifests a certain amount of greediness. The matter is one, however, which must be settled by the English Members, because the number of Irish Members in attendance at this moment is very small. I have no doubt that the hon. Baronet will make a very efficient member of the Committee; but as the hon. Member for North Kildare is not in his place, not having recovered from his recent severe attack of illness, it would only be a graceful act for the hon. Baronet to offer to retire when my hon. Friend is in a condition to appear here again.

(3.15.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I desire to say a few words on this matter. I entirely agree with my hon. and gallant Friend that the hon. Baronet the Member for South Dublin would make a very efficient member of the Committee; but I regret that the addition of the name of the hon. Baronet should be effected at the cost of expunging that of the hon. Member for North Kildare, because I think that it is likely to lead to a misunderstanding, or, at all events, to a misconstruction of the motives which have led to it. My hon. and gallant Friend has alluded to the schism which prevails in our ranks. It is one which I hope will cease to exist after a short time; but I desire to point out that up to this moment we have kept out of this House any mention of that schism, or any act that would emphasise the misunderstanding which at present unfortunately exists. That, unfortunately, can no longer be said, if there is to be taken off the roll of the Committee the name of a Member who has been most attentive to his duties, who is one of the Whips of the Irish Party, and who is most popular among Members generally. Except that he has taken a particular side in this unfortunate controversy there is no reason whatever why the name of the hon. Member for North Kildare should be expunged. I do not wish to go to a Division on the matter; but I feel it my duty to support the protest which has been made against the unnecessary and invidious conduct of certain hon. Members of the House.

Question, "That the name of Sir Thomas Esmonde be there added," put, and agreed to.

On the name of Colonel Nolan being put from the Chair,

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Perhaps I may be allowed to suggest that it would be a graceful act on the part of the hon. and gallant Gentleman to retire in favour of the hon. Member for North Kildare. We all know the great services of the hon. Member for North Kildare, and the hon. and gallant Gentleman may now sacrifice himself on the altar of his country. The hon. and gallant Gentleman may confess his own unworthiness for this great position, and open the way for the nomination of the hon. Member for North Kildare, so that the House and the Committee may have the advantage of his invaluable services.

The other names were then agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

INDIA—THREATENED FAMINE IN MADRAS.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he has any information that the districts of Chingleput, Nellore, Cuddapah, North Arcot, South Arcot, Tinnevely, and Malabar, in Madras, with a population of about 12,000,000, are threatened with famine; and, if so, in view of the fact that, with the exception of Malabar, all these districts were famine-stricken in 1876 and 1877, some most severely, whether he will state what steps have been taken in the meantime to protect them from famine, and what results, if any, have followed from the taking of such steps; whether the primary cause of the threatening distress is the failure of the November rains; whether irrigated as well as unirrigated lands are threatened with crop failures; whether the Madras Government have taken any, and if so what, steps to carry out the declared intentions of the Government of India—

"That human life shall be saved at any cost and at any effort; no man, woman, or child shall die of starvation;"

and whether he will lay upon the Table all the particulars received by the Secretary of State respecting the impending distress, and also details as to the crop out-turns in the districts named in the years 1888, 1889, 1890?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The latest Reports that have reached the Secretary of State are dated Madras, 6th January. A failure of the late crops was then feared in parts of the seven districts named. No fear of famine was expressed, and the prices of grains consumed by the poor were said to be well below scarcity level. Plans for opening relief works, and for dispensing other relief, are ready, if necessity arises. In reply to the second paragraph of the question, I may say that the partial failure of the harvests has been due to the scantiness of the later rains or north-east monsoon. Irrigated crops have also suffered in parts, though not so seriously as the dry crops. In reply to the fourth and fifth paragraphs of the question, my answer is that the Secretary of State has asked for fortnightly telegrams from Madras, stating the condition of affairs and the steps taken to relieve distress if it arises. These telegrams will be published. The Government have also been asked to furnish a statement of the general out-turn of crops in the threatened districts for the years named.

H.M.S. POLYPHEMUS.

MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the experiments lately conducted at Portsmouth in the ex-boiler of the Polyphemus, with forced and induced draughts; whether the system of forced draught has failed and proved injurious to boiler tubes, and whether ships have been in consequence taken over from contractors with natural draught only, and not fulfilling their contract power and speed; and, if so, what steps are proposed to be taken to secure the power and speed contracted for; and whether it is intended in the future to adopt the use of forced draught for ships in Her Majesty's Navy?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): It is not considered desirable to publish at present the results of the experiments. Details have been furnished to the firm immediately concerned. Forced draught under proper precautions is not injurious to boiler tubes, but difficulties in connection with its extreme application have arisen with one or two special types of boilers, which types will not be repeated. The Admiralty has decided not to make forced draught trials in certain cases, and to accept the machinery after satisfactory natural draught trials. In such cases the contractors have constructed the machinery in accordance with the specifications.

TIED HOUSES.

MR. JOHN KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware of the observations which Mr. Justice Grantham is reported in the Times newspaper of the 28th instant to have made at the hearing of the action of "Keen v. Usher and Others (Limited)" on Tuesday last, with reference to the evidence of the manager of the defendants as to the existence of a practice, which he declared to be universal, and by which Brewery Companies employ persons to manage their licensed houses, who are in fact the mere servants of such companies, dismissable at a week's notice, but are made to sign agreements with the Brewery Companies for yearly tenancies in order that such agreements may be produced before the Licensing Justices; whether he is aware that a practice of the kind, though not universal, is very common; whether he would propose to take any, and, if so, what steps to put an end to it; and whether he can give the House an assurance that, at any rate, the notice of Licensing Justices generally will be at once called to the character of the frauds so practised upon them?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir. I have seen the newspaper report of the observations referred to. I am not aware of the frequency of the practice described. I am advised that there is nothing in the Licensing Acts to require the licensee to hold the premises for a term of any particular length; and, moreover, inasmuch as under certain circumstances, the licence may become forfeited, and the premises disqualified, it is not unreasonable or contrary to the public interests that the owner should reserve to himself an active control over the management of the house and the power of getting rid of an objectionable licensee at very short notice. With the view of ascertaining whether this control is secured in such a manner as to constitute in any sense a fraud on the Justices, I have asked the learned Judge to be so good as to favour me with his observations as to the facts before him, as to which I have insufficient information.

MINING ACCIDENTS.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will instruct his Inspectors of Mines to state in their Reports covering the year 1890, in the case of every person who met his death by accident, the hour of employment in which the accident occurred; and if he will give, approximately, the number of hours occupied underground by each individual Inspector during the past year, wherever a record has been kept?

*MR. MATTHEWS: Instructions have been given in accordance with the first paragraph of the question. In future Returns the particulars will be given. The Annual Returns of the Inspectors state generally the number and character of the visits made, but no record has been kept of the number of hours occupied underground.

INSPECTION OF COAL MINES— EMPLOYMENT OF WORKMEN AS INSPECTORS.

MR. DAVID THOMAS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in pursuance of the promise made in August last, he has further considered the suggestion that practical workmen should be appointed as Sub-assistant Inspectors of coal mines; and, if so, with what result?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I have been considering this question, and I have obtained the assent of the Treasury to an increase in the Vote for mine inspection; but I cannot pledge myself to say that the suggestion will prove either practical or useful.

BANK NOTES.

SIR WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.), who had on the Paper a notice of his intention to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether or not he has power, without fresh legislation, to permit the issue of notes representing four or eight half-crowns, instead of issuing the silver coins themselves, postponed the question until Monday.

THE NAVAL PRISON AT LEWES.

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Correspondence between the Visiting Justices of the Naval Prison at Lewes and the Lords of the Admiralty, with reference to the rules of discipline in force at that establishment, and to the question whether the prison as a building fulfils all the requirements necessary, and whether the Admiralty have had any Report furnished to them as to the adaptability of the building, and of the sanitary state of the same; and, if so, whether he will lay a Copy of such Report upon the Table of the House?

Mr. David Thomas

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The correspondence is not yet complete. The building is an old one, constructed on an obsolete model. Its sanitary condition has for a long series of years been favourably reported on, and the health statistics show it to be excellent. The attention of the Admiralty has been drawn to the small size of the cells, which is below the dimensions of modern cells, and steps have been taken to provide a remedy, and plans for this purpose are now under consideration.

CASE OF THOMAS LOCKET.

MR. NEWNES (Cambridge, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of Thomas Locket, who was sentenced at Worship Street Police Court, on the 21st instant, to two months' hard labour for moving a postman's bag a distance of five yards, and whether he intends to take any action in the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: The learned Magistrate who heard the case informs me that this man was convicted not of moving the bag, but of stealing it. I am of opinion that the evidence justified the Magistrate in passing the sentence he did.

MR. NEWNES: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the prosecutor admitted that the defendant had no intention of stealing the bag?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information to that effect. The man was convicted of stealing the bag.

MR. NEWNES: He admitted that it was a mere freak.

REVOLUTION IN CHILI.

MR. DUNCAN (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government is in telegraphic communication with the British Minister at Santiago, and the Commander of the British Squadron on the coast of Chili; whether he will state what the latest information is which has been received by the Government with regard to the course of the Revolution in Chili; and whether there is any truth in the report recently published that the British and other Foreign Ministers at Santiago have threatened to withdraw from the country; and, if that report be true, and the threat be carried into execution, what protection would be available to British subjects in Chili in the absence of the British Minister?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FER-GUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The latest telegram from the Admiral in command of the Squadron was received from Callao via Lima on the 23rd inst. He was about to start for Coquimbo. He reported that telegraphic communication from thence with Chili was interrupted, but he would, of course, have means of sending back messages to Callao, where he has left a vessel to bring messages from home if necessary. H.M.S. Champion had brought news that Valparaiso and Iquique were blockaded, and that there had been firing between the ships and the shore on the 18th. The latest telegrams from Her Majesty's Minister at Santiago were received on the 18th and 19th. At that time he did not apprehend bombardments nor serious injury to general commerce. No report whatever has been received of any threat on his part or that of the other foreign Representatives to withdraw. Inquiries will be made of Her Majesty's Minister. We have no reason to believe that either the Government or the insurrectionists have any hostility to Englishmen or other foreigners.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is intended to take such steps in respect to the clerks attached to the Savings Bank Department of the General Post Office as will prevent systematic overtime in that Department; and whether the Order in Council of 21st March 1890, which states that "The salaries of clerks in the Second Division for a daily attendance of seven hours shall be, &c.," has been modified by any subsequent Order in Council, and whether it can be altered by any Departmental Order?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the first part of the hon. Member's question, I have to state that I have already limited the amount of extra duty in the Savings Bank Department to three hours daily, although I have received within the last week numerous applications from clerks to be allowed to perform more than that amount of extra duty. I am most anxious to prevent systematic overtime in any branch of my Department; but there are practical difficulties in adjusting the numbers of a force to duties which become specially onerous only at particular seasons of the year. These demands have, until the present year, been readily met by the cordial co-operation of the ordinary staff, who have only very recently expressed their willingness to perform extra duty to a greater extent than I have required from them. With reference to the latter part of the hon. Member's question, I am not aware of any alteration having been made in the Order in Council to which he refers. I understand the words quoted by the hon. Member to indicate a normal or minimum attendance of seven hours per day, all time beyond that being paid for extra.

CLEANERS OF THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the invitation for contracts in respect to the cleaners of the Houses of Parliament; whether he will see that the hours of work of the cleaners are not more and the weekly wage is not less than those of the furniture dusters and the carpet layers, and that generally their hours of work and their wage for the year are the same as for the former; and whether he is aware that a foreman and a book keeper in regard to these men are paid for by the Office of Works, and that their sole connection with the contractor is being engaged and paid for by him; and, if so, whether he can state why they should not be engaged and paid by the Office of Works, and the profit of the contractor (whatever it may be) be thus saved?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary yesterday answered this question so far as it relates to distress. I have not had time to receive any Report from the Board of Works as to the merits of the proposed causeway; but I may say at once that I am not aware of any funds from which assistance could be given to the work.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any, and, if so what, steps are being taken to relieve the great existing distress on the Islands of Clare and Achill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Works are in progress in these islands, and railway works are now being constructed which will give employment and relieve the existing distress.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland of what nature are the relief works proposed to be carried out in the Ballyvourney, Clondrohid, and Inchigeela districts, and what amount it is intended to spend in each district, and whether all labour employed will be local or imported?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am unable to say at this moment what the nature of the relief works is.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has received a Memorial from the Clare Castle Harbour Trustees, through their Chairman, Lord Inchiquin, with regard to the proposed improvement of the navigation of the River Fergus; and whether, in view of the fact that the scheme suggested in the Memorial offers great advantages in the way of relief work by giving employment almost exclusively to unskilled labour, largely available in the locality, and in view of the admittedly great distress existing in the district, he can hold out any hope that the request of the Memorialists will be acceded to?

*MR. JACKSON: The Memorial referred to by the hon. Member has been forwarded to the Treasury by the Irish Government, and a reply has been sent to Lord Inchiquin, that the Treasury has no funds at its disposal from which assistance could be given for the improvement of the navigation of the River Fergus.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will lay upon the Table Copies of the Report of the Committee, ordered by the Irish Board of Works, which met at Clifden and Galway in January, 1890, to invite promoters to submit surveys and estimates for the Connemara Light Railway, of the tenders submitted, and of the contract and conditions entered into with the Midland Great Western Railway Company for the construction of the lines from Galway to Clifden, from Westport to Mulraney, and from Ballina to Killala, whether public competition was invited for the construction of these lines; and, if not, why not; and whether the Midland Railway Company, since they entered into the contract, have sublet the Galway and Clifden line, by an arrangement under which a considerable portion of the free grant is to be handed over to the shareholders of the Midland Company, as stated by the Chairman on 13th August?

*MR. JACKSON: I believe that copies of the evidence taken by the Commission of Inquiry in January of last year were placed during last Session in the Library of the House, and contain all information as to the various schemes then brought forward; there were no tenders in the proper sense of the word, as there could be no line to construct until an agreement had been made by the Treasury with the promoters. In order to give the House all information possible I yesterday moved for a Return of the Orders in Council, &c., which contain the agreements made under the Light Railways (Ireland) Act, and the right hon. Gentleman will find in that Return the particulars he asks for with regard to the Midland Great Western Railway. As regards the second and third paragraphs of the question, I may say that the lines for the construction of which agreements have been made with that company have been started under preliminary contracts, with the object of employing labour at the earliest moment on the works, and I understand that the company is about to invite tenders from a considerable number of selected firms for the final contract. I have no knowledge of any such arrangement as is alluded to in the last paragraph of the question, nor can I find any reference to it in such reports of the Midland Great Western Railway Company's half-yearly meeting as I have been able to consult.

In answer to a further question from Mr. J. MORLEY,

*MR. JACKSON said: I do not think I can say that any other promoters had the opportunity of submitting terms, because the first proposal was a proposal as to a narrow gauge line. It was considered desirable to make agreements with the existing companies for the purpose of securing a satisfactory working of the lines when constructed, and the agreements made relieved the barony from any future charge. The Midland Railway Company will construct and work the line for all time.

MR. J. MORLEY: I do not want to raise a controversy at this moment, but I desire to point out that a large sum of public money has been handed over to a Railway Company without giving other persons a chance of competition, and therefore the Railway Company appears to have been left to dictate its own terms.

MR. WALSH OF THE CASHEL SENTINEL.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he has examined (as promised) into the case of Mr. Walsh, of the Cashel Sentinel, now undergoing four months' imprisonment in Tullamore on a charge of conspiracy; whether, before being convicted in Tipperary on this charge, Mr. Walsh had been sentenced to three months' hard labour for publishing in his newspaper a speech of another person commenting on a declaration of the right hon. the Member for Mid Lothian; did the police hold over the first warrant until they ascertained that Mr. Walsh would not appeal against the second sentence, and have they since abstained from executing it, so that the prisoner, by the act of the Executive, is now enduring a punishment later in point of time than the one first inflicted on him; where is the authority for this procedure, and what is the name of the officer responsible; whether, inasmuch as Sec. 23 of the Petty Sessions Act prescribes when a warrant is issued, "for its execution forthwith," it is intended to enforce the first warrant four and a quarter months after sentence, when Mr. Walsh's second term has been completed; and how long may a policeman keep unexecuted in his possession a warrant which he has the power immediately to act on, and which the statute provides shall be executed "forthwith," and where is his discretion to suspend the Law derived from?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I have examined into the case of Mr. Walsh, of the Cashel Sentinel. The warrant in the conspiracy case, under which the prisoner is now undergoing punishment, was the earlier in point of date. The warrant in the appeal case referred to in the question as the first warrant was not, in point of fact, issued until after the warrant in the conspiracy case, and therefore could not have been executed before it. It is not the fact that the police held over the first warrant, or that the prisoner, by the act of the Executive, is undergoing a punishment later in point of time than the one first inflicted on him. When the warrant in the appeal case was issued the prisoner was in custody under the warrant in the conspiracy case. Where there are two sentences which are not concurrent the ordinary course is to execute the second warrant on the expiration of the time of imprisonment under that which was earlier in date. This practice appears to be according to law, and there was nothing exceptional in the present case.

MR. T. M. HEALY: For the fourth time the right hon. Gentleman has carefully abstained from answering the question whether the police have not failed to follow the statute which prescribes that they shall execute a warrant forthwith.

*MR. MADDEN: I have on this and on other occasions fully answered the hon. and learned Gentleman's questions. If the provisions of the Statute have been violated, the prisoner will have his remedy.

THE POTATO CROP IN IRELAND.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state (roughly) by how much the potato crop in North, East, and South Galway fell short of an average crop; if the crop was not only bad but uneven, and if many small holders of land have now nearly exhausted their potato pits; and if it is his intention to, at present, confine all public works to the mountainous portion of the county known as Connemara; and, if so, do not the Reports he has received show that a large portion of the population east of Lough Carrib are now without any potatoes beyond that required for seed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Roughly speaking, the potato crop in the districts mentioned fell short of an average one by from two-thirds to one-half.

IRISH CENSUS RETURNS.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the intention of the Government to call in the services of the Irish National School teachers to fill Census Returns, as in former years; and whether, in that case, the work being in addition to their ordinary legitimate labour, for which they are admittedly underpaid, they will be given the remuneration allowed to the Government Census clerks for similar work?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Irish National School teachers who are in charge of schools will be required, under the authority of the Census Act (in common with the heads of all other educational establishments), to furnish Returns similar to those obtained in 1861, 1871, and 1881. No remuneration is provided by the statute for these duties, and none has ever been given. No similar work is done by Government Census clerks.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Sir Frederick George Milner, baronet, for the County of Nottingham (Bassetlaw Division).

MOTIONS.

METROPOLIS WATER SUPPLY.

On Motion of Sir Algernon Borthwick, Bill to place the Water Supply of the Metropolis, and the adjoining districts, under the control of a public authority, and to make further provision for such supply, ordered to be brought in by Sir Algernon Borthwick, Mr. Baumann, Mr. Fisher, and Mr. Whitmore.
Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 178.]

visions for such supply, ordered to be brought in by Sir Algernon Borthwick, Mr. Baumann, Mr. Fisher, and Mr. Whitmore.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 178.]

VESTRYMEN'S QUALIFICATION ABOLITION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. James Rowlands, Bill for the abolition of the Rotal Qualifications for members of Vestries, ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Rowlands, Mr. Cremer, Mr. Howell, Mr. Whitmore, Mr. Pickersgill, and Mr. James Stuart.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 179.]

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LAND TENURE, IRELAND (ARBITRATION).

*(4.17.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central) rose to call attention to the remaining disputes between large bodies of tenants in Ireland and their landlords, which arose in the years 1885-7; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to use its influence for the settlement by arbitration of the remaining disputes between large bodies of tenants in Ireland and their landlords, which arose in the years 1885-7, and, if necessary, to propose legislation to Parliament for effecting this purpose."

The right hon. Gentleman said: I had desired to raise the question which forms the substance of my Motion by way of Instruction to the Land Purchase Bill. It seemed to me that when we are invited to enter upon the discussion of a great agrarian measure for Ireland, by which it is proposed ultimately to abolish dual ownership, and incidentally to reduce very greatly the annual payment of those tenants whose landlords agree to sell, it would be wise statesmanship to sweep away the dregs of a past agrarian movement and to conciliate Irish opinion towards the new measure by getting rid of the remaining disputes between landlords and tenants, and by restoring to their holdings the 2,000 to 3,000 evicted tenants, who, in the almost universal opinion of Irishmen, have been unjustly evicted. If, again, any estates of Irish landlords are to be bought by English money, it would seem to be wise to buy up those whose owners have been the cause of the unfortunate disputes rather than those of the better landlords, who, under Lord Ashbourne's Act, have been clearing out of the country. When I found that I could not raise this question on the Land Bill, I delivered in this Motion. My personal justification is that I have visited, myself, many of the estates which are the subject of my Motion; that I have always come away from them deeply impressed with the importance of bringing these miserable disputes to an end, believing that it can only be effected by arbitration. I have never lost an opportunity of urging this course on both landlords and tenants, and whenever I have spoken on the subject in this House I have always urged the Government to use their influence in this direction, and, if necessary, to propose legislation on the subject. I believe I am right in saying that there are not more than 15 or 20 estates, at the outside, where these disputes exist. From these estates 2,000 to 3,000 tenants have been evicted. They are all living in temporary huts close by their former holdings, sustained by the contributions of Irishmen in every part of the world, and living in confident belief that they will be reinstated in their holdings. Except in the case of two estates, no advance whatever has been made towards re-letting the lands from which these people have been evicted. Although great efforts have been made to bribe Protestant tenants from the North at very low rents, by a free gift of the evicted tenants' interest, to take these farms, no one has been found to run counter to the overwhelming weight of public opinion of the district by taking the farms. They lie derelict and uncultivated; no one who has not seen them can have an idea of the desolation. The houses have often been burnt or razed to the ground. The land is covered breast-high with thistles; the remaining tenants in possession on these estates are living in constant expectation of being evicted; they are unable to farm; their cattle are constantly distrained and carried away. These disputes are the remnants of a very much larger number of cases where disputes arose in 1886. I believe I am right in saying that there were a hundred of such cases. I have no desire to embark in a historical discourse, but it is necessary to remind the House that these disputes arose in consequence of the great fall of prices of agricultural produce, and the failure of Parliament to legislate on the subject in 1886. It is incontestible that if the Act of the following year had been passed a year sooner, these disputes would never have occurred; or if the Act of 1887 had been made retrospective, in the sense of dealing with the arrears which had grown up in the interval extending the period of redemption, the disputes would have been settled. In the interval the tenants finding their appeal to Parliament for remedial legislation, disregarded, turned their attention to agitation and to combination, and adopted what may be called extra legal methods. The better landlords of Ireland made large abatements of rent cases, of judicial rents varying from 20 to 40 per cent.; a minority of landlords, as is always the case in Ireland, stood on the legal rights, and refused to make any abatement. The tenants then combined together, and adopted the form of combination known as the Plan of Campaign. I am not going to defend that, or many of the things which took place. I will only say that in no previous agrarian movement in Ireland has there been so small an amount of crime in the true sense of the term. There are many who suffer from the Plan of Campaign on the brain who think that those who engaged in these combinations were actuated only by fraud. Lord Salisbury has recently said that all those engaged in these disputes were engaged in swindling and stealing their landlords' property. This, in my view, is an utterly wrong view of the case. The tenants are not tenants in the English sense of the term—they are joint-owners; they claimed that when a great agrarian crisis occurred, it was not right or fair that the whole of the loss should fall on one of the joint owners and none on the others; their claim was admitted by all the good landlords, and was conceded by the Legislature the next year. The sequel has shown that in the vast majority of cases the tenants were justified in their demands. I desire to point out that out of the 100 cases of combination, 80 have been practically settled. The cause in all was the same, the landlords refusing to make any abatement; the tenants then combined to demand abatements; the landlords then began to evict, and the Government supported the landlords with all the powers of the Coercion Act. It will not, it cannot be, denied that the main, if not the sole, use of the Coercion Act has been to break down these combinations to enable the landlords to evict, to support them in securing arrears of full and excessive rent. Nineteen out of 20 cases under the Coercion Act have been directly or indirectly connected with these disputes. I have no desire to raise a Debate on the Coercion Act, otherwise I should be tempted to dilate on its utter failure. What I desire to point is this. In no single case that I am aware of has a combination been broken down. A large number have been settled; 80 out of the 100 have been brought to an end. So far as I have been able to obtain information, the settlements have been effected in all of these cases upon the basis of a large abatement of rent, as large in most cases as the tenants originally asked for, and such as, if offered in the first instance, would have avoided all dispute. In every single case the evicted tenants have been replaced in their holdings. In some cases settlements have been arrived at by arbitration with the happiest results; but in all the cases the arbitrators have awarded abatements as large, or closely approaching the amounts originally demanded. In no case can it be said that the combination has been actually put down. Now, Sir, there remain about 15 or 20 cases of combination, and in those cases there is strong evidence to show that the tenants on the whole were justified in their demands. There is hardly any case in which the landlords have not made offers to their tenants, which, if made in the first instance, would have avoided all the trouble. The main difficulty in these cases is, that as a rule the landlords will not concede to the evicted tenants the same terms they are prepared to give to those still in possession; many will not allow the re-instatement of the evicted tenants, while others refused to reinstate the leaders only, or else offer terms which it is not possible to accept. On the other hand, the tenants are on their part unwilling to abandon the evicted tenants, and in consequence refuse to come to terms singly with their

Colonel Nolan

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

landlords. They ask that all shall be treated alike; they hold that as men of honour they are bound to stand by one another, and they will not desert those who have fought the battle for them. I believe that is the main difficulty in all the existing disputes. Now I wish to illustrate the position by two or three cases. First as to the well-known case of Lord Clanricarde. In 1885, when the agrarian difficulty first began, his tenants sent a petition asking for an abatement of 25 per cent. The Petition was signed by Dr. Healy, the Coadjutor Bishop of the Diocese—a prelate whose sympathies are well known to be in favour of the landlords. It was also signed by the Protestant Rector. The agent, in forwarding the Petition, evidently indicated an opinion that the demand ought to be complied with; he stated that the year was a very bad one, and that neighbouring landlords were giving reductions of rent, and he hoped his Lordship would see his way to giving an abatement to the tenants who had not gone into Court. Lord Clanricarde reprimanded his agent for forwarding the Petition, and never gave any reply to it. His tenants then entered into a combination. This took place a year before the Plan of Campaign was devised. Lord Clanricarde thereupon instructed his agent to proceed against them with drastic measures. I may mention that never during the 19 years he has been in possession of the property, has he once been in Ireland to see it. Evictions being resorted to, were resisted with great force by the tenant. I need not remind the House of the correspondence that took place later between the late Chief Secretary, the President of the Board of Trade, and Lord Clanricarde on the subject, in the course of which the former refused any longer to allow the forces of the Crown to be used for the purposes of these evictions, unless he made a reduction of rent equivalent to that granted by neighbouring landlords. Lord Clanricarde then made a feeble and imaginary reduction, which certainly did not satisfy the necessities of the case, and later on, when the present Chief Secretary came into power, the evictions were resumed, the aid of the forces of the Crown being no longer refused. After three years' fighting, and after 100 tenants had been evicted, Lord Clanricarde came to the conclusion that it would be wise to make some abatement, and for the first time he offered a 20 per cent. reduction. If that offer had been made at the commencement of the dispute it would have avoided all difficulty. His agent, before Lord Cowper's Commission, stated in his evidence that if he had been permitted to make that abatement, there would, in all probability, have been no combination on the part of the tenants. When the offer was made the tenants would only accept it on condition that the evicted tenants were reinstated. Lord Clanricarde declined positively to reinstate any of them, and accordingly this miserable dispute went on, and something like 150 more tenants were evicted. A remarkable document appeared in the Times to-day. It is a letter from Bishop Healy, who has been negotiating with Mr. Tener, Lord Clanricarde's agent, on behalf of some of the evicted tenants, desiring to know on what terms they could be reinstated in their holdings. From the agent's answer, published in the Times, it appears that the terms on which Lord Clanricarde is willing to reinstate evicted tenants are so monstrous that no tenant can possibly agree to them. In the first place, he will only reinstate those tenants he may think it desirable to reinstate in the interests of the estate. In the second place, he insists they shall pay rent for the two or three years during which they have been out. It really seems absurd to suppose that anybody could have put forward such proposals; but there they are, showing the spirit in which Lord Clanricarde deals with these cases. I believe I am right in saying that there are 800 other tenants still in possession, but expect to be evicted in the same manner. Many of them are already under notice. It may be said that this is an exceptional case, but that is not so. The case of Lord Massereene has a remarkable resemblance to it. Lord Massereene's agent, Mr. Wynne, one of the best-known men in the North of Ireland, and one of the ablest agents, in 1886 advised his employer to make the same abatement that neighbouring landlords had made, but he refused, and his agent was either dismissed or gave notice, and his affairs were put into the hands of a firm of Dublin solicitors, gentlemen who have obtained a certain notoriety for the manner in which they deal with these disputes.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Land sharks.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The tenants next met together and sent a deputation to Lord Massereene, who refused to see them. Thenceforward the tenants combined, evictions took place, and the usual serious consequences followed. After the dispute had gone on several months Lord Massereene offered terms which the tenants would have been prepared to accept, subject to the condition that the evicted tenants were reinstated; but, unfortunately, though Lord Massereene was willing to reinstate the tenants generally, he made an exception in the case of three of the leaders, whom he would under no circumstances consent to replace. But the majority of the tenants preferred eviction to the abandonment of their leaders, and this led to the breakdown of the negotiations, as the tenants would not desert these three men. The case of the Ponsonby estate differs from that of the Clanricarde and Massereene estates. Mr. Ponsonby was not unwilling to make an abatement of 15 per cent. The tenants asked 30 per cent., and, being refused, joined the Plan of Campaign. Mr. Ponsonby thereupon began to evict. After many evictions, and after months had gone by, negotiations were opened with a view to the purchase of their holdings by the tenants under the Ashbourne Act; and, according to the statement of the tenants, terms were very nearly agreed to. At that stage the hon. Member for Huntingdon stepped in, and, on behalf of a syndicate of landlords, bought the estate with a view of carrying on the dispute. The hon. Member in a speech to his constituents has since explained that his object in so doing was to defeat the Plan of Campaign, and give such a lesson to the tenants who had taken part in it as would deter others from embarking on a similar course. The hon. Member having bought the estate, made a not unreasonable offer to the tenants. Such an offer, in fact, if it had been made at the outset, would have avoided all the difficulty. In the first place, however, he was not prepared to reinstate the evicted tenants. Later on he gave way to some extent and agreed to admit them, but insisted upon their paying the rent for the period during which they had been evicted—in some cases as much as two or three years. Of course, this was impossible, and so all negotiations ceased, and the unfortunate dispute has gone on. During the last few months 250 tenants have been evicted. The tenants were anxious and willing to refer the dispute to arbitration. But the hon. Member for Huntingdon, on behalf of his syndicate, refuses arbitration on the ground that it would be a victory for the Plan of Campaign. The last case I shall mention is that of Mr. Olphert. In this, as in the others, the tenants originally demanded an abatement, and, the landlord offering wholly inadequate terms, the tenants joined the Plan of Campaign, and the evictions proceeded. Efforts were made from time to time to bring this case to a settlement, and I took considerable part in endeavouring to induce Mr. Olphert to agree to refer the matter to arbitration. I saw his son in London, and I also communicated with the hon. Member for South Tyrone on the subject. At one time I had great hopes Mr. Olphert might be induced to adopt this course, but it appears from a statement he made publicly in the North of Ireland that he could not do so, as he had received assistance from other landlords of the district upon the understanding that he would not give way. Over 200 tenants have during the last few weeks been evicted. Undoubtedly Mr. Olphert before the last batch of evictions made offers of a much more generous character than he had ever made before, but no agreement could be arrived at owing to Mr. Olphert being unwilling to reinstate the evicted tenants on the same terms. These are the principal cases, but I could multiply the number if necessary. Still they fairly illustrate the nature of the existing disputes. As I have already said the difficulty is the reinstatement of the evicted tenants. But I want the House to consider is it reasonable to expect that men who have combined together and promised to stand by one another in order to get an abatement of rent should desert those who have suffered for the general good, and should abandon their evicted friends? To do so would be playing a dishonourable part. Whatever may have been the condition of the original combination—be it legal or be it criminal—I hold that when the main grounds for which the combination was started have been conceded by the landlords, when the combiners have been granted an abatement of rent, and when the only question remaining is the reinstatement of the evicted tenants, then the combination can no longer be called illegal or criminal. I do not think that any jury could be found in the whole of Christendom to convict tenants of criminal conspiracy under such conditions as these. The Chief Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have stated that if I publicly uttered in Ireland anything illegal I should be treated the same as certain Irish Members have been. Well, I have three times publicly stated this opinion in Ireland, and I presume that, as my words must have been criticised and scrutinised, they have not been found to be illegal. I have frequently said the same thing in this House, and am prepared to justify it either in Ireland or here. Is it not possible to bring these unhappy disputes to an end? Is it not a scandal that the peace of the country should be disturbed because men like Lord Clanricarde and Lord Massereene act in this unreasonable and unjust manner? Arbitration had settled the trouble on the Vandeleur estate as well as on other estates. The dispute on the Vandeleur estate was one of the most difficult I came across in Ireland, because the matter was by no means clear. The landlord offered an abatement, but the tenants demanded a larger abatement, which was refused, so that a combination was entered into, and evictions took place with the usual miserable consequences. I was invited over by the tenants, with a view to endeavouring to bring about an arrangement, and when there I found the greatest possible difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to the real merits of the case. I urged the landlord's agent to agree to arbitration, but without success; but fortunately the hon. Member for Canterbury was more successful. Colonel Vandeleur agreed to the suggestion, and the hon. and learned Member for Hackney undertook the task, his award bringing the dispute to a conclusion. The tenants received an abatement equal to that which they had originally demanded, the evicted tenants were replaced in their holdings, and peace has been restored to the district. The tenants, I am told, are most desirous of abiding by the award, and the priests are doing their utmost to promote that result. Now, I will venture to make an appeal to the Chief Secretary, and to ask him whether this course might not be pursued in other cases, and whether it does not offer a solution of these disputes. How is it to be brought about? I have no doubt that the best plan of bringing it about would be for the Chief Secretary to bring the influence of the Government to bear upon the remaining landlords who are parties to these disputes. I have not the smallest doubt myself that if the Chief Secretary were to summon these landlords or their agents to the Castle in Dublin, tell them that the peace of the country required that these disputes should be brought to an end, and ask them to accept arbitration, his influence would prevail, more especially if he were to hint that, in the event of their refusal, he would not use the Coercion Act or pack juries to support them. These disputes go on mainly because the landlords are supported by the Coercion Acts and because they know that if any case is tried the jury will be packed for them. If they knew that they would not be supported by the Coercion Act, and that they would not have juries packed for them, my belief is that these disputes would speedily be settled. I would therefore recommend the Chief Secretary to suggest arbitration to the landlords, and to couple the suggestion with a hint in the direction I have referred to. Indeed, I believe that if the right hon. Gentleman were to rise in his place to-night and say he is in favour of arbitration, and thinks these disputes ought to be brought to an end in the way I suggest, his voice would be so influential that within a few days we should hear of the settlement of all these cases. So far the right hon. Gentleman has never lifted his voice in favour of such a settlement. I hope I am not doing him an injustice in this matter; but if he can pick out from his speeches in this House any expression favourable to a settlement, or tending towards peace and conciliation, I will gladly withdraw my statement.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

It appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman's action has so far been in the opposite direction, and has tended to urge the landlords to maintain their old attitude. If legislation were necessary to carry out the policy I advocate, I do not think it would be difficult to frame a compulsory measure on the subject. I would suggest that the disputes should be scheduled in the Bill, and that the Board of Arbitrators should be appointed for deciding what abatements should be made in rents. I do not, however, feel it necessary to enter into the details of such a scheme. All I desire to do is to lay down the general principle that these cases would be dealt with by arbitration. I do not deny that the landlords are within their legal rights; they can claim their pound of flesh. But it is not always wise in these days to insist upon the assertion of legal rights. I suppose the Irish landlords in the time of the Irish famine were within their rights in the action they took. Let me remind the House what a great statesman of our time said on this point—I mean Lord John Russell. In Mr. Spencer Walpole's Life of Lord John Russell, recently published, will be found a letter written by that statesman in 1848, when he was Prime Minister of this country. Writing to the Lord Lieutenant in the middle of the famine, Lord J. Russell said—

“I am not ready to bring in any restrictive law without at the same time restraining the power of the landlords. It is quite true that the landlords of England would not like to be shot at, but neither does any landlord of England turn out 50 families at once and burn their houses down.”

I say that, however bad the Plan of Campaign and boycotting may be, they are not as bad as wholesale evictions and the burning down of houses by men like Lord Clauricarde. I have purposely restricted my Motion to the disputes which arose between the years 1885 and 1887, so that it does not include the Tipperary case, which comes within a totally different category, as it was a political dispute which arose in consequence of the indignation of the people in respect of the Ponsonby dispute. My confident belief is that if the Ponsonby dispute were settled by arbitration or otherwise, the Tipperary dispute would come to an end. In conclusion, I can only say that every consideration, whether of justice to the tenants, or of the interests of peace in Ireland, or of wise statesmanship, points to the same suggestion, namely, that the Government ought to use its influence in obtaining a settlement of these cases by arbitration, and if they fail to do so, ought to apply to this House for legislation. I confidently appeal to the House in favour of a policy of peace and conciliation. I beg to move the Motion which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to use its influence for the settlement by arbitration of the remaining disputes between large bodies of tenants in Ireland and their landlords, which arose in the years 1885-7, and, if necessary, to propose legislation to Parliament for effecting this purpose,"—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of Question."

* (5.9.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): In rising to oppose the Motion I may say there are two things I have no desire to do. I have no desire to enter into any thick and thin defence of Irish landlords, and certainly it is no part of my business, here or anywhere else, to attempt any defence of Lord Clanricarde. Nor have I any intention of condemning in any general way the principle of arbitration. If any landlord, having a dispute with his tenantry, chooses to submit that dispute to arbitration I am perfectly satisfied, and I think he will probably act wisely. But when the right hon. Gentleman comes forward with arbitration as a kind of specific for this disease—a kind of lymph that has simply to be injected into the Plan of Campaign to effect a complete cure of the disease—I take leave to differ with him. And it is on that ground that I oppose the Motion. I can very well understand the anxiety of hon. Members on this side of the House to have the Plan of Campaign out of the way and settled. There are many reasons why they should wish the Plan of Campaign out of the way at the present time. In the first place, it is a very costly business, and the folly of, the hon. Member for North-East Cork and the hon. Member for East Mayo in launching the Plan of Campaign has been about the most costly folly that Irish Members have ever committed. Speaking at Chicago on November 29 last, the Member for East Mayo said—

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

"During the last two years I myself have been obliged to pay out on the average 25,000 dollars per month for food, and for the purpose of providing means for famishing people."

That is to say, after having advised people to give up the means of livelihood that they possessed, and after having used means which amounted, in my opinion, to absolute coercion in order to carry out the Plan, the hon. Member goes to America and informs the American people that this costly folly tots up to an expenditure of something like £5,000 or £6,000 a month. You can well understand, therefore, why hon. Members on this side of the House wish to get rid of the Plan of Campaign. But there are other reasons. There are also contingent liabilities. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford has encouraged the evicted tenants by promising that they shall be reinstated in their holdings when the right hon. Gentleman and his friends return to political power. Now, that is a very dangerous promise for the right hon. Gentleman to make to any such body of people. In the first place, it is a promise which the right hon. Gentleman may never have an opportunity of carrying out; and even if the right hon. Gentleman attains to power he may find it exceedingly difficult to carry it out. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) has given an intimation that he sees difficulties in the way. At any rate, I am certain that the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) does so, for what did he say at Cork on the 17th of December, 1890? He said—I am quoting from the Cork Daily Herald:—

"What has Mr. Parnell done in the case of the evicted tenants—the men who have sacrificed all for principle, the adopted children of the nation? He has said in that manifesto that the Liberal Party could do nothing for them by means of direct action. That was a misleading declaration. If by direct action is meant legislation, of course we are all aware that the Liberal Party could not command the assent of the House of Lords, but the Liberal Party, when it comes into power, will have the control of the House of Commons, and control of the House of Commons means control of the purse, and I am not aware of any reason why the Liberal Party, controlling the Exchequer of the country, might not be enabled to make a grant in aid of the evicted tenants, who had suffered by the unjust exercise of the law."

Considering the cost of the Plan of Campaign and the bills drawn on the future, hon. Members on this side of the House have every reason to press for a settlement to get rid, first of the cost, and then of the contingent liabilities. The Member for Bradford seemed to me—I hope I did not misunderstand him, and I certainly do not wish to misrepresent him—to argue that if the Act of 1887 had been passed in time, the Plan of Campaign never would have come into operation, and these evicted tenants never would have suffered.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Hear, hear!

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I have the assent of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian to that statement. I ask the House to look that statement fairly in the face, and contrast it with the actual facts. I do not believe that the Plan of Campaign was brought into operation for the purpose of relieving the tenants at all. I will tell the House why I say so. The hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), speaking on October 4th, 1888, in Dundalk, while the Plan of Campaign was at its height on the Massereene estate, plainly stated what the struggle meant. He said—

"The struggle on the land question is only part and parcel of the great struggle for Irish independence, which was fought for in '98, in '48, and in '67."

That was why the Plan of Campaign was brought into operation. It was founded on a doctrine preached by Mr. John Mitchell at a much earlier date, when he said—

"I am convinced, and have long been, that the mass of the Irish people cannot be roused in any quarrel less than social revolution, destruction of landlordism, and denial of every tenure and title derived from English sovereignty."

That is the basis of the Plan of Campaign, and not any desire to shield the tenantry. To come now to the question of the Act of 1887, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford asserts that if the Act had been passed in time all the struggle might have been avoided. Now, what did that Act do?

It provided for the revising of the judicial rents for a limited period; but will any hon. Member say that the reductions in the judicial rents granted under that Act ever equalled the reductions offered by the landlords, with the single exception of Lord Clanricarde, before the Plan of Campaign was brought into operation on their estates? Much larger reductions were offered in every case, always excepting that of Lord Clanricarde, before this warfare commenced, and were declined. That can be proved. Therefore it is not fair of the right hon. Gentleman to state deliberately that if the Act of 1887 had been passed in time the trouble would have been avoided. I say that the landlords were in the main better than that Act, and this, therefore, bars the right hon. Gentleman's argument as to the Act of 1887. The fact of the matter is that the Plan of Campaign was only founded as a political machine, and it has been used as a political machine. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford has gone over several estates, and argued strongly in favour of applying arbitration, compulsory if necessary, to the disputes. Now, I would call the attention of the House to at least three cases where this principle of arbitration has been brought into operation in Ireland. First is the case of Captain Hill, of Gweedore, and that case was the origin of the whole trouble in Gweedore. I am not very sure that the Chief Secretary or his agents have not some responsibility to bear for the trouble that followed Captain Hill's settlement. Captain Hill is the owner of a small property in Gweedore, where the holdings are small and the people are poor. Trouble arose in 1887, and evictions were on the point of taking place. The whole dispute was practically left in the hands of Father M'Fadden as arbitrator, and what took place? The forces of the law were on the estate, and evictions were imminent. The tenants owed £1,914 on the decrees. They offered £1,456, and, by the way, this was the famous case where Colonel Dopping was agent. This was a reduction of 5s. 6d. in the £1 on the non-judicial rents, and a reduction of 20 per cent. on the judicial rents. The landlord asked for £1,516, but Father M'Fadden's arbitration was accepted, and Colonel Dopping agreed to receive the £1,456. All the expenses were to be paid by the landlord; all the tenants were to sign agreements to become judicial tenants at 25 per cent. reduction, and all the old tenants were to be reinstated. In fact, every condition suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford was in this case carried out. The terms of the tenants were absolutely conceded; but have the rents been paid? I know of my own knowledge that the agents sat for two days in the rent office last month without a single tenant crossing the door. I want to put this to the House: It is one thing to talk about arbitration, but it is quite another thing to get the award carried out. What is the Land Court, established under the Land Act of 1881, but a Court of Arbitration appointed by the House of Commons itself? And yet the judicial rents fixed by this Court of Arbitration under the authority of this House are no more sacred than the rents which have not been revised; and the awards of the Court can only be enforced by eviction. What is the use of piling award upon award? What is the use of setting up another Court of Arbitration to revise the Court already set up by the House itself? The awards can only be enforced by eviction even in that case; the eviction will be resisted, whatever the Court be; and all the same unpopularity will attach to it, simply because the Plan of Campaign is not a movement to relieve tenants, but a political engine. Another case of absolute arbitration is to be found in the Glensharrold estate. There the landlord has disappeared altogether, having been ruined long ago. Glensharrold is a miserable place, where it is quite impossible for the people on the wretched land to make the rent, or a living. They make their rent out of the bog and the sale of the turf. The dispute was between the tenants and the Land Court, with Mr. Justice Monroe at its head. The Court offered an abatement of 30 per cent., on rents that had been judicially fixed in the main. That offer was rejected, and the Plan of Campaign was adopted. How would the Act of 1887 have prevented the Plan of Campaign in Glensharrold, seeing that its highest reduction was 16½ per cent.? The people were poor, and, therefore, extraordinary exertions were made by a number of philanthropic gentlemen to get the dispute settled. Mr. Justice Monroe was practically the arbitrator between the landlord and the tenants; he had no interest in the land. As to what the facts were, I will quote from a letter written by the Bishop of Limerick, the Bishop of the diocese, who undoubtedly knew the circumstances of the case, and who felt for the poor people. There were arrears due to March, 1890, amounting to £2,611 14s. 9d. The payment to be accepted for this sum under the arbitration of the Court was £384 11s. The arrears to be forgiven, therefore, were £2,227 3s. 9d. No Court of arbitration could have been much more liberal than that. These were the terms offered by Mr. Justice Monroe, so far as arrears were concerned, and I will prove that they were superior to those offered by at least one hon. Member who will support the Motion before the House. With regard to the actual rent, the old rent paid by these people amounted to £738 15s. 4d.; the judicial rent was £542 6s.; and Mr. Justice Monroe offered to take and fix the future rent at £384 11s. This was an annual reduction in the actual rent of £354 4s. 4d. Here was a Court of Arbitration making reductions as favourable to the tenant as could be conceived, and what was the result? The proposals of Mr. Justice Monroe and Bishop O'Dwyer were absolutely scouted; huts were put up, and the tenants were evicted. Now they are living in cold and starvation, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford says that if the Act of 1887, which could give no such terms as those I have mentioned, had been passed earlier, all would have been well. "You have only to arbitrate, and, presto! the whole difficulty vanishes," says the right hon. Gentleman. Then I come to the case of the Vandeleur estate. I know that estate very well. I have been there. The right hon. Gentleman asserted that the Vandeleur estate provided a sample of arbitration for Irish landlords. I myself have no land in Ireland or elsewhere, and I am thankful for it—not as much as would sod a lark. But my desire in the whole of this land dispute is to see that the tenants get justice, and that those who wish to rob the Irish landlords do not have the chance to do so. Now, I come to the Arbitration Court which the right hon. Gentleman holds up as a pattern for those who hold land in Ireland. Who was the arbitrator? Was he an impartial person? Because in any Court of Arbitration the first duty ought to be to find an impartial person. But, instead of this, there was chosen from the very thick of the fray a gentleman whose opinions are very clearly defined. That doubtless was Captain Vandeleur's business and not mine; but when such a process as this is held up as a model for other landlords to follow, I think it our business to see what is really the case. The gentleman appointed as arbitrator was the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Sir C. Russell), with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Henniker Heaton) looking on. These persons arrive at the estate, and decide not only what is the amount due and to be paid, but they actually fix the rents for the future. I do not suppose the right hon. Gentleman proposes to take any such power in regard to Courts of Arbitration to be established in the future. At any rate, that was the power set up by them. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell me that the award thus made on the Vandeleur estate has been carried out? Will he say how many tenants have felt themselves bound by that award, and paid the instalments ordered? Will anyone tell me that? Will the hon. Member for Canterbury rise and give the information? Probably he could tell more than any other Member of this House. But I say that both publicly in the newspapers and privately from those who know, or profess to know, I have been informed that while a certain number of tenants really stuck by the award, and paid their instalments, a considerable number have done nothing of the kind, but have refused to pay anything at all. We had better have the truth as to this question. If these tenants have paid, those who know the fact ought to say so, and contradict the rumours that have been abroad. I know nothing of my own personal knowledge on the subject. I only say what I have seen in the newspapers, where it has not been contradicted, and what I have been informed by persons in the neighbourhood that the facts are as I have stated. Looking at the fact that the awards made, which have been highly favourable to the tenants, have been set aside in the case of Captain Hill and in other cases—I have quoted the Glensharrold case already—I say the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford cannot come here and prove that arbitration is a specific for these disputes. A good deal has been said about Lord Clanricarde, and I am not about to take on myself the task of defending him. I have been over his estate, and will say this, that whilst he has neglected every duty that can be said to belong to the ownership of property, while he has behaved in an utterly callous manner, and has cared nothing for putting the Government or any one else into difficulties—it may be said for those who have thrown this quarrel on his tenants, that their responsibility also counts for something. They knew their man, and before subjecting these people to the hardships they now suffer, having had to live through the winter which has just passed in their wretched wooden shanties, experiencing the bitter cold; being without the doles they were premised, some of them afflicted with typhoid fever and dying from day to day; those hon. Members who are responsible for all this ought first to have counted the cost. They have not suffered themselves. Whatever happened to the evicted tenants, the Parliamentary Fund has been all right. They knew that Lord Clanricarde was the last man in Ireland whom they ought to fight. They knew he had a large reserve outside Ireland, and that he could sit in the Albany not caring what happened in Galway. They knew that years hence he would issue his orders to his agent, who would be certain to carry them out, that Galway might be depopulated for all the noble Marquess cared; and I repeat that the men who promoted this quarrel between Lord Clanricarde and his tenants carry on their shoulders an immense responsibility. What has been said of Lord Clanricarde? I spent a week on his estate, doing my best to get at the facts, and I obtained them. I am wholly against his refusal in 1885 to give a moderate reduction such as other landlords gave. He was utterly in the wrong, and is about the only landlord who has been subjected to the Plan of Campaign who made such a refusal. But I found that in the district of Woodford the unrevised rents of Lord Clanricarde—the rents not subject to judicial process—were absolutely lower than the rents of Lord Dunsandle and other landlords in the same neighbourhood, which had been through the Court, and subject to judicial control. Gentlemen whose word would be believed anywhere, say that on the part of his estate where the war was hottest the rents were reasonable, and that the men who were at the head of the war were not Lord Clanricarde's tenants at all. But I say that the case of the Irish landlord has no more right to be judged by that of Lord Clanricarde, than the case of the Irish tenants in general has to be judged by that of the Plan of Campaign tenants. Lord Clanricarde has brought nameless calamities on his country, and the Plan of Campaign tenants have done more to injure their question than all the Irish landlords have done for a quarter of a century. Lord Clanricarde is blamed, but I hold in my hand a report from an Irish newspaper, dated the 27th of this month. A landlord in County Wexford had evicted a tenant, and in my opinion had evicted him properly. That tenant owed five or six years' rent, and the amount due was £34 5s. I have the report from a local newspaper. The landlord had given an abatement in 1885 and had done right in so doing. The abatement he gave was a large one—30 per cent.—but no rent had been paid during the five or six years which followed. The County of Wexford is one of the best counties in Ireland. The landlord was not only within his right, but morally he was bound to take proceedings against such a man. In the report the landlord was asked what abatement he was willing to give on the arrears. The landlord refused to abate a farthing, but insisted on having his pound of flesh. Who do you think the landlord was? It was not Lord Clanricarde. It was not Mr. Smith-Barry. It was the hon. Baronet the Member for South Dublin. I hope he will not think I am challenging his right, or holding that he was doing wrong, but it is rather hard to find gentlemen acting in this way to protect their own property, coming to this House to vote for Resolutions interfering with other people's property, and applying to that property principles they will not apply to their own. I will now say a few words to those on the Front Opposition Bench. I suppose they will vote for this Motion. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling burghs is not in his place. He is greatly respected in his native country, although of late he has been developing into something like a Gladstonian Rob Roy. In my native county, the right hon. Gentleman recently delivered an address to his constituents, in which arguing, not against the Plan of Campaign, but against the Land Purchase Bill, he said:—

Mr. T. W. Russell

Mr. T. W. Russell

“On the whole it seemed to him, that as the mass of the tenants of land in Ireland had fixity of tenure, and a rent fixed by a judicial tribunal, which could be readjusted every 15 years, he really did not see that they had very much necessity to go further in their favour.”

That is the policy of the right hon. Gentleman in relation to Irish land. If that is a good argument in favour of protecting the British taxpayer, it is one also for protecting the Irish landlord in his legal rights. I am inclined to regard the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) as a higher authority than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford. At any rate, he has been Chief Secretary for Ireland, and he does not speak at random. In regard to this Motion, my objection, as I have said, is not to the principle of arbitration, if the two parties wish to appeal to that principle. But the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the Olphert estate. That is an estate I know a good deal about. I have been over it frequently. I know many of the tenants, and I have heard from them what they think of what is going on. What is their story? Mr. Olphert, five years ago, had 450 tenants. I think that now he has 120. Where are the rest? They have been evicted for non-payment of four or five years' rent—just the number of years which the hon. Member for South Dublin evicted his tenant for. It is complained that Mr. Olphert gave no abatement. Neither will the hon. Gentleman. But Mr. Olphert did offer an abatement. He made it before the Plan of Campaign, and it was refused by both judicial and non-judicial tenants. From that day to this Mr. Olphert has never ceased in his efforts to conciliate his tenants. He has offered to the poorest of his tenants an abatement amounting to 80 per cent. That offer was made and refused in my presence. To the rest of the tenants, who are fairly well to do, he has offered not 80 per cent., but favourable terms. I deny that Mr. Olphert has ever refused a general settlement, or refused to reinstate evicted tenants. I deny in Mr. Olphert's name that he has ever done what the right hon. Gentleman has charged him with. Judged by the facts, no man has acted more generously, with small means, than Mr. Olphert has done. The right hon. Gentleman has said that there are twenty estates under the Plan; that only on two have even efforts been made to plant them with tenants, and that where efforts have been made, they have not been real, but sham. I beg to tell the right hon. Gentleman that there is not a vacant holding on the Coolgreany estate now. Not only are the rents paid for the current year, but the interest on the borrowed money has also been paid. I tell him that the tenants on the Massareene estates are bond fide tenants, from the counties of Fermanagh, Tyrone, and Londonderry. Two estates only! Has he not heard of Luggacurran, the Marquess of Lansdowne's estate? And what has happened on the O'Grady estate? The O'Grady has turned his estate into grazing land, and he is doing infinitely better with his cattle than he did with his tenants. Then they talk of the victory of the Plan of Campaign. Apart from grounds of humanity, The O'Grady has no reason to care if never another tenant sets foot upon his estate. Take the Ponsonby estate. There every tenant has been evicted, and 1,500 head of cattle, and 700 or 800 sheep are grazed. I daresay the owner will be better off with the cattle than he was with the tenants. ["No!"] Yes, it is a matter of figures. In a monetary sense, cattle pay better than when the estates are tenanted. Go to any of these estates, and you will find that they have been re-tenanted by bond fide tenants, or they are being grazed by the landlord or some syndicate. That is called a triumph of the Plan of Campaign. I should not like to be responsible for such a triumph. According to the right hon. Gentleman, there are more than 2,000 tenants out of their holdings. They are suffering; some of them are making efforts to get back. Who is responsible for keeping them in idleness, for unmaking them in every sense of the word? They are living lives of wretched idleness; they are loafing about the public-houses of Youghal and other towns. Who are at the root of all this? The men who founded the Plan of Campaign. They have deprived these tenants of the means of earning their livelihood; they have caused them nameless and horrible suffering; they have sent them to the big towns of England and Scotland, and some of them across the Atlantic. Yet the men who have done all this come now to this House, and beg the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to extricate them from the difficulties they themselves have created, by means of a system of arbitration that has broken down hopelessly wherever it has been tried, and will not necessarily succeed, because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford considers it a specific for this Irish disease.

*(553.) SIR T. GRATIAN ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has accused me of evicting tenants.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I said the hon. Gentleman sued for his rent, and he was entitled to get it.

SIR T. G. ESMONDE: At all events, the hon. Member pointed out my wickedness. ["No, no!"] At all events, he pointed out the fact of my having evicted a tenant. ["No!"] He did not? I fancy he did.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I did not point out the hon. Member's wickedness.

SIR T. G. ESMONDE: Well, he pointed out the fact anyhow, of my having evicted a tenant, as a sort of counterpoise to the doings of the landlords whom he has taken under his wing. I have no doubt the hon. Gentleman desired to be perfectly accurate when he said that I offered no reduction whatever to this tenant since 1885. As a matter of fact I offered this tenant a reduction every year since 1885. His rent was reduced, and I offered him furthermore a reduction of 30 per cent., and if he did not choose to pay that, well, he made a very great mistake, that is all I have to say. The other tenants on the property accepted those terms. Of course, that is only a slight inaccuracy in the speech of the hon. Member. There is another slight inaccuracy in his speech in reference to the tenants engaged in the Plan of Campaign on the Brooke Estate. It is said that these tenants were silly enough to adopt the Plan of Campaign, and that there are now prosperous tenants on their holdings. It is true that there are people from the north in possession of these farms, but it is known that most of these so-called bond fide tenants instead of paying rent, are paid for becoming tenants. It is also a matter of notoriety that those tenants are only too anxious for an opportunity to get away from their obligations, such as they are, and to leave the farms on which they have been placed. I think if the landlord of the particular property which has been mentioned were consulted, he would raise his voice against arbitration or an amicable settlement with his tenants. The hon. Gentleman has contended that the awards under arbitration would not be obeyed, but the hon. Member utterly failed to see that the fact of arbitration having failed in three instances, which he named, does not affect the general question of recourse to arbitration. I do not believe that the hon. Member is really serious in his opposition to the Motion, which is an attempt to deal with an urgent portion of this great subject in the way suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford. I should think Her Majesty's Government would be very well advised, in the interests of peace in Ireland, in giving a favourable reception to this Motion of the right hon. Gentleman. If Her Majesty's Government do not see their way to accept the Motion, or endeavour to deal with the special cases in some such manner as indicated, we must only believe that all their assertions of anxiety for peace and order in Ireland are utterly bogus assertions, that they are not really anxious for peace, but for disturbances in Ireland, in order that they may have an additional reason for continuing to work the Coercion Act to their own purposes. It may be that Her Majesty's Government will listen to the bad advice of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, and we shall conclude that the Irish tenant farmers need expect no sympathy or assistance from the present Tory Government. If this Motion is negatived by the efforts of the Government, then the Debate will have served this useful purpose, it will have shown the Irish tenant farmers and the evicted tenants who their real friends are, and how much faith can be placed in the assurances of the Party opposite. Irish farmers will be able to realise how much there is in the assurances of kindly feeling entertained by Her Majesty's Government, when they read the proceedings in this Debate to-night. At all events, this Motion, and the support we give it, will dispose of the statements that Irish tenants are not anxious to meet their landlords in every possible way; the Debate will dispose of the stock argument that the tenants are the deluded victims of agitators who desire to keep the land question open, and that but for Her Majesty's Government Irish landlords would have no chance against the organised action of their countrymen. It will show that the representatives of the tenant farmers in the House have offered to meet the landlords in a kindly way, and in the spirit of compromise, with a view to ending the disputes which have arisen upon land questions, upon which we are told agitation lives and thrives. If the Motion is negatived, it will show the Irish farmers who their friends are, and it will relieve us of the responsibility some endeavour to attach to us of carrying on the agrarian conflict in Ireland. We have, in spite of all charges and misrepresentations, in spite of taunts from the hon. Member for South Tyrone and others, refused to desert the Irish tenants, and we have not the slightest intention of doing so. We shall stand by them by every means in our power and see them through the contest in which they are engaged. Without fears or foreboding we look forward to the end. We know that practically the whole people of Ireland have pledged themselves to support these evicted tenants, and that they will fulfil their pledge. We know that the Irish nation outside Ireland, in America, in Australia, and elsewhere, will not allow these evicted tenants to starve because of the sacrifices they have made for what they and we understand to be the National cause of Ireland. We have waited long, and can afford to wait a few weeks longer, until a General Election shall replace the present Tory Coercionist

Sir T. G. Esmonde

Ministry by another administration, which will, we believe, do justice to all sections of Irishmen, and lend a willing ear to the just claims of the Irish people.

(6.6.) COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): It is an interesting experience to me to follow an hon. Member sitting below the Gangway on the other side of the House who is in possession of Irish property. The hon. Member makes a great mistake when he imagines that my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone, or any gentleman on this side of the House, felt that any blame of any kind is to be ascribed to him for the performance of a function landlords unfortunately have to perform sometimes, and which is generally found very disagreeable, namely, the eviction of a tenant who absolutely refuses to pay any rent. The hon. Member tells us that the rejection of the proposal of the right hon. Member for Bradford will, in some way or other he did not explain, relieve him and his friends from responsibility in connection with the agrarian battle now being carried on in Ireland, and which I am glad to hear him admit is carried on under the auspices of the Separatist Party. For my part, I fail to see how the rejection of the Motion can relieve the hon. Member's Party from the grave responsibility which they incurred when they drove unfortunate tenants from their farms. It will bring no relief to a starving tenant who formerly thrived on his farm, and who has received no monetary assistance since disaster befell the Home Rule hat; it will be no satisfaction to him to learn that the Resolution has been negatived by the House. I believe that for years and years to come the tenants who have suffered so much from the dictates of gentlemen who have not suffered at all will curse the day when they first listened to the abominable advice which has resulted in turning prosperous tenants into beggars on the road side, depending for their doles upon the uncertain exchequer of the National League. Dealing with the speech of the right hon. Member for Bradford, the first observation I have to make is that the right hon. Gentleman has made the same speech on many previous occasions. The right hon. Gentleman's speech, however, does not become more perfect, although he so often practises delivering it. The statements of the right hon. Gentleman with reference to certain estates in Ireland are, as a rule, promptly overturned. The right hon. Gentleman appears to possess two qualities pre-eminently—great industry and immense credulity. I want, in a Parliamentary manner, to throw discredit on the arguments the right hon. Gentleman employs. Not long ago the right hon. Gentleman went to Constantinople to interview the Sultan, but instead of being introduced to the Sultan he was taken to the stable, where he was shown the Sultan's mare, and, fortified by his interview with that quadruped, he forthwith wrote a long article on European affairs. The right hon. Gentleman has also visited Ireland, and been personally conducted through certain estates by Members of the Home Rule Party. He acted on that occasion with great discretion, and showed his possession of some military capacity. He thought, advancing into this dangerous country, it would be well to secure his rear from attack and prevent his communications from interruption by the enemy. So the first thing he did was to make application to Dublin Castle to learn if the Chief Secretary intended to take an interest in his progress. Finding that the Government did not propose to supply him with a shorthand writer; though possibly they might have to afford him police protection, he proceeded on his personally conducted expedition and paid visits to three estates. He was introduced to certain priests and to certain carefully selected tenants, and then, on his return to England, the right hon. Gentleman delivered the speeches with which we are all now familiar. Hon. Members below the Gangway opposite have incurred great responsibility in moulding the right hon. Gentleman, who was very malleable, into what we see now. I believe the right hon. Gentleman is quite capable of taking in accurate information if he would only take the trouble to ascertain the facts and listen to both sides. If he had gone to tenants who had the honesty to pay rent, instead of devoting all his attention to the tenants who refused to pay, I am sure that, in common honesty he would, in the course of his patriotic speech, have informed the House that there were some tenants whose views did not coincide with his own. What does the right hon. Gentleman propose to do? Having vaguely condemned the Plan of Campaign, which he described as an "unfortunate incident," he proceeded with great lack of logic to move a Resolution which would place the land of every Irish landlord absolutely at the mercy of that organisation. What would be the result of carrying this Motion? If hon. Gentlemen opposite from Ireland took exception to the political action of some hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House, as they took exception to the action of my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon, all they would have to do would be to issue a mandate not to pay a farthing of rent; whether the rent was just or unjust, that would not matter in the least. The moment that mandate goes forth the tenants refuse to pay, and, irrespective of the merits of the case, then comes in the operation of this novel piece of statesmanship proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. Although he does not approve of the Plan of Campaign, he thus will place power in the hands of the campaigners to seek to extort from a political opponent under threat of possible ruin any demands they may choose to make. That would be the result of carrying this Resolution. Disapproving apparently of the Plan of Campaign, the right hon. Gentleman approves of placing the whole of Ireland under its influence. Any man who chooses to deal with this question in a logical shape will see that what I say is absolutely incontestably correct. There is one method adopted by the right hon. Gentleman to which I must take exception. It is his habit, when he is about to make an attack upon a landlord, to take an instance—say that of the Clanricarde estate, and alluding to the fact that this particular landlord refused to make an abatement in his rents, although a neighbour made a reduction of 20 per cent., he is held up as an example of a monstrously unjust man. But it does not follow. I know cases in a district where the taking off of 25 or 30 per cent. would not bring down the rents of one estate to the level of those in another where no abatement is made. Everything depends on what the original rent was. If it was a low rent, why should there be an abatement? So far as I have heard in the course of the Debate, I have not been able to discover a single argument to induce the House to agree to this Motion. What is it that the proposal amounts to? What is it offered to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary as a final and scientific settlement of the land difficulty? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford tells us what he would do were he Chief Secretary for Ireland. He would summon the landlords to Dublin Castle, and then he would tell them that if they did not accept the terms of arbitration—which, I suppose, their opponents would lay down—he would withdraw from them the protection of the law, which in his position he would be bound to maintain. He would take away the protection of the police, on which their lives in many cases depended, and place them at the mercy of their opponents, unable to get any rent, unable to protect their lives. I trust the day is far distant when any British statesman belonging to the Unionist Party will consent to accept so cowardly, mean, despicable, and dastardly a proposal as that. But this is what the Member for Bradford proposes. I cannot conceive that any man with any sense of justice would consent to adopt a proposal of the kind. He would subject men to ruin, to the danger of their lives, simply because they asked their tenants to pay rent, not fixed by the landlords, but by the Act carried by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian in 1881 as "a final solution of the Irish land question." This Debate, however, is merely the preface to another Debate on Monday week, to which I am sure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle looks forward with unbounded satisfaction. It is thought well to clear the ground, but the importance of this Debate is that it saddles the Party opposite before the country with sympathising with a policy and adopting a plank in their platform which I believe they are sorry they ever stood upon. I have often, and sometimes I hope with success, pointed out that the Party opposite in adopting the policy have adopted the morality of their Irish allies, and we have proof of that in the suggestion that the policy of the Plan of Campaign should be extended all over Ireland as a happy solution of the land difficulty. The Member for Mid Lothian, in a speech in Scotland, pointed out that at the present time crime does not follow boycotting and other kinds of intimidation, and that that differentiates it from former times. Well, although violent crime may not follow the Plan of Campaign in the terrible way that it followed the League proceedings when the right hon. Gentleman was Prime Minister, although it is not followed by the crime of murder, yet to destroy the peace and happiness of a man is really a crime. It may be said that the right hon. Gentleman does not read all the speeches of his followers in Ireland, and therefore he may think that violent intimidation no longer exists. I will read, therefore, in the hearing of the right hon. Gentleman, an extract from a speech which shows the same kind of intimidation couched in the same words which were used in the days when he was Prime Minister, and these words are used to produce the same effect. This is an extract from a speech delivered at Nenagh on January 11 by the hon. Member for Longford, a speech which, like all he now delivers in Ireland, was made under police protection.

Colonel Saunderson

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Yes; police protection from the Parnellites.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: What a happy family they are. This speech was made, and it is a curious thing that in that speech the hon. Member for Longford employed the very same expression which his former leader, and probably his future leader, whatever he may say about Parnellites, used some time ago. The Member for North Longford said—

"He would tell Mr. Balfour, he would maintain and tell them on every platform on which he stood, that the man who took a farm out of his neighbour's hands was a scoundrel, and that the people should treat him like a leper"

—the words of the Ennis speech. Well, we do not like to be treated like lepers in Ireland, and words of that kind amply justify the stand we have taken. We know perfectly well that if the Plan of Campaign and Land League Party have the ascendancy, if we have a Land League Parliament, we shall be treated like lepers. We have objected to that, and we shall continue to object to it; but what I cannot conceive is that any Radical, who is supposed to be a man who loves freedom and justice, should get up in this House, or before an audience in the country, and deliberately support the system adopted under the Plan of Campaign. I appeal to the head of the Radical Party—the hon. Member for Northampton. How can an hon. Member like him support the principle of the Plan of Campaign? Let him imagine himself a tenant in Tipperary. I observed that the Member for Bradford carefully avoided Tipperary. We shall have enough of Tipperary next week. Here were men who openly avowed that they had no quarrel of any kind with their landlord—that their rent was a just and fair rent. They did not allege that the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Smith-Barry) was a rack-renter or an unjust landlord; but because he had the audacity to confront that organisation in Ireland which is the backbone of all the policy of the Party opposite—because he did that, the leaders of the Plan of Campaign went down—the father and mother of the Plan, Messrs. Dillon and O'Brien—and ordered the Tipperary tenants of the hon. Member to leave their farms, their houses, and their shops, where they greatly prospered, and live in the wretched lath-and-plaster shanties with which the League supplied them. If they did not obey, the tenants were to be treated like lepers. And this is the policy which Radicals in this country think worthy of their support. I cannot think that the good sense and patriotism of the Radicals will ultimately allow them to consent to such a policy. No matter how they may value the necessity of supporting for a time the Plan of Campaign, I cannot believe that they will ultimately consent to place around the necks of the Irish people a yoke destructive of their liberty, their progress, and their happiness.

(6 30.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The hon. and gallant Gentleman has not been very happy in his remarks tonight. I observed he had to go to the Bosphorus for his bulls. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has been kind enough to read a pretended extract from a speech of mine. I suppose he took it from the Freeman's Journal?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: No; I took it from the Cork Herald.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The substance of the speech I admit and stick to; but I advise the hon. and gallant Gentleman when he refers to police protection to be a little more careful than he has been. It is the fact that one gentleman who attended that meeting was in receipt of police protection. He was a Parnellite gentleman, who had the night before struck me a blow on the head; and as he required to attend the meeting for the purpose of disturbance he applied to his natural allies, the gentlemen connected with Dublin Castle, to furnish him with police protection. I presume that by direction of the Chief Secretary he was protected by four constables, who endeavoured to break up the meeting, as was the case at Mitchelstown, by forcing the men into our midst. As the gentleman created a disturbance he was removed from the meeting. The speech from which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has quoted was one in which I twitted the hon. Member for Cork with the fact that while the administration of the Chief Secretary has been in full blast for five years, while evictions and murders, and all kinds of police outrages, have taken place under that Administration, the Member for Cork had not a single word of criticism of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, but has reserved himself wholly and solely for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. I stated that, as far as I am concerned, I maintain the original policy of the Land League, namely, that any man who takes a farm from which another tenant was unjustly evicted ought to be treated like a leper, and I always will treat him so; because the first principle of our movement is that, if there is a landlord rack-renting his tenants, and those tenants are put out of their holdings either by their landlord or by the force of circumstances, any men who take their places, who seize their property—property which the law recognises, and which the Attorney General for Ireland declares to be property equal to that of the landlord—are coveting their neighbours' goods, and are thieves and robbers, and ought to be treated accordingly. That is a position which, neither in this House nor out of it, will I ever recede from. Let me point out to the hon. and gallant Gentleman and to his supporters on the Front Government Bench that they are in this dubious position. According to the hon. and gallant Member the Home Rule hat has broken down, and according to the hon. Member for South Tyrone the doles which have been paid to the evicted tenants have been stopped, while the much larger sums which have been paid to Members of Parliament are still being paid. Let us assume the truth of that statement. The Government's declarations are that the Tipperary tenants and the tenants on the Clanricarde, the Olphert, and other estates in the country, have left their homes under intimidation and coercion; that they are the dupes of the Irish Parliamentary Party. Having been driven out by coercion and intimidation, do the British Government and the landlords of Ireland say to them, "Fellow citizens, you have been betrayed by the Land League; you have been betrayed by Parnell, and Dillon, and O'Brien; we will come to your succour?" That is not the position assumed by the Member for South Tyrone or the hon. and gallant Gentleman. No; we are told that these men had no free will, because they went out under intimidation and coercion. Although they are unwilling victims, you are prepared to leave them in the mud. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, which is it? Which horse are you going to win on? Either they are our victims, or they are not. If they were our victims, surely now, when the evil genius has been cut down, when those who have exercised these coercive influences are beggared and bankrupt, is the time for the Tory gentlemen to reap their harvest. Why do not the Member for North Armagh and his Friend the Member for South Hunts, and the row of Orange lilies I see opposite, transplant themselves? Why do they not go amongst the victims and say, "You have been betrayed by false friends, but we of the Primrose League and the Orange Lodges will use our influence with Her Majesty's Government and get you restored to your holdings, or, if we cannot do that, we will see there is a fair arbitration upon your claims?" I should have thought Ireland's difficulty was England's opportunity. I should have thought that the difficulty of the Irish Parliamentary Party, if they are in a difficulty—and I have not experienced it myself. [Laughter.] Well, there is one thing our friends opposite may rely upon, and that is that, however much we may differ amongst ourselves, we shall always be solid against the common enemy. You will find the two sections of the Party are like the two blades of a pair of scissors, which yet may take off some of your heads. If your statements be true, I should have imagined that the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford gave you the opportunity you desire. I ask Her Majesty's Government if, in the words of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, the doles have been cut off, and the tenants are fever-stricken, and ague-stricken, and typhoid-stricken, and are living in water-logged houses—though I really think they are living in much better houses than they have had before—if these tenants are so hopeless, are you not driving them to despair? I can well imagine the Member for South Hunts and his friends not being by any means anxious to say to the Tipperary tenants, "We shall never allow you back to your homes," or to say to Lord Clanricarde's tenants, "Never again"—as Lord Wolseley said to the Boers—"while grass grows and water runs shall you return to your inheritance." I challenge you to say it. I challenge the Chief Secretary to say to these tenants, "Never so long as the British flag floats over Dublin Castle, shall you or your descendants return to the holdings." If the evicted tenants have no hope from the British Government or the Irish race abroad, what will be the natural consequence? As yet, the Plan of Campaign has been absolutely crimeless in its operation; but the prospect for Her Majesty's Government will not be very pleasant if there are to be bands of homeless and desperate men encamped besides those thriving tenants who have grabbed their farms. You tell us that Lord Massereene has imported prosperous tenants from Fermanagh, Derry, and Tyrone, and that Mr. Brooke has imported them from Wicklow. If the Government instil the belief into the minds of the people that there is no hope as long as grass grows of their returning to their homes, I congratulate the Government on the prospects of peace. What has kept the peace of Ireland has been the policy of the Member for Mid Lothian. That right hon. Gentleman has bound over the Irish people to the peace, and they have kept it, because their hope has been that by some means an issue will be found whereby, doing justice both to the landlord and the tenant, the difficulty can be put an end to. The hon. Member for South Tyrone has said that arbitration has broken down hopelessly wherever it has been tried. [Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: I said on campaign estates.] Even I and the hon. Member for the St. Stephen's Green Division of Dublin were asked by the Drapers' Company to arbitrate between them and their tenants, and not one landlord has put his finger on our award and said, "You have swindled the landlord." Has that arbitration broken down? The award has been loyally accepted by the tenants, and, to their credit, by the great Drapers' Company of the City of London. I should imagine that if statesmanship and common sense were equivalent terms it would be to the interest of the Government, now that they are passing a Purchase Bill, and declaring that they adopt a policy of purchase in order to deal with the most dangerous symptoms of Irish agrarian life, to take the most ulcerated portion of Ireland for the most speedy treatment. When a surgeon has to deal with a case of cancer, does he first operate upon some healthy part of the body? That is the policy of the Government. The hon. Member for North Armagh said that we are to assume that Lord Clanricarde is a good landlord. [Colonel SAUNDERSON: I did not say anything of the kind.] Well, is he or is he not? I should like to have it on the testimony of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He said that Lord Clanricarde would not make any reduction, and added that there are many unreduced properties lowly rented. I suppose we are to infer that Lord Clanricarde's estate is lowly rented. In other words, if a landlord has been lodging in the Albany, and for 20 years neglecting every duty that attaches to landlordism, you must assume that he is a good landlord, and that his rents are fair rents. I will assume the reverse. I will assume that a landlord, for whom the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) cannot say a good word, must be a bad landlord. When the hon. Member for South Tyrone was a week on his estate, and yet cannot say a good word for him, am I to be blamed for the assumption that he must be the present lord? I am surprised that we never have the President of the Board of Trade present when we are talking about Lord Clanricarde. When Lord Clanricarde's name is mentioned in the right hon. Gentleman's presence it exorcises him. "Get thee behind me, Satan," was not more effective. We all remember the correspondence—not published by the right hon. Gentleman or by Lord Clanricarde, but which came out in the course of an action for libel brought by the landlord's agent, Mr. Joyce—in which the right hon. Gentleman declared that he would put pressure on Lord Clanricarde and his kin, but pressure always within the law. The right hon. Gentleman himself was the judge of the law. Those who are not in the position of Chief Secretary are not to use any pressure whatever, and are not to make themselves judges of the law. If it is found that a landlord like Lord Clanricarde neglects his duty for years, surely the State has some right of interference on behalf of the unhappy tenantry, and the more so that they are left in the hands of an agent, who is a bankrupt, a disgraced and abandoned man—[Colonel SAUNDERSON: "Absolutely untrue"]—a man who, in his own district, from his own butcher, cannot get credit for a pound of chops.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): Will the hon. Member repeat that outside the House?

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will, to be sure, on one understanding—[Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] Listen to it: That you will not lay the venue in Belfast. Give me a mixed tribunal; that is all I ask. Even two Removables I will take. You lend a man like Tener all the forces of the law to harry and attack those unhappy tenants who, during the bad years of 1885 and 1886, were unable to pay their rents. Remember that the Bishop of the district (Dr. Healy) has always been a great friend and loyal supporter of Her Majesty's Government. I do not blame him for that. I understand that he has seen the Chief Secretary several times. That is not contradicted. He has remonstrated with the right hon. Gentleman, who, I am quite sure, wishes Lord Clanricarde at Jericho. [Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member for South Tyrone wishes him there and again it is this: When you find a landlord for whom no man in his senses, or out of his senses, can be got to say a good word, are you content to leave ten square miles of one of the habitable portions of Her Majesty's dominions at the mercy of a tiger of that description? If you were to let loose in this district a man-eating tiger, or a dozen of them, it would not be a greater misfortune to the people than to give Lord Clanricarde the uncontrolled use of the soldiers and police of the Government. The legislation of 1887 was too late for these unfortunate tenants, who had then incurred the disabilities which ensured their eviction. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford simply asks that, as regards men in this position who have been ill-treated, the Imperial Government shall, at any rate, step in and give them something like fair-play. If these things were going on in Turkey; if this place were Erzeroum, where you sent Mr. Clifford Lloyd, tears that would turn a mill would be rolling from the eyes of the hon. Member for South Armagh. As it is only Galway, as these men are only his own fellow-countrymen, Lord Clanricarde is to be allowed to do as he pleases. Take the case of Mr. Olphert. The Government are not content to give arms, soldiers, and police to these landlords. Poor Mr. Olphert is an old gentleman, and his property is almost entirely managed by Mr. Robert Olphert, who has been engaged as Crown Prosecutor in some cases at the Winter Assizes in order to put 100 or 200 guineas into his pocket, although he has never had any experience in the work he has to do. I never found fault with the Chief Secretary for going to Ireland. I was delighted that he went, and delighted that he got a good reception. And for this reason: I think it has done him a power of good. The more he sees of Ireland, the more he will come to see that there is a real Irish question, that there is ground for the earnestness with which we plead for some relief for these unhappy tenants. The more the right hon. Gentleman is brought into touch with the actual distress and miseries of the Irish people the more I shall be pleased, and I cannot think of any better performance for Her Majesty's Government than that they should spend a recess doing that which the Chief Secretary did, studying Irish problems on the spot. The right hon. Gentleman, however, drove into Gweedore at 10 o'clock on a winter's night, when he could not see the bogs, and left before daybreak in the morning. It is rather an ungenerous thing to pretend that he could gauge the true position of affairs by taking change of air in an hotel for the night. Did the Chief Secretary see the priest or the tenants? No, he only saw Mr. Olphert and a Police Inspector, and the sole result was that Mr. Robert Olphert was instructed by the Crown to prosecute in several cases at the Winter Assizes, the landlords of the North of Ireland and of Ireland generally having thereby an indication that the action of Mr. Olphert had the approval of the Her Majesty's Ministers. But I do not think there is any need on the present occasion for re-creation between ourselves and the Government. I did expect that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) would have enabled us, through the great influence he now possesses with Her Majesty's Ministers, to hear of some scheme, whether by means of a secret understanding or otherwise — some scheme put forward by him or by, as his mouthpiece, one of Her Majesty's Ministers. [Interruption.]

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Have some decency.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. T. M. HEALY: Some scheme with regard to the evicted tenants, who, we are informed, are the hon. Member's special care. It is the fact that tens of thousands of pounds were being collected in America in the interest of those tenants until the misfortune occurred to the Irish Parliamentary Party. As far as the hon. Member for Cork is concerned, he has declared his acceptance of the Bill of the Government on land purchase. That being so, I cannot conceive anything more simple than for the Government to declare that they are willing to accept the principle of compulsory purchase laid down by the hon. Member for Cork in one of his recent speeches. Such a proposal would meet with no opposition from any quarter. Lord Clanricarde, we are told, only wants cash. Why does not the Government give it him? The hon. Member for South Hunts (Mr. Smith-Barry) only wants cash.

Why should not the Government let him have it? Lord Lansdowne only wants cash, either in Consols or in some other form. Why should not the Government let him have it? Because these tenants are evicted tenants, are they to be deprived of any benefit under the scheme of Her Majesty's Government? I imagine that from the point of view of the Tory Government landlords who have suffered — such as the hon. Member for South Hunts, Mr. Ponsonby, and Lord Clanricarde — are more objects of public charity than landlords who have not suffered — such as the Duke of Abercorn and Lord Waterford, who have pocketed hundreds of thousands of pounds from their Irish estates. Really I see no objection in principle or in detail to an arrangement between the hon. Member for Cork and Her Majesty's Ministers with regard to providing for these tenants. So far from criticising such an arrangement I should rejoice at it; and I think if the tenants believed that the differences of the Irish Party had led to an understanding between the hon. Member for Cork and Her Majesty's Government, they would conclude that it was an ill wind that blew nobody good. Accordingly, this is a case on which the Government can legislate with the consent of all Parties. The Tory Party will not object to the Member for South Hunts or Lord Clanricarde, or any other of these ill-treated and much-abused landlords, receiving a sum in payment for their estates. I do not suppose the hon. Member for North Armagh will object. We will not object; the followers of the hon. Member for Cork will not object; and I cannot imagine that those on the Front Opposition Bench who have brought forward the Motion will object. Nothing is wanting to complete the remedy, except the willingness to apply it. Surely as it is your position that the landlords are the unwilling victims of a conspiracy, you will be the very first, when the conspirators have fallen out among themselves, to step in and show that "Codlin's your friend—not Short." I therefore, in all seriousness, would assure Her Majesty's Ministers that I do not think this is a case for controversy, violence, or bitterness. The amount required to settle the matter is not large, and sooner or later it will have to be settled—by the present Government or by their successors. The Tories cannot expect to be always in Office—especially after Hartlepool. The clock will some time or other strike 12, and when it does perhaps you will be sorry that it is not you who have had the giving of compensation to the Member for South Hunts, Lord Clanricarde, and gentlemen of that class. I say that the Tory Party above all others, in view of their declarations, can treat this subject with freedom and success. Nobody believes there are any genuine tenants on these estates. What is conclusive on that point is the fact that the Land Purchase Commissioners, when applied to by Lord Lansdowne with regard to the Brook Estate to advance money to these so-called “planters,” refused to sanction any advance on the ground that they were only bogus tenants. What, then, becomes of the declaration of the hon. Member for South Tyrone? If the case of the evicted tenants receives from the Government some amount of consideration we shall all be delighted, and I would earnestly trust that Her Majesty’s Government, whether influenced by sympathy for the tenants or by the hope of quieting down affairs, or by consideration for their friends, will see that their interests, as well as the interests of Ireland, lie in providing a settlement of these difficulties.

(7.11.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I do not intend to follow the hon. and learned Gentleman through a great many of the topics he has introduced into his speech. I shall not follow him into the interesting discussion he suggested to the Committee as to who was the gentleman who was under police protection on a particular occasion. I shall leave that question to be settled among themselves by gentlemen below the Gangway, as I shall also leave the question suggested by the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman as to the comparative merits of his policy and that of the hon. Member for Cork. But there are some points in the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman which I wish to notice. This I would say: I do not think that those unfortunate tenants who now find themselves in imminent danger of starvation on the roadside, when they read the speech of the hon. and learned Member, will be able to derive any very lively satisfaction from it. What comfort has the hon. and learned Gentleman to offer to these unfortunate dupes of the criminal conspiracy known as the Plan of Campaign? The hon. and learned Gentleman, with his knowledge of Parliamentary affairs, cannot be serious in suggesting a vote of public money for the relief of the evicted tenants. That is all very well as a topic in this House to draw cheers from below the Gangway opposite, but the hon. and learned Gentleman knows as well as I do that it is mere delusive mockery to hold out any expectation to these unfortunate dupes that any Government will ask Parliament for money for their relief. The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the visit of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the West of Ireland, and said it has had at least the result of showing my right hon. Friend that there is an Irish question. Now, Sir, before that visit had taken place, and before the failure of the potato crop, my right hon. Friend had given evidence of his appreciation of the existence of the specific Irish question which assumes an acute form in the West of Ireland—such proof as I venture to say no Chief Secretary before has ever given. If the hon. and learned Gentleman has forgotten, the House and the country will not forget that, in a Bill introduced by the right hon. Gentleman early last year, there was a system of provision for the congested districts in the West of Ireland which has been admitted on both sides of the House to be an effort to grapple with a question such as has never been attempted before by any Minister. That scheme was conceived and developed by the right hon. Gentleman as a portion of the programme of the Government before his visit to the West of Ireland, and before any appearance of the partial failure of the potato crop, which was the immediate occasion of that visit. This remark, therefore, of the hon. and learned Gentleman is without foundation. But does the hon. and learned Gentleman really think that these rent disputes—whether you regard them as bona fide disputes or as steps in the campaign against Irish landlords as the English garrison in Ireland—have any real relation to the acute crisis which had taken place in the West of Ireland? Any one who knows these districts knows that this is not a question of the amount of rent; for on the smaller holdings, in a season like this, it would be impossible for the holder to live rent free. The two questions, therefore, have no reference to each other. An attempt has been made by the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Motion to show that the existence of these remaining disputes—which we all regret—is due largely to the default of the present Government. I will for a moment call attention to the position of the Plan of Campaign estates. It is a gratifying thing to those who are responsible for the administration of the law in Ireland to be able to state that there has not been a time for many years when Ireland generally has been more free from crime than at the present time, both of the ordinary character and agrarian crime. But there are certain exceptions, few in number I am happy to say; there are certain estates and districts of which that could not be said. Two important questions have been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman who has moved the Motion. In the first place, who is responsible for that state of things? and, secondly, what remedy can be suggested? I take issue with the right hon. Gentleman on both portions of his argument. The right hon. Gentleman said that the delay in passing the Bill of 1887 and the fact that legislation concerning arrears has not taken place are the causes of the Plan of Campaign. Now, on three of the estates which have been mentioned prominently in connection with the Plan of Campaign, namely, the Ponsonby, the Massereene, and the Lansdowne, there are a considerable number of leaseholders. As a matter of fact, I do not think that leaseholders are very numerous on any of the other Plan of Campaign estates, certainly not on the Olphert and Clanricarde estates; but on the three estates I have mentioned they are most numerous. The landlords of those estates offered their tenants to let them go into Court and break the leases and have the benefit of the Act. That offer had been made voluntarily, and gave the tenants the full benefit conferred by the Act of 1887. Can it, then, be said that the fact that leaseholders have not been admitted to the benefit of the Act of 1881 has been the cause of the starting of the Plan of Campaign? With regard to the question of reduction of judicial rents and arrears, it has been shown that the landlords, with possibly one or two exceptions, have in their offers dealt with the question of arrears more liberally than the tenants would have been treated if the Bill of 1886 had passed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford has suggested compulsory arbitration. If that were adopted, there would be three subjects to be dealt with—first, a fair rent; secondly, arrears; and, thirdly, the re-instatement of the evicted tenants. With regard to fair rent, such arbitration is not required; the State has supplied the means of compulsory arbitration in that respect; the Court of the Land Commission is always open to the yearly tenants, and by the offer of the landlords has been open to the leaseholders. As to arrears, how does the matter stand? The Government and the House have always laid down the principle that they will not compulsorily deal with one class of debts without at the same time dealing with others. Then the House must remember that on all these estates there are certain tenants who have honestly and fairly paid their rents, with the reductions offered, and kept their contracts with their landlords, not joining the Plan of Campaign. It would be grossly unjust to honest tenants who have struggled through bad times if those who have joined an illegal conspiracy are to be allowed exceptional terms as regards arrears. With regard to the evicted holdings, they are either in the hands of tenants now cultivating them under contracts of tenancy, or they are being used by the landlord as best he can, generally as grazing farms. Will power be given to a tribunal to turn out these tenants, or will the landlord be compelled to take the others back to the land which he is using? With regard to the injustice of the former suggestion, I think that I need say nothing; and as to forcing the former tenants back on the landlord, I would like to read to the House some words from a document which is entitled to respect—it is a letter from Dr. O'Dwyer, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Limerick, in connection with the Glensharrold Estates. In his letter Dr. O'Dwyer used these words—

Mr. T. M. Healy

"I beg of them (the tenants) at the last moment, before taking a step they may regret all the days of their lives, to listen to my advice. If they spend years in idleness on the side of the road, neither they nor their children will ever raise their heads again. A farmer whose home is once broken up, whose stock is scattered, and whose capital is spent, may recover his land after some years, but he will be a pauper while he lives."

That is the testimony of one who knows the Irish tenants well. But it is now proposed that the landlord, who has been the victim of this conspiracy, should have compulsorily put upon him a tenantry which, according to the Bishop of Limerick, has degenerated into paupers. Such a proceeding would be an injustice to the landlord and injurious to the interests of the community. Each case, of course, depends upon its own merits; in some, arbitration might do good; in others it would be futile; the parties must be the best judges of that, and, as I have shown, the Legislature cannot interfere with advantage to the community or justice to the landlord. It may be asked what alternative the Government suggested to the Plan of Campaign. I would suggest that there is an alternative policy which has been pursued, and which has worked wonders in Ireland—I mean the policy of a firm and temperate administration of just laws. It cannot be contended that the laws relating to occupiers of land in Ireland are less favourable than those of any other country; on the contrary, they are distinctly more favourable. That is the course I would submit to the House, and I submit that it is more wise and statesmanlike than that of making concessions to organised lawlessness—a policy which would be impossible to work out without the grossest injustice alike to landlords and to honest tenants.

(7.31.) Mr. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): The right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down began by stating his opinion that the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) would be read with dismay by tenants on those estates. I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech will as certainly have that effect. It appeared to me that he misconceived the suggestion made by the hon. and learned Member for Longford, and he repeated the misconception towards the end of his speech; for if a just and temperate administration of the law in Ireland is all that is required to settle the land war and the agitation that has arisen out of it, why are Her Majesty's Government asking us to give our time this Session to a complicated measure of land purchase? The Government recognise that new laws are required, and laws of great importance. We were told by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) that no Government was justified in calling upon the sacred resources of British credit without having a very strong case behind them, and, therefore, there must be in the mind of the Government a very strong case to induce them to ask the House to give British credit for altering the land laws of Ireland. How can we justify to our constituents the fact that this new alteration of the land laws and this claim upon British credit will give the go-bye altogether to the districts which have suffered most? Surely the Government will give us some definite reason why their Land Purchase Bill will simply apply to those districts where there is no conflict between landlord and tenant, and will not apply to those where a state of social war, with heartburnings and bitterness, prevails. For my own part I should have preferred that other classes of cases could have been brought within the purview of the Motion before the House, and that the whole question of arrears, which is at the bottom of all the difficulties on the Plan of Campaign estates, as well as on other estates, where the pinch of want is terribly felt this winter, could have been raised. However, I welcome, on its merits, the proposition that has been brought forward. The hon. Member for Tyrone was much concerned about the settlement of the land question in the interest of the landlord, but unfortunately said nothing at all about justice being done to the tenant. I believe I have spent much more time on the Clanricarde estate than the Member for Tyrone. I desire most strongly to avoid any taunt as to the past, but I would make an appeal to Her Majesty's Ministers on behalf of the thousands of people living on that estate. No one has ventured to say a single word on behalf of the owner of that estate. We have had his conduct denounced in the strongest manner by the Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). I would ask the Government whether this House is expected really to give its attention to a Land Bill for Ireland, and to pass by altogether the condition of things in this district. It has been said again and again that we are not to trouble ourselves with these things because Members below the Gangway and others have really brought about these troubles by the Plan of Campaign. But I am sure that those who are acquainted with the question will say that the combination on the Clanricarde estate took place, not only before the Plan of Campaign was instituted, but against the deliberately expressed wishes of the National League. It was a spontaneous movement on the part of the tenants. Some very strong observations have been made with regard to the condition of those who, it has been alleged, have been compelled or induced to form these combinations, and great compassion has been, very rightly no doubt in many cases, expressed on their behalf. I think we should be under a misconception if the idea went forth to the country that all those who have left their homes and have found shelter in the huts of the National League, are to be commiserated with on the change that has taken place in their condition. Throughout my life I believe I shall recollect meeting with the widow of one of the tenants of the Clanricarde estate—a poor woman of the name of Solon. Her husband had been a tenant at a rental of some £7 10s. For three years he had been unable to work, and was dying of consumption. A little child, six years of age, died of fever, and the husband died a few days afterwards. Six days after the death of the husband, the widow Solon had gone to buy bread in the neighbouring town. On coming back she found the cabin surrounded by the forces of the Crown. The women said they had come too late—he whom they had come to put out had gone before; he was dead. The woman and her five children were put out on the roadside, the woman not even being allowed to stay behind in the yard to wash some linen. The hut was destroyed. I thought I had never seen such a picture of absolute despair as this woman presented as she gave me an account of these proceedings. It seemed as if there was nothing left in life that she cared about—all the brightness seemed to have gone out of her life. But last Autumn I happened to see this woman again in one of the League huts at Woodford. There was no mistaking her; but she looked infinitely better, and she and her children were distinctly in far better circumstances. It is not, therefore, the fact that all these poor people are suffering in the way we have been told, although many of them have made great sacrifices indeed. Without going further into these particulars I do ask Her Majesty's Government whether we are to look forward to these poor people being left as time goes on simply to despair and desperation? You cannot exaggerate the condition of things in that district. Put aside the statements of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, and of those who were present at these scenes on behalf of the landlord, and of those who heard the case for the police. Put these aside, and I would ask hon. Gentlemen who are interested in this question to read the Report of the Commissioners who visited this district lately in connection with the inquiry as to tolls and market rates, and see what landlordism can sink to under such a condition of things as prevails in that district. It seems to me a positive disgrace to the laws of England that such a state of matters should exist over such a wide district in Ireland. We have a right to ask Her Majesty's Government, when we hear from almost every platform from which their supporters speak so many declarations as to their remedial measures bringing about a settlement of the land difficulties in Ireland, how they can justify the conditions of these districts.

Mr. Madden

(753.) MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.): I was quite surprised that the right hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke from the Front Bench opposite and who came here armed with such a load of documents should have so suddenly collapsed in his vindication of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. But I was more surprised still when I found him committing the extraordinary error that he did commit, in stating to this House what many hon. Members know not to be correct, namely, that it was not because of the action of the present Government that the Plan of Campaign was started in Ireland. As one thing follows another, as cause follows effect, so did the Plan of Campaign follow the rejection of the measure of the hon. Member for Cork in 1883. It is because the Government in 1886 refused any relief whatever to the tenants of Ireland, and refused to give the leaseholders any opportunity of going into the Land Court, and refused to revised judicial rents, and refused to touch at all the question of arrears, that the Plan of Campaign had of necessity to be started. The right hon. and learned Gentleman went on to state that the Marquess of Clanricarde had made a fair and reasonable offer to his tenants before the Plan of Campaign was started. The Marquess of Clanricarde made no offer at all to his tenants before the Plan of Campaign was started. On the contrary, he refused to allow the tenants who had leases, to break those leases so that they might go into the Court. He refused to allow judicial leases to be revised, and refused to abate one penny of the arrears. But when the noble Lord found that his tenants were serious, he came out with an offer to reduce non-judicial rents 25 per cent., and judicial rents 15 per cent., but even that was after evicting a great number of tenants, and after the Plan of Campaign had been started and the Government had refused to give relief to the tenants. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says that the Government are not to blame for the condition of affairs which exist on the Plan of Campaign estates; but I very deliberately that they are, because the Plan of Campaign has been only been put in force against the worst landlords. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh does not happen to be one of the landlords who have come under the Plan of Campaign. But why? I say it to his credit, that it is because he is a fairly good landlord, and there has been no occasion to put it in force against him. But there are bad landlords who have insisted on their pound of flesh, and who have forced upon their tenants a condition of affairs which it has been necessary for them to dispute. As has been pointed out, the tenants on the Clanricarde estate started the combination in spite of the efforts of the National League and of the Irish

Mr. Sheehy

Parliamentary Party, because they were obliged to do so, no redress being forthcoming. They had old leases which at one time were necessary to shelter the tenants from the rapacity of the landlord, and to prevent his running up the rents from year to year, pound by pound, until it became impossible to pay any longer. How does the Government take the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford? Is it an honest proposal? We have been charged over and over again with being the advocates of dishonesty, but now we bring the accusation to the test. If the tenants are dishonest, as is said, and the landlords are honest, as is claimed for them by their advocates, how is it that the tenants propose, and the landlords object to arbitration? From the first day of the Plan of Campaign until now there has never been an hour in which the tenants on the Plan of Campaign estates were not willing and anxious to submit their case to honest arbitration, but the landlords would not agree to it, believing that arbitrators would decide against them. The hon. Member for South Tyrone spoke here to-night, though not for the first time, of the Vandeleur case. I remember his once speaking of the happy condition of the tenants on the Vandeleur estate. Those tenants were "petted," and "had no wrongs to redress," and were "the dupes of the Irish Members,"—that is to say Mr. Dillon, Mr. O'Brien, and the rest. Well, the landlord was obliged after a time to look to his own interest, and thinking he had gone far enough on a fool's path, he determined to try and make a settlement with his tenants. He submitted the case to arbitration. This was the case in which the hon. Member for South Tyrone said the landlord was a just man, and the tenants were a pack of robbers—were dressed so comfortably and looked so well off that it would have been dishonest on their part to refuse to pay the landlord. What was the result of the arbitration? Why, that the tenants got better terms than they demanded in the first instance from their landlord. Then the hon. Gentleman brings forward his knowledge of the Glensharrold estate—and what astonishes me is the boldness with which some advocates introduced delicate subjects. If there is an estate in Ireland, to contemplate the condition of the tenants of which would make one's blood run cold, it is the Glensharrold and Falcarragh estate. The hon. Gentleman stated that the tenants were asked to submit their case to arbitration, but that is not the case. They have offered to do so. Even the Bishop of Limerick, whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman quotes here to-night, who sent out not a friendly valuer, but a hostile valuer to the Glensharrold estate, discovered on the valuation made by Mr. Barry that the demand of the tenants was honest, just, and upright. It is said it would be hard on the poor landlords to have pauper tenants forced back upon them; but who has made them paupers? I say it is the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Hunts and others, who have joined in a combination to make it impossible for these and other tenants to make an honest living in Ireland. These tenants on the Glensharrold estate had their rents raised four times within a quarter of a century, until they could not by any possible means earn the rents. It was only by their industry as turf cutters and sellers that they were enabled to pay the enormous rents that were charged them. These tenants were made paupers not by their own idleness, not by their own want of thrift, but through the rapacity of the landlord under whom they had the misfortune to live. They were willing from the first hour to submit their case to arbitration. The tenants on the Clanricarde estate have also been willing from the first day to now to submit their case to arbitration, and the same thing can be said of the tenants on the Ponsonby estate. On the last-named estate the landlord was also prepared to refer the case to arbitration, but a third party stepped in—a gentleman whose object was to keep up a fictitious value of the land in Ireland for the benefit of his class. Where, then, was the dishonesty in these cases? I say it was on the part of the landlords and their advocates. We, on the other hand, feel that we have not only been honest, but generous, and we maintain that we have been justified in our defence of the tenantry. In regard to the letter of Dr. Healy to the Times, I would point out that four years ago Lord Clanricarde offered to give reductions of 20 and 15 per cent., but not until the Plan of Campaign was started. Up to within the past three months he would have let the farms to new tenants, if any new tenants would have accepted them; but a change has come over him. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh thinks that this is a happy hour for the landlords, that the Plan of Campaign has been a failure, and that there are no longer any funds to support the tenants. Well, the Committee should know that the terms on which the tenants can be restored are the payment of three years' rent, the payment of all costs, and payment for the time during which the tenants had been out of possession. The landlords' honesty is this: that they would require their tenants to pay rent for the land, even when the tenants had not the land. A lovely code of morality this! The dishonesty of it is that the tenants having been plundered for years, and years, and years, and having revolted against the extortions made by Lord Clanricarde's agents, and having been sustained by the rest of the Irish race at home and abroad, the landlords found they had come to a serious pass in the condition of their estates in Ireland, and although most of them bent to the storm, a few of them more turbulent and fearless than the rest, refused to accede to the demands of the people, and these were supported by the other landlords, who sheltered themselves behind the mask of the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Smith-Barry). But I venture to say that the tenants of those landlords, notwithstanding the hope expressed by the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) although they may appear to him and other Members as derelict and abandoned by the the Irish race, will carry on this business to the finish, and until they have succeeded in breaking in even the wild colts of landlordism in Ireland. I would ask the House, has the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary succeeded up to the present time in breaking the spirit of the people of Tipperary? No doubt we have had bogus reports to that effect communicated to the press day after day, and I regret to say grabbed at, leaped at, and licked up, even by portions of that press which ought not to be found on the side of the Irish landlords. But I ask has the hon.

Member for Hunts got back much of his rent? Has he got back any of his tenants? We have been charged with the offences of the tenants of Tipperary, and it is said that it was a dishonest move on their part. I say that a more honourable and praiseworthy act was never done by a body of tenants than that which was done by the tenants of Tipperary. They did not refuse to pay the rent, or at any rate a reasonable rent, but they refused to be his tenants at any price, even at a farthing an acre per year. Had his agents offered to let them remain on their farms for the next four years, provided they promised to pay that rent, they would not have continued their occupancy. In fact it was not a matter of refusal of rent on their part, it was a matter of revolt against his conduct in taking the lead, as he did, against the people of Ireland with whom he had had no personal quarrel. The landlords' honesty comes to this, that when the landlords get their chance, they may conspire, confederate, and agree, and the Government will not bring any member of them before the Court of Removables for illegal conspiracy. No, Sir; that weapon is one which is only intended for those who stand by the weak against the strong, and by the poor against the wealthy. That is a weapon which is only used by a Tory Government against the Irish Nationalists, and it is not a weapon which the Chief Secretary would dream of applying to such persons as the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh or the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Johnston). Those are to be allowed to conspire. Those may have their landlords combinations and confederacies, and may work their mischief against any number of tenants, and thousands upon thousands of the poor peasants of Ireland. Those may conspire for the wrong, and ruin, and degradation, and impoverishment of the people, but there is no punishment for them. No, the punishment of the law is for the poor Nationalist, who dares to vindicate the right of the tenant to any possible modicum of justice. I venture to say that, notwithstanding what this Motion proposes to night, it will meet with the fate of all the Motions which have hitherto been brought forward in the interests of peace, order, and tranquillity in Ireland from the opposite side of the House. I venture to say that the landlords of Ireland whose advocates are so very zealous in this House, will yet regret that the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), has not been accepted in the spirit in which it is moved. I know, however, it is impossible to break the spirit of the Irish tenants. I know that the airy nonsense which has been uttered and repeated in this House in speeches made over and over again, will have no effect upon the spirit which animates the evicted tenants of my country. I would that a better spirit prevailed in the breasts of Members of this House, and that for the sake of that peace and harmony, aye, and of that humanity which they sometimes profess to have so much, the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman would be accepted, so that in future those questions which have arisen between certain Irish landlords and their tenants who have revolted against them, would be submitted to arbitration impartially and honourably with the result that peace, happiness, and content might be brought to many parts of Ireland. (8.10.)

Mr. Sheehy

*(8.40.) MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I must say that the account which has been given to-night of the condition of the tenants on the Clanricarde estate is not accurate.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*MR. ROCHE: We have been told that sickness and fever are rife among these tenants, and that the funds have been stopped. I tell the House that there is not a particle of truth in those assertions. I challenge the hon. Member for South Tyrone, who said he had been on the Woodford estate to give the name of a single tenant whom he visited. I know every person he saw. First he called on the District Inspector, then the local Magistrate, and finally the evicting landlord. From these sources alone did the hon. Member derive his information. I confess I have taken a very active part in connection with the struggle on the Clanricarde estate, and the action which I have taken will be the proudest boast of my life: I would repeat it to-morrow under similar circumstances. The hon. Member has stated to the House that the tenants were compelled against their will to take the action they did; that many only acted under threats of personal violence, and that they were, in fact, terrorised into it. But I reply that not a single step was ever taken which was not first discussed at a general meeting of the tenants, and what was done had their full sanction. We are told that all this was the work of the combination known as the Plan of Campaign. But the Plan of Campaign was not started until October, 1886, whereas the combination on the Clanricarde estate was formed exactly a year before. Again, as was proved before the Times, Special Commission, this combination of the tenants had not the sanction of the National League or of the Irish Parliamentary party: indeed, it was started in opposition to the wishes of both, on behalf of the tenantry. I went to the League Offices to ask if they would be supported in the struggle against their landlord, but I was told to advise them to pay their rents, for they need expect no assistance from the League. I told the tenants what had occurred, but they could not pay their rents, so we issued an appeal for help, and within six months the Tenants' Defence Association at Woodford received subscriptions to the amount of £1,000. So the fight went on. In December, 1885, the tenants memorialised Lord Clanricarde for an abatement of 25 per cent. in their rents, but they got no reply. In August, 1886, four of the tenants on the Woodford estate were evicted, and I believe the evictions cost the present Government about £3,000. In addition to that, 68 of the tenants were arrested and thrown into prison, and got from 12 to 18 months' confinement for defending their own houses. Not until all this had occurred, and until the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford had visited the scene of the evictions did the landlord make any offer to the tenants. Then he declined to recognise the combination, and he would not reinstate any of the evicted tenants unless they went to the agent individually and pleaded for mercy. They refused such terms, and now at least one-third of the entire population of Woodford has been evicted, and these people are living in huts erected by their organisation. Some 22 or 23 families are in huts on the parochial plot, and Lord Clanricarde is applying to a Superior Court for an injunction in order to get them evicted again. I ask the Government, in the interests of peace and of justice, to step in and prevent this fight continuing, for, although not one serious crime has been committed in the Woodford district, yet if Lord Clanricarde persists in his vengeance against the people, they will resist, and will not allow this man, or anybody on his behalf, to continue to pursue them with such harshness and injustice. It is the duty of the Government to prevent anything in the shape of breaches of the peace or of crime in the district, and if they will only adopt the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford they can do this. The tenants have always been anxious to settle this matter on just and amicable lines. At first they offered to purchase their holdings on fair and equitable terms. I made an offer to that effect to the landlord's agent, and the reply we got was that Lord Clanricarde would take 25 years' purchase for the estate. In consequence of the evictions, I purchased a small property right in the centre of the estate, and the price I gave was equal to only 12 years' purchase. Yet for the property surrounding it Lord Clanricarde wanted 25 years' purchase. If this landlord, who is, I believe, actuated with malice towards the people, will only act in accordance with the dictates of humanity and justice, all will be well. But I fear he will not do so, and, therefore, I say it is the duty of the Government to step in and interfere. In the many speeches to which I have listened to-night I have not heard a single argument against the principle of arbitration. The whole tone of the speeches of the supporters of the Government has been indicative of a desire to break down the combination without recourse to arbitration. But I assure the House, from my knowledge of the people on the Plan of Campaign estates—and I have a pretty intimate acquaintance with them—that there is far more life in the organisation to-day than there was four years ago. I say, too, that it would be equally in the interests of both landlords and tenants if arbitration were resorted to.

I recollect a case in the locality of Woodford in which the tenants demanded 30 per cent., and the landlord offered 15 per cent., reduction. The matter was to be left to arbitration. The tenants suggested as the arbitrator the landlord's own brother, and the Bishop of the Diocese, but the landlord would not agree to that, and resorted to eviction. He turned out five of his tenants just as the crops were ready for harvesting, and the struggle went on for seven months. At the end of that period the landlord granted a reduction of 25 per cent., he reinstated the evicted tenants, wiped out all law costs, paid for the crops on the land at the time of the eviction, and paid also £160 for the support of the tenants during the time they were evicted. Surely he would have done far better to have come to terms in the first instance. I tell the House that the tenants on the Clanricarde estate will never give in if by so doing they will have to desert those of their number who have been wounded in the fight. I take it to be admitted that long before there were any signs of disunion amongst our Party the Rev. Dr. Healy attempted, time after time, to bring about a settlement between Lord Clanricarde and his tenants. If Lord Clanricarde will not agree to arbitration, how on earth can the dispute be settled? I am afraid it never will be settled while the present Government is in power. The people of Ireland have not the slightest confidence that the present Government will assist them in bringing about a peaceable settlement of these disputes. The hopes of the people are all centred in the next General Election. They are prepared to make great sacrifices, and to endure great suffering, until the General Election. If then their hopes are disappointed I would not care to be responsible for the peace of the Plan of Campaign districts; for I am persuaded that if the people see that the Government will not come to their rescue and do them justice, they will not tolerate such men as Lord Clanricarde, who never visits the country, and who has never seen his Woodford property, and who persists in turning them out of their homes. The hon. Member for South Tyrone says he has spent a week investigating the case of the Clanricarde tenants. I challenge the hon. Gentleman to give the name of the tenants on the Woodford estate he consulted, because I maintain that there is not a particle of truth in any one of his statements. In one case a poor boy was taken from a sick bed, and died two days after the eviction. The father of the boy tried, time after time, to obtain an inquest, in order that the truth might be known. The head of the Government in Ireland was appealed to, but the matter was hushed up. If it is of any use I appeal to the Government, even in their own interest, to go down to Woodford and investigate the facts for themselves. I confidently assert that if the Chief Secretary were to spend three days in the Woodford district, he would be the first Member to stand up in this House and insist upon justice being done the tenants.

Mr. Roche

(9.5.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I regret that while my hon. Friend was giving a categorical and clear denial to the statements of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) with reference to the Woodford estate, the hon. Gentleman left the House. I regret that the hon. Member has left, because I propose to refer to the Ponsonby estate, in regard to which the hon. Member has been betrayed into a course of systematic misrepresentations. He has spoken about the doles of money being refused the tenants, and about the tenants' miserable and impoverished condition. The fact is, the tenants on the Ponsonby estate are comparatively better off to-day than they have been at any time during the past 10 years, but it is well that the House should not lie under any misconception as to our attitude towards the evicted tenants. We are not now suing in forma pauperis. We do not come here to beg Her Majesty's Government to establish these Boards of Arbitration. We have not approached the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, who of his own motion and in consequence of his desire to bring about peace, has proposed this Resolution. We are not suing for terms on behalf of these evicted tenants, because as long as there is a dollar to be had from an Irishman in any part of the world it shall go towards the relief of the tenants. There may be a temporary disagreement amongst hon. Members here, but there is one point on which we are all agreed, and that is that we shall all stand firm in defence of those who, in time of crisis and in defence of principle, have made as gallant a stand against overwhelming odds as was ever made by any body of civilians or military. Hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to forget the history of the past few years. They seem to forget that in 1886, when the hon. Member for Cork introduced his measure, the fall in prices was so rapid and crushing on the greater portion of the tenants in Ireland that it was absolutely impossible for the leaseholders to pay their ordinary rents, and even for those tenants who had had judicial rents fixed to pay their judicial rents. Hon. Members opposite produced figures to show there was no fall in prices. I well remember the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) declared in this House that there could not be a serious fall in agricultural prices because the price of wool had risen. The Bill of the hon. Member for Cork was thrown out, and no attempt was made by the Government to deal with the question. It was a profanation to talk of dealing with the judicial rents that had been so sacredly and recently fixed. A short time passed, and the Government, who had denied that there was a fall in prices, appointed the Cowper Commission, and that Commission's Report we all remember. A little later on the same Government gave power to the Land Commission to reduce the judicial rents and to fix a certain schedule according to which rents could be reduced. What is the fact in regard to the Ponsonby estate? In 1885 remonstrances were addressed to Mr. Ponsonby, but all these remonstrances fell on deaf ears. The summer of 1886 was very wet, and the barley crop, which forms the bulk of the cereal produce of the district in which the Ponsonby estate is situate, was almost an utter and complete failure. I remember seeing hundreds of the tenants dragging their crops of barley to the town of Middleton. The local distillers refused to buy the barley. The tenants then took it to Cork, where they were satisfied to sell it for their food and lodging. The stuff was barely good enough to give to pigs. When the main portion of the crops was ruined, it became necessary that the tenants should get an adequate reduction of their rents. I, personally, have never regarded judicial rents as things from which there is no appeal. The tenants have not had a fair share in the fixing of the judicial rents. I am not satisfied, and I never shall be satisfied, that judicial rents are a fair measure of what agricultural rents should be in Ireland, until the appointment of Sub-Commissioners is made upon an honourable and impartial basis. The appointments made do not command confidence, and it does not finish argument or close debate to tell us that judicial rents have been fixed. When there was a fall in prices in 1886 all this edifice of judicial rent tumbled to the ground, and the Government had to find a remedy for a state of things they had before denied. I can speak from personal knowledge of the Ponsonby estate, a knowledge not derived from flying visits. I know it from top to bottom, and I knew it long before there was any disturbance upon the estate in connection with the tenants' combination. I know that some of the tenants were among the most cruelly rack-rented of the class in Ireland. I know that some of the poorest tenants paid rent on their own improvements, and that legalised spoliation had been going on upon the Ponsonby estate for generations. I have here some of the figures showing the rents that had been paid. They are furnished by Canon Keller, who has intimate knowledge of the facts, and a deep interest in the tenants, and I am willing to accept the statements of the Very Rev. Canon Keller against the statements of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, who probably does not know barley from oats, or a horse from a mare. Here are some instances of the the rents that were paid. In the case of a tenant named Doyle, the largest tenant on the estate, the valuation was £250, the rent £370; in the case of another the valuation was £163, the rent £223; in the case of a third the valuation was £61, the rent £79; in the case of a fourth the valuation was £40, the rent £58. It was against rents of this kind—rents it was not possible for them to pay, rents imposed upon the tenants' own improvements—that they combined and demanded a reduction, which by the acknowledgment of the agent, Mr. Horace Townsend, would have been granted if the tenants had gone into the Land Court. The Attorney General for Ireland, who is in general a painstaking gentleman, mentioned three estates in Ponsonby, the Olphert, and, I think, the Luggacurran estates, and he said on the Ponsonby estate the leaseholders were offered by Mr. Ponsonby the option of going into the Land Court. I deny that utterly. The right hon. Gentleman is misinformed. No such offer was made until the tenants had been two or three years in combination, and a large number of them had been evicted. The offer was made only on the condition that they should abandon those of their number who had been evicted, but this, as honourable men, they refused to do. To their credit be it said, there, as throughout Ireland, the tenants refused to abandon their fellows who had been evicted, who had fought by their side, and who in the ultimate victory will have a share in the reward. I should have thought that in a free assembly like this such chivalrous conduct would have extorted admiration from opponents, but the unhealthy atmosphere of this political life seems to have stifled these feelings of generosity. The right hon. Gentleman has put the case most unfairly; the leaseholders were offered the right to go into Court, but not until a large number of them had been evicted. I can assure right hon. Gentlemen they will sit on that Bench a long time before they hear us withdraw one word we have uttered in defence of the Plan of Campaign. We acknowledge it was an extreme remedy, but it was extreme necessity drove the tenants to adopt it. On the Ponsonby estate, not a Member of this House, not even the hon. Member for North-East Cork, in whose constituency the land is situated, was responsible for the Plan of Campaign. It was only when the unfortunate people were driven to the wall that they adopted the Plan of Campaign, upon which they have fought the landlord ever since. We know the history of events. Negotiations for a settlement were coming to a satisfactory conclusion, until a certain Mephistopheles came upon the scene in the person of the hon. Member for Huntingdonshire, and then they were broken off. We have it on the authority of the agent and intermediary (Mr. Brouncker) that matters between landlord and tenants were approaching a settlement, that a very small sum divided them, when negotiations were closed with the appearance of the hon. Member for South Hunts. I do not know whether he appeared in defence of his order, or whether he was looking for dignity and honours from the Crown, as reward for meritorious action, but his appearance destroyed the expectation of a settlement. In connection with this estate the hon. Member for South Tyrone a while ago spoke of the cattle and sheep roving over the pasture lands; but I can call to mind some very vivid words of his in which, not long ago, he described the docks and weeds and thistles overgrowing the land. We say the responsibility lies not with the tenants who dared to stand up in defence of their rights and property, but with the landlord, who, blind to all sense of justice, and deaf to good counsel, proceeded to the enforcement of his unjust claims. There cannot be a doubt that these avenging landlords, these men who have singled themselves out by their exceptional treatment of their tenantry in Ireland, would never have persisted to the bitter extremities they have gone were it not for the demeanour, the advice and encouragement they constantly received from the Chief Secretary for Ireland. There can be no doubt that landlords such as Lord Clanricarde, Mr. Olphert, and others would not have pursued their tenants in the bitter and malignant spirit they have if they had not been aware that they had the encouragement and approval of the Government of Ireland. We claim in connection with this combination of tenants that practically there has been no crime in Ireland. We claim that for the Ponsonby estate, for the Massereene estate, the Luggacurran estate, and all over Ireland where this unfortunate necessity for a struggle has been forced upon the people. When hon. Members talk of serious responsibility, let me ask who encouraged this system of planting, of bringing men from distant parts to confiscate the property of tenants, to rob them of the fruits of their industry? I say a serious responsibility lies upon the men who encouraged this kind of thing, for a new spirit has entered into Ireland, a new spirit has been infused into the breasts of the Irish tenant; and he who once endured the cruellest wrongs ever in flicted on a body of people, no longer stands a legitimate object for the perpetration of oppression, which is as keenly felt to-day, and will be as boldly resisted by Irishmen as by any people who ever struggled against tyranny and wrong. If hundreds and thousands of these men who have made the land what it is, who have given it all the fertility it possesses, find themselves driven from their homes and debarred from all hopes, I, for one, say that if these planters from the north—that paradise of all that is loyal and good and orderly—are in the future overtaken by a swift and stern retribution, I shall not be found to raise a voice in protest. There is a serious responsibility upon those who lend themselves to an iniquitous system such as this, and I beg the Government to pause before it is too late. I beg the men who are defending a system of extermination to pause before they have created a state of things which will produce many a bitter crop of suffering, perhaps of outrage and crime. We shall support the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford. It commends itself to everyone who has any idea of justice, equity, and fair play, and who is really in favour of law and order. We recommend the Motion for this reason, and shall support it for this reason. Our duty is clear to the evicted tenant. We shall support every honest attempt for a peaceful settlement, we shall advise recourse to arbitration, and if the worst comes to the worst, it will be our duty in the future, as it has been in the past, to wait and work for the downfall of the Government and the system which has caused so much misery.

Mr. Flynn

(9.30.) MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I desire to offer a short statement to the House in reference to the Vandeleur estate, and the statement I shall make will be one that will not give much pleasure to the representatives of the landlords in Ireland, neither will it give unbounded satisfaction to those who represent the interests of the tenants. I represent a constituency which is in no way influenced by Irish votes or Irish interests, and when I feel it my duty to make a statement as to matters with which I am acquainted, I hope the House will credit me with having no bias either way. The history of the troubles upon the Vandeleur estate may be given very shortly. For generations the Vandeleur family have held good reputation in the County of Clare. They managed their estates in a kindly, but, unquestionably, somewhat haphazard manner, and no very grave dissensions, if any, appeared between the landlord and the 450 tenants. In good times the landlord obtained the full amount of rent demanded, and in bad times he made considerable abatements. Meanwhile, these gratifying relations existing, times were changing, the country was becoming more advanced, popular ideas were more represented, and new rights or claims were put forward. Perhaps I may first direct attention to the year 1874. In that year my friend Mr. Vandeleur's father stood as candidate for the representation of Clare, and was defeated, and it is alleged by the tenants that immediately after his defeat the landlord raised his rents. It is only fair to say that on a close investigation of affairs it appears that while there is some foundation for the statement, this might be excused on many grounds, and the statement of Mr. Vandeleur was that he only raised the rents to the figures at which they stood previous to the election in which he was defeated. Whether this is true or not, all I can say of the management of the estate is that the people lived in a fairly happy manner, and it was not until the introduction of the Plan of Campaign that any real trouble arose, when questions, especially the raising of the rents in 1874, were brought forward, and these resulted in the people combining to refuse payment of rents. Writs of eviction were issued, and 1,000 police were brought on to the estate for three weeks to carry out eviction against 26 tenants. Mr. Vandeleur complains very much that he suffered a very great deal of damage in the course of these eviction proceedings; preserves were destroyed; his house injured, and tenants' houses were demolished against his wish, and the wish of the agent for the estate. I shall have a word or two to say in regard to the agent, and I am sure the House will understand I desire to give an explanation of some of the troubles. This agent, one of the firmest, most just and loyal of men, came from the North of Ireland, an Ulster Scotchman. He took the strictest views of rights and wrongs, and did not always yield to the tenants' demands for abatement. Troubles arose, relations became strained, evictions took place, and finally the whole of the tenants refused to pay a farthing of rent. After three years, efforts of various kinds were made to bring about some sort of arbitration—and it is now my duty to point out that the Government, through their agents, forced Mr. Vandeleur to come to terms in regard to arbitration—and to this end every kind of inducement, argument, and warning, was used. I think this should be known, considering the charges that have been made against Mr. Vandeleur. This correspondence shows that Mr. Vandeleur at no period agreed to arbitration until the Government agents forced him into it. On March 15, 1888, Sir Redvers Buller wrote to Mr. Vandeleur, saying he had been asked—he did not say by whom—to tell him that his tenants were anxious for a settlement, and to suggest that their offer should be accepted. Mr. Vandeleur, during 1878, also received letters to the same effect from the Resident Magistrate at Kilrush, Captain Walsh, and other Resident Magistrates, all the correspondence being to the same effect, urging Mr. Vandeleur to come to terms of arbitration. Matters drifted on, and ended in my friend Mr. Vandeleur, after a long correspondence, communicating with Sir Charles Russell, and placing matters in his hands. This came about in a very simple manner. Mr. Vandeleur determined to evict all the tenants in February, 1889, but the police said it would be impossible to carry out the evictions before June of that year, and, of course, the interval before the evictions could be carried out meant a heavy loss to Mr. Vandeleur, yet still the police said the evictions could not be carried out earlier. So Sir Charles Russell acted as arbitrator, and his award in my judgment, was not so fair as it might have been, but it was such an award as Sir Charles Russell expected would place the rent beyond doubt in good and bad seasons. By this award the Government saved at least £10,000 expenses of evictions, and Mr. Vandeleur was enabled to obtain the whole of the Campaign money deposited in the hands of the arbitrator by those in charge of it. Matters then appeared to be going on smoothly. I visited the estate, and with some trouble, owing to the strained relations existing between landlord, tenants, Resident Magistrate, and Police, was instrumental in settling some minor difficulties. At this period there occurred an event upon the estate which caused me considerable pain, and will no doubt excite a feeling of indignation in the House. The 26 tenants who had been evicted, and had been living in Land League huts, were restored to their holdings. These tenants brought back such cattle and stock as they had, borrowed more, and got a little money from the bank to work their farms. Two or three days after I left, with everything, as I thought, in fair working order, an act, as I thought, of unparalleled treachery was perpetrated. The police, upon an old bill of £150, came down and seized the whole of the tenants' cattle. I made representation at once to the Chief Secretary, and he instituted an inquiry immediately, and in the result it turned out that the Resident Magistrate was in no sense to blame, but the Sheriff, in carrying out his duty, took upon himself to seize the cattle for an old bill of costs, although Mr. Vandeleur had relinquished his claim, and did not press it. I felt very much annoyed, though it was proved the Resident Magistrate had nothing to do with it. Now, I return to the arbitration. Sir Charles Russell, in giving his award, made a condition that the damage to crops should be made the subject of local valuation by somebody appointed in Kilrush, and Mr. Considine was selected, in some manner unknown to me, to perform the duty. Mr. Considine awarded a sum equal to three years' rental for the damage done to the crops, and this award is now the subject of correspondence between the hon. and learned Member for Hackney and Mr. Vandeleur. To show the gross injustice of this award, if the damage done to the crops was worth three years' rental, then the tenants' demands were exorbitant and they were well able to pay their rents. The idea of three years' rental is outrageous, and has caused considerable irritation. And now, it may be asked, How far do the results justify the statement that arbitration is a failure, and that no further arbitration should take place? I communicated within the last few days with Mr. Stothard, the agent, to inquire to what extent the award of the hon. and learned

Mr. Henniker Heaton

Member for Hackney had been obeyed, and I have a letter in reply stating that out of 213 tenants only 27 have obeyed the award.

AN HON. MEMBER: That is not a true statement.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I have the names in each case. It is only fair to mention that the 26 evicted tenants may be added; but, in that case, the total is only 53, which I do not think shows a satisfactory result, and until I have better information I must consider the award has been a failure. It may be expected that I should say something as to the future of the estate. I am bound to say I never remember visiting a more beautiful country; soil and climate offer every encouragement for success, though railway communication is required. I think Mr. Vandeleur's ancestors are greatly to blame for not having in the past devoted more attention to the development of the estate, but if this is properly carried out in the time to come, if railways are extended, and if the people are taught to be industrious instead of idle, I believe there is a great future for the Vandeleur estate.

(9.50.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: I think we ought to be deeply grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his interesting contribution to this important Debate. The proposition is that Boards of Arbitration should be established, and the Government contend that this proposition cannot with advantage to the country be carried out; but while they carry on this pantomime of contending with us to-night against the proposition, they, behind the scenes, have been doing exactly the thing we want them to legalise. We have heard read letters from officials in Ireland—we had letters from so high an official as Sir Redvers Buller himself—all bringing "pressure within the law on a landlord in Ireland."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): He was not then Under Secretary.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: He was not Under Secretary, but he was a friend of the Government, and he had been in office a short time before.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I may explain that Sir Redvers Buller dates his letter from the War Office.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Why did Sir Redvers Buller intervene? Was it not because he was known to have had official communication with Ireland in the past, had had official intercourse with the Representatives of the Government there, that he was in such close connection with the Government that his letter might be taken as expressing the views of the Government? What does he say? That he "was pressed to make this representation." By whom? By his employers—from those from whom he held office? Undoubtedly we are justified in coming to that conclusion. Sir Redvers Buller was not the only official addressing letters to Mr. Vandeleur. Captain Walsh, the Resident Magistrate stationed at Kiltrush, addressed letters of remonstrance to Mr. Vandeleur, pointing out the advisability of settling with his tenants; and when we have such an official stating to a landlord that "it is advisable," "most desirable," he should settle with his tenants, what does it mean but "pressure within the law?" We are accused of bringing forward and supporting a proposition that will, in the language of the Attorney General for Ireland, "work gross injustice." We usually meet with this declaration when we agitate for the rights of the tenant in Ireland. We were told it would be a gross injustice to pass the Land Bill in 1881. We are told by the Attorney General for Ireland that this proposition is not necessary for the reduction of rents, because there is the Land Court for the purpose. This Court was thought satisfactory in 1881, and yet an Arrears Bill had to be passed in 1883, and again in 1887 the Land Act had to be amended in order to afford the Commissioners an opportunity of still further reducing rents, and every effort that is made in this House and out of it to bring justice home to the tenants of Ireland is characterised as grossly unjust. The Attorney General for Ireland says the alternative is a firm and temperate administration of the law, a firm and temperate administration where tenants alone are concerned, but he will not adopt our proposal because pressure would be brought upon the landlords to come to settlement, and the hon. Member who first opposed this Resolution states that legislation is unnecessary. But the hon. Member (Mr. T. W. Russell) was not always of that opinion, because if I remember rightly he not long ago wrote a strong letter to the Times, and spoke in this House as to the necessity for legislation in order to deal with such cases as the Vandeleur estates and others. The hon. Member said to-night, in opposing this Motion, that arbitration had been applied to the Vandeleur estate and had failed. But why? Last year a similar statement was made in the House, and we made inquiries, the result of which was that we found that in only a few cases had the award not been acted upon. If it is not acted upon to-day we have the reason stated by the hon. Member for Canterbury, who says it is because of the imperfection of the award, the incompleteness of the award, and is not to be attributed to the dishonesty of the tenants. But no such failure could take place if we had a legalised Court of Arbitration. The hon. Member for South Tyrone says that this House ought not to come to the rescue or relief of those who have entered the Plan of Campaign upon these estates. That is the cry in this House and outside, "You must not yield to the Plan of Campaign," but it is time that cry was stilled. Take the case of the Ponsonby estate. An attempt was made at arbitration there to settle the difficulties. An attempt was made by a philanthropic gentleman from the South of Ireland, well known to the right hon. Gentlemen on the Government Bench, well known to the hon. Member for South Hunts, to buy this estate. Sir John Arnott, the proprietor of the Irish Times, a supporter of the present Government, was prepared to advance a large sum of money, as much as £10,000, with which he was prepared to bridge over the difficulty about price. A correspondence of a lengthy character was entered into between the agent of the estate and Sir John Arnott. Sir John Arnott states in his letter that he was willing to lose £10,000 in order to bridge over the difficulty and difference. That letter I have read not only in print, but in manuscript. But the syndicate of landlords, represented in this House by the hon. Member for South Hunts, put on the estate a prohibitive price. No landlord in Ireland will be satisfied with anything short of beating the tenants to their knees, and I maintain it is the duty of the House of Commons to come to the assistance of the tenants who are being so ruthlessly dealt with. I must characterise the conduct of the syndicate of landlords represented here by the hon. Member for South Hunts as cruel and wrong in the extreme; but it is not a bit worse than the conduct of those who manage and are responsible for Lord Clanricarde's estate. I have no doubt a sincere and honest attempt has been made recently by the Bishop of the diocese to settle that estate, and to-day's Times contains a letter which has been frequently referred to in general terms in the course of this discussion. I beg the House to pardon me while I read a few extracts from that letter. The Bishop asked the agent a number of questions, but I will only ask the House to listen to the answers given by Mr. Tener. The agent replied—

Mr. J. O'Connor

"Any tenant who would be restored will be liable for all costs and arrears, even for those which accrued while not in possession of the farm."

In case of restoration of evicted tenants I would at once require payment of three years' rent and costs."

That makes it impossible for the evicted tenants to be restored to their houses, and the other tenants—and it is to their credit—will not go back unless their brother tenants are restored. Again Mr. Tener says—

"I would still give no written guarantee that the balance would not be demanded at any time."

That is to say, that while the balance of the arrears or the balance of the rent that may be due would not be demanded now, it would hang like a millstone round the necks of the tenants who have been settled with, and this millstone would deprive them of all energy in the future to develop their farms; it would take the heart out of them, and spoil them as industrious men. He goes on—

"But I may say that no further payment of arrears will be required for 12 months. In any case I would not restore them generally speaking; each case should be considered on its own merits and with regard to the interests of the estate. All tenants in present possession, except a few against whom legal proceedings are pending, can have the same terms on paying at once three years' rent and costs. No costs under any circumstances will be remitted, and no reduction in any circumstances on judicial rents, but on non-judicial rents a reduction of 10 per cent. will be made on all payments made."

That is to say, these tenants will be restored on conditions that will place them in a worse position than that occupied by those who have been in occupation all the years that they have been out, because, while the tenants in occupation have had their rents re-considered and reduced by the Commissioners under the Act of 1887, those who would be settled with would be deprived of all the benefit of the reductions. I think it is very clear from the circumstances on the Ponsonby and the Clanricarde estates, and from the conditions that are laid down by the landlords' syndicate and the agent of Lord Clanricarde that the landlords do not want peace with the tenants, that they will not make the peace outside this House, that they will not accept the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, which would bring about peace through the legalised action of this House. It is evident the landlords of Ireland do not want anything but war with their tenants. The hon. Member for South Tyrone stated that the tenants on these estates have made exorbitant demands for reductions, and that they have not acted according to awards which have been made. I will give the hon. Member an instance of a Plan of Campaign estate with which I had some intimate connection in the early stages of the Plan—I allude to the Mitchelstown Estate, and it is a fair sample of the estates that have been campaigned. After the Land Act of 1881 had been passed the tenants of that estate applied for permission to go into the Land Court. Being leaseholders it was necessary for them to ask permission, and Mr. Webber, the husband of the Countess of Kingstown, said he would select a typical case to be heard by the Court. That case was selected, and the tenant had his rent reduced by 30 per cent. Thereupon, Mr. Webber withdrew his consent from the other 400 tenants on the estate, and they had to continue to pay rack rents, rents which, according to the decision in the typical case, were 30 per cent. too high. The Cowper Commission was appointed, and reported that the value of agricultural produce had fallen by 20 per cent. since the rents had been fixed between 1881 and 1883. Therefore, the tenants on the Mitchelstown estate were rack rented to the extent of 50 per cent. The unfortunate tenants paid the 30 per cent. declared by the Commission to be a rack rent beyond the 20 per cent., which, according to the Report of the Commission, had been the reduction in the value of agricultural produce. What was the reduction asked for by the tenants on the estate? Did they ask for 50 per cent.? No; nor for 40 nor 30. They only asked for 20 per cent., and they were refused. The Plan of Campaign was entered upon, and bitterly fought on both sides. Men were sent to prison, men lost their lives, in the struggle, and after all this there was an arbitration and a settlement. The Land Commissioners came down and gave a larger reduction to the tenants than had been asked for under the Plan of Campaign. The rents have been paid and the award made has been acted up to by the tenants. That is a typical case, and a fair example of many of the estates that have been settled under the Plan of Campaign. Let the Committee bear in mind that some 60 estates have been settled by arbitration, and no complaints have come to this House, except those which have come from the hon. Member. I beg the Government to entertain this proposition, first, because the condition of things which demands a settlement was created by the Government themselves by refusing to legislate for these tenants, by rejecting the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork in 1886, and by the oppression of the Crimes Act, which has been placed at the disposal of the landlords of Ireland. That is an undoubted fact. We have never heard of landlords being sent to prison under that Act. I have given a few instances which, I think, ought to show that there is a cry against a settlement in the Plan of Campaign estates. That cry is kept up outside by those who are acting in the interests of the landlords, and finds an echo—more than an echo, a solid support—in this House from the friends of the landlords. But I would appeal to the landlords themselves. It is to their interest to have such a modus vivendi as that proposed this evening. It is also to the interest of the House to pass the Motion to remove the many subjects which disturb it here Session after Session. It would remove from us the necessity of carrying on such a Debate as this we have had to-night; it would remove the necessity of debating the Motion which will be proposed next Monday week by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley). It would also be to the interest of the Government to pass the Motion. It would be to the interest of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland and his Government to have removed from their path this great obstacle to their successful administration, and it is because I believe it would serve all these interests that I give my support to the Motion.

(10.17.) SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower, Hamlets, Bow, &c.): According to the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down he appears to have given up the position attempted to be established by the Motion, for, in answer to the statement of the hon. Member for South Tyrone that arbitration had been a failure, he says that arbitration has not been a failure, and he gives us most remarkable instances of its success. What is the success which has been achieved at Mitchelstown? What was the arbitration there?

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I did not say there had been arbitration there.

SIR JOHN COLOMB: There was arbitration—that of the Land Court, which, he says, fixed the rents at a 30 per cent. reduction. It is obvious, therefore, that, in the hon. Gentleman's opinion, the Land Court is an efficient Court of Arbitration for the reason that its action has been effective and satisfactory in the instance which the hon. Member has named. I listened with great interest to the statement of facts made by the hon. Member for Canterbury—and in matters connected with Ireland the one thing we want is facts. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down attempted to prove—and laid great stress upon it—that the Government is adopting a system of compulsory arbitration. The hon. Member thinks he finds proof of that in certain letters which have been referred to. I cannot share that view. If my memory serves me right, Sir Redvers Buller was an old brother officer of Colonel Vandeleur, and nothing is more natural than that, reading in the papers of the difficulties of Colonel Vandeleur, particularly as the Colonel was not too strong in the head, Sir Redvers Buller should write to advise him to come to some settlement. All the letters simply amount to this: that Sir Redvers Buller advised his friend to look more fully into the matter, and, if possible, to arrange a settlement. The same process may be seen any night when a policeman advises excited or tipsy men to go home. No one will make a charge against the Government of conniving, or ignoring, or attempting to avoid the law because a policeman uses a certain amount of discretion in advising a man to do a certain thing rather than imprison him. But I agree with the hon. Member for Canterbury when he says that it is to be regretted that the Vandeleur family have not done more to develop the estate, but, unfortunately, the want of security furnishes an excuse for not sinking capital, which will not be attracted to Ireland until political agitation ceases. This Debate is important to the future of our Empire, because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford committed himself at Drogheda to the distinct pledge that he would join no Government and enter no Cabinet which did not, as a preliminary to his joining it, give a pledge to put back the Plan of Campaign tenants into their holdings. We must all, I am sure, look with alarm upon the condition of a future Cabinet of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian without the ready aid, great eloquence, and suavity of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford. The Division may determine that grave issue. The hon. Member for Canterbury has given us a narrative of facts; but where is the hon. and learned Member for Hackney? Why is not the hon. and learned Member able to come and support his right hon. Friend? It certainly is very noteworthy that he is not in his place, seeing that he has taken such a prominent part in this arbitration. But, to come to the question at issue. I think when an abstract Resolution of this kind is proposed to the House we should look on it from several points of view. And one of the points of view is this: If the House passes the Resolution, can it be carried out, and will it work? Who is going to draw the terms of Reference? How can you go to arbitration on a political or sentimental brief? There are not only two parties—landlords and tenants—but there are two classes of tenants, having respectively judicial and non-judicial rents. The judicial tenant is a man who has been into the Land Court, in whose case sworn evidence has been taken, and in whose case the Commissioners have actually visited and examined the land on the spot and fixed

Mr. J. O'Connor

the rent at a sum they think fair. Where is the room for arbitration in such a case as that? Are you going to start a sort of irresponsible Court of Appeal to upset the decision of that tribunal? I say you cannot work such a scheme practically unless as a preliminary you disestablish and disendow the Land Court of Ireland. The judicial tenant at present, if he is dissatisfied with the rent that is fixed, has a Court of Appeal; and if he does not appeal, you are bound to assume that he is satisfied. Therefore, in the case of the judicial tenant who will not pay, I fail to see, and challenge any one to show, where is the ground or basis for drawing up terms of reference in arbitration. As to the non-judicial tenant, it may be said that he has not had his rent fixed. That is so; but he has power to go into the Court to-morrow to have it fixed; and if it is reduced he will be recouped the amount he may have paid in excess of the judicial rent from the date of his application to the Court. Therefore, I ask again, is arbitration proposed to be established under this Resolution or is the Government to have thrown upon it, in addition to its other labours, the duty of acting as a Court of Appeal, to inquire into every case of dispute between the landlords and tenants? Is the Government to be called upon only when political capital is to be made? Can you draw a line in rent reduction where the Government is to interfere and to arbitrate and where it is not? Are you going to deal with the question in an abstract form, or how are you going to regard it? If the Motion is passed and tenants do not pay their rent, but say they are in the Plan of Campaign, what is to happen? Are you to interfere where the rent is £10, or £20, or £40, or £100, or where is the limit to be? You cannot fix a limit at all. And is the Government to arbitrate between the farmers who belong to the Boards of Guardians and the labourers who occupy labourers' cottages, where the latter refuse to pay their rents, and put themselves under the Plan of Campaign? In such a case is the Government to arbitrate and upset the decision of the Board of Guardians? Or is this Motion only put forward for political purposes to catch votes? Certainly it could never be carried out. There are, I know, some people who sincerely believe that the Plan of Campaign is only a parallel to strikes in this country; but I venture to say that anyone who went over to Ireland, not for a week or 10 days, but for a longer period, and made inquiries, and invested in some land where the Plan of Campaign was in force, would come to the conclusion that there was a vast difference between the Plan and a strike. In the case of labour in this country, wages are not regulated by Act of Parliament, as are rents in Ireland; besides, in Ireland the tenant is secure in his holding, which cannot be said of the English labourer. The labourer, moreover, does not break a contract when he goes out on strike, as the Irish tenant does when he refuses to pay his rent. The Motion has no bottom in it. Instead of bringing about peace, it would intensify war, and would cast upon the Government a duty they could not perform. We may regard it as a hopeful sign that tenants are, generally speaking, content. It is within my own knowledge that a threat of the Plan of Campaign being adopted on a particular property is an immense impetus in favour of the payment of rents on the neighbouring estates, because tenants are frightened that they may be "campaigned," and take good care to pay their rents even before payment is expected. I ask hon. Members opposite how in practice they are going to apply such a Resolution as this to the position at New Tipperary? There has been no dispute there between landlord and tenants with regard to rent.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I expressly excluded the New Tipperary dispute.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for telling me. I was not present during that part of his speech. We understand, then, that hon. Gentlemen are going to vote for arbitration under the clear and distinct pledge of an ex-Cabinet Minister of their Party that there is no bottom in the New Tipperary quarrel, that arbitration cannot be applied there, and that the New Tipperary tenants are left in the lurch and excluded from the arbitration proposal.

(10.32.) MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I am sorry the hon. Gentleman did not read the Motion before he attempted to discuss it. Had he read it he would have seen that in terms it only applies to disputes arising between 1885 and

1887. This would include the dispute on the Ponsonby estate, where the Tipperary dispute originated, and if the Resolution were put in force, no doubt it would be effective in ending the New Tipperary quarrel also. Hon. Members on both sides profess their anxiety to bring peace to Ireland, and they now have the opportunity of giving effect to their wishes. Every argument against the Resolution to which I have listened has been based on the idea that the result of arbitration is to be in favour of the Plan of Campaign. Surely this is an extraordinary ground for right hon. Gentlemen opposite to take their stand upon, and for the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh to contend that the passing of this Resolution would be a concession of anything to the Plan of Campaign. Surely that could not be the case unless in every instance the Plan of Campaign were justified. We believe it can be so justified, but hon. Gentlemen opposite take the reverse view; then let them put their belief to the test. The Attorney General for Ireland, in the course of his argument, said—and the main drift of his argument was—that whereas our contention is that leaseholders were excluded from the Act of 1881, and unjust arrears were undealt with, there were three estates to which he said the leaseholder argument would not apply, inasmuch as the landlords had offered to let their tenants break their leases and go into Court. The argument of unjust arrears would not apply, he said, because landlords had made larger concessions in arrears than any legislation would have forced them to grant. I should like a little higher authority for that statement; but if it is true, then it is due to the fact that the Plan of Campaign has been in operation in Ireland. What was the origin of the Plan of Campaign, for that is the pith of the whole matter? The responsibility for the Plan of Campaign rests not with us on this side of the House, but with Her Majesty's Government, who in the autumn of 1886 refused to listen to my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell), when he said that owing to the fall in agricultural prices judicial rents fixed by the Land Court had become unfair and impossible of payment. I, as a Land Commissioner, stated that in fixing rents I had made no allowance for the unexpected fall in prices, and the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) derided me, and said I had demonstrated my failure as a Land Commissioner because I had not been able to foresee what no living man then foresaw. What happened afterwards? The Government appointed a Royal Commission which found that no Land Commissioner had had in view a possible fall in prices when he fixed judicial rents. Yes, and the Government passed into law a measure giving relief to those tenants, though not so much as they ought to have got; therefore the injustice is one you have acknowledged, and you cannot get out of it by specious argument and beating about the bush. In 1887 you admitted that the results of the Land Act of 1881 had been unjust to leaseholders, and reductions since have been larger than to ordinary yearly tenants, proving that these leaseholders had a very serious grievance, and that this existed up to 1887, and this Motion does not pretend to deal with any tenant who is not suffering under that grievance. Arrears are still undealt with by legislation. We have been told by the right hon. Gentleman that the House has refused to deal specially with debts of this kind. Yes, but the House has dealt with such in Scotland; the reductions in arrears given to crofters far exceed any reductions by judicial rents. The Attorney General for Ireland alluded to two estates on which the Plan of Campaign was introduced, the Massereene estate and Lord Lansdowne's estate, and on both he said the landlords had offered to allow the tenants to break their leases and go into the Land Court. Yes, but this was after the Plan of Campaign had been put into operation, and after people had been evicted. What good was it then? On the Massereene estate leaseholders were only a very small proportion of the tenants, and the main fight there was against non-judicial rents, rents that had never been before the Land Court. Lord Massereene refused any reduction whatever, and dismissed his agent who recommended it. It was only after the Plan of Campaign had been adopted, and after some of the tenants who had not been evicted had gone into the Land Court and had got a reduction of 23 per cent., they having asked 25 per cent.; the Land Court thus showing that the quarrel the tenants had entered upon was not an unjust one. That Lord Massereene made an offer to give the other tenants a similar reduction. But this offer was coupled with a condition that two of the tenants, who had been mainly instrumental in wringing from him this concession, were to be handed over to him as victims. Is this not a case for arbitration where we have shown the tenants were in the right and Lord Massereene in the wrong, and where the landlord would only make his concession on condition of wreaking his vengeance on the tenants who brought about this concession? Now take the Lansdowne case. The landlord refused any reduction of the judicial rent, and you in this House, by your action, by the law you have passed, have shown you believe Lord Lansdowne to be in the wrong, and yet you will not appoint a means by arbitration of bridging over this dispute, a dispute I believe Lord Lansdowne would be glad to have bridged over. Allusion has been made to the Glensharrold estate, and the history of the dispute there is a very instructive one. This estate was under the management of a Court in Ireland, not of any landlord, and the Court refused to give a halfpenny reduction. Judge Boyd tried to put me into Kilmainham Gaol because I advised the tenants to stick to their combination as the only one to bring about a concession. They did stand by each other, and the Court sent down a valuer who recommended a reduction of 30 per cent. Did this not prove the justice of the tenants' claim? But you may say, why have they not accepted the offer? The right hon. Gentleman has made a great deal of the letter from the Bishop of Limerick. That Prelate has lived in the town all his life, and his knowledge of agricultural tenancies is not very great, but he sent to Glensharrold a valuer of his own, who recommended a larger reduction than did the valuer for the Court. The valuer for the Court was Mr. Murphy, of Dunfanaghy, well known as valuer and arbitrator in railway cases, and now chief valuer of one of the Courts in Ireland. He is well known as an official valuer, and is an excellent valuer on land of good quality, but a bad valuer for land of bad quality, upon which he is inclined to put too high a price. We have heard how a little fact outweighs much theory, and I will give the facts as to the Glensharrold estate. Glensharrold land is mountain bog such as is found in the Gweedore district in Donegal, and there was a flutter among the landlords when the rents on Captain Hill's Gweedore property were reduced 35 per cent. The Land Commissioners were fluttered by it even. It was supposed to be a model property. They held a special sitting to hear appeals from the district, and they sent down their own valuer, while the landlord employed Mr. Murphy, of Dunfanaghy, according to whose valuation the reduction should have been less; but the Land Commissioners, acting on the report of their own valuer, confirmed the judicial rents in almost every case. This is a proof that Mr. Murphy's valuation was at least 30 per cent. too high; but it is a fact that in Glenshull the tenants were willing to settle if they could get 10 per cent. more than Mr. Murphy recommended. Was there ever a better case for arbitration than this? But we are told that arbitration has failed. For myself, I have only been connected with one arbitration, and that was on the Pollock estate. In that arbitration we appointed an umpire, but the services of that umpire were never required, because the gentleman who acted for the landlords and myself on behalf of the tenants had no difficulty whatever in coming to terms. The result is, that the tenants are perfectly satisfied with what was done. As to the Vandeleur estate it is said that the tenants there have not paid their rents, and a sort of list of these tenants was produced. It is not the first time we have heard of these lists, which we have found to be bogus lists, because when they have been brought up before their statements have been disproved. The hon. Member for Louth and the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. J. Henniker Heaton) went over one of these lists together and found that out of 150 cases only six were genuine ones. The tenants on the Plan of Campaign estates have been alluded to as the dupes of the Plan of Campaign. ["Hear, hear!"] An hon. Member says "Hear, hear!" But I would inform that hon. Member that the Plan of Campaign has been in operation in as many as 120 different estates, and that it is still operating upon 25. What has happened to the rest? The dupes have won the victory, they have got what they could not have got but for the Plan of Campaign. That Plan of Campaign has prevented outrage and crime in Ireland. We have challenged you over and over again on this point, and you have never yet been able to produce a single case in which the Plan of Campaign has been proved to have led to outrage and crime. On the contrary, the Plan of Campaign has protected tenants in Ireland outside the Plan of Campaign estates. It is, indeed, because you know this, and because you know that you have to give way to the Plan of Campaign, that you now wish to work vengeance on those who have carried it out. We appeal now not to the Irish Members opposite, but to the English Members, who have some sense of fairness in them, to step forward and say that this farce has gone on long enough, and that the best thing for all parties is that some higher power should step in and say this must now be ended on fair terms. What is the alternative which has been offered by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General? He told us that it was important to produce an alternative, and the alternative he produced was the wise administration of just laws. This would have been a good argument if the laws had been just at the time the Plan of Campaign was put in operation. This Resolution only refers to tenants who adopted the Plan of Campaign before the end of the year 1887. Do you deny that the laws were unjust then, or that the tenants had an argument in their favour when they adopted the Plan of Campaign; and are you going to say that although they were driven to this because this House was so slow in attending to an Irish grievance, therefore these men are to continue to suffer and have no hope? Is this, I ask, a statesmanlike policy? You profess to believe in the justice of your cause, the Irish landlords profess that their brethren in Ireland have acted justly towards their tenants. Why do not you adopt with eagerness and avidity the opportunity now offered to you of establishing a Court of Arbitration, so that you may thereby show the world that the Irish landlords have justice on their side? If you refuse to adopt this proposal, if you still decline to take advantage of the opportunity it affords of a settlement with the Irish tenants, the public will form its own judgment as to the reasons by which you are actuated. I do not think they will have any difficulty in coming to a right conclusion. They will be of opinion that the real reason by which you are actuated is that you have a bad cause, and that you are well aware if the Courts of Arbitration were established they would operate to the tenants' right and to the landlords' wrong.

Mr. Mahony

Mr. Mahoney

(10.55.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The question which has most forcibly pressed itself on my attention in this Debate is why it ever came on, and under what inspiration the right hon. Gentleman who introduced it was rash enough to bring it before the attention of the House. Which of the numerous sections on that side of the House did he expect to please by his action? Was it to please hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, who initiated the Plan of Campaign by informing their dupes that it was a short, a certain and expeditious method of bringing the landlords to their knees? Was it to please them that he brought forward a Resolution which, if it means anything, means that the landlords have not been brought to their knees, and that the aid of the Government is required to carry it out? Was it to please hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway that he thought himself justified in bringing forward a Motion which, if it proves anything conclusively, proves this at all events: that there never was a feebler or a more fatuous attempt at the settlement of any great question than the attempt made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1881? The whole of his speech, and of every speech which has been delivered below the Gangway, comes, in substance, to this: that you cannot trust the Land Courts in Ireland to fix fair rents; that the method of arbitration, which, with so much pomp and circumstance, you established in 1881, has proved a total failure; and that the Legislature must again produce a second Court of Arbitration, conducted by different principles and methods of procedure, to settle the outstanding quarrels with which the settlement of 1881 has been found incapable of dealing. I am convinced that the right hon. Gentleman, whomsoever he consulted when he put his Motion on the Paper, consulted neither the hon. Member for Cork nor the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. Both those distinguished Members of this House must be perfectly well aware that nothing could be worse for the cause which they, more or less in harmony, attempt to represent in this House than to bring forward in this House a Resolution which will make plain to the English public the seamy side of one of the most contemptible methods of political agitation ever adopted, and make plain to the Irish public and tenants how illusory were the promises of support held out by the Irish agitators four years ago. I am aware that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford thinks that he has a prescriptive right to deal with this matter of the Plan of Campaign estates. He has trotted about Ireland from time to time, from one Plan of Campaign estate to another, and has from time to time written letters to the newspapers explaining his views. He has been in close and intimate relation with the leading agitators on those estates, and he thinks he has a right to lead the House in all its discussions upon this interesting and important question. But, for my own part, if I may speak very sincerely to the right hon. Gentleman, I would recommend him to leave these questions to the Irish Members. Depend upon it, these amateurs in agitation, these dabblers in disorder, do not really know how to play the game; let him leave it to those who do know how to play the game, and who are perfectly prepared on occasion to go to prison for their convictions; and let him not come down again with that curious hesitation of manner and intention which always overcomes him when he tries to explain to the House how very near he went to breaking the law, and how terribly afraid I and the Government were to prosecute him. He resembles nothing so much as a boy going to bathe in rather chilly water who sticks in a hesitating foot, and as soon as he finds the water rather cold takes it out again with a rapid and convulsive motion, and then goes home and explains that he was quite prepared to face the inclemency of the weather, but, on the whole, thought it better for his health to abstain. The right hon. Gentleman proposes a plan of compulsory arbitration in the case of certain disputes in Ireland disputes in cases as between landlord and tenant. But disputes in this country are not unknown. Disputes, as we all are aware, and as we all know with deep regret, have existed, and do exist, between classes in the industrial world in England. Why are not those settled by compulsory arbitration, if compulsory arbitration is to be the form of deciding disputes at all? Are the workmen of England less worthy of support in this House than the campaigners in Ireland? For my own part, there can be no question that of all persons who have engaged in these pursuits in any country in the world, probably those engaged in the Plan of Campaign are least deserving of special favour at the hands of this House. We know, at any rate, in regard to the disputes between capital and labour, that the persons concerned have acted within their rights, and aimed at a perfectly legal object. But that is not so with regard to the Plan of Campaign, and one of the most important parts of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was that in which he demonstrated the essential difference between a trade dispute in England and a land dispute in Ireland. What are the facts about the Plan of Campaign? The whole of the discussion to-night has been conducted upon the theory that the Plan of Campaign was a spontaneous movement on the part of the tenantry, and that it would not have been heard of if the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork in the autumn of 1886 had been accepted. That theory was first invented by the ingenious mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and it has since been repeated by almost every Member of the right hon. Gentleman's Party. I say that there never was a historic theory more absolutely devoid of the slightest trace of foundation. I will describe the Plan of Campaign in one word, by saying that it is simply a move in the Irish revolutionary movement which has been going on since 1879. After the result of the election of 1886 was known, when it became evident that the people of this country would have nothing to do with Home Rule, hon. Members from Ireland announced, and United Ireland, which then represented hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite, repeated that the time had come for instituting a new campaign against the landlords. On July 24, 1886, United Ireland said—

"Another campaign against the landlords is inevitable;"

and on July 31 —

"Landlordism may rest satisfied that within the great ambit of the Ten Commandments, and even within the less venerable precepts of the English law, the Irish people will find means of modifying the jubilation of the landlords."

But experience has shown that the gentleman who wrote that knew very little about the Ten Commandments or about English law, for every competent authority has declared that the Plan of Campaign is both inconsistent with the Ten Commandments and with every known principle of the English common law. That was before the hon. Member for Cork brought in his Bill, which has ever since been used as a stalking-horse for the legality of the Plan of Campaign. Now, let us examine how far the contention is true that the Plan of Campaign was the spontaneous action of the tenants, taken in consequence of the rejection of the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork. Has anyone taken the trouble to estimate the amount of relief that would have been given on the Plan of Campaign estates had the hon. Member's Bill become law? Sir, the relief given would have been absolutely insignificant. The Bill only applied to leaseholders and tenants whose rents were judicially fixed before 1884. Now, let me remind the House that on the Ponsonby estate 190 eviction notices were served. Of the tenants concerned, only 22 would have gained anything under the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork. Out of the 114 tenants dealt with on the Coolgreany estate only 15 would have been benefited. On the Olphert estate better terms were offered than would have been given to the tenants under the hon. Member's Bill; and on the Clanricarde estate, out of 1,400 or 1,500 tenants, there were not more than 117 who would have gained one shilling had the measure become law. If, then, out of nearly 2,000 tenants on those estates, not more than 154 would have gained anything under the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork, what becomes of this flimsy pretence that the rejection of the measure was the justification of the Plan of Campaign? The contention falls to the ground. The truth is that no far-fetched explanations, no recondite investigations into the contemporary history of Ireland are required; the reason for the Plan of Campaign is found in the avowed intention of hon. Members below the Gangway opposite to make the government of Ireland impossible. They thought that to start the Plan of Campaign was a very good way of achieving their end. Could they have chosen a better method of doing that? From the beginning of the agitation in 1879 they have seen the importance of mixing up the agrarian and the political motive. Could there be a better method of doing this than by the Plan of Campaign? The objects of the Plan of Campaign are the objects which have signalized the agitation since 1879, and the methods by which it has been carried out are those which have been invariably used by the leaders of the agitation. They bribe one set of men, and they terrorise another. One hon. Gentleman, an English Member, who spoke when the House was thin, about 8 o'clock, gave his own experience of an evicted tenant in Loughrea, I think—at all events, it was on Lord Clanricarde's property—who, he said, was in a much better position two years after she had been evicted than she was before; and he told us the story with a great deal of perfectly genuine feeling, but without the slightest glimmering of the obvious inference that might be drawn from it. I have no doubt she was better off. Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway have said to the tenants, "You will make more out of the Plan of Campaign than you will ever make out of your holdings." Those people are to be better off now they have gone out of their holdings on the £2 or £3 a week given to them by the National League---

M. A. J. Balfour

MR. T. M. HEALY: Better than Consols, any way.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. T. M. HEALY: Goschens! Goschens!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: So much for the bribery; how about the intimidation? The hon. Member for Meath had the courage to tell the House that not a single crime could be alleged in connection with the Plan of Campaign. I listened to that statement with amazement. I thought my power of wonder had long been exhausted, but I have still much to learn. Why, Sir, the hon. Gentleman must know perfectly well that there is no difficulty in piling up a catalogue of offences against the law in connexion with the Plan of Campaign; and he knows perfectly well that it would be impossible to work the Plan of Campaign on any estate for six months without first bribing the tenants to come out and then terrorizing them if they attempted to go in.

MR. MAHONY: When I used the word "crime" I meant what I call real crime.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Here comes, I think, "the great ambit of the Ten Commandments." I am not going to enter into a casuistical discussion with the hon. Gentleman as to what constitutes crime and what does not; but if he thinks no crime has occurred, that is, no real crime, I presume an attempt to blow up a sergeant of police and a large body of innocent gentlemen is not to be counted a real crime. I do not think any other interpreter of the Ten Commandments will take the same view. Is it not notorious, not to go into the details of the various crimes, how tenants on all estates have come by night to pay their rents, and have implored the agent or the landlord who received their money to keep that fact secret, as if it were the most disgraceful incident of their lives? Is it not true that, when the least sign of giving way on the part of the tenants was visible, some hon. Member below the gangway, the hon. Member for Mayo perhaps, or some other person, promptly rushed down and made a vehement speech against a settlement? These gentlemen want arbitration now.

DR. TANNER: I rise to order, Sir. The hon. Member for Mayo, Sir, has been described as a person by the Chief Secretary.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must ask the hon. Member not to interrupt.

DR. TANNER (pointing to the Chief Secretary): Treat that man there the same.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Some Member immediately went down and did his best, not merely by persuasion, but by violent speeches, to keep the yielding phalanx in line, and to prevent those who had already discovered their mistake from settling with their landlords, and from doing that which he and other Members below the Gangway described as betraying the Irish race. The evidence that this Plan of Campaign is in no sense the spontaneous action of an over-rented and over-tasked tenantry, but is simply a move in a political game, of which the tenants are at once the instruments and the victims, is manifest from every particular connected with the progress of events. This is evidenced by the fact I have just alluded to. It is evidenced by the enormous sacrifices made under threats, as in the case of the unfortunate Duggan at Tipperary. It is manifest from the fact that the Plan of Campaign has always arisen from the Land League organisation, which is essentially a political organisation. That organisation always started and maintained it, and by it the tenants are now kept alive, so far as they are kept alive. It is evidenced by the fact that it is not left to the tenants themselves to determine whether they shall or shall not continue the fight—that some politician thinks it necessary to interfere as soon as the tenants give the least indication of a desire for settlement. It is shown, if further proof is required, by the fact that wherever you find a body of Protestant tenantry, though subjected to precisely the same economic conditions as the others, they have invariably refused to join the Plan of Campaign; and if that is not enough it is proved by the fact, the curious fact, that on the Clanricarde estate there is a small portion of the property where the population is entirely Irish-speaking, and where, therefore, the Irish patriots, as they do not know Irish, have had no power, and through all the trouble that there has been on the Clanricarde estate I believe that these, the highest rented tenants, have paid their rents in contentment from year to year. We are told that the landlords have shown I do not know what kind of malign and stupid obstinacy by not giving a reduction to their tenants, yet I believe that on the Clanricarde estate there were practically no arrears to speak of at the time the Plan of Campaign was started. Every one of those tenants could have gone into the Land Court, yet not a single one did so, and then you come to us and ask for arbitration. Was ever so flimsy a case put before the House of Commons? Parliament spent the whole Session of 1881 in passing a Land Bill fixing fair rents.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Who moved to omit the fair rent clause ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I am not going to praise that Land Bill, but it was the glory of every Liberal statesman and of every Radical politician. Hon. Members below the Gangway quarrelled with hon. Members above as to who were deserving of the greatest credit for passing it. Yet when 1886 comes round we find in regard to an estate where not a single tenant had gone into Court—for the talk about the fall of prices was merely an excuse—hon. Members opposite rather than go to the Land Court started the Plan of Campaign, and asked for exorbitant reductions; and yet they asked the House to believe that this was the result of spontaneous combination on the part of the tenants, and not a political move on the part of political revolutionists. Now, in the speeches we have heard to-night there appears to me to reign considerable obscurity of ideas upon what are called the rights of the tenants. The right hon. Gentleman who opened the discussion—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Central Bradford—told us that it was the opinion of the tenants, and that he agreed with that opinion, that it was a matter of right on their part to get a reduction of rent. The question of liability is one thing, and the question of right is another. I conceive that the legislation of 1870 and 1881 meant, if it meant anything, that the tenant, whatever else he had a right to, had no right to get a reduction of rent; but that every single tenant in Ireland, other than the leaseholders, who are a small number, either had a judicial rent which he was bound to pay and had no right to get reduced, or had a non-judicial rent which he could have taken into Court and got reduced. It is preposterous, therefore, to say that the Land Act of 1881 gave the tenant a right to some kind of reduction outside the operation of that Act. That is not so. I am aware that hon. Gentlemen opposite have, on this occasion, as on previous occasions, told us that, because we passed the Act of 1887 giving a reduction of judicial rents in certain circumstances, we have no right to say that judicial rents should be adhered to. But I differ from that entirely. The Parliament of 1881, acting under the advice of hon. Gentlemen who sit opposite, and to whom it never appeared to occur that prices might vary, passed a Land Act which fixed judicial rents for 15 years, and every Irish landlord was told that as he was unworthy to exercise it, henceforth the function of fixing rent would be transferred from him to a Court. The system broke down in practice, and Parliament had to interfere—I will not say to put the system right, for that was impossible—but to patch it up in a kind of way; but what right, I may ask, had the Irish tenant outside the action of Parliament to claim that the landlord was to do the very thing which Parliament told him he was not to do, and was not worthy of doing? The whole contention is preposterous. I admit that had I been an Irish landlord, and a landlord had asked my advice in the matter, I might have said to him, "It is a serious misfortune for you to have lived at a time when a Liberal Government passed such an Act. It is an extremely foolish Act: it does not settle the Irish question, but that is not your fault. Parliament says you are not to fix your own rents, and I advise you to go beyond the advice of Parliament, and to do that which you would have done had Parliament never interfered between you and your tenants." But that would be a very different thing to coming into this House and saying that the Irish tenant had a right to demand something other than the Land Courts gave him, and that if it was not immediately granted by the landlord an illegal conspiracy would be started. I will now endeavour to bring my observations to a close; but I cannot leave the subject without expressing my indignation at the sort of language which the right hon. Member for Central Bradford, and those who have supported him, have thought fit to use against the landlords against whom the Plan of Campaign has been directed. I do not doubt that there are bad landlords in Ireland: nay, I am certain that there are. When you have to deal with such a large class of men you are certain to meet some stupid, some criminal, and many injudicious men among them. But the particular landlords whose estates have been the subject of Debate are certainly not men who deserve to be attacked as they have been to-night. Even in regard to the hon. Member for South Hunts the right hon. Gentleman was obliged to admit that the terms he offered were fair and generous, and he only found a ground for attacking him by misrepresenting the facts of the case; because, if I recollect rightly, the evicted tenants were included in the generous offer he made only a little more than a fortnight after the offer of the original terms. That is not denied.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I stated that.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But the right hon. Gentleman did not give the date. There was one other point on which the right hon. Gentleman attacked my hon. Friend. He said that under the terms offered the evicted tenants were obliged to pay rent for all the time they were out of their farms. That is not so. They had to pay certain costs, no doubt; but as far as my information goes they had not to pay rent during the time stated. In my opinion, a more ungenerous statement than that could not be made. Mr. Olphert is a man very advanced in years. He lived, not merely on friendly, but on intimate terms with his tenants, until the right hon. Gentleman, and men like him, interfered between them. If the right hon. Gentleman is spared to a grateful country, as I hope he may be, until he reaches the same age as Mr. Olphert, I hope he may be able to look back upon a life as well spent. With regard to Lord Clanricarde, the other person who has been attacked, it is not my business to defend or to criticise him. I have listened to the criticisms passed on him to-night, but I have been unable—it may have been my stupidity—to extract from these criticisms anything beyond this—that Lord Clanricarde is an absentee, that he shows not the slightest interest in or care for his property, that he has left the whole thing to look after itself, that he has never spent sixpence upon it, and that he absolutely ignores the representations made to him by his tenants and by other persons on their behalf. I do not say that is not a heavy catalogue of offences, but it is not a catalogue of offences justifying the Plan of Campaign. As far as any evidence has come before me, Lord Clanricarde's rents were not excessive rents, and it has been admitted by the most fanatical admirers of the Plan of Campaign that nothing but excessive rents will justify it.

Either Lord Clanricarde's rents were excessive or they were not. If they were not, what justification is there for the Plan of Campaign being started on this estate? If they were excessive, why did not the tenants appeal to the Land Court before they joined it? That is not, indeed, a justification for all Lord Clanricarde thought fit to do, but it is an absolute and conclusive proof, until a refutation is given to it, that those who started the Plan of Campaign on that estate are a thousand times worse than Lord Clanricarde himself. The right hon. Gentleman suggests arbitration. I think I have disposed of that. Then he says I should inform those landlords who fail to make peace with their tenants that they shall neither have justice in the Courts nor protection out of them. He asks me to summon to Dublin Castle these recalcitrant landlords. I do not know that they would come, but if they did I do not pretend to possess the commanding personality of the right hon. Gentleman, and I do not know that I could persuade those landlords who have been the victims of this criminal and perfectly unjustifiable conspiracy to make peace with their adversary and give him all that he asks for. But supposing that arbitration were adopted, what reference should be given to the arbitrators? Observe what happened on these estates. The Plan of Campaign was started at the end of 1886—or that was the period of its early honeymoon. It was then believed in by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Since then no rent has been paid at all. Where the tenants have not been evicted there is a heavy accumulation of arrears. It is probable—I am afraid it is pretty certain—that, as a matter of fact, the tenants have got rid of the arrears and have not in most cases banked them. What is the arbitrator to do in such cases? If he wipes out the arrears he is not acting on principles of equity, because, even on the principle of gentlemen below the Gangway, the landlord is, at any rate, entitled to the whole of the arrears minus what would have been a fair reduction. Practically, it may be said he is entitled to three-quarters of the arrears. But if the arbitrator orders payment of the arrears, where are they to come from? For these arrears hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway are responsible; but if the arbitrator were to give an award against them, I do not know that there is any Court of Law which could enforce it. But, even supposing these difficulties got over, have we any reason for supposing that other difficulties could be settled? I think it will be admitted that you cannot ask any landlord to accept a settlement which would by many be regarded as a triumph for the Plan of Campaign, and which would be in effect a stimulus for the same ingenious scheme being started on his neighbour's property. The hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon), after the arbitration on the Vandeleur estate, announced it as the greatest triumph of the Plan of Campaign. But has the arbitration on that estate succeeded? In his most powerful speech the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) elaborated and conclusively proved that arbitration where it has been tried has not succeeded. How stands the case with regard to the Vandeleur Estate? The first instalment under the award of the arbitrator was to be paid on October 25, 1889; 255 tenants paid, and 14 failed to do so. The second instalment was due in April, 1890; 237 paid and 32 failed. The third instalment became due in September, 1890; 160 paid and 109 failed. The fourth instalment became due at the end of the year, and 20 tenants have paid it, while 249 have failed. Such are the figures. Yet the arbitration, on the evidence of my hon. Friend below the Gangway, was all in favour of the tenants; and the arbitrator was a gentleman whose ability we all acknowledge, though he is a strong politician. In this case there is a gradual increase from half-year to half-year in the number of defaulters. It appears to me that if anything were required to show the absurdity of a proposition whose absurdity is evident on the face of it, this experience would afford it. If I am asked what course ought to be pursued my answer is this: Some hon. Members have accused me of desiring to prolong these disputes, but no man in this country has a stronger personal or public interest than I have in seeing every dispute in Ireland settled. Every consideration, public and private, every consideration derived from personal credit or from public credit, would induce me to desire to see these unhappy controversies once for all wiped out. But I would never counsel any landlord in Ireland to submit to the Plan of Campaign. If I were an Irish landlord I would beg my bread before I gave in to the Plan of Campaign.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

DR. TANNER here uttered some words which were understood to be: The galloping snob. [Cries of "Order!" and "Name!"]

DR. TANNER: Mr. Speaker, I made a mistake, and withdraw unequivocally.

*MR. SPEAKER: Yes; but the hon. Gentleman has repeatedly interrupted. I warn the hon. Gentleman that if he interrupts the proceedings again it will be my duty to put into operation the Standing Order.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: When I was interrupted I was stating to the House what is the fact—that if I were an Irish landlord I would beg my bread rather than give in to the Plan of Campaign, and I would beg my bread rather than let any other landlord give in for want of support. But when once the illegal conspiracy came to an end I should remember that, after all, these men were acted upon by those in whose advice they thought they could trust. I should remember that they were compelled by intimidation in many cases to follow courses which they bitterly regretted; and, for my own part, even if it were not wholly to my own personal and pecuniary interest, I should desire to restore peace to that part of the country in which my property was situated, and to see that on fair and equitable, and even generous, terms the tenants were restored to their ancient homes. These are the principles on which I should act. But to ask us to have compulsory arbitration or legalised arbitration in these cases—to ask us, in other words, to bolster up the tottering Plan—is surely in the highest degree absurd; and I am certain that, if we were insane enough to propose such a course, the House of Commons would not be insane enough to adopt it.

*(11.44.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The right hon. Gentleman, in the last sentence of his very vigorous speech, interspersed, with some other words that were not so kind, some very kindly words towards the tenants. He said he hopes the day may come when he may remember that these men were, as he says, misled, and when he may do something to reinstate them in their position, and that, I think he said, would be one of the happiest moments of his life.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said if I were an Irish landlord.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I am quite certain that an Irish administrator cannot have less kindly feeling towards the Irish people than an Irish landlord ought to have. Well, Sir, when that day does come it will be too late, because these tenants will have finally and for ever lost their status as Irish farmers. The right hon. Gentleman attacked my right hon. Friend (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) with great severity; but I do not think he will persuade the people of Ireland that the Member for Bradford is not a true and disinterested friend, according to his lights—[ironical cheers and laughter—and these lights are bright lights—not only to the Irish tenants, but to Ireland, and to the cause of order in that country. The right hon. Gentleman attempted to induce the House to believe that my right hon. Friend was actuated not only by political motives but by motives of personal ambition in taking the course he has taken to-night; but those who listened to my right hon. Friend's speech, and who read his Amendment, will see that it is not a political question which he has brought before the House of Commons, but purely an administrative question, and I think it should have received a more favourable, and I venture to say a more courteous, handling from the chief administrator of Ireland in this House. We are not here to attack or to defend the Plan of Campaign. Many gentlemen opposite have spoken of this Amendment as a confession that the Plan of Campaign has failed. I will not say whether it is a confession or not, but I do say it is an endeavour to effect a practical solution of a great difficulty, which cannot be solved by any machinery at present before us. The right hon. Gentleman said he would not counsel anyone to do anything that would give recognition to the Plan of Campaign. There have been 100 or 120 cases of the Plan of Campaign. Out of them all but some very few have been brought to a pacific solution, and if the landlords of Ireland had obeyed the advice of the right hon. Gentleman he would have had on his hands, not only these three or four estates now remaining, but 100 or 120 cases, and his position as the administrator of Ireland would have been a painful one indeed. They are now reduced to some three or four estates, and we ask the Government to re-consider its position in this matter. It is the absolute duty of the Government of Ireland to bring about a pacific settlement, and how does the right hon. Gentleman propose to bring it about? I listened very carefully to the speeches of the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General for Ireland, and the only remedy which was put forward was the just and quiet administration of the existing law. That law, the Attorney General remarked, was more favourable to the tenant than the land law in any other country. I will not stop to dispute that contention; I will grant that it is a very favourable law. But what use is there in referring us to this law in regard to the tenants on the Plan of Campaign estates? There is not one tenant on any one of these estates who is in a position to appeal to that law. He has lost his status, and he cannot get it back except by the good favour of the landlord, or without some such amendment of the law as that proposed by my right hon. Friend. What chance is there of the tenant recovering his status by favour of the landlord? There is one great district in Ireland—not as the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) said, in a moment of inadvertence, 10 square miles in extent, but something like 10 miles square—which is under Lord Clanricarde. It is not my business to attack Lord Clanricarde, and I am glad it is not my business to defend him. I will just read to the House the conditions which Lord Clanricarde lays down to the inhabitants of this immense tract of country before they can recover their status—

"Any tenant who would be restored will be liable for all costs and arrears, even for those which accrued while he was not in possession of his farm. In the case of the restoration of evicted tenants, I would at once require payment of three years' rent and costs. In any case, I would not restore the tenants, generally speaking. Each case would be considered with regard to its own merits. The tenants in present possession can have the same terms on paying at once three years' rent and costs. No costs, under any circumstances, will be remitted, and no reduction, under any circumstances, will be made in judicial rents. But on non-judicial rents reductions of 10 per cent. will be made on all payments made."

Now, I ask any hon. Member opposite not whether these tenants deserve to pay this enormous fine; but whether there is the least chance of their being able to pay it? There is none at all. And, as is the case of Lord Clanricarde's estate, so are practically, with less fault on the part of the landlords, all the other estates concerned with the Amendment. My right hon. Friend shows you a better way. He asks the Government to do what the Chief Secretary rightly describes as placing an arbitration on the top of an arbitration. Is there any harm in that in Ireland? In 1887 the Government had an arbitration on the top of an arbitration. Again, the leaseholders were admitted to the advantages of the Act in 1881, and everyone knows that if bad times come again in Ireland, you must have, in some way or other, another arbitration on the top of an arbitration. Now, here are some three or four arbitrations proposed which would settle this great and outstanding controversy in its present phase, and perhaps another one would not occur for a long time. But the right hon. Gentleman says, "Ah, but you cannot trust the tenants to keep to the result of the arbitration." I think too much stress has been laid upon the transactions with regard to the Vandeleur estate. It is quite true that, as time goes on, there are tenants who fall behind in their payments. But consider the character of those payments. There were the accumulated rents of something like two and a half years, to be paid within a very short time. The question is, was the non-payment contumacious or not? I do not gather that anyone has genuine evidence that it was; and we, on the other hand, have good evidence to the effect that the tenants have been trying to pay, have been selling cattle to pay, and have been borrowing to pay. We know that there has been a bad potato crop, and that some of the tenants are now behind. But as far as rebellion against the law is concerned, that is over, and I do not think the right hon. Gentleman, or the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), denies that what is going on at present is not a contumacious and illegal refusal of rents. I have just had a telegram put into my hand, stating that, in the case of the arbitration at Gweedore, everything has been paid to the very last farthing. On the whole, these arbitrations have been most successful. But the Government would enjoy advantages which private arbitrators do not possess. They would be able to feel the pulse of the district to which they went, and to judge whether an arbitration would be favourable in that district. I will conclude by saying this to the Irish landlords: If you do think that the Plan of Campaign has not yet been defeated, and you do not agree with this Amendment, and endeavour to clear away all that remains of this wretched quarrel, you will be doing something that is unwise. But if you think the Plan has been defeated, then you will be doing something both ungracious and unwise in not agreeing to this proposal. To the Government I say this: Seeing that Ireland is, in their opinion, quieting down, let them remove the last relics of agrarian disorder by accepting this Amendment.

Sir G. Trevelyan

(11.59.) The House divided:—Ayes 213; Noes 152.—(Div. List, No. 25.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY—Committee upon Monday next.

MOTION.

LICENSING (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. T. M. Healy, Bill to amend the Licensing (Ireland) Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Flynn, Mr. Peter McDonald, and Mr. Cox.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 180.]

PURCHASE OF LAND, &c. (IRELAND) BILL, 1890-91 (SINKING FUNDS.)

Copy ordered—

"Of Return showing the operation of Sinking Funds on first Advances and additional Advances under the Purchase of Land, &c. (Ireland) Bill, 1890-91."—(Mr. Jackson.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 65.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 2nd February, 1891.

SAT FIRST.

The Lord Cottesloe, after the death of his father.

ARABI PASHA.

QUESTIONS—OBSERVATIONS.

*EARL DE LA WARR: My Lords, I wish to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they are in possession of information relative to the state of health of Arabi Pasha in Ceylon; and, if so, whether they will lay that information upon the Table of the House? I am induced to ask this question in consequence of reports which have reached this country, and which I believe from private information to be correct, that Arabi Pasha is suffering greatly from the effects of the climate of Ceylon. It will be in the recollection of your Lordships that Arabi was banished to Ceylon for the crime—if it can be called a crime—of fighting for the independence of his country; and I hope to hear from the Government that they consider that the so-called crime has been now atoned for, and that the aged Egyptian exile may be allowed to end his days in his own country and among his own people.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, the question of the noble Earl raises somewhat extensive speculations on the subject of political ethics. We have heard a great deal lately about the difference between political and ordinary offences; but I never expected to hear the distinction strained so far as to make Arabi Pasha an innocent man. The crime for which he was tried, and for which he was condemned to death, was not that of fighting for his country, but that of rebelling, he being a soldier, against his Sovereign. He was condemned for military mutiny, and if he had been a less distinguished person he would undoubtedly have been shot. The Government of that day, for reasons which I will not in the least contest, which I have no doubt they considered sufficient, thought it desirable to press on the Egyptian Government that the sentence should be commuted, and the sentence was commuted to perpetual banishment. I do not in the least impugn the wisdom or discretion of their action; but I cannot admit that Arabi Pasha is, among the other offenders, entitled to the very special sympathy which my noble Friend has assigned to him. But I quite agree that the banishment should be simply banishment; that it ought not to be banishment to a climate which would seriously endanger the offender's health. That was not in the terms of the original sentence. When, therefore, it was shown to the Egyptian Government that there were persons who believed that the health of Arabi Pasha and of some of his companions was being seriously affected by their residence in Ceylon a medical inquiry was ordered to be held. A Medical Board was appointed last autumn to examine and inquire into the statement. They did examine, and their Report was that the climate of Ceylon had exercised no injurious effect upon the health of the banished persons. In these circumstances, it did not appear necessary to Her Majesty's Government to urge the Egyptian Government to make any change in the policy they were pursuing. The particular document in which the opinion of the Medical Board is recorded is not, I think, in this country. I think it was sent to Egypt, and is there now; but I will inquire of Sir Evelyn Baring whether there would be any difficulty in producing it; and, unless I hear that there are reasons which I do not expect to hear, I should be very happy to lay it on the Table of the House.

*EARL DE LA WARR: May I ask the noble Marquess what was the date of that Report?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It was made last autumn; but I cannot give the precise date.

THE PLEURO-PNEUMONIA ORDER.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY, in rising to ask the Lord Privy Seal whether the Board of Agriculture would grant special licences, after full inquiry, to pedigree cattle entered for the approaching spring sales at Perth, Inverness, and elsewhere, although such cattle may be located in counties now scheduled under the "Pleuro-pneumonia Order," said: My Lords, the breeders of pedigree cattle throughout the country are very seriously inconvenienced by the scheduling of whole counties under the Pleuro-pneumonia Order, and the question which I have to put to my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal is, whether certificates could not be granted for those cattle to attend the Spring Sales? I may explain, in a few words, the reason for this demand. The breeders rely upon these Spring Sales for getting rid of their animals. Unless breeders are able to send them to the annual sales throughout the country, which are looked forward to for that purpose, breeders are unable to sell the animals they have bred, and the loss thereby caused to them is considerable. I do not wish it to be considered that I put this question in any way antagonistic to the Board of Agriculture, who, I am sure it will be recognised, are taking very vigorous means for stamping out pleuro-pneumonia; but it is known that among these pedigree herds there has been no case of pleuro-pneumonia, and that it is very unjust, therefore, to include them in the scheduling of counties. If proper inquiry is made they might, with perfect safety, be brought to these sales, and transmitted under certificates to any place to those persons who have purchased them. This assists both ways, because not only would bulls entered from places which are not scheduled at auctions held in scheduled districts be allowed to be removed, but it would permit the movement of such animals within the scheduled country. I most earnestly hope that the President of the Board of Agriculture will be able to see his way to giving this relief to breeders of pedigree cattle, who will otherwise suffer serious loss. I beg to put the question which stands in my name.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): My Lords, the Board of Agriculture have carefully considered the question to which the noble Marquess has referred, but they are unable to grant the special licences for the purpose of enabling cattle in an infected district, which is scheduled under the Pleuro-pneumonia Order, to be exposed for public sale beyond the limits of such district. To concede what my noble Friend asks would be tantamount to revoking the Order for all practical purposes. The Order is essential for carrying out the Pleuro-pneumonia Act. If I understand the question of my noble Friend aright, he proposes to bring cattle to sales from all parts of the country, in several instances from parts adjacent to those where pleuro-pneumonia is already in existence.

The Marquess of Huntly

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: No; certainly not. On the contrary, I should desire to be very careful that no animals should be brought from an infected circle.

EARL CADOGAN: But, under such circumstances, it would be impossible for the Board to say that any sale could be held without risk of infection. Certificates might be asked for cattle which had been exposed to danger, though apparently healthy, and the Board would not be justified in granting licences to place outside a scheduled district cattle which had been exposed to that danger. I may mention that for purposes of breeding the Board have already indicated their willingness to give special movement orders for pedigree bulls to be transferred from one district to another, but only after special examination, and in special cases.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY: The last part of the noble Earl's answer really comprises all I ask with regard to pedigree bulls; but in the North we cannot understand what has to be done. That was the very object of my question. Perhaps the noble Earl will promise that directions or orders will be promulgated, so as to inform pedigree breeders what is required?

EARL CADOGAN: I am afraid, from information which I have received from the President of the Board of Agriculture, that I can give no promise whatever to the noble Marquess, nor can I hold out any hope to him that his request will be acceded to.

TRAMWAYS ORDER IN COUNCIL (IRELAND) (ATHENRY AND TUAM RAILWAY) BILL. (No. 19.)

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without Amendment; and to be read 3^d to-morrow.

CUSTODY OF CHILDREN BILL. (No. 18.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill I ask your Lordships' patience for a few moments while I mention a few facts in connection with the measure as it originally passed your Lordships' House and with its fate in another place. A Member of your Lordships' House, whom I regret not to see present (the Earl of Meath), originally brought the question forward; and in the address which he delivered to your Lordships upon it he established, certainly to my satisfaction, and I believe to the satisfaction of most of your Lordships, the fact that there is an evil which requires to be remedied. But it appeared to me that the remedy proposed by the noble Earl was not altogether appropriate; it appeared to me to interfere too much with, and to shake the foundations of, the right of parental control. I certainly thought that the object aimed at by the noble Lord could be met by a simpler form of procedure. On the part of the Government, I undertook to deal with the question, and I accordingly brought in a Bill which was certainly very short and simple; in fact, I believe that some of your Lordships thought that while the Bill of the noble Earl went too far, my Bill did not go far enough. The two Bills were, in the result, referred to one of the Standing Committees, and were there very fully considered. Forty-five Peers attended upon that Committee, the conditions certainly were calculated to add weight and authority to its proceedings, and there can be no doubt that the Committee were actuated by a desire to amend the law. For two days, I think, and part of a third day, the deliberations of that Committee were conducted, the matter being very freely discussed among persons representing different religious opinions, but all the Peers in attendance being desirous of amending the law in a direction which would get rid of the evils which undoubtedly exist. The result of their deliberations was a Report which was adopted unanimously, and with a slight alteration, moved by myself, lest the existing state of the law with regard to the discretion of the Court should be interfered with by the language used in the Bill, and preserving therefore the right of the Court to consider the wishes of the child itself, the Bill recommended by the Committee passed this House by the unanimous vote of your Lordships. In the House of Commons the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House, when the Bill was brought on there for consideration, had entered into an engagement with the Members of that House that contentious matters should not be introduced at that period of the Session. Although a considerable number of Members of the House of Commons were in favour of the Bill, it was felt that at that period of the Session, and after the pledge that had been given by the Government, it was impossible to proceed with it, and it was dropped. I regret that that result should have happened, and I believe that the occurrence of the intervening period has been fraught with great mischief. It is one of the results of the discussion of a subject of this kind, followed by an ineffectual attempt to legislate, that opportunity is presented to people to take advantage of the state of the law that has been disclosed. The evils disclosed were monstrous, and such as undoubtedly and urgently demanded a remedy. It was evident that the parental rights which the common law have given were being grossly abused, and in some instances for proselytizing purposes by Societies in the interests of one religion or another. It might be said for both sets of proselytizers that they endeavoured, at all events, to promote the moral and social welfare of the children whom they took into their charge; and, perhaps, it is only natural that they should desire to give to children that religious education which they believed would be of most advantage to them. But what can be said for parents who, by the hypothesis upon which alone the Bill could be applicable to them, have abandoned every parental duty, and only strive to make use of their parental rights for the purpose of extorting money from those who have rescued their children from wretchedness, and sometimes from sin and vice? Apart, however, from the proselytizing aims of any Society, there are a number of benevolent and charitable people who have no other aim than that of rescuing children from miserable surroundings, and seeing that they are properly cared for; and these people are also made the victims of abandoned parents, who have sometimes demanded to have their children given back to them for the vilest of all purposes, with the object of extorting money, or else that the parents themselves might derive pecuniary advantage from the wages that their children might be capable of earning from the training they have received. I believe that the Bill as it is now settled, moulded as it has been by the deliberations of the Committee, simply gives to the children of the poor the same kind of protection that the Court of Chancery extends to the children of the rich. It is obvious that the Bill is most urgently demanded from the facts which have been made public from time to time, and which come to me now from day to day, that efforts are being made by the most abandoned parents to resume possession of children under such circumstances that no one could say they were just either to the children or to society, or that in justice or truth such parents ought to have the power to exercise the Common Law right given them. Under these circumstances, I cannot forbear from pointing out that those who prolong the existing condition of things incur a very grave responsibility, and that they are acting contrary to the unanimous opinion of a Committee, including men of all shades of politics and of different religious beliefs. The origination of this measure cannot be attributed to one side in politics, and certainly not to one side in religion. It is a distinctly serious and an almost awful consideration that a few narrow-minded persons should, by their opposition, delay the passing of a wholesome and necessary piece of legislation. My Lords, I thought it right to make these observations, that the Bill should not pass without something being said to show the urgent need of the matter being dealt with; and I hope the Bill will now receive the unanimous approval of the other House, and that those who have obstructed it will see that by continuing to do so they will be incurring a very serious responsibility before the country in delaying a wholesome and necessary reform.

The Lord Chancellor

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD THRING: My Lords, I desire to make a few observations upon this Bill, in which I take the deepest interest. I think that the Lord Chancellor is entitled to the thanks of society for the manner in which he has taken up the Bill and pressed it upon Parliament through its several stages. I know that I am liable to be regarded as a philanthropic faddist; but I do not care about that in this instance, although I am not one of those who are in favour of benevolent legislation, or who think that people can be converted from wickedness to goodness by Act of Parliament. What I do say is this: that where there is an existing law which is shown to interfere with a course of action which is beneficial to many of Her Majesty's subjects, and to the most helpless class of Her Majesty's subjects, I trust your Lordships will not be deterred from repealing that law immediately. Now, what are the circumstances under which this Bill is brought forward? What are the cases to which it applies? It applies principally to two classes of children: the deserted children found in workhouses, and the waifs and strays, the "gutter-children," as they are often called, who may be picked up by benevolent persons in the street. What is the case with regard to the deserted workhouse children, those poor deserted workhouse children, who have never known anything but the monotonous orderly dullness of a workhouse, who have really never felt any individual existence? In every well-managed union they are put out to foster-parents under the guidance of a committee, and it was shown before a Committee upon which I had the honour of sitting, of which Lord Kimberley was Chairman, that those foster-parents are almost invariably kind to the children entrusted to them; that they usually take the greatest care of the little beings until they are able to be put to some employment; and that they look after them during their after life if not interfered with. But what usually happens is that when one of these little children who have been rescued and trained up to the age of 15 or 16 is able to earn a small wage, the parent who has never shown any care for his child demands that it shall be returned to him, and it is very often taken back to misery and ruin. Take the case of the little waifs and strays. They are taken charge of by kind and benevolent people, are clothed, maintained and educated at the expense of those people, sometimes with the knowledge and at the voluntary action of the parents, while sometimes they are children whose parents cannot be found, and who are in the position of deserted children. Here, again, the same thing happens. The time arrives when these poor children can earn wages, and they have to be delivered up again to their wretched abandoned parents under this wicked and cruel law. What possible objection can there be to repealing this law? Surely in the case of workhouse children, who have been maintained and clothed at the expense of the public, the community has a right to say the entire expenditure which has been bestowed upon them shall not be wasted, and that something shall be done to ensure that they shall be brought up in the course in which they have been educated at the expense of the State! Take, again, the case of the waifs and strays: is it right that kind and benevolent people should at the very moment when the child is in the greatest danger at the age of perhaps 15 be deprived of the control over that child? Is that right or just, or for the benefit of the community? From all we can learn from a book by Mr. Booth—not General Booth's Darkest England—but a book upon the condition of the East End of London, it seems that often the only hope of saving the children is to take them away and keep them from their parents, and to bring them up under ordinarily good conditions. The money and the effort that has been expended upon a child in so far helping to make it a useful member of society should not be thrown away by restoring the child to the custody of those from whose cruelty, neglect, and bad example it has been rescued. Is it the object or intention of the law that these poor children should be handed over to degradation and ruin? Surely not. What possible harm can be done by preventing it? I have been told that the measure is an attack upon the home, and upon parental control. The "home," forsooth! What has been the home of these children of the workhouse? How can that home possibly be invaded? What has been the home of the waifs and strays? The streets. Are the streets a home to which we are bound to pay any regard? It is idle to talk of the parents' "home" when the only home of these rescued waifs and strays has been the streets. Then, again, with respect to parental control. I have heard one individual talk of the desecration of the Fifth Commandment. Is there any command, divine or human, which lays an obligation upon any one, even upon these poor children, to honour and obey their drunken and profligate parents, who have never discharged anyone of the duties of parents? Then the last argument I have heard is that with regard to religion as it is called. Really I think it is a mere mockery to say that any religious differences should be allowed to interfere with the saving of these poor children. Is is not better that a child should be brought by even the most bigoted sect that can be found in England, but in morality and decency than that it should be allowed to be placed in surroundings of immorality and indecency? But even if there were a chance of the father's religion being disregarded, or if it is necessary that in such cases the father's inalienable right, as they call it, to have his child educated in a particular religion, should be maintained with so much strictness, all I can say is that the Bill safeguards it, and provides that the duty shall be imposed of seeing that the child shall be brought up in the religion which its parent may require it should be brought up in. I do not pretend to say that this Bill is a great or comprehensive or heroic measure, but it is a measure which, as the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has said, is most urgently needed. It is a Bill which will give heart to those benevolent persons of whom everybody has heard, whom those who sat upon the Sweating Commission or the Poor Law Commission know, and to those societies of good and kind people who are working obscurely yet earnestly and diligently, who give their time, their money, and their thoughts, throughout the length and breadth of this land, in reclaiming the abandoned children of the poor. I say it is a Bill which cannot do harm; that it is a measure which must do much good; and I trust your Lordships will give such an assent to it that in the other House of Parliament it will meet with that attention which I am sorry to say it did not receive during last Session.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I should like to say a word or two to add my hearty support to the measure which has been introduced by my noble and learned Friend. It is difficult to see how there can be any controversy as to the principle underlying this legislation. It assumes, what surely is known to be the fact, that a parent may so conduct himself towards his child as to shock all right feeling. When a parent has abandoned or deserted his child, has cared nothing for it, and has left it to be cared for by others, it is outrageous that he should be allowed to go before a Court and say, "Although I have neglected every duty which I owed to my child, and although to deliver it up to me now will be most disastrous to the child, still I have a legal right to the custody of the child, that custody I will have, and you must give it to me." Can anyone maintain such a proposition thus barely stated, and say that ought to be law? All that this legislation proposes to do is that, where the Court is satisfied that a parent has so behaved as to disentitle him to the custody of the child, it shall have power to refuse its aid to procure the delivery of that child back to the parent. The only objection which I have heard raised is that which arises out of what is sometimes called the religious difficulty. I believe that this difficulty may be greatly exaggerated; and it seems to me absurd to suppose that your Lordships cannot so safeguard this legislation as to meet that difficulty, and yet carry out this beneficial change in the law. I do not believe that, on account of the religious difficulty which may arise in one case out of a vast number of instances, your Lordships will leave the children unprotected, and compel the Courts to deliver them up to parents who ought not to have the custody of them. That is a proposition which surely, it seems to me, it is difficult to insist upon. If the present safeguard in the Bill is not sufficient, suggest additional safeguards; but I would call the attention of those who are pressed with this difficulty to the fact that this religious question was very fully discussed in the Standing Committee of your Lordships' House, and that the provisions of the Bill as they now stand were inserted on account of that difficulty, and met with the full assent and approval of those who were pressed by that difficulty, and who urged it upon the Committee. As that difficulty—the only difficulty, as it seems to me—has been met, I can see no reason why the Bill should not speedily become law. Again I say, if the present provisions and safeguards are not sufficient, in the opinion of any of your Lordships, to meet what is called the religious difficulty, by all means amend them; but do not let that objection stand in the way. Those who, on account of this difficulty, delay or render impossible this beneficial legislation, will, in my opinion, take upon themselves an enormous responsibility, and I would only add that the very religion whose name they invoke imposes upon them the highest possible duty of suggesting provisions which may be deemed sufficient.

Lord Thring

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Since I addressed your Lordships just now, several cases have been put into my hands which have occurred recently, and which my noble Friend is anxious should be quoted. I do not know that I need read the particulars of them, but in each case the child who had begun to support itself in respectability and with intelligence had been taken from the place where it had established itself. In the last case—I think I had better quote more of the particulars, taking one example out of many—a father had deserted his six children. He was sent to prison, and when the man came out he began to live with another woman. The father brought back two girls, of 12 and 14 years of age, to live with this woman, whom he had taken instead of his wife, and to look after their illegitimate children.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned at five minutes past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 2nd February, 1891.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS.

ENDOWED CHARITIES (CUMBERLAND).

Return ordered—

"Of the Digest of Endowed Charities in the County of Cumberland, the particulars of which are recorded in the books of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, but are not recorded in the General Digest of Endowed Charities in that county, 1864-5 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 433 (17), of Session 1863)."—(Mr. James William Lowther.)

ENDOWED CHARITIES (DERBY).

Return ordered—

"Of the Digest of Endowed Charities in the County of Derby, the particulars of which are recorded in the books of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, but are not recorded in the General Digest of Endowed Charities in that county, 1869-70 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 25, of Session 1873)."—(Mr. James William Lowther.)

ENDOWED CHARITIES (NORTHAMPTON).

Return ordered—

"Of the Digest of Endowed Charities in the County of Northampton, the particulars of which are recorded in the books of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, but are not recorded in the General Digest of Endowed Charities in that county, 1870-2 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 25 (1) of Session 1873)."—(Mr. James William Lowther.)

ENDOWED CHARITIES (SURREY).

Return ordered—

"Of the Digest of Endowed Charities in the County of Surrey, the particulars of which are recorded in the books of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales, but are not recorded in the General Digest of Endowed Charities in that county, 1861-3 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 433 (14), of Session 1863)."—(Mr. James William Lowther.)

EAST INDIA (SCARCITY IN KUMAON AND GARHWAL).

Address for—

"Copies of, or extracts from, Correspondence relating to the scarcity which prevailed in the Kumaon and Garwhal districts of the North-Western Provinces in 1890."—(Mr. Howorth.)

QUESTIONS.

SCOTCH SALMON FISHERY RIGHTS.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that much dissatisfaction prevails in Scotland in consequence of the alienations in recent years of the Crown rights to salmon fishings in Scotland; and whether he is now in a position to state the intention of Government in reference to the Report and Recommendations of the Committee appointed to inquire into these Crown rights?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am not aware that much dissatisfaction prevails in Scotland in consequence of the alienations in recent years of the Crown's rights to salmon fishings in Scotland. The evidence given before the Commissioners does not disclose the prevalence of dissatisfaction on this subject, and the Commissioners report that—

"The Commissioners of Woods and Forests have acted judiciously in disposing by sale of some of the fishings of which they had previously ascertained the average value by letting under tender; and that in their opinion no injury was done to the public in disposing of what is not a property held in trust by the Crown for the public, but part of the patrimonium of the Crown, to the owners of lands ex adverso the fishings."

In reply to the second paragraph, Her Majesty's Government have not had the opportunity of considering the question in conjunction with the Secretary for Scotland owing to his Lordship's illness; but I may point out that, as regards the recommendations relating exclusively to Crown fishings, the Committee were not unanimous, and that one out of the three members of the Committee expressed himself as decidedly opposed to any exceptional treatment of Crown fishings—an opinion in which he is supported by a considerable number of witnesses who appeared before the Committee, and by several of the District Fishery Boards, who have since memorialised the Government on the subject. The recommendations of the Committee as to enforcing the removal of illegal fixed engines and the removal of natural obstructions which impede the passage of salmon to the spawning grounds are clearly desirable in the interest of the public at large; and, when an opportunity occurs for introducing a Bill to amend the Scotch Salmon Fishery Acts, these recommendations will not be lost sight of.

ELECTORS IN THE SCOTCH CROFTER COUNTIES.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, if moved for, he will grant a Return, limited to the Crofting Counties of Scotland, showing, first, the number of Parliamentary electors in each parish; and, second, the number of electors in each parish entitled to vote in the election of School Boards?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I see no difficulty in the way of giving a Return of the Parliamentary electors in each of the parishes referred to. In regard to the Return of School Board electors, a separate roll of such electors is not always necessary in small parishes; and so far as possible, in order to save expense, the drawing up of such a roll, even where necessary, is postponed until it is certain that the election will be contested. Where such a separate roll is drawn up, it may be done either by the assessor or by the School Board officials. I shall, however, be glad to give a Return in those cases where the separate roll has been actually drawn up. This could not, however, be done until the elections have taken place.

H.M.S. SANS PAREIL—THE 110-TON GUN.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is correct that, when under trial, one of the 110-ton guns of the Sans Pareil was hopelessly disabled, after firing the third round with reduced charges; if so, can he state the cause; and whether, seeing that other similar big guns on the Victoria and Benbow have proved failures, it is intended to abandon guns of this calibre, or replace them with Krupp guns similar in type to those supplied to the Italian Government, and which have already stood a test of 200 rounds without the slightest indication of any defect whatever?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): It is not true that one of the 110-ton guns of the Sans Pareil was hopelessly disabled after firing the third round with reduced charges, as the gun has since fired six rounds with maximum service charges. The gun in question is still under proof, and has not been as yet accepted into the Service. The other guns of this calibre in the Victoria and Benbow have not proved failures, and it is not intended to abandon guns of this calibre, or replace them with Krupp guns similar in type in the three ships in which these guns are mounted. The information which has reached me gives a very different account of the performance of the Krupp gun to the statement of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Jackson

ITINERANT MUSICIANS.

MR. JACOBY (Derbyshire, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he would take into consideration the advisability of requiring all itinerant musicians to take out licences, such licences to be subject to endorsement by Superintendents of Police in respect of any breach of any bye-laws or regulations affecting such street musicians?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's Hanover Square): I would remind the hon. Member that it is not really the function of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to impose taxes for social purposes; taxes are imposed only for the purposes of raising revenue. If it be desirable for police purposes that licences should be taken out by the people alluded to—who, although I daresay they inflict excruciating torture upon some persons, yet to other persons do afford a limited amount of enjoyment—it would be for the Home Office, and not for the Exchequer, to move in the matter.

THE VALUATION (METROPOLIS) ACT.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that no less than 567 appeals under "The Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869," are entered for trial at the approaching Quarter Sessions for the County of London, 18 of which are appeals by the London County Council, one being a test case involving the rating of some 4,000 hereditaments, and that the trial of the said appeals, which, under Section 42, Sub-section (13), of the Act must be determined before the ensuing 31st of March, now devolves, by the Local Government Act, upon Sir P. Edlin, the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions for the County of London; whether he is aware that the London County Council have refused to increase the salary of Sir P. Edlin, although the criminal business of the Quarter Sessions has, by the Local Government Act, been increased by one-third, and the trial of all assessment appeals transferred to it; whether, having regard to the enormous importance to the ratepayers of London of the re-assessment of the Metropolis, he will take steps to re-constitute the old Court of Assessment Sessions, and charge the salary of the Chairman of the same upon the Consolidated Fund, and thus make him completely independent of the London County Council, whose appeals he is required to adjudicate upon; and whether, having regard to the action of the London County Council, he will advise that the salary attaching to the office of Chairman of Quarter Sessions of London shall be supplemented, on public grounds, from the Consolidated Fund, as was the case prior to the passing of the Local Government Act?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): By the Local Government Act the trial of the appeals referred to devolves upon the Quarter Sessions of the County of London, and can take place before the Chairman or before his deputies. The old Court of General Assessment Sessions could not be re-constituted without an Act of Parliament; and its revival, if possible, would not be expedient. I am aware that, although Sir P. Edlin's duties have been largely increased by the Local Government Act, there has been at present no increase made in his salary. I am not prepared to act on the suggestion in the last paragraph. It is hardly accurate to say that before the Local Government Act Sir P. Edlin's salary was supplemented out of the Consolidated Fund. He had a fixed salary, of which one-half was charged on the Consolidated Fund and one-half on the County Rate. Parliament decided by the Local Government Act that the whole of the salary shall be paid out of the County Fund.

ARMY PENSIONS—CASE OF J. HIGHAM.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state why a pension is refused in the case of John Higham, who enlisted in the Royal Horse Guards at Regent's Park Barracks in 1848, aged 19 years; served 12 years and 19 days; was willing to re-enlist, but was refused on account of bodily injury; and left with a good conduct badge; and whether similar applications have been rejected in the same way without any reason being given?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): John Higham claimed his free discharge from the Army in 1860, before he had completed the minimum service required by the Regulations to qualify him for any pension. There is no record of his having been refused permission to re-enlist, nor of his having any bodily injury. Pension after so short a period of service can only be granted when a soldier is discharged for injuries received in the Service.

THE LATE DUKE OF BEDFORD.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet ascertained from the Coroner if the statement, which he furnished for the information of the House, truly represented the facts as to the inquest upon the late Duke of Bedford; whether he has been informed that, in this case, the usual practice was departed from, and that upon the notice card in the Coroner's office, which, for the information of the public and the Press, gives the dates, places, times and numbers of inquests to be held, no reference of any kind was made to the inquest in question; whether it is the custom to use a notice card until the notices extend to the bottom of the card, and if in this case the notice card, although not filled up with notices, was removed on the afternoon of the day of the public announcement of the suicide, and destroyed, and another card substituted; and whether he will cause a thorough investigation to be made into all the circumstances, in order that the public may know upon what official in the Coroner's office the blame rests?

MR. MATTHEWS: The question implies a charge of untruthfulness against the Coroner, which on his behalf I am bound to repudiate. The statement which he furnished truly represented the facts. The usual practice was not departed from. The card was filled in, as is customary, and the inquest in question was referred to on the card, the place and date of holding it being mentioned. The notice card never mentions the name of the deceased. It was not removed before it was filled. The hon. Member is probably not aware that by law it was absolutely in the discretion of the Coroner, if he thought proper, to hold the inquiry in private. I am not aware that any blame attaches to any official in the Coroner's office, and I should not be justified in making any further investigation of the kind suggested.

*MR. COBB: If I can prove to the right hon. Gentleman's satisfaction that the statement which the Coroner made to him for the information of the House is not true, will further inquiry be made into the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: Of course, I shall listen with the greatest attention to any proof that the hon. Member tenders to me, and I shall act upon my judgment in reference to it.

POSTAL FACILITIES.

SIR FREDERICK MAPPIN (York, W.R., Hallamshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is the practice of the Post Office authorities to deliver letters only three times a week in a parish situated six or seven miles from a town containing more than 300,000 inhabitants; and whether he will re-consider his decision declining to afford better postal facilities for the parish of Bradfield, near Sheffield, on the ground that the cost would exceed the revenue derived from the letters delivered?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that it is the general practice of the Department to provide for an official delivery of letters six days a week in rural districts wherever the number of letters to be delivered warrants the cost. In some cases, where the houses are very scattered and the letters few, the delivery is restricted to three days a week, and the district referred to in the question is one of these. The expense even now incurred in maintaining the three days post to the district of Bradfield is considerably in excess of the revenue derived from the letters delivered, and I regret that I do not feel justified in incurring further expenditure.

PIRACY IN THE CHINESE SEAS.

MR. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY (Sussex, East Grinstead): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any information as to the plunder of the steam ship Namoa by pirates near Hong Kong, in December last, and the murder of her captain; whether any of the pirates have been brought to justice, and how soon after the arrival of the Namoa the Government were able to send a gunboat in pursuit of the pirates; and whether it is intended to present to Parliament any Papers or Reports on the occurrence?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Reports have been received from the Commodore on the station and the officer administering the government of Hong Kong of the seizure of the Namoa by Chinese pirates who had embarked in her, when about 50 miles from Hong Kong on the 10th of December. The captain and a German gentleman, named Pater-son, in the employ of the Chinese Customs Department, and two quartermasters were killed and the second officer slightly wounded. The pirates took possession of the ship, and having got together property estimated at over $20,000 disembarked into junks off the coast of China and escaped. The Namoa then returned to Hong Kong, where she arrived on the morning of the 11th of December. H.M.S. Linnet started on the morning of the 12th to endeavour to trace the pirates, and appears to have received all possible assistance from the Chinese authorities. Nothing, however, was ascertained, and she returned to Hong Kong on the evening of the 13th. The Admiral on the Station, who subsequently arrived, despatched two of Her Majesty's vessels to endeavour to discover the whereabouts of the pirates. The result of these further investigations is not yet known. Papers can be laid before Parliament if desired, but it would be better to await further news.

Mr. Cobb

THE LEEWARD ISLANDS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what are the reasons which have induced the Colonial Office to advise Her Majesty to disallow the Act to amend the constitution of the Leeward Islands, which passed the Federal Council of the Colony of the Leeward Islands in February, 1890; and, if this Act has not been disallowed, what are the reasons which have prevented the passing into law, and the proclamation in the Colony, of an Ordinance which formed the most important item in the Governor's Address to the Leeward Islands Federal Council in the Session of 1890, and which was introduced by the Attorney General of the Colony, and carried by the votes of both the nominee and the official members thereof?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Bill to amend the constitution of the Leeward Islands was reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure. It has not been disallowed; but the Secretary of State considered that supplementary legislation by the Island Councils was required before the Royal Assent could be given to it, and when that legislation has been passed the Secretary of State will be prepared to advise assent to the Constitution Bill.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if he is aware that the Provost Marshal of the Presidency of Dominica, in the Colony of the Leeward Islands, has been engaged for several hours each day during the months of October, November, and December last, in selling the houses and lands of over 1,000 pasant proprietors for default under the House and Land Tax Ordinance; and that for want of bidders at these official sales the President's clerk has been detailed to buy in such houses and lands for the Government; and that, owing to these sales, an impetus has been given to emigration from the Island of Dominica to the French settlement of Cayenne, and to the Republic of Venezuela; and whether, under these circumstances, the Secretary of State will instruct the Governor of the Leeward Islands to reduce or abolish this tax?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Secretary of State has received no information from the Governor of the Leeward Islands as to the matters referred to by the hon. Baronet; but his attention has been called to the fact that the Official Gazette of Dominica contains a large number of notices of sales of leases and land for default in payment of Land and House Tax. The Governor will be called upon for a Report on this tax, and until that Report is received the Secretary of State is not prepared to say what instructions he will give.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if it is a fact that, while the gross value of the exports from the Island of Dominica is given as amounting to £65,000 annually for all products, the revenue exacted by the Government is £22,000, or one-third of the yearly production; and, if these figures are incorrect, what are the correct for revenue and exported produce respectively for the year just ended; and whether it is the intention of the Secretary of State to sanction any further loans on the local revenue of Dominica for public works, the interest and sinking fund of which will have to be provided by increased taxation?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Returns have not been received of the revenue of Dominica or of the gross value of exports from the Island in 1890. The estimated revenue for 1890 was £21,482; the average value of exports for the ten years ending in 1889 was £54,752; and the average revenue for the same period was £18,345. The Secretary of State has not been asked to sanction any further loan for public works.

ARDCHATTAN AND MUCKAIRN SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is the case, as stated by the School Board of Ardchattan and Muckairn, that on 26th January last there were only 19 children on the roll of the Episcopal school, and only 13 in actual attendance that day, four of these being the children of the teacher recently appointed, who came to the district about a month ago, whilst the School Board had been informed that one of the 19 had gone to the Board school; and upon what authority was the statement made in the communication by the Secretary of the Scotch Education Department to the School Board of 22nd ult., that "there are 38 children on the school register of the Episcopal school?"

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The School Board of Ardehatten and Muckairn, in a letter of 27 January, state the attendance at the Episcopal School as it is given in the question of the hon. Member. My Lords have no further information in regard to this; but I may point out that the decision of the Department to recognise the school was based upon the statements before them at the time when that decision was arrived at. In May, 1890, the promoters of the school stated that there were 38 on the registers; and in July of the same year the School Board returned the number as 40. The letter of the Secretary of the Scotch Education Department of 22 January did not make the statement referred to in the question. The words of the letter are as follows:—

"It was distinctly asserted—and in regard to this the extract from the minutes of your Board proves the existence of a discrepancy which ought easily to be cleared up—that there are 38 children on the school registers of the Episcopal School instead of the 16 named by your Board."

The hon. Member has thus, I presume through inadvertence, omitted the substantive part of the sentence from which he quotes, and his question thus seems to ascribe to the Secretary of the Department an assertion which, on the face of that sentence, was not made by him, but was cited by him as showing the existence of a discrepancy which ought easily to be cleared up.

TITHES.

MR. R. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, when the Tithes Bill, now before the House, becomes law, the plate, pictures, and furniture, and personal effects of a landowner will be liable to be distrained upon for tithes; and whether, if such is the case, he will be willing to introduce into the Bill a clause providing that nothing but agricultural produce shall be subject to distraint for tithe?

Mr. Caldwell

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The question can only relate to tithe rent-charge due from an occupying owner. The Bill now before the House makes no alteration in the law as to the goods which are liable to distraint for tithe rent-charge, and I do not propose to make any alteration in that law. I cannot give an authoritative exposition of what the law is; but I may say that, if the owner of the land liable to tithe rent-charge were fortunate enough to be possessed of plate and pictures, and he was distrained on for tithe rent-charge, they might be in considerable danger.

INTIMIDATION IN SCOTLAND.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he can inform the House whether the conviction of Robert Smith, in the Edinburgh Sheriff Criminal Court on 26th January for intimidation by using threats, is to be brought under the review of the High Court of Justiciary; and whether, if it is not, he will lay upon the Table a Copy of the indictment and of the sheriff substitute's charge to the jury?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I have, as yet, had no official intimation; but I am otherwise led to believe that the conviction referred to in the question of the hon. Member is to be brought under review of the High Court of Justiciary.

THE LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) ACT.

COLONEL HAMBRO (Dorset, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the money placed at the disposal of County Councils, under "The Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act, 1890," was intended to be so employed as to benefit the agricultural labourer equally with the artisan?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Councils of Counties and County Boroughs are empowered, in their discretion, to apply the moneys which are placed at their disposal under "The Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act, 1890," for the purposes of technical education, under the Technical Instruction Act, 1889. That technical education is intended to include not only technical instruction but manual instruction, and the latter comprises instruction in processes of agriculture.

THE COAL MINES ACT.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the examiners appointed under "The Coal Mines Act, 1887," in the Newcastle-upon-Tyne and Darlington districts, require from those who desire to be examined for first-class certificates that they must have served five years either as overman or underviewer before they can sit for such examination; and whether such restriction is in accordance with the provisions of the said Act; if so, under what section?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; the fact is as stated. I am advised by the Law Officers of the Crown that the restriction is one that the Board of Examiners have a right to impose under Sub-section 2 of the 24th clause of the Act.

MR. FENWICK: Will the effect of that restriction be to leave out 99 per cent. of the men otherwise qualified; and is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to propose legislation to remedy the grievance?

MR. MATTHEWS: The result may be as the hon. Member has stated, and I confess it rather startled me; but I have taken the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, which is embodied in my reply to the hon. Member's question. I am not prepared to propose any legislation on the subject. The Examiners have the confidence of the House and the country.

VACCINATION.

MR. FENWICK: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware of the fact that a lad named Arthur Brownjohn, who was engaged at the Clarendon Press, Oxford, with a view to his becoming an apprentice in the classical composing department, on making application to the medical officer for a certificate of physical fitness, as required by the Factory Act, was refused such certificate on the ground that he had not been vaccinated; and whether the medical officer is justified in withholding the certificate on such grounds; and, if so, whether he is prepared to advise the Government to amend the Law in this respect?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir. The certificate was not refused by the medical officer, but signed in the usual way. It was stated in the "Remarks" column of the form that the lad was "unvaccinated." The Controller of the Clarendon Press considered this to be an insufficient certificate, and refused to employ the lad.

NOTES FOR SILVER.

SIR WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether or not he has power, without fresh legislation, to permit the issue of notes representing four or eight half-crowns, instead of issuing the silver coins themselves?

MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir. I have no such power.

MADRID INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if any results have yet attended the International Industrial Conference, held at Madrid last year, and particularly as regards the extension in Foreign countries of the legislative measures adopted by Her Majesty's Government against false marking, the counterfeiting of British trade designations, and in furtherance of honest trading?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The projects submitted by the Madrid Conference for the approval of the respective Governments were designed to be concluded on the 14th of October last; but an extension of that period till the 14th of April next has been requested by certain Governments in order to enable them to give the subject more careful consideration. Communications on the subject are now in progress, and it is hoped that the above-mentioned extension of time will not be over-passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CHARITABLE SCHEMES.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in the interests of the health and convenience of the Members and officials of the House, he will endeavour to make arrangements by which Addresses to the Crown relating to Charitable Schemes may not be considered after 12 o'clock, but may be brought on immediately after Private Business?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am exceedingly anxious to consult the convenience of Members and of officials of the House, but I think that the hon. Member will see that the suggestions which he makes are impracticable. The procedure with regard to Addresses to the Crown relating to charitable schemes is regulated by Standing Order of this House, and I should hesitate to suggest an alteration of the Standing Order, which would seriously curtail the time either of the Government or of private Members. My personal experience shows that on Tuesdays and Fridays there would be opportunities for bringing forward such schemes at an early hour.

REPRINTS OF PARTLY CONSIDERED BILLS.

MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will arrange for the distribution to the Members with the Votes of a reprint, from time to time, of such portions of a Public Bill as have been amended in Committee, without waiting for the whole Bill to have passed through Committee?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In cases of Bills of great importance the suggestion made by the hon. Member has been adopted, and a reprint is circulated with the votes indicating the progress made; but I think that it would be inconvenient to adopt the rule with reference to all Bills, as it would involve a considerable addition of labour and expense.

IRELAND—THE LAND PURCHASE ACTS.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland in how many cases has Lord Waterford, when selling land to tenants under the Purchase Acts compelled them to reserve to him rights of game, hunting, fishing, and sporting generally; how many agreements containing such reservations have been sanctioned altogether by the Purchase Commissioners; do some of the London Companies conveyances under the Purchase Acts contain reservations of mines or quarries; and will the Government either deal comprehensively with such questions, or void all covenants whereby the landlord merely sells to the occupier the right of agricultural possession, and still retains to himself other privileges attaching to the fee simple?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The Land Commissioners report that in the cases of 74 out of 230 holdings sold upon the estate of the Marquess of Waterford the rights of game and fishing were reserved. These reservations appear to have been agreed upon between the contracting parties in the cases of all holdings adjacent to the demesne of Curraghmore, where the vendor resides, and upon mountain holdings in the same district where there were game. The Commissioners are unable to state the number of the agreements referred to in the second paragraph; but they point out that such reservations must be made in all cases in which the landlord himself holds under a fee farm grant containing those reservations, or where the shootings or fishings were leased. The Commissioners see no objection to a residential landlord, or a landlord having an estate with valuable sporting rights, contracting with his tenants for the reservation of such rights upon sale; but they are of opinion that in the cases of sales of ordinary agricultural holdings or non-residential estates these reservations should not as a general rule be made. In the cases of the estates of the Salters' and Skinners' Companies there are such reservations, these companies themselves being subject to them in their grants from the Irish Society. In the cases of the Drapers' and the Fishmongers' Companies, who appear to have acquired these rights by conveyance from the Irish Society, there are no such reservations.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give notice that I shall move an Amendment to the Land Purchase Bill to make such reservations impossible.

IRISH TITHEPAYERS.

MR. PENROSE FITZGERALD (Cambridge): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he would state what portion of the annuity of £4 9s. per cent. which is charged to Irish tithe-payers for a term of 52 years for loans for the redemption of tithe rent-charge under "The Irish Church Act Amendment Act, 1872," represents, or is required, for the purpose of a Sinking Fund, and what is (accordingly) the rate of interest reserved or charged by the Treasury on such loans; and in cases where the tithe-payer desires during the currency of the 52 years' term to redeem the outstanding instalments of his annuity, or where he is compelled to redeem them under the Irish Land Purchase Acts, what is the rate of interest allowed to him in the Table for the Redemption of Outstanding Instalments adopted by the Irish Land Commission?

MR. GOSCHEN: If my hon. Friend will put down the question for to-morrow I shall be able to give a clearer answer to it.

COUNTY CESS IN KERRY.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he seen a report of the last Land Sessions in Kenmare; is he aware that the county cess of Kerry amounts to 4s. in the £1, and that the extra police force in the county is the cause of the high county cess; and whether he will consider whether this extra police force is now necessary?

*MR. MADDEN: I am informed that, according to the Presentment Book for last Assizes, the county cess of Kerry averages 4s. 3d. in the £1. The portion for the police tax is about 9d. in the £1. The authorities responsible for the preservation of the peace of this county are unable at present to recommend any reduction in the number of the extra force serving there, but they hope to be in a position to do so within the next two or three months.

IMPRISONMENT OF MR. LONG.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can explain why Mr. Long, editor of the Nationalist paper, has been lately removed from Clonmel Gaol to Kilkenny Gaol; and whether, at the former place, the prisoner was entitled to visits from members of his family?

*MR. MADDEN: I am informed that the usual practice is that, in any case where the connections or associations of a prisoner with a district are such as, in the opinion of the General Prisons Board, to be calculated to interfere with the due maintenance of discipline in the local prison, his transfer to another prison is made. On this general principle the transfer referred to was made. Both at Clonmel and at Kilkenny Prisons, Mr. Long, being a bail prisoner, was and is entitled to receive visits under the rules governing that class of prisoners.

MR. FLYNN: Has not Mr. Long been removed from Clonmel to Kilkenny Gaol in order to deprive him of the visits to which he is entitled? Has not that been the object of his removal?

*MR. MADDEN: No, Sir.

MR. P. NULLY.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if the Lord Lieutenant has received Memorials pointing out that Mr. P. Nully, of Mayo, was imprisoned for 10 months before the date of his second trial, and that a Crimes Act jury disagreed at his first trial; if the Lord Lieutenant has been informed that the nearest relation of Mr. Nully is very old, ill, and not likely to survive for any long period; and if, under these circumstances, the Lord Lieutenant will be pleased to advise Her Majesty graciously to permit that the 10 months' imprisonment suffered by Mr. Nully shall be allowed to reckon as part of his sentence?

MR. MADDEN: A Memorial on behalf of the convict mentioned and of the nature indicated, has recently been before the Lord Lieutenant. His Excellency has decided that the law must take its course, and the memorialist has been so informed.

RAILWAY FROM TUAM.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if the construction of a railroad from Tuam has been delayed, owing to the Bill for it having failed to reach the House of Lords before the Christmas Recess; and if in consequence there is likely to be no employment in that neighbourhood until the railway authorities have agreed with the landowners; if such an agreement generally requires three months; and if, in the meantime, he will be pleased to recommend the institution of a few works, under the Relief of Distress Act, at Tuam and Milltown?

MR. MADDEN: The Tuam and Claremorris Railway Bill has been read a second time in the House of Lords, and will, I hope, become law in a few days. The experience of the Government in connection with other light railway projects leads to no such conclusion as that suggested in the second paragraph. The Government would be very glad to see work started on this line of railway. Inquiries are proceeding as to the condition of the Tuam Union.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN DUBLIN.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the seven hours system has been introduced into all Civil Service Departmental offices in Dublin, except the General Post Office; and whether it is intended to introduce it there; and, if so, when?

*MR. RAIKES: As soon as the Government has arrived at a decision in the matter, proper notice will be given to the persons concerned, and the hon. Member may rest assured that every care will be taken to respect existing interests.

IRISH NATIONAL TEACHERS.

MR. CONWAY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Rules for the establishment of a fund for the widows and orphans of Irish National teachers have received the sanction of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury; and, if not, will he state what has caused the delay?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The Rules have been referred for revision to a Conference of Actuaries, and when the Report is received it will be considered without further delay.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what Report has been received from the Local Government Board Inspector in respect to the amount and nature of the destitution prevailing in the Kanturk (County Cork) Union; and whether anything has yet been done with regard to the opening of public works in the district?

MR. MADDEN: A Report of the character indicated in the question has been received from the Inspector, and is now under consideration.

MR. FLYNN: I will put a further question upon the subject to-morrow.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has had brought to his notice the representations made to the Innishowen Board of Guardians as to the extreme distress existing in the congested district of Urris, and whether there is any immediate prospect of employment being afforded to the people, in order to avert the necessity of giving gratuitous relief?

MR. MADDEN: Representations regarding distress have been received from the Innishowen Board of Guardians. The condition of the district is being inquired into.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether there is any, and, if so, how much money over and above what is appropriated for the construction of the Killybegs and Glenties lines, available for similar purposes in other parts of Donegal?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): If, in addition to the agreements already made, the Glenties, Achill, and Collooney lines be constructed, the whole of the funds available under the Act of 1889 will be absorbed, and there will be no surplus for any other lines.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN OSSORY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the scheme promoted by the Roscrea Board of Guardians for building two labourers' cottages in the Booris in Ossory Electoral Division, and one in the Electoral Division of Moneenalassa, was, on the Report of the Local Government Board Inspector, sanctioned by the Privy Council; whether the Board of Works have written to the Guardians stating that they could not send down an arbitrator to value the three half-acre plots and assess the compensation to be paid to landlords and occupiers until a sum of £30 was lodged on that account, but that they would not undertake that that sum should cover the expenses of the arbitrator; and if he could explain why the fee charged for valuing one and a half statute acres should be almost equal to the price of the land?

MR. JACKSON: I believe the facts are as stated in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the question, and I am making inquiries.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN CORK.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the recent Report of the Cork Chamber of Commerce and Shipping with reference to the postal arrangements of the City of Cork, in which complaint is made of the action of the General Post Office Authorities in not supplying a sufficient number of experienced sorters, in consequence of which the in-coming morning mail is not delivered in time in the city to permit of replies being despatched by the outgoing mid-day mail; and whether this state of things will be remedied?

*MR. RAIKES: In answer to the hon. Member, I have to state that an addition to the Sorting Force at the Cork Post Office has just been made for the purpose he describes, and I have no reason to believe that anything further is needed. I will, however, make inquiry in the matter, with a view to ascertaining how the new arrangements are working.

MOTION.

ELECTORAL DISABILITIES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Attorney General, Bill to remove certain Disabilities of Persons by reason of absence to be registered as Voters at Parliamentary and Local Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, and Mr. Long.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 182.]

VOL. CCCXLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.—(No. 110.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3.

(4.10.) MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): In the absence of the hon. Member for Carnarvon (Mr. B. Roberts), I beg to move the Amendment which stands in his name, which provides that in cases where the tithe rent-charge is to be remitted on more than two-thirds of the annual value of the land the rent shall be assessed under Schedule A, and not under Schedule B, as proposed in the Bill. I think that this alteration will be of great service, especially in those hard cases in which the tithepayers require to be assisted. If the Bill is allowed to pass as it stands, it will give a large advantage to the tithe owner without a commensurate advantage to the tithepayer.

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 10, to leave out "B" and insert "A."—(Mr. H. Gardner.)

Question proposed, "That 'B' stand part of the Clause."

*(4.12.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I hope to be able to convince the hon. Member opposite that he has not considered the effect of his Amendment. I think that by giving a concrete case I can convince the hon. Member that this Amendment could not be adopted. If a farm is let for £90 a year, after the passing of this Bill it would, of course, be let tithe free to the tenant. Supposing that the farm were liable to a tithe of £75, there would be a margin of only £15 rent for the landowner—I am taking an extreme case. The assessment to Schedule A would therefore be £15; and under this proposal, by the substitution of Schedule A for Schedule B, the tithe rent-charge could not exceed £10. Supposing another farm also let at £90 a year, the tithe rent-charge being £39, leaving a margin of £51 for assessment to Schedule A; under this pro-

RAILWAY FROM TUAM.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if the construction of a railroad from Tuam has been delayed, owing to the Bill for it having failed to reach the House of Lords before the Christmas Recess; and if in consequence there is likely to be no employment in that neighbourhood until the railway authorities have agreed with the landowners; if such an agreement generally requires three months; and if, in the meantime, he will be pleased to recommend the institution of a few works, under the Relief of Distress Act, at Tuam and Milltown?

MR. MADDEN: The Tuam and Claremorris Railway Bill has been read a second time in the House of Lords, and will, I hope, become law in a few days. The experience of the Government in connection with other light railway projects leads to no such conclusion as that suggested in the second paragraph. The Government would be very glad to see work started on this line of railway. Inquiries are proceeding as to the condition of the Tuam Union.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN DUBLIN.

MR. CONWAY (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the seven hours system has been introduced into all Civil Service Departmental offices in Dublin, except the General Post Office; and whether it is intended to introduce it there; and, if so, when?

*MR. RAIKES: As soon as the Government has arrived at a decision in the matter, proper notice will be given to the persons concerned, and the hon. Member may rest assured that every care will be taken to respect existing interests.

IRISH NATIONAL TEACHERS.

MR. CONWAY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Rules for the establishment of a fund for the widows and orphans of Irish National teachers have received the sanction of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury; and, if not, will he state what has caused the delay?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The Rules have been referred for revision to a Conference of Actuaries, and when the Report is received it will be considered without further delay.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what Report has been received from the Local Government Board Inspector in respect to the amount and nature of the destitution prevailing in the Kanturk (County Cork) Union; and whether anything has yet been done with regard to the opening of public works in the district?

MR. MADDEN: A Report of the character indicated in the question has been received from the Inspector, and is now under consideration.

MR. FLYNN: I will put a further question upon the subject to-morrow.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has had brought to his notice the representations made to the Innishowen Board of Guardians as to the extreme distress existing in the congested district of Urris, and whether there is any immediate prospect of employment being afforded to the people, in order to avert the necessity of giving gratuitous relief?

MR. MADDEN: Representations regarding distress have been received from the Innishowen Board of Guardians. The condition of the district is being inquired into.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether there is any, and, if so, how much money over and above what is appropriated for the construction of the Killybegs and Glenties lines, available for similar purposes in other parts of Donegal?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): If, in addition to the agreements already made, the Glenties, Achill, and Collooney lines be constructed, the whole of the funds available under the Act of 1889 will be absorbed, and there will be no surplus for any other lines.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN OSSORY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the scheme promoted by the Roscrea Board of Guardians for building two labourers' cottages in the Booris in Ossory Electoral Division, and one in the Electoral Division of Moneenallas, was, on the Report of the Local Government Board Inspector, sanctioned by the Privy Council; whether the Board of Works have written to the Guardians stating that they could not send down an arbitrator to value the three half-acre plots and assess the compensation to be paid to landlords and occupiers until a sum of £30 was lodged on that account, but that they would not undertake that that sum should cover the expenses of the arbitrator; and if he could explain why the fee charged for valuing one and a half statute acres should be almost equal to the price of the land?

MR. JACKSON: I believe the facts are as stated in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the question, and I am making inquiries.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN CORK.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the recent Report of the Cork Chamber of Commerce and Shipping with reference to the postal arrangements of the City of Cork, in which complaint is made of the action of the General Post Office Authorities in not supplying a sufficient number of experienced sorters, in consequence of which the in-coming morning mail is not delivered in time in the city to permit of replies being despatched by the outgoing mid-day mail; and whether this state of things will be remedied?

*MR. RAIKES: In answer to the hon. Member, I have to state that an addition to the Sorting Force at the Cork Post Office has just been made for the purpose he describes, and I have no reason to believe that anything further is needed. I will, however, make inquiry in the matter, with a view to ascertaining how the new arrangements are working.

MOTION.

ELECTORAL DISABILITIES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Attorney General, Bill to remove certain Disabilities of Persons by reason of absence to be registered as Voters at Parliamentary and Local Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, and Mr. Long.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 182.]

VOL. CCCXLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.—(No. 110.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3.

(4.10.) MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): In the absence of the hon. Member for Carnarvon (Mr. B. Roberts), I beg to move the Amendment which stands in his name, which provides that in cases where the tithe rent-charge is to be remitted on more than two-thirds of the annual value of the land the rent shall be assessed under Schedule A, and not under Schedule B, as proposed in the Bill. I think that this alteration will be of great service, especially in those hard cases in which the tithepayers require to be assisted. If the Bill is allowed to pass as it stands, it will give a large advantage to the tithe owner without a commensurate advantage to the tithepayer.

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 10, to leave out "B" and insert "A."—(Mr. H. Gardner.)

Question proposed, "That 'B' stand part of the Clause."

*(4.12.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I hope to be able to convince the hon. Member opposite that he has not considered the effect of his Amendment. I think that by giving a concrete case I can convince the hon. Member that this Amendment could not be adopted. If a farm is let for £90 a year, after the passing of this Bill it would, of course, be let tithe free to the tenant. Supposing that the farm were liable to a tithe of £75, there would be a margin of only £15 rent for the landowner—I am taking an extreme case. The assessment to Schedule A would therefore be £15; and under this proposal, by the substitution of Schedule A for Schedule B, the tithe rent-charge could not exceed £10. Supposing another farm also let at £90 a year, the tithe rent-charge being £39, leaving a margin of £51 for assessment to Schedule A; under this proposal the landlord would have to pay a tithe rent-charge of £34. That will show the injustice of such a proposal.

(4.15.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I would advise my hon. Friend not to insist upon the Amendment; but I do not think the second instance given by the right hon. Gentleman comes within the extreme cases of the proposed clause.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I did not say that it would. My point is, that in such a case the tithe rent-charge payable would, under this Amendment, be more than three times as much as in a case where twice the amount of tithe rent-charge was due.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: Unless some concession is made by the Government, I think the arguments used against the Bill on Thursday were very forcible. The practical relief, however well it may look in theory, would in numerous instances be nothing at all.

After a few words from MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.), which were inaudible in the Gallery, the Amendment was negatived.

(4.20.) MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): The object of the Amendment which stands next, in my name, is to provide that the value of farm buildings, when their value exceeds 10 per cent. of the annual value of the land, shall not be included for the purpose of ascertaining the annual value of the land under Clause 3. My contention is that if the Amendment is not agreed to, the clause will work great injustice to the small farmers. I will give an instance of two small farms lying close together, the land of both being of exactly equal quality, but the buildings good in the one case, and old and dilapidated in the other. Where the buildings are old and dilapidated this crumb of relief will be given, but where the buildings are good there will be no relief whatever. I do not think it is possible to defend an arrangement of that sort. The proposal will be a direct premium against spending money on a farm. I admit that, theoretically, relief will come both to small and large farms, but in practice the effect of the clause as it stands will be to give relief in a certain number of cases to large farms, but none to any number of small farms worth thinking of. The tithe, as now assessed, goes far beyond the intentions of the donors of the tithe. This Amendment will remove what is an undoubted injustice in the clause, and I therefore hope it will be accepted by Her Majesty's Government. As a rule the commutation of land on which buildings stand has followed very nearly the value of the labouring fields. At any rate the tithe upon land on which buildings stood in 1836, certainly never included for one moment the value of the bricks and mortar. Under this clause, however, the value of the buildings will be included. It may be said that I am asking for relief for men who are the proprietors of houses and buildings, and who may, therefore, be presumed to be not very poor men. I have, however, not been influenced by any such consideration. Of course, one would be even more inclined to grant relief to poor men than to rich men, but the question has never been in my mind. I do not care whether the owner of a farm that will be affected by the clause is rich or poor, whether his buildings are good or bad, or whether his farm is well stocked or badly stocked. I simply say that, having shown that the position of the tithe has now gone far away from the intentions of the original donors, or of the Act of 1836, such an Amendment as this is necessary. It is a just and a fair proposal, and if it is not agreed to it will be very difficult indeed to prove that this Bill is one of concession or compromise. We are told that the clergy are anxious to compromise, the agriculturalists in the Eastern Counties have suffered loyally and patiently, and have paid their tithes like honest Englishmen, and, rather than see this clause stamped with the approval of the House as being a fair adjustment between the two contending parties, I am almost sure that, if my Amendment be rejected, I shall, on the Report stage, move that all this clause be set aside.

Sir M. Hicks Beach

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 11, after the word "mentioned," to insert the words—

"Exclusive of the annual value of any buildings, unless such value does not exceed 10 per cent. of the annual value of the land."—
(Mr. Gray.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(434.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I always listen with very great sympathy to my hon. Friend, because I know he honestly and sincerely feels the case he presents to us on this Bill, and his Amendment now is really only intended to benefit the small farmer. But I would venture to submit to my hon. Friend that the principle of this Amendment is really inconsistent with the view on which the clause is based, and which, as far as I have hitherto understood, he shares equally with myself—namely, that the relief to be afforded by the clause should be afforded in those cases where the annual value of the land has been so much reduced in proportion to the tithe, as to make the tithe a burden beyond the point named in the clause. My hon. Friend wants to relieve those cases which really require relief. I would point out to him that the cases which really require relief are not those which would be mainly affected by this Amendment. Compare the case of a farm with the ordinary farm buildings upon it with the case of another small farm on which the owner had erected a large house, and had added by that process enormously to the value of his land, and, therefore, to the security of the tithe rent-charge. The second case is exactly one in which my hon. Friend would by his Amendment give relief, for he would provide that the value of the country house should not be calculated at all, except to the extent of 10 per cent., and, therefore, property which would be far more valuable than the farm property in the first case would be less liable to tithe, as the farm property would not be relieved by the proposals of my hon. Friend. I think my hon. Friend has not considered his proposal sufficiently from this point of view, and I hope he will not press it.

(438.) MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): I am sure my hon. Friend's Amendment was intended to apply to agricultural land and not to suburban land, or land used for building purposes. I wish the Committee to remember that if the farm buildings of England have enormously improved during the last 50 years it is because of the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836. By that Act the landlords of England were given to understand that if they laid out thousands of pounds in improving their properties the tithe owners in the future should derive no advantage from their outlay. Under cover of that Act the agricultural buildings of the country have enormously improved. Now, 50 years afterwards, the House is asked to reverse the policy which has hitherto been pursued. I must say I think that unless this Amendment is agreed to, a very great wrong will be done to the landowners of England, and a very great injustice to the tithepayers.

(440.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I would suggest to my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon that if he would add the word "agricultural" before "buildings" to his Amendment, it would completely meet the objection of the President of the Board of Trade.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): It seems to me a pity that inasmuch as the House has been treated to Tithe Bills for five successive Sessions, hon. Gentlemen who champion the cause of the tenant farmers have not some figures to submit to show how the Bill will work out, and how it ought to work out in the cases they refer to. I observe, moreover, that the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture (Mr. Chaplin) is on the back of the Bill, and I should think that since he has been appointed to his important office, he should be in a position to enlighten the House as to the condition of things in the eastern counties. Up to now we have heard nothing save that there is a good deal of suffering there. We on this side of the House, who hold different views from hon. Gentlemen opposite, have had nothing tangible in the shape of statistics put before us for our enlightenment. I have listened to the observations of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division, and I do not suggest that he should withdraw his Amendment. On the contrary, I would ask him to show the zeal he feels in the interest of the tenant farmers by dividing the Committee. No doubt he will be supported by the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Farquharson), but for my part I think the argument is altogether against the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

(1042.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) rose to move the following

Amendment: In page 3, line 14, at end of Sub-section (1) insert the words —

"And in such case the rent of the tenant, if the land be let, shall be reduced by a like amount."

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! This Amendment is outside the scope of the Bill.

(10.43.) MR. LLOYD - GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I rise to move the following Amendment: In page 3, line 14, after the word "recoverable," to insert the words—

"Provided always that the tithe owner shall, if aggrieved by any such assessment, have the same right of appeal against the said assessment as the owner or occupier of the said lands now possess."

I feel I am right in stating that under the Bill, as it now stands, a tithe owner has no right of appeal against the assessment. He may feel himself aggrieved to the extent of £20 or £30, but he has no right of appeal to the Commissioners. I think this is an Amendment which will recommend itself to the Government and the Committee generally. At any rate, I should like to hear what the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has to say about it.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 14, after the word "recoverable," to insert the words—

"Provided always, that the tithe owner shall, if aggrieved by any such assessment, have the same right of appeal against the said assessment as the owner or occupier of the said lands now possess."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(4.44.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Our view in preparing the clause was that there was no need for the representation of the tithe owner in this way, for anyone who is accustomed to the proceedings of the Income Tax Commissioners knows how excessively keen the surveyors are to keep up the assessment. Well, to do that is the object of the tithe owner, therefore, the interests of the tithe owner are safeguarded without giving him special power of appeal.

*(4.45.) MR. S. T. EVANS: It is true that it is to the pecuniary interest of the Surveyor of Taxes to keep up assessments: but in the case of the tithe assessment, I doubt if he will have the same controlling power over the Commissioners as he has in the case of the Income Tax. The Surveyor of Taxes is now directly interested in keeping up the assessment; but we have suggested that the Commissioners may be interested in keeping down the assessment, and it is a question whether the Surveyor of Taxes will in future be stronger than the Commissioners, and will be able to counteract their desire to keep down the assessment.

Mr. Labouchere

*(4.46.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: Should not both the parties have the same power to appeal—the tithe owner as well as the tithepayer?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I will undertake to consider this point before the Report stage.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(4.47.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I now move to insert, after Sub-section 3—

"If in any case the owner of the tithe rent-charge, or the owner or occupier of the land, is dissatisfied with the annual value so ascertained as aforesaid, either of them may appeal to the County Court Judge of the district in which the lands are situate, who may, on such application, determine such annual value, or appoint a valuer to ascertain the same."

My reasons for moving this Amendment are these: I do not consider that the Commissioners are an impartial tribunal in these cases, for the reason that they are Justices of the Peace, residing in the locality and having property in the locality. I happen to know a case in point in the particular district in which I reside. All the Commissioners there are land owners who would be interested in keeping down the value of the tithe, and also the assessment of property. In one case with which I am acquainted, valuable property belonging to the Chairman of the Commissioners, was assessed at £80, whereas a similar property, belonging to a gentleman who was not a Commissioner, but who happened to be a Non-conformist, was assessed at £120. Representations were made by this gentleman to the Commissioners in London. They considered it a strong case, and sent down a Special Commissioner to investigate the matter, and the result was that the Chairman of the Local Commissioners had the assessment of his property raised from £80 to £200. There was another Commissioner who had under-valued his property by assessing it at £70. A Government Commissioner was sent down, and it was found that the value of the property was £160. Another case was that of a gentleman who was very fond of talking of the predatory characteristics of Radicalism. He assessed his own property at £25; but when a Government Inspector came to investigate the matter, he discovered that the value of the property was £45, so that in two of these cases the Commissioners assessed their property at half its value, and in the other case at nearly half. When we have such facts as these before us, a tribunal of this kind cannot be considered impartial, and there ought to be some authority on the spot to whom the tithe owner can appeal for justice if he thinks he is wronged. I think I am right in saying that in at least two of the Bills introduced by the Government to deal with the tithe question, an appeal—or rather an application—was allowed to be made by the tithe owner to the County Court. The County Court was to have been the authority for inquiring into the value of these lands; and, I must say, it appears to me more in consonance with the proposals of the Government themselves, that the County Court should be the appellate authority rather than the Commissioners.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 38, after Sub-section (3), to insert the words—

"If in any case the owner of the tithe rent-charge, or the owner or occupier of the land, is dissatisfied with the annual value so ascertained as aforesaid, either of them may appeal to the County Court Judge of the district in which the lands are situate, who may, on such application, determine such annual value, or appoint a valuer to ascertain the same."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(452.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The Amendment of the hon. Gentleman raises three questions. As to the question of Appeal, as the President of the Board of Trade has pointed out, there is already in existence a machinery for appeal, namely, the Income Tax Commissioners; and we think that that machinery should be adopted. The hon. Member opposite says that in previous Bills we allowed appeals to the County Court, but he must be good enough to remember that different questions are now raised to those raised under the previous Bills. Under the previous Bill the rents and profits had to be ascertained independently. It was a matter of valuation, and we adopted the tribunal we thought best fitted to deal with it. Therefore, having adopted Schedule B of the Income Tax in this Bill, we have given an appeal to the Income Tax Commissioners. As to the constitution of the tribunal, which the hon. Gentleman objects to, it must be remembered that the Income Tax Commissioners are chosen from the Land Tax Commissioners, and that the names of the persons chosen are sent to the Members of Parliament representing the various localities in which the Commissioners are to act. Objection can, therefore, be taken to the names, and others can be suggested in their place. With regard to the appointment of a valuer, the hon. Gentleman suggests that the Local Authorities should have power of nominating him. That power already exists under Section 47 of the Income Tax Act of 1853, and has, to my own knowledge, been exercised, so that we have already the machinery for bringing local knowledge to bear on the matter which the hon. Gentleman refers to. Lastly, as to the appeal from the Income Tax Commissioners, there is now a ready appeal, and one which does not bear hardly on the appellants. The hon. Member will remember that when a person desires to appeal he asks the Commissioners to state a case, and if they do so the case is disposed of without any considerable expense. On the three points I have dealt with I think the proposal we make is the best, and for that reason we cannot agree to substitute for the appeal given in the Bill an entirely different one.

(456) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: No doubt the appointment of the valuer is in the discretion of the Commissioners themselves.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: No, it is set forth that it shall be lawful for the appellant as well as the Commissioners in any such appeal to require a valuation to be made.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: It is in the discretion of the Commissioners, however, whether they appoint a valuer or not. They are not bound to do so.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: They are bound.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Very well, then I object that the Commissioners at the present moment are too partizan. For instance, in the locality in which I reside, the Commissioners have been appointed out of one political party and out of one denomination. Up to a recent period the locality was represented in Parliament by men of one Party, and whenever names were submitted to them they naturally favoured men of their way of thinking. I object to this political class of men, believing them to be too partial to be entrusted with these duties. As to the first point mentioned by the Attorney General—the appeal to the County Court given in the first Bills brought in by the Government—I simply mentioned that the Government themselves thought the County Court a competent tribunal for investigating the value of land.

*(458.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I do not think the Attorney General has given sufficient weight to the arguments of my hon. Friend, probably because he does not know the locality in which my hon. Friend resides. Some very strong cases were mentioned, all of which will bear investigation, as they are well founded. My hon. Friend stated a case in which a Commissioner had actually returned the value of his own property at less than half the proper amount, and another case in which a man's assessment was raised £40 because he was a Nonconformist. It is all very well to say that objection can be taken to the persons selected as Commissioners when the names are submitted. We know that, but it is an exceedingly invidious thing to take upon oneself to object to a certain name. I hold it is desirable that this matter should be removed from the region of politics, and that the present method of submitting names to Members of Parliament gives a political colour to the whole thing, nor do I know why the Government adopted the County Court as a Court of Appeal in their former Bills and do not propose to do so now. If my hon. Friend goes to a division, I shall support the Motion.

*(459.) VISCOUNT WOLMER (Hants, Petersfield): Is the hon. Member for Carnarvon quite sure that the cases he has given are of assessments under Schedule B? Under Schedule A there is room for proceedings such as he mentioned. I do not see why, in the case we are considering, the attitude of the Income Tax Commissioners in the future should be different from what it has been in the past. I do not see what inducement there is which does not already exist to them to allow Schedule B to diminish and grow small. On the contrary, it seems to me that the machinery is absolutely safe-guarded at present by the rule that prevails in the counties which which I am acquainted, which is that no reduction is allowed unless it can be shown, on the production of accounts, that it is required. The present state of the law, according to my view, prevents the possibility of abuse, and I do not think his proposal is necessary.

*(51.) MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I have listened with some surprise to the observations of my hon. Friend the Attorney General, as to the names of the Commissioners being submitted to Members of Parliament, and I should think other Members have listened with surprise equal to my own. On this point the arguments of the Attorney General appears to me to be somewhat unsatisfactory. The argument in favour of his contention is that we are already provided with machinery, but that existing machinery seems to me insufficient and bad. First, the fact that the machinery exists is hardly sufficient reason for denying such a tribunal as my hon. Friend proposes, when you are legislating exceptionally. Secondly, the existing machinery is shown to be lamentably insufficient. Upon the ground that the County Court has been selected by the Government as the proper tribunal to adjudicate on matters cognate to this, and secondly, as the existing machinery is open at any rate to suspicion, and has in some cases been shown to be guilty of very grave derelictions of duty, I shall support the Amendment.

*(53.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I think the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General mistakes the nature of the hon. Gentleman's proposition. It is intended to protect against under assessment as well as against over assessment. At present, I understand, there is a protection against over assessment, but not against under assessment.

I do hope the Government will give the tithe owner the same protection as is accorded the owner or occupier of the land.

*(5.4.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I think the hon. Member must have made a mistake as to the Amendment we are discussing. I think he is discussing the Amendment which the hon. Member has also placed up on the Paper, giving the owners some such protection as is asked for. That I promised to consider on Report, and I think it would be a good thing to give some protection against under assessment. Sir, I hope the Committee will not make the Judge of the County Court the judge of value. That suggestion, I know, was made by the Government two years ago, and after being made it was more fully considered, and it was felt to be a mistake. I believe the proper tribunal to judge of value is that which is customary in England, and the proper appeal from that tribunal is that which the law already provides.

(5.6.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have given three concrete instances in which the protection of the surveyor of taxes was proved to be grossly inadequate, and the same thing will occur again. At present it is the interest of the Commissioners of Income Tax to keep down the tithe rent-charge as much as possible.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: Which schedule?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am sorry I have not got the letter of the Inland Revenue with me, therefore I am unable to quote it. I may be able to do so later in the discussion. It makes no difference whether Schedule A or B is concerned, and it is the interest of the Income Tax Commissioners to keep down the assessment as much as possible. In the cases which I have cited, it has been kept down extraordinarily, and I might point out to the noble Lord that in every instance the balance sheet cannot be employed, for I should say the case is very rare in which accounts of the produce are kept. I certainly hope the right hon. Gentleman will consent to this Amendment on Report.

(5.11.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 122; Noes 152.—(Div. List, No. 26.)

(5.23.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): In moving the Amendment I have placed upon the Paper, namely, to leave out Sub-section 5, I suggest that this sub-section is opposed to the policy of the Bill, and is unfair. I also move my Amendment, because it would be impossible for the sub-section to be of any practical effect, and because it would only cause confusion and unnecessary expense. The provision in the Act of Parliament, to which the sub-section refers, is the 58th section of the 6th and 7th of William IV., which provides that it shall be lawful for the Valuers or Commissioners, upon the application of the landowner, to apportion the whole of a rent-charge upon certain land to the exoneration of other land belonging to the same owner and equally liable to the rent-charge. But there is a provision to the effect that no close of land shall be charged with any rent-charge, or share of rent-charge, on account of the tithe of any other land, unless the value of the land charged shall be at least three times the value of the rent-charge. At that time, therefore, the tithe rent-charge did not exceed one-third of the value of the land. Now, if between that time and the present, the land has so depreciated in value that the tithe exceeds two-thirds of the value, surely there is a strong case for relief. The object of the whole section is, that where the tithe has practically absorbed the land, relief shall be given. It seems to me that relief is equally necessary in the case proposed to be excepted; and to put an exception of this kind in this remedial Bill, seems to me opposed to the whole policy of the Bill. I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill that there is no evidence existing in the Office of the Land Commissioners which will inexpensively enable the sub-section to be worked. When the apportionments were made (at any rate this is the result of my information upon the subject), the lands specially apportioned under Section 58 of the 6th and 7th William IV. were not distinguished—that is to say, the apportionments did not in terms provide that certain lands were charged to the exoneration of other lands, and therefore, it would be impossible to give evidence of that, except by a very laborious process. In fact, I do not know how this could be done except by going to the offices of the land agents who acted in the matter, or to the Assistant Commissioners, and raking up the old papers, if they could be got at, endeavouring in that way to make out a case. What will happen under the Bill when a claim is made for remission? Why two documents will be produced. The Tithe Award and Apportionment, showing the amount of tithe charged, and the Income Tax assessment under Schedule B. They will show the relative proportion which the tithe bears to the value of the land. So far the evidence is simple; but if you provide that relief is not to be given in cases where the tithe has been specially apportioned, in reference to which you have no means of showing what was specially apportioned, except by resort to the land agents memoranda, and other similar documents, all I have to say is that you will be introducing a provision that will lead to a great deal of litigation, trouble, and expense. The case may practically be put in this way: The tithe owner sues for the tithe, and the landowner contends that his land has been depreciated in value, and that he is entitled to the benefit of the relief to be given by this Bill. The tithe owner will then say to him: You are not entitled to relief, because the tithe was specially apportioned on the land to the exoneration of other land. The award, however, does not show this. It only shows that the tithe was charged in particular portions of the parish, and does not show what parcels of land were particularly exonerated. In this case the tithe owner will have to give the next best evidence he can obtain, which may be the evidence of the person who made the appropriation, if he is alive, or surveys, plans, declarations, statements or memoranda for what they are worth. Now, I appeal to practical men in this House as to whether that sort of evidence is not of a most unsatisfactory character, especially when it is 40 or 50 years old. It is the kind of evidence you get in right of way cases, and it is of a nature which will cause expense of a serious character. Although I do not go so far as to say the sub-section will defeat the object of the Bill, yet I do assert it will go a long way towards defeating the benefits intended to be conferred by it. I am satisfied that there is no evidence to be obtained except such as I have mentioned; it will be most expensive to get. It may also give rise to great litigation, and altogether the provision is a most undesirable one. I believe the right hon. Gentleman will appreciate the difficulty of this matter. I appeal to hon. Members to bear me out in what I say as to the practical nature of this objection to the sub-section. I know that there is a rough sort of justice in the sentiment that people on whose land the tithe was specially apportioned should not come under the benefit of this remission; but after all it is of no use, with a view to a sort of sentimental rough justice, to leave a provision of this objectionable nature in the Bill. I hope that hon. Members will agree to my Amendment, which is in no sense hostile to the Bill, but will make it practical by stopping a loophole for endless litigation.

Mr. T. H. Bolton

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 1, to leave out Sub-section (5).—(Mr. Thomas Henry Bolton.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (5) stand part of the Clause."

*(5.33.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I can assure the hon. Member I feel very much indebted to him for the pains which he has taken in discussing this Bill, and for the way in which he has put his special knowledge of this technical and complicated subject at the disposal of the House and of the Government. I have listened carefully to the objection which he has raised to this sub-section. I had been under the idea that the award showed whether there had been a special apportionment, but the hon. Member with his practical knowledge assures us it does not, and that the tithe owner would have enormous difficulty in obtaining the evidence necessary to prove to the satisfaction of the County Court Judge that there had been a special apportionment. As this clause would only apply to a few cases, and would have a tendency to encourage most expensive litigation, I am bound to say the objections to the retention of the sub-section tion are valid, and therefore I do not intend to defend the proviso.

*(5.34.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether in withdrawing the clause for the present moment, the Government retain liberty to re-introduce it, should it be found not to be beset by such difficulties as the hon. Member suggests. The clause, it will be remembered, was not contained in the Bill of last year, and in the course of the Second Reading Debate I pointed out the injustice likely to arise in cases where there had been a special apportionment. I am very much obliged to my right hon. Friend for putting it in this year, and I should be sorry indeed if the practical difficulties were found to be so great as to prevent its object being carried out.

*(5.35.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will adhere to his decision to omit the clause, which is certainly one calculated to lead to endless litigation, as well as to bad feeling.

(5.35.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 95; Noes 198.—(Div. List, No. 27.)

*(5.48.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I beg to move at the end of Clause 3 the addition of these words—

“Or held by any Corporation or public body, or to any lands other than those used for agricultural purposes.”

The sole object of this clause, according to hon. Gentlemen opposite, is to relieve those who have suffered by the agricultural depression, and therefore I hold that its benefits should not be extended to land held by a Corporation or other Public Body, which may be very wealthy. Neither should it be extended to land used for other than purely agricultural or pastoral purposes. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has been good enough to show me some words the Government would be willing to accept, but they would cover lands used for the growth of underwood and timber. I venture to submit that there has been no depreciation in the value of timber or underwood, and therefore there is no reason why such land should come within the operation of this clause. Land devoted to this purpose is often used for purely ornamental purposes, and I do not think that the present tithe owners would be willing that tithe should be remitted in such cases. In order to get an expression of opinion from the right hon. Gentleman I beg to move the addition of the words I have indicated.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 15, at the end, to add the words—

“Or held by a Corporation or public body, or to any lands other than those used for purely agricultural or pastoral purposes.”—(MR. S. T. EVANS.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*(5.50.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I certainly do not see why any distinction should be made as to the ownership of land benefitting under the clause. A Corporation or Public Body includes, of course, a College, and I may ask why should land held by a College for public purposes—for educational purposes, for instance—not profit by the provisions of this clause equally with land held by private persons. I cannot think the hon. Member will attempt to defend such a distinction. If he will abandon that part of his Amendment, I shall be happy to limit the operation of this clause to land used solely for agricultural or pastoral purposes, or for the growth of timber or underwood. That would avoid the possible inclusion in the clause not only of land used for building purposes, but also of land which the owner has wasted, and in regard to which my hon. Friend the Member for South Kensington had intended to raise a discussion in Committee. But I must insist on the inclusion of land used for the growth of timber or underwood, because if the hon. Member had happened to be the owner of a coppice or wood, he would have been aware of the great deterioration in value—a deterioration as serious as that which has befallen other classes of land. If the hon. Member wishes to take issue on the first words of his Amendment, I hope the Committee will not agree to them.

*(5.52.) MR. C. W. GRAY: I am glad to find myself in accord on this point with the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill. I think corporations ought to be admitted to the benefits of the Bill. I do not wish to be unfair to the tithe owner, and I think it would be unfair to let the owner of a coal-pit or mine, who wastes the land by putting slag or rubbish upon it, reap the benefit of this clause.

*(5.54.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: Are we to understand the words are to run: "This section shall not apply to any land except that used for pastoral or agricultural purposes, or for the growth of timber or underwood?"

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: That is the intention.

MR. PICTON: I cannot quite see what all this means. I thought these conditions were being imposed in the interests of those who have suffered from the agricultural depression, but the inclusion of timber and underwood is going beyond mere agriculture, and therefore I hope my Friend will persist in his opposition to it.

*(5.55.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: The main value of underwood is that it supplies fencing for the estate; there is now practically no sale for it, its value being so small. When the Tithe Commutation Act was passed a good price could be got for it, as there were heavy Import Duties on foreign timber, but now most of the timber used for building comes from the Baltic and America, and one of the chief uses of underwood is to protect and shelter growing crops and flocks and herds.

(5.57.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): There is one strong reason why underwood should not be included. The object of the clause is solely to meet the changed conditions of agriculture. Now the changes have only affected corn lands, and have not affected the land on which underwood is grown. I believe underwood is worth just as much now as it was in 1836.

MR. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I should not have interfered in this Debate, had it not been for the extraordinary ignorance of the hon. Member who last spoke. I can corroborate what has fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for Lichfield, as to the immense fall in the value of underwood. In the hop counties we grow underwood, simply because it is possible to get a supply of poles, and that is its main value. Indeed it is a regular agricultural crop.

(5.58.) MR. PICTON: As we here do not possess landed estates, I think we are able to come to an impartial decision on this subject, for we do not hope to put any money in our own pockets, nor do we desire to benefit our class. It appears to me it is not the poor agriculturist whom you are relieving of the burden of the tithe, but it seems the whole tendency of the Bill is to destroy the security of the nation's property.

Mr. C. W. Gray

*(5.59.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I will give only one illustration to prove the necessity of including land used for the growth of underwood. Seven years ago underwood for hoops was worth £17 or £18 per acre; now it fetches only £5.

MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I hope that with regard to the first part of his Amendment my hon. Friend will give way, but as to the latter part I trust he will divide the Committee. Underwood may be used for agricultural purposes, and its value may have greatly depreciated, but such land is not generally occupied by the poorer tenants. It is generally held by the owners of the estate, and there is therefore no necessity to include it in this clause.

*(6.0.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I am prepared to withdraw the first six words of my Amendment, but I still object to the words "or for the growth of timber or underwood." No answer has been made by hon. Gentlemen opposite, to the assertion that these words would apply to lands used for the purpose of growing timber for ornamental purposes. Although many of us on these Benches are not the happy possessors of land, we know something about underwood, as we have been able to show in the course of this discussion. Hon. Members have not advanced any bond fide argument in favour of this clause. The sole argument used in favour of the clause is that it is designed to aid those people who are suffering from agricultural depression, and notwithstanding what the Attorney General has said, no case has been made out for a remission of tithe in the case of the growers of underwood, and certainly not for the growers of timber.

*(6.2.) SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Paneras, S.): It is quite evident the hon. Gentleman does not know as much about underwood as about tithe. I have had 25 years experience of the growing of underwood, and during the last five years we have had a depression in the sale of underwood which never before occurred in the history of that vast produce. The underwood on land which I have had to manage used to yield, for a ten years' cutting, from £1,000 to £1,100 per 100 acres: now, an average crop of 10 years' growth is only worth from £300 to £400. Consequently you will see that when you have calculated the cost per acre—the cost of planting and maintenance—and the rates and tithes, there is less than nothing left for the owner. I could give a thousand instances in the County of Kent which have come under my personal observation during the last five years, which prove that there is a very great depression in the sale of underwood. I can also tell the hon. Gentleman of cases in which Assessment Committees have, within the last two years, reduced the rating of underwood by 60 per cent. Nothing can prove more clearly the truth of what I have said than such action on the part of Assessment Committees. I assure the hon. Member he is entirely wrong.

*(6.4.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I am obliged to the hon. Baronet for his information with regard to underwood; but then my argument as to timber is not touched at all. I fail to see why a remission should be made in the case of the growers of timber. If I bought silver some years ago, when the price was high, I do not see why now, when silver has depreciated in value, I should have my loss made up out of the public purse.

*(6.5.) SIR J. GOLDSMID: I should like to point out how extremely inconsistent the hon. Member is. The other day when the hon. Member for Malden moved to increase the amount of reduction which was to be given by the tithe owner from one-third to one-half, the hon. Member voted for the Amendment.

*MR. S. T. EVANS: I did nothing of the kind. I voted for the omission of the words "two-thirds."

*SIR J. GOLDSMID: The hon. Member voted for the Amendment with the object of inserting the words "one-half." When the hon. Member has had a little more practical experience of Parliament he will know what hon. Members mean when they vote for the omission of words. The other day I stated that I objected not only to "one-half" but to

"one-third," and that I intended to vote against the whole clause. I consider the principle of the clause wrong. But, nevertheless, if you apply it to agriculture you ought to apply it to underwood. If the hon. Member would like information with regard to timber I can give him a little. I have watched the timber market very continuously. About 15 years ago the price of oak per foot was about 3s. Five years, four years, and three years ago the price was about 1s. 6d per foot. There has been a slight rise since then, and now I should say the price is about 2s., or about two-thirds what it was 15 years ago. And oak governs all the rest of the timber trade, consequently you can easily ascertain what the relative values of the different classes of timber are. What I said about underwood is accurate. I will give the hon. Member the names of the Assessment Committees if he would like to hear them. Certainly nothing has suffered so much from depression as the value of underwood.

*(6.8.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The argument of the hon. Baronet (Sir J. Goldsmid), as indeed all the arguments against the Amendment, have related to timber or underwood regarded as an article of commerce. I can understand there has been depression, but it must be borne in mind that a great deal of the timber that is grown in England is grown for ornamental purposes and for sporting purposes. It seems to me monstrous that timber grown for purely sporting or ornamental purposes should be entitled to the benefit of this remission.

(6.9.) MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON: The hon. Member for Glamorganshire says the remission is granted owing to the agricultural depression. I do not understand that to be the case. We were told the other night that the remission is intended as an inducement to landlords to keep their land in cultivation. Such an inducement would apply to underwood with equal force, because landlords who find the tithe very nearly exceeding the total annual value of the underwood, will be apt to cast the underwood on the hands of the tithe owner. As in some cases, 14 years have to elapse before any profit is derived from underwood, I think the tithe owner would be a sufferer if he were to take underwood in hand.

*(6.10.) VISCOUNT WOLMER: I, like my hon. Friend (Sir J. Goldsmid), object altogether to the principle of the clause. I do not believe any case has been made out for agriculturists to have this remission given them. A great many mythical cases have been presented to us, but not an actual one. But if you admit the principle of the clause, as I understand the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. S. Evans) does, I cannot understand why you should except underwood. Hazel and ash are just as much a crop as oats or barley.

*(6.11.) MR. S. T. EVANS: There seems to be some misunderstanding as to why I supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maldon. My position is perfectly clear. I voted for the omission of the words "two-thirds," and reserved the right of voting as I pleased upon words which might be proposed in their place, and if the hon. Baronet (Sir J. Goldsmid) had taken the trouble to read the Amendments he would have seen I had given notice of my intention to move the omission of Clause 3 entirely.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot amend his own Amendment. It would be more convenient for him to withdraw this Amendment and then propose to amend the Government's proposal.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 14, to leave out from the word "lands," to the end of the Clause, and insert the words—

"Other than those used solely for agricultural or pastoral purposes, or for the growth of timber or underwood."—(Sir Michael Hicks Beach.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "or for the growth of timber or underwood."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

(6.15.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 179; Noes 112.—(Div. List, No. 28.)

Words added.

*(6.25.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I now propose to add these words: "Nor to any lands except those occupied by the owners thereof." The object of this Amendment is very clear. It is, in a word, to make the clause a yeomans' clause. It is admitted on all hands that the bargain made by the landlords in 1836 was a good bargain and it cannot be shown why the landlord should be relieved from tithe. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade said the other evening that this clause was intended to apply to the yeomanry only. I propose to make it a yeomanry clause and nothing else. The right hon. Gentleman said the owner ought to have enough out of his land to keep it in cultivation. I would not go so far as my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton), who says that in no case ought you to make any remission in tithe. If it can be shown that the effect of keeping tithe at its present amount will be to throw land out of cultivation, that is an evil which ought to be remedied, and these words would have the desired effect as far as the land of yeomen is concerned. I claim the support of the hon. Member for Leicester, and that also of the noble Lord the Member for Darwen (Viscount Cranborne), who said the other evening that we ought not to reduce tithe by one penny, except in so far as it would prevent land going out of cultivation. Of course I shall have the support of the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Gray), because he speaks merely on behalf of the yeomen farmers. Let me give the Committee a few figures. Take a case in which a farm is worth £150 a year, and the tithe is £125, leaving a margin for the rent of £25. It is proposed by this clause that tithe shall be reduced to £100. The result would be to put £25 into the pockets of the landlord without benefiting anybody else. I think, therefore, the clause ought to be confined to those cases where the owner himself occupies.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, to add, after the words last added, the words "Nor to any lands except those occupied by the owners thereof."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(6.27.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: My argument was, and is, that there should be a sufficient margin, which is supposed to be allowed for by this clause, for keeping the land in cultivation. The hon. Member does not seem to know what is required in order that land shall be kept in cultivation. It is not merely the possession of agricultural implements or stock, or the power to pay wages; there must be besides, the keeping up of buildings, drainage, fencing, and all the other things which fall on the owner of the land, and not on the tenant. This clause proposes to make the necessary allowance to the owner of land whether he lets or occupies it. The hon. Member proposes to make it penal for an owner to let his land. Does the hon. Member wish indirectly to discourage tenant farmers throughout the country? Because that would be the only practical effect of this proposal on the very class which I suppose he desires to encourage. I cannot imagine that he will persist in what would be a gross and unreasonable injustice, and I oppose the Amendment.

(6.29.) MR. C. W. GRAY: Of course, I oppose the Amendment, and I merely rise to say that the hon. Member erred in stating that my interest in this question has been merely on behalf of the yeoman farmers. I think I have made it plain from first to last that I have at heart the interests of the farmers generally.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That Clause 3, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(6.33.) MR. S. T. EVANS: It is my intention to take a division against the clause, and I hope I may have the support of the noble Lord the Member for Darwen (Lord Cranborne), and others who, in their discussions, have spoken against the clause. The circumstances attending agriculture in this country have not, in any material degree, changed since 1887; and it seems to me that an argument made use of in that year by the Prime Minister in another place, goes directly to the exclusion of this clause. Upon the First Reading of the Tithes Bill introduced in 1887 the Prime Minister said—

"There was no ground for the misconception that landlords had made a bad bargain in 1836.

The bargain of 1826 was a good one for landowners, and it remained a good one still."

Now, of course the Prime Minister would not in any case make a hazardous statement, and it cannot be that he did so in this instance, because he repeated it at another stage of the Bill when he went into the matter more fully. Replying to the Duke of Marlborough, he said—

"He had a distinct opinion that the landowners had no case whatever. His impression was that if anyone had to complain it was the tithe owner."

The noble Lord opposite (Lord Cranborne), it seems, holds a brief for the clerical tithe owner. The Prime Minister went on to say—

"The whole fall had been in the price of grain, and he very much doubted if there had been any fall at all in the price of green crops or of stock. That made it all the worse for those who came into the arrangement of 1836. If there was any case at all, it was on behalf of the clergy and not against them."

Then again on another occasion, when the Bill was in Committee, the Prime Minister spoke strongly on the matter. Replying to an Amendment moved by Lord Brabourne, he said—

"The settlement of 1836 is more advantageous to the land-owner than if he remained under the old law. The noble Lord did not make out the shadow of a case for re-opening the question of valuation and tearing up the bargain which Parliament made in 1836."

That is abundant testimony from the Prime Minister that landowners have no ground for complaint or reason for altering the bargain of 1836. I have pointed out on another occasion during these discussions that the Government abandons the Tory respect for contracts, and sweeps away contracts that are prejudicial to the interests of the landowners, while it keeps strictly to those which are beneficial to the landowner. Take the case of the lay tithe owner. Of course, on account of the object for which the Bill was introduced, to put down the tithe agitation in Wales—an object, let me say in parenthesis, the Bill will not accomplish—on account of that avowed object, the discussions have proceeded on the assumption that the main part of the tithe is received by clerical tithe owners, but, of course, there are lay impropiators. What happens in that case? A lay impropiator may have bought the tithe only last year, and yet you deduct 33½ per cent. from the income of one private individual and hand it over to another private individual. I do not see the justice of such a proceeding, and on that ground, and on the larger ground that no sufficient case has been made out for reduction of tithe, I propose to divide against the clause.

(6.40.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 182; Noes 103.—(Div. List, No. 29.)

(6.49.) Clause 4.

Verbal Amendments made.

(6.50.) MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): I desire to move an Amendment to line 21, as follows:—

“And any corn-rent in lieu of tithe rent-charge paid by virtue of any Local Act which has not been converted into tithe rent-charge under the Act of 1860.”

I move this in consequence of an answer I received a day or two ago when I inquired if these corn-rents would come within the operation of the Bill. I was informed by the right hon. Gentleman they would not. Now, there are many parishes in this country in which tithe rent-charge is not levied, but there are corn-rents fixed by Local Acts of Parliament. In one parish where I have a little landed interest tithe takes this form under an Act of 1795, and from that day to this the rents have been readjusted every 14 years. This Bill does not propose in any way to affect the valuation of tithe, it is merely a recovery of tithe Bill, a Bill for facilitating the securing of the tithe. In these circumstances it seems desirable that tithepayers and tithe owners, in a parish affected by a Local Act such as I speak of, should not be deprived of the benefits of the Bill. The tenant should go to the landlord and say, “In future you must pay the tithe,” and the rector should be able to recover from the landowner in the County Court. I see no reason whatever why this should not be so, and I see no difficulty in practice why these corn-rents should not be under this Act. It is true that by agreement among the tithepayers and tithe owners in a parish they can come under Section 1 of the Act of 1860, and convert these corn-rents into tithe rent-charge; but in the instance with which I am familiar there seems to be no disposition of payers and owners to take advantage of that Act, nor is there any reason why they should be compelled to do so. The Bill does not affect the valuation and apportionment of corn-rents in any way, it merely gives facilities which I think ought to be availed of in these cases, and I hope on reflection the right hon. Gentleman will accept the Amendment.

Mr. S. T. Evans

Amendment proposed, in line 30, after the word aforesaid to insert the words—

“And any corn-rent in lieu of tithe, by virtue of any Local Act of Parliament which has not been converted into a rent-charge under the Tithe Act, 1860.”—(Mr. Radcliffe Cooke.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*(6.55.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: There are hundreds of these Local Acts, and it is not too much to say that hardly two of them are identical. The circumstances vary to an extraordinary degree, and though no doubt in principle it is desirable that the same law should govern all these matters, it is in practice impossible to apply it in this way, just as it was to apply other Amendments of the Act of 1836 to all these Acts. The proper way is to take advantage of the first section of the Act of 1860. That Act provides that wherever corn-rents are payable by virtue of these Local Acts, and such corn-rents are subject to variations at certain periods, parties may apply to the Commissioners, and obtain commutation under the Act of 1836, at any time when the revision of the corn rents takes place, and in some cases this is the way these rents have been dealt with. I hope the hon. Gentleman will not press the Amendment.

(6.56.) MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: I think the right hon. Gentleman has somewhat misapprehended the case. If it be true, as he says it is, that there are hundreds of these cases, then there are that number of parishes where the parties have not availed themselves of the Act of 1860, for some reasons that seems good to themselves. That there are so many cases still extant, shows that neither tithe owners or tithepayers desire to avail themselves of the Act of 1860. I suppose the Government considered these cases when contemplating an amendment of the Tithe Act. I may conclude they did so, and I should have thought it would have been desirable to deal with them under this Bill, without alteration in the valuation or incidence of the rents. However, as the Government refuse the Amendment, I do not press it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(7.30.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I beg to move the insertion after the word "pasture" of the words "nor a rent-charge payable to any impropiator or corporation." Last Session the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill gave us a notable account of the poor clergy in Wales and in many parts of England, who he said were practically starving because they could not collect their tithes. Well, I wish to restrict this Bill to the poor clergy. Why should the lay impropiator—and I am one myself—and why should the great corporations have any relief? Colleges and corporations who own enormous quantities of these tithes never lay out one farthing upon the land from which the tithes are derived. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who are now holding enormous quantities of land, to the great detriment of the country, because they do not know how to invest the enormous sums they have in their hands. They do nothing to improve the land, and do not contribute a penny towards drainage or building. As a matter of justice, I do not think the tithe owner should be called on to receive the tithe in a new shape, while the tithepayer should be called on to collect the tithe. At present the tithe owner is spending from 5 to 10 per cent. in collecting his tithes, even in the most peaceable districts. When the Bill passes, he will practically get them collected for him by the landowner, besides having the tithe made the first charge on the land.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 33, after the word "pasture," to insert the words "nor a rent-charge payable to any lay impropiator or corporation."—(Sir J. Swinburne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(7.4.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not know whether I rightly gathered from the speech of the hon. Baronet that he himself is a tithepayer to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: I am a tithe owner.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: But is he also a tithepayer to the Commissioners?

SIR J. SWINBURNE: I do happen to be a tithepayer to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Well, then, this Amendment, if passed, will have the effect of preventing the Ecclesiastical Commissioners from recovering the tithe from him, and compelling them to distrain upon his tenants. I am also a tithepayer to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the view of the hon. Member does not commend itself to me as just.

Question put, and negatived.

(7.5.) MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON: The object of the Amendment which stands in my name is to extend Clause 4. I propose that no notice shall be taken of rents arising from sporting rights. I think we may well ask the Government to accept this Amendment, so as to prevent the tithe owner being placed in a better position, as far as sporting rights are concerned, than he was before.

Amendment proposed in page 4, line 37, at end of Clause, to add the words—

"The expression 'rents and profits' in this Act shall not apply to rents and profits arising from any sporting rights."—(Mr. H. R. Farquharson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(7.6.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I cannot think that my hon. Friend has quite considered what the effect of the Amendment will be. If it passes, and the proprietor uses his land as a rabbit-warren, he will free himself of the tithe. That does not seem to me to be a way of meeting the present agricultural depression.

(7.7) MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON: I have, of course, anticipated that objection, but my Amendment would only apply to sporting rights, where the land is also let for agricultural purposes. These would only be exceptional cases in which the land would be turned into a rabbit-warren, and I do not think that for the sake of such exceptional cases the tithe owners of the country should be given a lien upon the sporting rights of the landowners.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clause 5.

*(7.8.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I beg to move the next Amendment on the Paper, namely, to leave out "becomes payable," and insert "commences to accrue." I do not know whether the Government intend that the Act should be retrospective in its character, but legislation is not often made retrospective where the rights of parties are concerned, and that would be the effect if the clause is passed as it stands. It would be so if tithe was payable on the 28th of February, and the Bill became law on the 1st of March. I hope the Government will see their way to adopt the suggestion I have made, particularly in view of the time it would take to adopt the necessary County Court rules, and to appreciate the changes effected.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 39, to leave out the words "becomes payable," and insert the words "commences to accrue."—(Mr. S. T. Evans.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(7.10.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not think it would be fair to say that the words of the clause make the Act retrospective. The Amendment which has been placed on the Paper by the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Bryn Roberts) would have that effect, but of course we cannot discuss that now. The Act would only apply as it stands to every sum on account of tithe rent-charge, which first become payable on the half-yearly tithe paying day, which comes next after the passing of the Act. That appears to me to be a fair and proper date for the commencement of the Act. The effect of the Amendment would be to postpone the operation of the Bill for six months. I think that would be in every degree undesirable. The matter has been long before Parliament, and I think every one is prepared for a change. Three months must elapse before proceedings can be taken.

Mr. H. R. Farguharson

*(7.11.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I should like the right hon. Gentleman to bear in mind that the contract between the landlord and tenant has been torn up, and therefore some reasonable notice ought to be given to the tenant of the coming into force of a new one.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID: Is it true that tithe rent-charge becomes payable only on the 1st of January and the 1st of July? [Cries of "No!"] I am informed so; and, if that be the case, the supposititious case put by the hon. Member for Glamorganshire would not of course apply. This Act should be brought into force at once and no exceptions should be made.

(7.13.) MR. STUART RENDEL: If this Act were simply for the purpose of improving the process of recovery, I think the position of the Government would be one to which we should all give in. But it is really more than that. It is an Act for altering the whole status of tithes in the most complicated way, and no doubt landlords and tenants will require time to reconcile themselves to the new condition of things. It seems hardly consistent with the gravity of the change Parliament is contemplating, that it should come into operation with the suddenness that the Government propose. I hope the decision of the right hon. Gentleman is not final on this point. I cannot help believing that if the matters were more considered the value of the Amendment would be recognized. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will reserve this Amendment for further consideration on the Report stage of the Bill.

*(7.15.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I think the Government can hardly have thought of the great change this Bill will effect in the relations of the parties. If it merely altered the process of recovery, it might reasonably come into operation at once; but, as has been pointed out, it does a great deal more than that, and will involve readjustments and rearrangements, which cannot be carried out without time being allowed for that purpose.

*(7.16.) MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich): I think the hon. Baronet (Sir J. Goldsmid) is in error as to the date when tithe is due. For my part of England it is payable on the 1st of April and the 1st of October. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman (Sir M. Hicks Beach) at what date this Bill will come into operation?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It will come into operation on the passing of the Act.

*(7.17.) MR. S. T. EVANS: The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that the Act ought not to be retrospective in its character; but he has not answered the question I put. As it affects the relationship between landlord and tenant, I do not think the Bill ought to come into operation on its passing. I say that if tithe becomes payable on the 28th of February, and this Bill receives the Royal Assent on the next day, it will be retrospective in its character. I do not think this point has been sufficiently considered by the Government, and I press it further upon their consideration.

*(7.18.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Of course, any point that is raised will have the consideration of the Government, and I will consider this question further; but I am bound to say I do not at present see any reason whatever for accepting the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

(7.19.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: I do not intend to move the Amendment on the same point which stands in my name.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I move the Amendment standing in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 14, after the word "shall," to insert the words "as respects any sum becoming due after the passing of this Act."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Clause 5, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6.

*(7.20.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I now move an Amendment with the object of excluding Wales from the operation of the Bill. My reason for moving the Amendment is because we are all agreed, and have been, that it is to do away with the disturbances which have taken place in the Principality that the Bill has been introduced. The Government would never have touched the subject at all unless they had been guided by the so-called agitation in Wales; but the Bill is of such a character that instead of allaying the effects of this agitation it will add to them. Instead of assuaging the ill-feeling which exists it will embitter the relations between the Church and the Nonconformists—and goodness knows they are bitter enough already. What course will be followed in the future by conscientious Nonconformists? Why, they will refuse to pay tithes just as their fathers refused to pay Church rates. The Nonconformists have hitherto refused to pay; they decline to pay at the present time, and in the future they will continue to refuse to pay. What will the Government gain by the 2nd clause, which is the main operative part of the measure? They will be creating litigation where there was none before. As things stand at present the course of the tithe owner is clear. All he has to do is to give his notice and to distrain, but under the Bill he will have to take his parishioner into Court—and surely nothing will tend less to allay ill-feeling between a farmer and his parson than such a thing at that. And what will become of the litigation created by the Bill? When you have gone through all the processes of the County Court you will be precisely where you are now, the only difference being that whereas at present the tithe is collected by the agents of the tithe owner, they will be collected by the officer of the Court. What has happened before would happen now. The person who on principle has hitherto objected to pay will still refuse to pay, and the effect of the measure will be, not to put the Church in Wales on its legs, but to bring discredit on the administration of justice by associating that administration with the maintenance of an unpopular and anti-national Church. For those reasons it seems to me that the Bill, so far as it applies to Wales, is a mistake, and I therefore venture to recommend my proposal to the House. If English Members want the Bill, let them have it, but as to Wales it is not required, either by tithe owner or tithepayer, and fails to effect the object for which it has been introduced. I do not care to go into the matter further, as on Friday fortnight, under the Motion of which the hon.

Member for Merthyr gave notice a short time ago, we shall have an opportunity of discussing the whole question, and of showing on what a frail basis the Church in Wales rests. In the meantime, because I think the Bill will fail in the main object with which it has been introduced, I move the Amendment to exclude the Principality from its operation.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 18, after the word "to," to insert the word "Wales." — (Mr. G. Osborne Morgan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Wales' be there inserted."

(7.25.) MR. J. L. MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): I do not propose to say more than a few words on this Amendment. When the Bill was read a second time I opposed it, and stated my reasons for offering opposition. Those reasons are as strong now as they were then. I ventured on that occasion to point out to the House that the Government in bringing forward the Bill would, so far as Wales was concerned—and I am dealing simply with the question of Wales now—fail in the object they had in view. I ventured to point out that the Welsh clergy when they came to understand the operation of the Bill would oppose it. Since then a large body of Conservatives and clergymen in Pembrokeshire have met together for the purpose of discussing the Bill, and I think I am right in saying that the view they took was hostile to the Bill. I put it to the Government, that in the interests of the the body they are so anxious to benefit, it would be well for them to consider whether it would not be wise of them to accept the Amendment of my right hon. Friend. The clergy in Pembrokeshire came to the conclusion that the County Court was a very unsatisfactory remedy, and one reverend gentleman—a rural dean, I think—expressed a strong feeling against procedure through the medium of the County Court. These clergymen if not very numerous were certainly very representative. They expressed very strong disapproval of the Bill, and I, therefore, put it to the Government that it would be well for them to consider even at the last stage of the measure the advisability of accepting this proposal.

Mr. G. Osborne Morgan

*(7.28.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I will imitate the example of the two hon. Members who preceded me, and will not detain the House more than a moment from arriving at a conclusion. The Committee has, I think, shown that it regards this Amendment as an exceedingly bad joke, and one that has fallen extremely flat. Anyone with any real sense of humour would, I think, have been unable to put on the Paper such an Amendment; because, really, the only light in which it can be treated is with good-humoured ridicule. The fact is pretty well known, that it was the disturbances in Wales which first called attention to the question of the tithes, and which induced Her Majesty's Government to deal with it. They have taken up the question, and have dealt with it not in a provincial way but on a national basis. They have not confined the Bill to Wales, but have made it a general measure affecting the whole country. The right hon. Gentleman opposite proposes to exclude from the operation of the Bill that portion of Her Majesty's dominions to which it seems certainly to be most applicable, and I am glad that he has shown the country in so plain and unmistakable a manner the way in which he and his friends are disposed to treat this measure, although I am still charitable enough to believe that he and they are not perfectly in earnest in the proposal he has, at the last moment, introduced. I hope, therefore, that other hon. Members, who have conducted these discussions in a very different spirit, and who have argued the different points brought forward with great moderation, and without any undue animus or violence, will not be disposed to assist the right hon. Gentleman in the course he is pursuing. I am glad, however, that the Motion has been made, because it clearly shows the nature of the opposition the right hon. Gentleman and his friends are disposed to offer to the Bill, and that when Her Majesty's Government proposed to relieve the occupiers throughout the Kingdom from the payment of the tithe the Welsh Members on the other side of the House desire to exclude from the operation of the measure the occupiers in their portion of the country.

*(7.29.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly welcome to any advantage he may hope to derive from the course I have felt it my duty to adopt; but I tell him I doubt very much whether he will find a single Member from Wales who will be found in the same Lobby with him when the Division is taken upon this Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman who lives some part of the year in Wales is not himself a Welsh Member; and I think he will find that he is absolutely unsupported by the Representatives of Welsh constituencies.

(7.30.) SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN (Swansea, District): I am glad, Sir, that at last it has been clearly and distinctly stated for the first time by a Member of Her Majesty's Government that this Bill has been in reality launched at the Principality of Wales. We have all known this for some time, but, up to the present moment, we have had no distinct declaration of the fact from the Front Bench opposite. Now, however, the avowal has been made, I quite concur with my right hon. Friend (Mr. G. O. Morgan) in asserting his belief that there is not a single Welsh Member who will vote for this Bill. For, after all, what is the Bill? It is a paternal measure, emanating from the extreme goodness of the English Government, who are endeavouring to impose their own views on the Principality. Has Wales asked for this measure? Have there been any Petitions in favour of such a Bill? I have heard of none, and I doubt whether there has been a single Petition from Wales demanding such a measure. We are accustomed, when other measures of importance are brought forward, to almost innumerable Petitions, both for and against, but in this case there has been no desire whatever on the part of the Welsh people to be legislated for in this manner, and after this Division has been taken—for I have no doubt my right hon. Friend intends to divide the Committee upon his Amendment—[MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: Hear, hear!]
—it will be made quite clear that the unanimous opinion of the Representatives of Wales is against the measure which is now being forced upon their country by the English Government.

*(7.33.) MR. ABEL THOMAS (Cardiff, E.): I should like to say a word or two on this matter before the Division is taken. I quite concur in what the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment has just stated, and I would add that if the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Raikes), when he next goes down to Wales, is able to find any gentleman who will be affected by this measure in favour of it, he ought to put that individual in a glass case, and bring him up here as a curiosity. In point of fact, no one in Wales desires this measure; it is not wanted by the landlords; the Welsh parson does not want it; and the tenant has no wish for it. The tenant in whose benefit, together with that of the landlord, it is to be passed, says he does not want it, and it will do him no good. If it does affect the tenant in any way it will merely be by preventing him from being able to protest against the payment of tithes, as he has hitherto done. But even then he will find a mode of protesting against this measure. I see no reason why I should alter the opinion I expressed at the time. My hon. Friend the Member for West Carnarvon, and others near me, spoke upon the subject a long time ago; and it seems to me that now, after what the right hon. Member opposite (Mr. Raikes) has said, every Welsh Member in this House will be found voting in favour of the Amendment, and against the entire principle of the Bill.

*(7.36.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I only interpose in order to say that I think my right hon. Friend ought to be grateful to the hon. Member who has just spoken for having shown what is the object of the Welsh tenant farmers. He tells us that their object is to continue their protest against the Tithe Bill, I suppose in a manner which, as a general rule, involves a breach of the peace. That kind of protest will be taken away from the tenants by this Bill, and although the hon. Member says the tenants gain nothing by the measure, I think the rest of the House will agree that they will gain at least in the following particulars: First of all, the landlords will be called upon to pay the tithe rent-charge instead of the tenants; next, the clergyman or tithe owner will not be able to distrain as hitherto upon the farmer for non-payment of the tithe, but will apply to the landlords direct; and last, if the tenant farmer has to pay the tithe under his contract instead of having to do it within 21 days he will have a period of three months. If these are not deemed vantages by the Welsh farmers they must be very differently constituted from other people in the United Kingdom.

(7.38.) MR. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): I should like to ask the hon. Member who has just spoken from the Opposite Benches whether if he were asked to give up a portion of his revenues and receive nothing for it, he would be the less ready to protest against that proceeding? The Welsh Members are glad to have it avowed once for all from the Treasury Bench—[Interruption.] If hon. Members who interrupt me only knew what it was to think in Welsh and speak in English, they would be inclined to make more allowances for what I say. I was stating that we were glad to find it avowed from the Treasury Bench that this Bill has been brought forward with special reference to Wales. We thought so long ago, and now we find we have been right in that opinion. We now find that the disturbances in Wales have been the means of obtaining the intervention of the Government in this matter, and I should like to ask the Government in all seriousness whether it is their intention by this Bill to perpetuate as a legal right in our Principality, that which the Welsh people consider to be an extreme moral wrong. That is the difference between the Welsh tithepayers and those resident in the rest of the United Kingdom. They regard the tithe as an extreme moral wrong, because they are compelled to pay that impost irrespective of any benefit they are thereby enabled to derive. The House will probably pardon me for putting before it a few facts as to the real condition of things in that portion of the Principality where the disturbance originated. I will, in the first instance, refer to a report which appeared on the 13th of December last in the Western Mail, which, although a Tory paper, and therefore one which we could not expect to exaggerate on the side of the Nonconformists, is a paper which is nevertheless very fair in its reports on Welsh national questions. It says—

Mr. Sydney Gedge

"The condition of the Church in the rural districts of the Principality of Wales is anything but satisfactory."

Further on the writer refers to a paragraph that appeared in a Northamptonshire paper on the 31st of October last, respecting the National Church, and gives the population, the number of the clergy, the number of Churchmen, and the number of churches in eight districts in Pembrokeshire, one of the districts in which the disturbances first occurred. The report then goes on to say that in Bafil Parish, with a population of 140, the living was valued at £104; there were two Churchmen in the parish, the rest of the people having to go to another parish for their religious service. In another parish, with a population of 143, the living is valued at £103, there are no Churchmen at all in the parish, and the 143 individuals have to go elsewhere for religious purposes.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I do not see how this can be relevant to the question before the Committee.

MR. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): With all due deference, I am endeavouring to explain that the people residing in the districts where the disturbances occurred are compelled to pay a tithe for which they receive no service whatever.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not relevant to the Amendment now before the Committee.

MR. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): Therefore, I conclude that Wales ought to be excluded from the operation of this Bill. Receiving no service at all, it is a moral wrong to place these people in a position of being compelled to pay tithes, and to lay them open to imprisonment also.

*(7.47.) MR. S. T. EVANS: Sir, I will venture to say a few words in answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, who, with the two hon. Members behind him, appear to know little about the Principality. The right hon. Gentleman was inclined to indulge in a little prophecy. I also will indulge in a little prophecy. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that this Bill will put an end to the tithe agitation in Wales. It will do nothing of the kind. This Bill will be an exceedingly useful Bill to us when we become the owners of this public property, but the tenant farmers have nothing to thank the Government for in this Bill. The Government thought to repress the tenant farmers by this Bill, and if the right hon. Gentleman were to go to Wales he would find that he had very little power of persuasion over them. The right hon. Gentleman has gone to Wales on many previous occasions, but he has not been able to bring back one Tory Member to represent the tenant farmers of that country.

(7.50.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The hon. Member for Stockport has said that the farmers, in protesting against the tithes, have committed breaches of the peace. I venture to say that the hon. Member knows nothing about these disturbances, or that he has read the reports of some prejudiced paper. These tithe disturbances have been grossly exaggerated. For instance, there was a tithe disturbance lately in the County of Denbigh; a great fuss was made about it, and the military were sent to quell the rioters. They were sent absolutely without necessity. An inquiry was instituted into the facts of the matter with this result: that it was proved that no violence whatever was offered to anybody, and that the crowd at no period of the whole proceedings exceeded 100, including women and children. Yet to quell that formidable disturbance—that terrible riot—the military were called out. During the Recess I had the opportunity of witnessing tithe sales, and I never saw any disturbance. On the contrary, they were of a most orderly character. The police were represented by a constable and a superintendent, and never for a moment had the superintendent cause to regret his trust in the discretion of the people. At the end of the proceeding he thanked the people, who were protesting against the tithes, for their orderly conduct. These disturbances have been exaggerated in a most monstrous and gross manner; and I believe, as far as they are concerned, there is no necessity whatever for this Bill. Here we have been wasting a fortnight of this Session, after having waited day after day of previous Sessions, while the invaluable time of the nation has been wasted in another place, simply for the purpose of suppressing a few expressions of opinions, a few emphatic protests by the farmers of Wales against what they consider to be an injustice. Legislation for the benefit of the working classes has been postponed and blocked by a miserable Bill of this kind. This Bill should not apply to Wales, because it does remedy the evils of which the Welsh people complain. Our grievance in Wales is not that the method of enforcing the tithe is not as efficacious as it might be. We have not complained that the costs are not burdensome enough. We have not petitioned Parliament for the County Court process for the recovery of tithe. On the contrary. Our grievance is this: that tithe, which is national property, is at the present moment applied to the purposes of a sect which is the least influential and does the least work of all the religious denominations in Wales.

THE CHAIRMAN: That argument is hardly relevant to the Amendment.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I submit to your ruling, Sir. I support the Amendment of my hon. Friend because there is absolutely no necessity for this Bill, and because it does not remedy the grievances of Wales.

(7.55.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 93; Noes 140.—(Div. List, No. 30.)

(8.3.) MR. H. GARDNER: The Amendment which stands in my name is to insert the word "England," and the effect of that proceeding would be to exclude England from the operation of the Bill. I do not know whether the Postmaster General will see in this proposal a secret or recondite jest, but I tell him I mean it in grim and solemn earnest. I take a deep interest in this Bill, which I may point out was never asked for by England. We have had it from the Postmaster General, whose name is on the back of the Bill, that the measure was brought forward to meet certain difficulties in the Principality of Wales, where the collection of the tithe rent-charge had led to most regrettable riots. We did not ask for the Bill in England. The Bill, which is one of a series of many which the Government have endeavoured to pass, was brought forward solely and absolutely in order to put down the riots in Wales. To use the right hon. Gentleman's, the Postmaster General's, own words, it is to facilitate the collection of tithe rent-charge. Why on earth then has it been imposed upon us? I believe the sole reason for including England was because Her Majesty's Government found it convenient to extend the operation of the Bill to the whole of England, and England has been penalised solely in order that Her Majesty's Government may not be taunted with having brought in a Coercion Bill for Wales as well as for Ireland. This, I repeat, has been done simply for the convenience of the Government. The agricultural classes in this country have for many years past supported the leaders of the Conservative Party, and I am glad that they will be able to see now in what their support at last has landed them. Tithepayers will be subjected to very great inconvenience and loss under the Bill, and it is very doubtful whether they will not be subjected to imprisonment also by the operation of the County Court clause. They certainly are put in a worse position than they were before, because a man who through religious conviction may desire to make a protest against the payment of tithe rent-charge may be subjected to imprisonment as well as fine. Will the Government give us their reasons for including England in a Bill directed against the Principality of Wales? Have there, for instance, been any riots or disturbances in East Anglia, or in any of the counties which are specially protesting against the tithe rent-charge? The right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General knows there have not been any real difficulties such as have occurred in Wales in the collection of tithe. Then, why have the Government deliberately made up their minds, after so many years' consideration, to inflict this Bill on the tithepayers of England? I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture, whom I am glad to see in his place, and who deservedly holds a position created solely to guard the interests of agriculture, what are the reasons which have induced Her Majesty's Government to introduce this Bill? I do not wish to make any charges against the Government, but it seems to me that the only conceivable reason is that it will increase the price of the tithe rent-charge, so that tithe owners may get it redeemed at a higher value than could be done under the Act of 1836. Remember, that a Commission is to inquire now into the question of the redemption of tithe, and it is unfair to the tithepayers of this country to introduce such a measure when the Government are going to appoint a Commission to do this. If my hon. Friends will support me I shall certainly press this matter to a Division, because the tithe owners ought not at this juncture to be placed in a position to make a better bargain than they could do under the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836. I beg to move, in page 5, line 18, after the word "to," to insert the word "England."

Mr. H. Gardner

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Committee has already refused to exclude Wales from the operation of the Bill, and therefore the Amendment must be proposed so as to refer to England alone.

MR. GARDNER: That is what I desire.

THE CHAIRMAN: Then the Amendment will be, in page 5, line 18, after the word "to," to insert the words "England, which expression does not here include Wales."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(8.13.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON: I think my hon. Friend's arguments might have elicited some expression of opinion from the Government, and that there should not have been simply a conspiracy of silence. What was the point of what he said? His remarks were elicited by a frank avowal altogether uncalled for from the Postmaster General that the beginning and end of this Bill both are to be found in the Principality of Wales. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that the tithe disturbances in Wales were the prime cause of the introduction of the Bill. If the Government thought it their duty to extend the Bill to England, why did they not bring in a complete measure instead of so one-sided a proposal? On the contrary, they have rejected every proposal which would widen the measure or render it more fair, with the result, as the Bill now stands, that under Clause 2 it coerces the tithepayers of Wales, and under Clause 3 it deludes the tithepayers of England. Her Majesty's Government are bound to give some reason why, having decided to upset the settlement of 1836, they have thought it necessary to extend the provisions of their Welsh Tithe Bill to England. Why did they not wait until such an extension was asked for? Cannot they see that conditions which are applicable to Wales are altogether inapplicable to England?

*(8.16.) MR. C. W. GRAY: Although I have agreed with several of the suggestions of my hon. Friend opposite, I cannot go with him when he says that this measure will place the tithepayer in a worse position than he has hitherto occupied. The Government are entitled to credit for having carried into effect the wish of the House expressed two years ago by transferring the burden of paying the tithes from the tenant farmer to the owner. So far as that principle is concerned, we must admit that this Bill has fairly carried that into effect, and I cannot, therefore, join in my hon. Friend's sweeping condemnation of it. The tenant farmers of England as a class—and, of course, we cannot expect that they will be unanimous—will, in the great majority of cases, thoroughly appreciate the change which has been made in their position, and we must therefore give the Government credit for having carried out one of the principles for which we have been contending.

(8.19.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I do not know that I entirely agree with the hon. Member who has just sat down, that credit ought to be given to Her Majesty's Government for having introduced this particular measure, seeing that the Opposition rather take credit to themselves for having twice defeated the Government Bills on this subject, and for having forced them to introduce the present measure, which in its principle is totally inconsistent with their previous measures for dealing with the tithe, and is in accordance with the principle for which the Opposition have always contended, namely, that of throwing the burden of paying the tithe upon the owner instead of upon the tenant farmer. The Bill of 1889 was a most unjust measure, for it proposed to throw the whole burden on the tenant farmers of England. We, however, opposed it, and were fortunate enough to defeat it. Then came the Bill of 1890, which also in our opinion contained many provisions which were extremely oppressive with regard to the occupiers, and this Bill we likewise defeated. The result is the present Bill, which, in point of fact, embodies the principle for which we contended, for its 1st clause transfers the liability for the tithe from the occupier to the owner. I cannot consequently vote for this Amendment, because the 1st clause of the Bill makes that transfer, and I have always said that a Bill upon these lines would receive my support. As regards the objections which we entertain to the 2nd and 3rd clauses, I will not now discuss them, for they can be debated on the Report stage.

*(8.22.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Hitherto I had supposed that Her Majesty's Government were the parents of the present measure, but now I find that it has the paternal blessing of the right hon. Gentlemen opposite. In these extremely agreeable circumstances, I do feel disposed to quarrel with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. It is the more pleasant to be able to agree with the right hon. Gentleman, because the right hon. Gentleman is so completely at variance with his distinguished supporter behind him. The hon. Member asked why we had extended its provisions to England. I will tell him. We believe that it is a good thing that the owner shall be made directly responsible for the tithe. We believe it is a good thing that the tenant shall be free from liability to distraint for the tithe. We believe that it is a good thing that part of the tithe should be remitted in cases of extreme hardship; and we do not see why the blessings which it is proposed to confer upon Wales should not be extended to England.

MR. H. GARDNER: I shall not trouble the House by taking a Division. I wished merely to make my protest, and I now ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*(8.25.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I desire to move an addition to Clause 6 which will limit the operation of the Bill to three years. I do so because there is so much difference of opinion as to the merits of the Bill. I do not suppose it likely anyone will wish to interfere with the 1st clause; but as to the other clauses, there may be reasons for re-considering them. After all, this Bill does not settle the tithe question, for that probably will not be disposed of until the Church question itself is settled. The Marquess of Salisbury may think that, by getting rid of the Welsh difficulty, he is quieting the whole trouble, and doing away with the odium which must attach to the Church when it puts in a distress in order to get money for religious purposes. But he is mistaken. I need not detain the House at length. I understand it is not unusual for the operation of Bills to be limited in the manner I propose, and I hope the Government will agree to my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 19, after "1891," to add words, "and shall remain in force for a period of three years."—(Mr. Morton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

* (8.27.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It appears to me that the effect of the hon. Member's Amendment might be productive of inconvenience to his Party, because if that Party are to come into Office, as hon. Members opposite say they are certain to within the next three years, the right hon. Gentlemen who are now sitting opposite may not thank the hon. Member for plunging them into a renewed struggle over the tithe question. Should the hon. Member, however, be disposed to look at the matter from a higher point of view, I should like to point out to him that if the Bill is a good one it deserves a longer life than the limited period of existence the hon. Member proposes to give it. It would be absurd at the end of three years to revert to the old system, which we are now condemning. I hope the hon. Member will not press the Amendment.

* (8.29.) MR. MORTON: Although I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman that I am opposing the interests of my Party in making this proposal, I do not intend to press the matter to a Division. No doubt our Party will be in Office in three years' time, and will be prepared to deal with this question at the proper time.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 6 agreed to. (8.30.)

Mr. Morton

(9.1.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

New Clause (Power of Appeal).—brought up, and read the first time.

(9.4.) MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): I have to propose the addition of a clause giving an appeal on points of law or equity from the decision of the County Court. This Bill confers a special jurisdiction upon the County Court; but it contains no special power of appeal; and I take it, therefore, that the appellate powers under the Bill will be according to Section 120 of the County Court Act. That section limits appeals from the County Court to actions where the subject matter exceeds the sum of £20, except by leave of the County Court Judge. I maintain that unless in the Bill are provided special powers of appeal litigants will be denied the right of appeal altogether, because the majority of cases that come under the Act will be for the recovery of sums under £20. Of course, I am not speaking of the cases of tithes grouped or consolidated in the hands of large landowners—I allude to small freeholders, of whom there are some 6,000 throughout the Principality. Indeed, throughout Wales cases will not only be under £20, but I might say under £5. In the largest agricultural county in Wales—Carmarthenshire—I take the figures for tithe rent-charge in three parishes, and I find the average in each parish is £3 per annum, £2 15s. per annum, and £2 11s. per annum. Now, I contend that when £20 was fixed as the limit of appeal by the County Court Act of 1888, it was not, of course, contemplated that a large body of tithe-payers might come under the operation of the Act; they were not taken into account, because the jurisdiction of the County Court goes up to £50, and the limit of appeal is £20, or less than one-half. The right of appeal belongs, of course, to all classes of litigants, and I hope tithe-payers will not be denied that right. There will be very little hope for tithe-payers in Wales that they will obtain liberty to appeal from the County Court Judges. Who are these Judges? I do not wish to speak disrespectfully, but to make a true statement of fact. They are English-speaking gentlemen, and strong Churchmen, without any particular sympathy with those yeomen farmers in the Principality. Not only so, but there have been tithe actions in County Courts in Wales where leave to appeal has been asked for and invariably refused by the County Court Judges. Notably, there was one case of an action the other day for "pound brenc'h" under an old statute as to which no previous decision had been given for 200 years, and the Judge in that case decided against the defendant on a point of law, and an important point, too, that raised the question of penalties upon the defendant. There was a case in which one would naturally suppose the right of appeal would have been granted, but it was refused, and I may quote this as an instance of what the County Court will do unless the defendant has of right the power of appeal. I have no expectation that the Judges will enlarge the means of appeal under the Bill, and I hope, therefore, the Government will see their way to agree to the Amendment; and if they will not, I am afraid I must press the Motion to a Division.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the following Clause be read a second time":—

"If any party in any action or matter under this Act shall be dissatisfied with the determination or direction of the Judge of the County Court id point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence, the party aggrieved by the Judgment, direction, decision, or order of the Judge may appeal from the same to the High Court, in such manner and subject to such conditions as may be for the time being provided by the rules of the Supreme Court regulating the procedure on appeals from inferior courts to the High Court."—(Mr. Randell.)

*(9.10.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I am extremely sorry that the hon. Member should consider it necessary to press this clause. The law is perfectly clear, and Section 120 of the Act gives an appeal in any action or matter in which either of the parties is dissatisfied with any decision or point of law, or equity, or in regard to admission of evidence; the only exception is that there is no appeal in any action for contract or tort under £20, and, so far as my opinion goes, this will not be an action of contract or tort; it is a claim against the land. It cannot in any way be treated as a personal debt of the occupier or of the owner; it is a claim against the land which, as this Bill recognises, is only to be recovered out of the landlord's profits in the case of a tenancy and by distress under Section 2 of the Bill. I was sorry to hear the suggestion; and I must respectfully, but firmly, record my demurrer to it, that County Court Judges in Wales do not give their decisions according to law and the true facts of the case.

MR. RANDELL: I did not say that.

SIR R. WEBSTER: No body of men are less likely to allow their minds to be swayed by sympathy with the Church or want of sympathy with the religious opinions of the parties in an action, and refuse the right of appeal where such ought to be given. In years gone by I practised largely in County Courts and in the Provinces, and I can say that, while there were very few cases for appeal from the County Court, the Judges were ready to grant such far beyond what I thought desirable for the working of the Act. I hope the Committee will agree to leave the power of appeal where it is, and not by this direct intimation invite appeals in small cases. The Bill does not apply to Wales more than to England; the amounts will be the same in ordinary cases, which will arise in respect to tithe, and the ordinary issues to be raised cannot involve any question of law. I do hope that the Committee will not give by indication what I may call an express right of appeal in all cases, but will leave the matter as it rests under the Act.

(9.13.) SIR W. HARCOURT: If it is clear that there is an appeal in all these cases, of course the Amendment of the hon. Member is not necessary; but that is not clear, and the Attorney General's account of the section was most incomplete. I understood him to say there is an appeal in every case, except in actions of contract and tort. The Act provides there shall be no appeal in any action of contract or tort, in which the total of any corporeal or incorporeal hereditament shall come into question, or where the debt or damage does not exceed £20; nor any action of replevin in case where the debt or damage to goods does not exceed £20. The category is four times as numerous as that mentioned by the Attorney General.

SIR R. WEBSTER: I did not refer to the whole of the section, because it does not bear on the present application.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I understood the Attorney General to say an appeal would apply to all cases except those of contract and tort, and that these cases were neither.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I said nothing of the kind.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The memory of the Committee must judge whether my statement or that of the Attorney General is most correct. I heard him most distinctly state it could not occur, because in actions at the County Court there was an appeal in every case except of contract and tort, and that tithe was neither. There is no doubt the remedy for tithe under the Bill remains as before—the ultimate remedy of distress—but what I want to know is—everybody knows that legal proceedings in cases of distress are by replevin—is replevin specially reserved; can there be an appeal in action by replevin where the amount of debt or damage, or the value of goods seized does not exceed £20?

*(9.16.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I think the right hon. Gentleman will find he has not fairly represented what I did say. I was not referring to replevin at all, and I am sure the hon. Gentleman opposite will allow that his argument did not touch replevin. Of course, where there is replevin the rule naturally applies. I was referring to ordinary cases of summons or plaint issued by the County Court Judge. If there was an action of replevin in a case where there was distress—though in regard to proceedings under the Bill I do not think it possible—then in a case of replevin under £20 there would not be an appeal. There is an appeal in all cases except those excepted in cases where the claim is not under £20. The other special exceptions have no application to the case before us. Of course, if the hon. Member thinks that in action of replevin there should be special exemption from the £20 limit that will be a separate argument, but I do not think the Mover of the Amendment will say for a moment that he referred to replevin.

(9.17.) SIR W. HARCOURT: Where distress is the main remedy replevin must occur. If that be so, it is quite plain that in every case where a man is sued for less than £20, and has, or desires to have, an action of replevin, there will be no appeal.

Sir R. Webster

*SIR R. WEBSTER: It is the law now.

SIR W. HARCOURT: But if it were brought into another Court it would not be regulated by the County Court Act. I think that in these small cases, unless the hon. Member is satisfied that they would not be brought into the class where there is no appeal, he should not withdraw his Amendment.

*(9.19.) MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS: With all deference to the opinion of the Attorney General, I do not think he has touched the argument of my hon. Friend. The section of the County Court Act excepts from the bringing of appeals, except by way of leave, any action of contract or tort, and then proceeds to specify certain actions which do not come within that exception, and in which there is an appeal. Now, I should have thought my hon. Friend's argument was tolerably conclusive. A new jurisdiction is being given to the County Court, jurisdiction over a subject-matter clearly not previously conceded to the County Court, and which was not in the contemplation of the Legislature in framing the County Court Acts. We now give them jurisdiction in an exceptional subject-matter, and it is a matter involving discussion of nice questions of law, and, therefore, peculiarly fitted for appeals being granted as of right. Whatever may be the capacity, and I have no doubt it is great, whatever the desire to do justice, which no doubt is large among Judges who have given satisfaction by the diligent performance of their duties in County Courts in Wales, it cannot be contended on behalf of any body of Judges, however generally the exercise of their functions may inspire respect, that they will in no case refuse an appeal where such an appeal would be fit and proper. From misconception of the point raised, not fully appreciating its importance, sometimes from a mistaken view of the law, County Court Judges, or High Court Judges either, might refuse an appeal where such should properly be allowed. What we desire is not to enlarge the means of factious litigation, but to secure the rights of the litigant, and we say, having given the County Court jurisdiction in a novel sort of subject-matter, then in no proper cases should a litigant be excluded by the action of a County Court Judge from his right of appeal. In giving this we shall follow the precedent set by those who framed the 120th section of the Statute. All actions of a general nature in contract and tort are excluded.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Under £20.

*MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS: Yes, we understand that. And then the Act proceeds to separate from the exclusion, by name, a number of actions. We ask that the same course should be followed here. Exactly the same arguments in reference to the wisdom and impartiality of the Judges apply in either case; but the reasons that induced the Legislature to make exceptions then should control us now.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The right of appeal is not given in cases under £20.

*MR. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS: No; but I am showing by analogy why there should be exceptions, and that tithe should be among the exceptions. With regard to the limit, a new question arises. The limit was fixed having regard to the general class of cases in the Courts. Under this Bill, as my hon. Friend has said, the actions in Wales would be of a very small character indeed, and to attempt to class them with actions of contract and tort under £20 would make it impossible to get an appeal at all unless by leave of the Judge. The sum of £50 and the limit of £20 were fixed, no doubt, in reference to the general average of cases in Court; but, having regard to the general average of tithe rent-charge in Wales, by parity of reasoning there should be a right of appeal in actions where a very small sum is at stake. What we desire is embodied in the Amendment—that there should be an appeal on points of law. We do not ask an appeal at random on questions of fact. Every lawyer and most laymen will appreciate the words in the Amendment, “in point of law or equity, or upon the admission or rejection of any evidence.” The Attorney General has vouched, and rightly vouched, for the impartiality of the Judges. They are not likely consciously to allow religious or political opinions to bias their judgment in the administration of the law; but there are cases—and my hon. Friend has cited one—in which a Judge has refused an appeal, and—I assume my hon. Friend has rightly described the case—the decision was there on a point of law. I say, generally speaking, it may be accepted as an axiom when we are giving a new jurisdiction in a new matter involving nice questions of law, it will be for the satisfaction of all that there should be the right of appeal. There can be no harm in following the analogy I have indicated, and it will secure confidence in the working of the Bill.

(9.29.) MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): It seems to me some confusion has arisen in the minds of hon. and learned Gentlemen opposite. The principle laid down by the Attorney General is that there would be an appeal under this Act in every case, because it would not be an action of a contract or tort. The other cases raised do not come under the Act at all. What would be the appeal in this case? I do not know of any case that would arise in the nature of replevin except under the 2nd section, Sub-section 2. There is no doubt when an order of the Court is obtained it has to be executed in such a way as executions are always carried out under the principle of distress. When an order has been obtained in the County Court the officer of that Court will execute it much in the same way as if it were distress. What is the appeal? Suppose the officer seizes the goods of the wrong person. Under the order no question can arise upon that point, because the officer's action is justified by the order. Then the point can only arise where goods are seized and no rent is due—a seizure by the distraining landlord in the exercise of his Common Law right. There cannot arise, where the officer is executing the order of the Court, a question as to liability to pay the tithe. If an appeal is to arise at all, it must arise in the order of the County Court appointing the officer whose duty it is to distrain. That comes within the rule laid down by the Attorney General, and there may be an interpleader issue, which is a question of a new action. The question will be not as to liability to pay the tithe, but as to whether the officer in seizing the goods has seized the right goods. There would be a new action as to whether the order of the County Court Judge should remain. It would not be a replevin at all, and I therefore submit that the contention of the Attorney General is quite correct.

(9.33.) SIR W. HARCOURT: If the Attorney General is right, why does he object to this Amendment? If there is to be an appeal in all these cases, why does he object to give it in the Bill? The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down—and whose speeches always satisfy me that the point he contests is well-established—says that in an ordinary distress you may have a replevin; but that if it is made by order of the Court, the doctrine of replevin is ousted. I shall be astonished to hear that doctrine upheld by the Attorney General. The Court may make an order which may turn out to be mistaken. It may turn out that the distress has been wrongfully put in, and I should be much surprised if, by a side-wind in this Bill, the doctrine of replevin in such cases is abolished. But I do not know that any useful purpose will be served by going into these niceties of the law. If the Attorney General says he does not admit that there is any case without appeal, why should we continue this discussion, and why should he not make it clear that there is to be an appeal in all cases?

*(9.37.) SIR R. WEBSTER: In any of these matters there is an appeal; and as to the exception that ousts the appeal, it can only be in cases of replevin. Those cases are not before us, because, where replevin arises, it can only be after the Judge has given his order, and the hon. Gentleman now wants to give an appeal before even distress is levied and replevin can come in. The point the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby wanted to put upon me was not ad rem, because it deals with proceedings after the appeal has gone. There is not one word in the clause which will make an exception to the ordinary practice. I pledge the Committee that that is still my view, and in that I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would have counselled the Mover of the Amendment to withdraw his proposal. I believe these words to be wholly unnecessary, but I have no further objection to offer to them.

Mr. Ambrose

(9.39.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I will not pursue the matter; I will only say that the real truth is, that the hon. Member who moved the Amendment desires to have an appeal in all cases, not merely on the order, but in all subsequent proceedings.

*(9.40.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: We have no objection to accept the Amendment.

(9.40.) Question put, and agreed to.

Question, "That the Clause be added to the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause added.

(9.40.) MR. RANDELL: I beg to move the following new clause:—

"In any action or matter under this Act it shall be lawful for the plaintiff or defendant to require a jury to be summoned to try the said action or matter."

Under Section 100 of the County Court Act unless a jury is empanelled the Judge of the Court is the judge of fact and of law, and by Section 101 no jury is allowed except in cases where the amount sought to be recovered exceeds the sum of £5. I have explained that so far as all the cases in the Principality are concerned—and it has already been admitted that the Bill is aimed at the Welsh people—the amounts to be recovered will be under the sum of £5. Therefore the effect of the Bill will be to shut out the Welsh people from trial by jury in these tithe cases. I think the power of the Judge to find on the facts is conducive to a certain amount of oppression. In reply to what fell from the Attorney General, I would say that I cast no reflection on the Welsh Judges. What I said was that I did not at all question their decisions, but that the County Court Judges in Wales would not encourage appeals, and there is abundant evidence to show that tithe cases are not without their political significance. Juries, according to the Master of the Rolls in a recent case, by being judges of fact, have contributed greatly to the peace of the country, and they will be valuable in these cases of tithe.

New Clause (Trial by Jury).—(Mr. Randell.)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(9.45.) SIR R. WEBSTER: There is an absolute right to a jury in all cases above £5, but not under. That is a very excellent provision, whether it be applied to tithe or any other matter in dispute. It is not reasonable that a litigant should have a right to have a jury in cases where less than £5 is in dispute. Jury trial brings a large number of business men into Court at a great sacrifice of their time and almost without remuneration, for I believe the fee is only 1s. I do not think juries should be allowed in cases where the amount in dispute is under £5, simply because the debt has arisen out of tithe.

(9.48.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I confess I have a strong feeling in favour of the Amendment. Under the Bill juries would not be allowed in three-fourths of the tithe cases. I do not say anything against County Court Judges in Wales or elsewhere, but there is one disadvantage in making them judges of fact. I do not know that all of them are Welsh-speaking men.

An hon. MEMBER: Only one of them speaks Welsh.

SIR W. HARCOURT: And it must be remembered that these gentlemen will have to administer justice in cases that touch Welshmen in their dearest feelings. The only protection the people will have will be in juries who understand the language. If there ever was a case in which it is necessary to preserve juries for litigants it is this case of tithe. To the Attorney General £5 seems a small amount, but it is not a small amount to the people of Wales. I confess that in this matter I would go farther than the Amendment. I say again, with the deepest conviction, that the satisfactory working of this measure depends upon your not making the shoe pinch more than you did before; and if it is found that the indirect operation of the transfer to the County Courts is more oppressive than the old law, you will inevitably have a row over the Bill. You will have summary jurisdiction under the Bill, and the deprivation of trial by jury will be very deeply and, in my opinion, very properly resented. You do not pretend to make this Bill a Coercion Bill. You do not pretend that in Wales a case has arisen for exceptional legislation. You do not pretend that in the case of tithe you are going to give Resident Magistrates jurisdiction; but if the consequence of the Bill will be that the decisions of the County Court Judges—though upright, as I am prepared to admit—will be received with prejudice, the poor Welsh farmer will ask why, when he had the protection of a jury before, he should not have it now. In my opinion there will be a great deal of mischievous prejudice against your Bill, and though I do not oppose the principle of the measure as I understand it, I have been very anxious throughout every clause to remove anything like an exceptional jurisdiction. I hope the Amendment will be accepted. If it is not, I shall be myself prepared on Report to move an Amendment giving the right of trial by jury to these men in cases where they would have had it before.

*(9.53.) MR. S. T. EVANS: The question of fees cannot be an argument against trial by jury in the County Court any more than in the Assizes. It is of the utmost importance that no antipathy should spring up between the people and the County Courts, and, therefore, that these questions of tithe should be decided by juries. I agree with what the right hon. Gentleman has said about Welsh juries so far as I know them, and I think the Judges themselves would like to see the cases tried by juries.

*(9.55.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby two or three times stated that this Bill would take away from the Welsh people a security which they possessed before. The Bill does nothing of the kind. It leaves the right of trial by jury in the County Court exactly where it is now. In cases where the amount in dispute is over £5, a jury can be had by right, and in cases where the amount is under £5, a jury can be had with the consent of the Judge. It is said that politics will be mixed up with these tithe cases; and if that is so, who will be the most likely to give an unbiased decision, a County Court Judge who has nothing to do with the land or the tithe, or a juryman who in all probability will be himself a tithepayer? I say the County Court Judge.

*(9.58.) MR. ABEL THOMAS: This question will, of course, not appreciably affect England, where the amounts payable in respect of tithe are nearly all above £20, but it will affect Wales closely. For I will undertake to say that there will not be one case in ten where the amount claimed is £20; and if you divide that into two, for the amount will be payable half yearly, there would not be one farm in 100 in reference to which there could be trial by jury unless you accept the Amendment. I have no doubt that the County Court Judges will decide any case that comes before them fairly; but the question is, what will the Welsh people think? I believe where politics come into question, and especially the matter of Church disestablishment and payment of tithes, Welshmen will not be satisfied unless they have the facts tried by their own countrymen instead of by County Court Judges.

*(10.0.) Mr. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): Perhaps I may be excused for interfering in the Debate for a few minutes. I cannot forget that this is an English as well as a Welsh Bill, and I think the whole burden of proof lies upon those who desire a change in the law. I know of no reason whatever, so far as England is concerned, why there should be any fear of County Court Judges, in whom we have confidence, whose industry we know, and on whose legal knowledge we can rely. We have no reason to suppose that the County Court Judges appointed in Wales are inferior in character, or that their sense of responsibility is any less than that which prevails among County Court Judges in England. I do not see any reason to suppose that they will have any prejudice on one side or the other. They have to deal sometimes with disputes between employers and employed, and I never heard in England any doubt of the County Court as a tribunal. And I have no hesitation in saying that in Wales the same impartiality will be found among the County Court Judges. I have heard the objection raised that the County Court process will involve long journeys for the residents in Wales, and that severe labour will be caused them in carrying out the provisions of the Bill. If that is an objection it is no less good with regard to the trial of these cases by juries. One reason why trial by jury has more or less fallen into disuse is the labour it imposes upon the jurymen; and I think

Mr. Abe! Thomas

Welshmen would find the labour caused by having to serve on juries would be of a severe character. I think the County Court Judges have justified the confidence reposed in them, and I do not see why that confidence should not exist in Wales as well as in England.

*(10.5.) Mr. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The questions raised under this Bill will be entirely different to those ordinarily coming before the County Court Judges. If ever there was an instance in which a jury was required it is in that of the tithepayer; for in three cases out of four the County Court Judges do not understand the Welsh language. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there would be no partiality on the part of the Welsh juries. It is a remarkable fact that in all the cases which have arisen, in my own county particularly, out of these disturbances their verdicts have been characterised by the utmost impartiality. I do not for a moment mean to say that the Welsh County Court Judges—I think I know them all—are not able to deal competently with these matters, or that they are not likely to be impartial. But, of course, they labour under the disadvantage of not being able to understand the witnesses. What you want is not merely right decisions, but that the Welsh people should know and believe they are right. The County Courts in Wales are now exceedingly popular—almost too popular, if I may judge from the great number of plaints I have seen—and the people are generally satisfied with the decisions. I do not want to see any change in that feeling, and I cannot help thinking that three or four decisions by the County Court Judges against the tithepayers would be to discredit the County Courts. It is in the interests of the County Courts that I support this Amendment.

*(10.11.) Mr. W. BOWEN ROWLANDS: I was very much struck with the observations of the hon. Member for Stockport with regard to the prejudices of juries. He supposes that Judges live in a region where they are entirely unaffected by, and are unconscious of, prejudices. He supposes that they are the only persons unaffected by class, religion, or politics. In his various and extensive reading, has the hon. Member ever perused the pages of Hallam, who points out the prejudices by which Judges, from their age, their training, and their employment, are liable. Take one instance out of many. Is it to be supposed that those who supported Mr. Fox's Libel Act thought the Judges of the High Court were unfit to discharge the duties of their office? No; but the framers of Fox's Act deemed that Judges were unconsciously affected by their training, and thought it wiser to trust decisions of libel cases to juries, in whom the country had confidence, whatever their prejudices, rather than to Judges affected by another and, perhaps, a narrower circle of prejudices. But I would point out that juries are already trusted up to a certain limit. It is inverting the whole argument to say that juries shall be trusted up to £5 and £20, but that they are unfit in other cases, simply because of the smallness of the amounts which are at stake. My hon. Friend opposite spoke of the change in the law. True, it is a change in the law in subjecting tithe to the jurisdiction of the County Court. If this had been within the scope and jurisdiction of the Court before, there might have been something in the argument; but as this is a proposal to bring the matter for the first time within the scope of the County Court Act, I think the sniters have what is the prima facie right of every man in England—the right to have questions of fact tried by jury.

(10.13.) MR. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): The House will pardon Welsh Members for pressing this Amendment. I should like hon. Members opposite to disabuse their minds of the impression that in Wales we have not confidence in the County Court Judges, because they are English Judges. We have confidence in them, but our one great difficulty is that of language. I am told it is a maxim in law that a man ought to be tried by his countrymen. If that is so, I think we have a right to ask that Welshmen shall be placed on a similar footing with Englishmen when they appear before the Courts of Law. We have five County Court Judges in Wales, and I do not think one out of the five knows the Welsh language. Now that the Bill applies to Wales, it is our duty to see that it will work as smoothly as possible. Seeing that the English Judges are not able to understand the Welsh tongue, I think we have a right to ask that the Welsh people should be tried by jurymen who do understand their tongue. The Judges have accused witnesses of perjury, but I am sure if the Judges understood them they would hold a different opinion. As a miners' agent, I have frequently to attend the Courts of Law, and over and over again I have had occasion to correct the interpreters. It is a well-known fact that the Judges in the West of Wales, where the great bulk of the disturbances have taken place, have sat in cases without understanding a word of the Welsh language. If the Government could only see their way to the acceptance of this Amendment the Welsh people would be really grateful for that consideration.

(10.16.) SIR W. HARCOURT: This is one of the most important, if not the most important, questions which have been raised upon the Bill, and I hope the Amendment will be adopted. I remember a Welsh friend of mine telling me that at a Welsh Assize, before an English Judge, he asked leave to address the jury in Welsh, and, when leave was given, he said to the jury, "You have an English Judge who will deceive you, and who will sum up in such and such a manner," which, as he knew how the Judge would in all probability address them, he at once put before them. The result was that when the Judge came to his summing up, and did sum up almost in the words used by counsel, the jury were convinced that the counsel was right, and gave their decision accordingly. This simply shows the consequences of having an English legal administrator among a Welsh-speaking people. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill, as I have already warned him, is not fortunate in his legal supporters, for the men who have done most damage to the measure have been the hon. Member for Harrow (Mr. Ambrose) and the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Gedge). When the hon. Member for Stockport asks the Government to endorse the proposition that Judges and not juries are the best people to determine political questions, he has reached a point of political absurdity which it is impossible to surpass. I do not imagine the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade will accept such an argument; on the contrary, it is absolutely destructive of the case the hon. Member has set up, and, in point of fact, is the foundation of the argument for the Amendment. It is admitted that these are cases which, as the lawyers say, "sounded in politics," and in which we ought to be specially careful not to exclude a jury. It has been the unbroken tradition of English Law that, whatever you do in any other case, you must preserve the jury wherever a political question arises. If you allow Judges, however eminent or learned, to determine questions of political libel or sedition, as my hon. Friend behind me has pointed out, or other questions of a political character, the whole liberty of the subject will be gone. It is said that the onus of proof is with those who want to alter the law. Yes, but who is it that is altering the law? It is the Government who demand an alteration of the law, not we. It is because the Government are introducing a new jurisdiction for the recovery of the tithe by means of a Court which has no jurisdiction now, that the difficulty has arisen. I have said over and over again in these discussions that I do not at all object to your using the County Court bailiff instead of the tithe owner's agent for the recovery of the tithe. What I do press on the Government is that they should not import into the determination of these matters the whole body of County Court law, indirectly. It does happen that in the limited jurisdiction exercised under the County Court Acts there are particular restrictions; but you ought not to apply these restrictions in matters that are brought for the first time under the cognisance of the County Court; and, further, you ought not so to treat the Welsh people that, in giving a new jurisdiction to the County Court, you deprive them of the protection hitherto afforded of trial by jury. On these two grounds, first of all in regard to the political character given to the matter, and, in the next place, in relation to the circumstance that the new jurisdiction is to be exercised among the people whose language is not understood by those who administer the law, I urge that the arguments are strongly in favour of giving trial by jury in all cases under the Bill. If you do not allow trial by jury in cases under £5 you might as well refrain from legislating for Wales at all, because, whereas in England the great majority of cases will be above £5, and therefore triable by jury, in Wales the majority of cases will be under that amount, and the right of jury trial will be denied. On these grounds, therefore, I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able to meet the views of my hon. Friend and those who support him on this side of the House.

Sir W. Harcourt

(10.8.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I regret the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill has not answered the question put to him, because I think that if there is any question which ought to excite attention by this House it is that which is raised in this Amendment. Let me point out to hon. Gentlemen opposite that not only does this raise the question of a distinction of treatment as between England and Wales, but that whereas you in England will have in the majority of cases the right of trial by jury, you deny this right to the people of Wales. All your farms, steadings, and holdings in England are large. ["No, no!"] Well, at any rate, that is the case in the proportion of at least three to one. That is to say, you would be able to have a jury in three cases out of four, and to that extent you are doing an injustice to the Welsh people. You have already granted an appeal to the Queen's Bench. On the small cases that arise in Wales there may be a good deal of friction in the different districts presided over by the County Court Judges, and you ought to give the Welsh people an appeal on questions of law. The Attorney General smiles at this; I do not see why he should do so.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I was merely smiling at what the hon. and learned Member, who has only just come in, has said with regard to the question of appeal. As a matter of fact, the right of appeal has already been given on a previous Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am perfectly aware of that, but that is an entirely different question to the one I am raising. Supposing a man is to have a right of trial by jury in questions over £5, what, I ask, is the difference between that and £4 19s. 11½d., for which the right is denied? I say it is most unfair on the part of the Government that, in dealing with a separate nationality in which English is not spoken, they propose to reserve to the English people the right of trial by jury, and practically deprive the Welsh people of that right altogether. The hon. Member for Rhondda has already referred to this question of difference of language. I myself have heard in the Irish Land Court men giving evidence in Irish, who, because they happened to be able to speak a few words in English, have been compelled to continue their evidence in that language. The mistakes made under such circumstances are grotesque. I have heard a man use the word "three" for the word "thirty" from his want of knowledge as to English figures. Why, then, in the case of Wales, where the Welsh language is universally spoken and just as universally ignored by the County Court Judges, do you propose to enforce this distinction between the two countries? I would appeal on this account to the Government, if they will not give trial by jury, at any rate to allow an appeal on questions of fact. It is misleading on the part of the Attorney General to suggest that you have an appeal on matters of fact. That is not the case; and if he asserts that it is so, I deny the assertion. As a rule, County Court trials for sums under £5 are trumpery matters, but trials on this tithe question in Wales are not trumpery matters. They would not want juries in matters of shop debts and cases of that sort, but the case is different when the question relates to tithe. The Government are now inventing a new jurisdiction, and they will create an intense feeling if the Welsh-speaking people are denied the right of trial by jury. That is practically what it means. A matter which engages the deepest feelings of the Welsh people is thus to be dealt with. The men affected are those who seldom, if ever, see a Court. They do not live litigious lives; they reside right away on the mountains, and for a dispute about a wretched, miserable sum of 10s., 15s., 20s., or 30s., they are to be dragged into Court, probably for the first time in their lives, and the case in which they are concerned is to be conducted in a language which they do not understand. I say it is most unfair. You ought to abandon this £5 limit, and you ought to be induced to do this by the fact that the Welsh Representatives are a minority in this House, and that they are nearly unanimous in demanding this. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman, who has so far displayed a reasonable spirit, will accede to this request. I object to the doctrine of the hon. Member for Stockport—"Trust in Judges, and distrust juries." I think we ought to cultivate distrust in all officials. Let the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind that four-fifths of the cases likely to arise under this Bill in Wales will be affected by this limit, and then I think he will see the desirability of abandoning the position he has taken up.

VOL. CCCLXIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

(10.33.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: The only argument which has been advanced against this proposal is that juries might be affected by political prejudices. But surely it is not likely that every member of a jury summoned to try a case would be of one and the same way of thinking. Two might be one way and one another, and thus prejudices would be neutralised. But if political prejudice exists in a Judge, it is necessarily all on one side, and Judges, be it remembered, are as prone as anyone else to these prejudices. Again, it has been said that the jurymen will be of the same class as the litigants. But that is not so, because, as a rule, the County Court jurors are summoned from among the tradesmen of the town in which the Court holds its sitting, while the litigants come in from the rural districts for miles around. It is notorious that there is not a more impartial tribunal than a County Court jury.

(10.35.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I can confirm what my hon. Friend has said as to the class from which County Court juries are drawn. I believe that the Judges would prefer the assistance of juries in settling these tithe cases. They would not care for the invidious task of deciding a case in which so much political animus and religious feeling may be involved. As a rule, a batch of 30 or 40 cases from one parish will come up for hearing at the same time. They will all turn on one particular point, and though the aggregate amount involved may be £40 or £50, in not more than one case, perhaps, will the litigants be entitled to claim a jury. I think that these cases call for special treatment. Why should a distinction be made between a case above £5 and one under that amount? The wealthy tenant farmer will be able to enjoy the luxury of a jury; the poor peasant proprietor will not, unless this Amendment is agreed to, and if it were only to dispose of the suspicion that there is one law for the poor and another for the rich, the Government ought to make the concession demanded.

(10.39.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 127; Noes 168.—(Div. List, No. 31.)

*(10.51.) MR. MORTON: I had intended to propose a new clause dealing with the apportionment of the tithe rent-charge among the occupiers. By the advice of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, I put it down as a new clause; but I still think it would have been better to have added it to Clause 1. I am now quite willing to accept the words which have been suggested by the President of the Board of Trade, and therefore I withdraw the proposal.

*(10.52.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: I have on the Paper two new clauses, one providing that several cases may be included in one application to the County Court and another dealing with apportionment of rent-charge on land owned by several parties. I understand that the Attorney General has prepared a clause with the same object, and I am willing to accept it. I do not, therefore, move.

*(10.53.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Member proposes that this should be provided for in the Statute, but that would be too hard and fast a line. I propose that a clause be inserted giving the Court power to make rules for this particular object.

New Clause handed in, but not read.

(10.53.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I am always glad when hon. Gentlemen who have proposals can come to an agreement with the other side; but really the House of Commons should have something to say on this matter, or else we shall have all sorts of legislation passed without the slightest idea of what is being done. What is this new clause?

*(10.54.) SIR R. WEBSTER: The Amendment on the Paper proposes that Mr. Lloyd-George

the tithe owner may include any number of separate claims against separate parties in the same proceeding. That, of course, would enable a claimant to raise all kinds of questions without risk as to cost, because they would be recoverable against one or other of the defendants. I venture to suggest that the proper course would be for rules to be made to meet that object, and the new clause which I have proposed would prevent any abuse of the privilege, which would ensure the saving in costs.

(10.55.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I should have liked to have had an opportunity of examining this clause. It appears to me that the hon. Member for St. Pancras has been moving his Amendments mainly in the interests of the tithe owner. I am a little jealous of that proceeding, because my interests in this matter are not so absolutely with the tithe owner as those of the hon. Member. I think that the tithepayer should receive some consideration in the Bill. I do not oppose the Amendment now, but I will reserve my right to examine it on Report, and of seeing what its effect will be. But I do repeat my protest against this method of introducing clauses without giving the House an opportunity of knowing exactly what is being done.

(10.57.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General has refused an Amendment which would give a jury in all cases, and yet he now accepts an Amendment enabling cases to be tried in omnibus. This will enable the tithe owner to strike 40 heads off at one blow. Now, let me ask the Government this question: Suppose a tithe owner has claims against 50 defendants, and, by bringing them up in batches of five, he can keep them all under the £5 limit, will he be at liberty to have them disposed of in 10 batches, and thus prevent any jury being empanelled? Now that the Government have accepted this Amendment, the Welsh Members ought to insist on engrafting on to it the principle of trial by jury. This is an Amendment accepted admittedly in the interest of the tithe owner. The least, then, the defendants can ask in return for the concession is that they should have the defence of the palladium, that the tithe owner shall only bring one suit, that he shall not have Brown, Jones, and Robinson in one process, and Smith and all the rest in another process. Let him elect which litigants he is going to contest. Let him bring his charges separately against each one, or let him have one process. He should not be able to include four in one process, six in another, and one in another. The interests of men on one side of a mountain may be very different to the interests of men on another side of the mountain. Why are these men to be included in a kind of omnibus legal pill, which they are all to swallow? Of all the principles one has ever heard of this principle approved of on behalf of the patentee by Her Majesty's Government is the most extraordinary. Let us know from the Government what they mean. The very least you can give a litigant is the right to say, "I shall be included in the one process, or I shall not."

*(11.3.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: We did not anticipate that any objection would be raised to this clause, but I quite agree that it is only fair to the Committee that they should see the clause in print before they assent to it. Therefore, what we propose to do is to ask leave to withdraw the clause now, and bring it up again on Report. I trust that we shall be allowed to conclude the Committee stage to-night.

(11.4.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: I am one of those who believe that tithe is public property, and that the provisions of this Bill should be reasonably efficacious in order that that public property should be preserved. If you make the recovery of tithe unnecessarily troublesome and expensive the property will disappear. Many of the tithe rent-charges are very small in amount—some are as low as 6d. and 9d. In one parish in Wiltshire there are 573 tithe rent-charges not exceeding 20s. each, and 371 of them are less than 5s. each. I have a list of tithe rent-charges in another parish, and some of them are as low as 1s. and 2s. If in such cases you are not to allow the causes of action to be grouped, you will make the recovery so expensive that the property will be lost altogether. It was with the view of making the recovery reasonably efficacious and practicable that I put on the Paper the new clause which stand^s in my name. The Government have substantially accepted that clause, although in another form. My only desire has been to deal with this Bill in a sensible and practical way, and to make it a useful measure.

*(11.6.) MR. S. T. EVANS: Before the Amendment is withdrawn, I should like to ask that whatever regulations are made they shall be embodied in the clause, and not in rules. I think there would be the most strenuous opposition on the Report stage if you allow the Judges to make rules governing the question, and so take away the responsibility of the Committee.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: I should like to know whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to give us trial by jury. On the Report stage we shall be very limited in our discussion. No hon. Member on this side of the House will be able to speak more than once—[Ironical cheers]—and hon. Members opposite will only be able to speak once. I am sure we shall regret that. We have now a Minister of Agriculture. Cannot he tell us what are the intentions of the Government? Are they going to give us trial by jury when the tithe is under £5, or do they intend to refuse it absolutely?

(11.8.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I think it would tend to shorten the discussion if the Government would express their intention with regard to the question of trial by jury. The Attorney General has stated that consolidation of actions shall not take place except in cases where the same issue is involved. Personally, I shall oppose the withdrawal of the clause unless a pledge is given that recourse may be had to trial by jury.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I hope the hon. Member will not divide the Committee against the withdrawal of the clause, which everybody wishes not to proceed with. It is impossible for us to give any pledge, but we will consider before the clause is brought up on Report whether the change that it makes in the law would require any change in the law with reference to the limit of £5. I cannot do more than that.

(11.12.) MR. T. M. HEALY: In view of the importance of this matter, I hardly think the right hon. Gentleman has considered sufficiently the language he has just used. The Report stage, of all other stages, is the most unsuitable for the consideration of a matter of this kind. I feel the force of the remarks of the hon. Member for St. Pancras. Viewing the tithe as national property, it is desirable it should not be frittered away; but litigants have rights as well as tithe owners, and they are entitled to know exactly where they stand. I think hon. Members for the Principality might be content if the right hon. Gentleman will give us the pledge that if it is thought desirable by any considerable section of the Welsh Members to have the clause discussed in Committee, he will re-commit the Bill. The matter is so vital in the interests of the smaller litigants that I am sure that if the right hon. Gentleman considers the point he will see it is not unreasonable that the Welsh Members should have the opportunity of discussing the question in Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Question, "That the Amendment be withdrawn," and declared it carried.

MR. T. M. HEALY: On a point of order. The hon. Member (Mr. Lloyd-George) was on his legs.

THE CHAIRMAN: I asked if it was the pleasure of the Committee that the Motion be withdrawn. I declared the Motion withdrawn before the hon. Member rose. [Cries of "Progress!"]

(11.15.) MR. W. P. MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): Having regard to the importance of the clause which stands in my name, and the lateness of the hour, and the fact that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill seems to be rather tired, and that he has not condescended to reply to the arguments urged by Members for the Principality in favour of having their cases tried by jury, I beg to move that you, Sir, report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. The clause standing in my name involves the question of whether or not men who, for all practical purposes, have been law-abiding men, are to have their mouths for ever shut, are not to be allowed to enter their protest against paying what they consider to be an unjust infliction.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress."
Mr. T. M. Healy

gress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. W. P. Morgan.)

*(11.17.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: We have hitherto, before the interposition of the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), discussed this Bill in a businesslike way, and in a way that reflects especial credit upon the Welsh Members, who naturally take a great interest in it, and until now there has not been the slightest trace in the Debate of anything that could be fairly called obstruction. I am therefore utterly astonished at the Motion of the hon. Member to report Progress at 20 minutes past 11 o'clock, when there is ample time for the Amendment which stands upon the Paper in the hon. Member's name to be fully discussed. I hope that the hon. Member will not press the Motion to report Progress.

(11.18.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman introduced the invidious word "obstruction." Hon. Members have arrived at a time when I believe they do not desire to discuss the Bill. I never recollect any measure being more modestly discussed than this Bill has been, and for hon. Gentlemen to shout "obstruction," shows what little foundation there is for the charges of obstruction which are made from the Government Benches. I hope, however, my hon. Friend will not press the Motion to report Progress. I cannot altogether acquit the Government of imprudence in having accepted at the end of the discussions on this Bill, an Amendment embodying a new principle. It is in my opinion a most mischievous proposal, and is certain to raise a very strong degree of opposition. Even though the hon. Gentleman agreed to withdraw the Amendment, he cannot be surprised that it was followed by the most vehement protests; protests which were in my opinion absolutely needed in view of the mysterious character of the proposal. You might just as well introduce a proposal that a tradesman should collect all his bills. [Cries of "Order!"] I am doing what I can to help gentlemen opposite.

*(11.21.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I rise to order, Sir. I submit that it is out of order, on a Motion to report Progress, for a gentleman, whether hon. or right hon., to discuss an Amendment which has been withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman was out of order.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Under the circumstances, it appears that the best thing I can do is to vote for the Motion to report Progress.

(11.22.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I am very sorry that gentlemen opposite thought it in good taste to drag in my name as an Irishman, and to wave it as a kind of red rag before John Bull. My intervention in the Debate occupied, I suppose, 10 or 11 minutes, and really I hardly think, considering the importance of the question, and the anxiety that prevailed on this side, it was an unfair intervention on my part. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman (Sir M. Hicks Beach) that I am as anxious as anybody that he should get this Bill through to-night, because an arrangement in which I am interested will be dislocated if any other course is followed. I think it was unfair to say that, because I interfered with reference to the Bill, obstruction must prevail—in other words, that the Irish Members, who are dragged here by the supremacy of this House, are to be subjected to a new kind of disability. It seems that we are not to take part in any but Irish discussions without being charged with obstruction. This comes from the leader of a Party which champions the beautiful principle of a united Parliament. I will not, however, take advantage of the unhappy plight into which the right hon. Gentleman's observations have put him, to retaliate upon him. I think it was a mistake on the right hon. Gentleman's part to treat the Welsh Members with contempt on the jury question, and to refuse to give expression to a single opinion in answer to their appeals. His true course would have been to say he was unable to accept the Amendment, and to ask the House to go on with the next business, inasmuch as an understanding had been come to that we should finish the Committee stage to-night.

*(11.25.) MR. W. P. MORGAN: I am willing to withdraw the Motion to report Progress, if I can get from the Attorney General an assurance that imprisonment will not be inflicted except for personal violence, and in that case I will not move my clause. I think the Committee will probably agree with me, that we have already had enough of legal argument on this Bill.

*(11.26.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I can give no further assurance than I have given already, that the officers who executed a process under this Act will be protected in the same way as an officer executing any other order of the Court. There ought to be no distinction whatever between—

SIR W. HARCOURT: As it seems now in order to discuss on this Motion a future Amendment, I will now proceed to discuss it.

(11.27.) THE CHAIRMAN: A question was asked and an answer was given. There could not be a discussion in violation of the Rules which prevent discussions on the question of reporting Progress.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then I would observe that the answer of the Attorney General is not a satisfactory answer to the question of my hon. Friend, and I strongly advise him to take no course on his Amendment founded upon that answer, because certainly the existing law will enable imprisonment to be given in some cases, which will go far beyond the provisions of the existing law.

*MR. W. P. MORGAN: I shall divide the Committee upon my Motion.

(11.28.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 112; Noes 163.—(Div. List, No. 32).

*(11.40.) MR. W. P. MORGAN: I beg to move the following clause:—

“Provided always, that notwithstanding anything in this Act or in the County Courts Act, 1888, contained, no person shall be liable to any penalty or punishment, unless such person shall actually obstruct or assault the bailiff or receiver of the County Court, or his or their assistants, or other officers of the Court, in the execution of his or their duty, or unless a rescue of property, previously legally seized, shall be actually made.”

I regret very much that there should have been for a moment a suggestion that I was desirous of obstructing the House or its business. I have never yet attempted to do anything of the sort. This Amendment has been on the Paper for something like a week, and I have been in my place day by day watching for an opportunity of moving it. I think I was justified in assuming that at this hour of the evening there was not sufficient time for properly discussing a proposal on so important a subject. If this clause be not inserted we shall have to all intents and purposes a Coercion Act in Wales as well as in Ireland. A man will not be allowed to knock at the door of a bum-bailiff or to crack a joke with an officer of the Court without rendering himself liable to be brought before the Court for contempt. A man will not be able to speak to an officer of the Court of some injustice that has been inflicted upon him. Indeed, he will have to do what the people of Ireland now have to do, that is, to say nothing at all, unless he is to come within the meshes of the law. We have had sufficient instances in Ireland of the operation of such a law as this, to justify the insertion of such a clause in a Bill which deals with a subject that in some respect excites considerable ill-feeling in the Principality, and I think the Committee would not be doing its duty if it did not insert in the Bill some clause which would have for its object the protection of those of Her Majesty's subjects who have recourse to protests at a sale or a seizure, or who wish to hold meetings so as to bring before the public the grievances from which they suffer. I would ask the Attorney General to consider this matter. I am sure he does not wish to inflict on the people of Wales any particular restrictions in their protests and in their endeavours to obtain redress of the grievances under which they consider they are suffering.

New Clause (No person shall be punished except for obstruction or assault,) — (Mr. W. P. Morgan,) — brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*(11.43.) SIR R. WEBSTER: This is not the first time I have had to deal with this question, and I hope the hon. Member will not think I am guilty of any want of courtesy if I make a brief reply to his remarks. The hon. Member proposes that no man shall be punished unless he is actually engaged in an assault or obstruction. A man of influence may stand by and incite persons to obstruction or to assault without himself actually indulging in violence. Then he proposes that, unless there is an absolute loss of property, there shall be no offence—that is to say, that attempts at rescue shall not be punished. A bailiff may in a scuffle lose his watch, and yet under the hon. Member's clause it would not be possible to prosecute those whose conduct produced the scuffle.

Mr. W. P. Morgan

MR. W. P. MORGAN*: Does the learned Attorney General mean to tell this House that this clause would do away with the Larceny Act, and that the bailiff could not prosecute a man for stealing his watch?

SIR R. WEBSTER*: If in the course of the scuffle the bailiff's watch happened to disappear, and it could not be proved who was the actual thief, nobody could under this clause be punished.

MR. W. P. MORGAN*: I would suggest to the hon. and learned Gentleman that he, with his superior knowledge and experience in these matters, should frame a clause which will carry out the object which he says the Government have in view, namely, to punish persons who actually commit assaults or incite others to commit assaults. I am desirous of protecting a man who says, "Three cheers for Gladstone"—words which, in the minds of some persons, might be regarded as inciting people to rebellion. If the Welsh people, who have hitherto been regarded as a law-abiding people, are to be prevented from holding their meetings and making their protests, the Government and the Attorney General must take the responsibility. It is the duty of the Government to maintain law and order, and if they persist in passing legislation which will have an opposite tendency, they must take the consequences.

*(11.47.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The hon. Member used some words which appeared to me to imply his own admission that the clause was open to the objection urged against it by my hon. and learned Friend, and that it would be fair on his part to accept some alterations. I think it would be difficult to frame a clause which would carry out the views of the hon. Member, and I would appeal to him not to press his clause now. If the hon. Member, or any hon. Gentleman opposite, can frame a clause which will not be open to the reasonable objections which have been urged, and bring it forward on Report, we will do our best to meet them, but we cannot consent to put the officer of the Court in a worse position in these cases than he is in other cases. On the other hand, we are extremely anxious to make it clear that we do not want to place people in these circumstances in a worse position than in any other cases. I do not think gentlemen opposite will lose anything by taking the course I suggest, especially in view of the important Debate that is anticipated.

*(11.49.) MR. S. T. EVANS: I should be very sorry to join in anything in the nature of obstruction. But may I make an appeal to the best instincts of gentlemen opposite? You are anxious to keep up the Establishment of the Church, and also anxious that the Church should be brought nearer to the people than in the past. If you have imprisonment except in cases of personal violence, there will be no sympathy felt among the people, except for the man imprisoned. If you imprison a man for making a conscientious protest, the first case of the kind will shake the Establishment to its very foundations. I would therefore appeal to gentlemen opposite—although, of course, we must fight on the Report stage—to restrict imprisonment, as far as their own proposals are concerned, to cases of personal violence, and personal violence alone.

*(11.50.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I have no confidence in leaving matters over to the Report stage. The discussion on Report is confined to the narrowest limits, and I would certainly advise my hon. Friends below the Gangway not to agree to anything of this sort depending upon the Report.

*(11.52.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I would point out that the clause is a very fair clause, even as the Bill is framed. It is, of course, absurd to say that if a man picked a pocket he cannot be imprisoned under the present law. I would point out to the Government that we all agreed that the power of the County Court Judge should be restricted to cases of violence.

(11.54.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camberne): I want to ask the Government whether, in order to enlighten us on this point, they could give us an assurance to the effect that a mere exclamation, or a mere expression of opinion, on the part of persons who feel themselves to be the victims of injustice shall not be a reason for imprisonment? I would remind the Committee that I was imprisoned in Ireland for saying simply, "Three cheers for the Plan of Campaign!"

*(11.55.) SIR R. WEBSTER: No one could possibly be imprisoned under this Bill for a mere exclamation or cry. If hon. Members will only look at the words of Clause 48 of the Act of 1868 they will see what it is we propose.

MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS: I would appeal to my hon. Friend below me to withdraw the clause now. There was a sort of understanding that we should finish to-night, and in my view my hon. Friend's proposal does not carry the law a bit further than it is laid down in the County Courts Act of 1868.

*(11.56.) MR. S. T. EVANS: Is the Attorney General willing to confine cases of imprisonment to this one Section 48?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I am not aware that I ever said I desired to avail myself of any other section. There is no other section applicable. I have never suggested by one word that there should be any liability except under this section.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

*(11.57.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I do not know whether my right hon. Friend will accept the clause which stands in my name—

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I really must appeal to the hon. Member—

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I have not sat down yet.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: You can move it on Thursday.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: I cannot be here on Thursday.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Some one else can do it for you.

*MR. SYDNEY GEDGE: Not on Report. The clause is very important. It is as follows:—

"No tax nor rate which shall be levied upon or be payable in respect of any tithe rent-charge shall become due until the person entitled to the same tithe rent-charge has received at least one-fourth part thereof."

I would point out that all other classes who have to pay the rates are in occupation of the premises on which the rates are charged. The clause would remove a very gross injustice. [The remaining observations of the hon. Member were inaudible, owing to cries of "Divide!" and "Agreed!"]

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

(12.1.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I wish to express my great obligations to hon. Members opposite for the anxiety they have shown to get through the Committee stage to-night, and I regret that they were not seconded by my hon. Friend behind me. Believing that the House is practically unanimous in the desire to get it through, I will put down the Bill again for to-morrow, with the Amendments for the Report stage, in order that they may appear on the Paper on Wednesday morning.

Committee report Progress, to sit again to-morrow.

INDIAN COUNCILS ACT (1861) AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 171.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.3.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): As great interest is taken in this Bill, and it is desired to have a proper Debate on it, might I ask the Government if they would put it down as a first Order for some night, and to let us know when it will come on?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I will consider the hon. Member's recommendation, and see how far it is possible to meet it.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

POLLEN FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL. (No. 91.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. Sydney Gedge

(12.10.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Between now and Report would the hon. Member who has the Bill in charge consider the question of limiting it to Lough Neagh? It would be undesirable that the police should have these powers over every river and lake in Ireland. It is a fact, I believe, that the pollen is confined to this one particular district in Ireland.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I have no objection to the suggestion of the hon. Member; but I should think such a provision unnecessary, as pollen is only fished in this one lake, though I believe it is to be found in one or two other places.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It seems to me undesirable to give policemen power to go rampaging all over the country on the pretence that they are looking for pollen. Will the hon. Member consider the matter before the Report?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I will consider the question of limiting the operation of the Bill before the Report stage.

Bill reported, as amended; to be considered upon Thursday.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 66.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday, 16th February.

KITCHEN AND REFRESHMENT ROOMS (HOUSE OF COMMONS).

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to control the arrangements for the Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, in the Department of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of:—Mr. H. Anstruther, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. William Corbet, Mr. Cremer, Mr. Flower, General Goldsworthy, Colonel Hamilton, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Lafone, Mr. Cowley Lambert, Viscount Lewisham, Colonel Malcolm, Mr. William McArthur, Mr. John O'Connor and Mr. Richard Power.

Ordered, That five be the quorum.—(Mr. Herbert.)

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 3rd February, 1891.

The Lord Fitzhardinge—Took the Oath.

STANDING ORDERS RELATING TO STANDING COMMITTEES.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): My Lords, the Committee which the House appointed a few days ago to examine into the Standing Orders of the House which relate to Standing Committees, have considered the subject, and have embodied their conclusions in a Report which I now have the honour to lay upon the Table. That Report will be circulated, and in it will be found the full text of the new Standing Orders, which the Committee recommend should be adopted by your Lordships. I think it will be for the convenience of the House that a week should be given in order to consider these proposals, and I therefore beg to give notice that this day week I shall move the adoption of the new Standing Orders in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee.

Report from the Select Committee (with the proceedings of the Committee and appendix) made, and to be printed; and to be taken into consideration on Tuesday next. (No. 26.)

FACTORY AND WORKSHOPS BILL [H.L.].

A Bill to amend the law relating to factories and workshops—Was presented by the Lord Kenry (E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl); read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 27.)

PRESENTATION TO BENEFICES

BILL [H.L.].—(No. 5.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE BISHOP OF LICHFIELD: I beg to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill. It passed through your Lordships' House last year, and is now presented precisely in the form in which it then obtained your approval. I therefore think it quite unnecessary to make any observations about the intent or purposes of the Bill.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

LICHFIELD CATHEDRAL BILL

[H.L.].—(No. 6.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read, and discharged; and Bill referred to the Examiners.

TRAMWAYS ORDER IN COUNCIL
(IRELAND) (ATHENRY AND TUAM RAILWAY) BILL.—(No. 19.)

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Five o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 3rd February, 1891.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS.

CARGOES ON SUNDAYS IN FOREIGN PORTS.

Address for—

"Return of the Regulations in force as to the working of Cargoes on Sundays in the principal Foreign Ports and Harbours of Europe and America."—(Admiral Field.)

ROYAL NATIONAL LIFEBOAT INSTI-TUTION.

Return ordered—

"Of Copies of Correspondence which has passed between the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, the Trinity House, and the Board of Trade, respecting the suggested removal of wrecks off Palling and other places in that vicinity on the coast of Norfolk, under the provisions of 'The Removal of Wrecks Act, 1877, Amendment Act, 1889.'"—(Sir Edward Birkbeck.)

EAST INDIA (FACTORIES).

Address for—

"Copy of Report of the recent Commission on Indian Factories."—(Sir William Houldsworth.)

CORN AVERAGES.

Copy ordered—

"Of Statistical Tables of Corn Prices for the year 1890, with Comparative Tables for previous years, and Memorandum."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 71.]

COLONISATION.

Ordered—

"That the Minutes of Evidence taken before the Select Committees on Colonisation in Sessions 1889 and 1890; the Report on the Condition of the Highlands in 1861, the Report of the Select Committee on Game Laws in Session 1873, the Report of the Royal Commission on Crofters and Cottars in 1883, the Report on the Cottars in the Lews in 1888, and the Report of the Western Highlands and Islands Commission in 1890, be referred to the Select Committee on Colonisation."—(Sir James Ferguson.)

QUESTIONS.

COLONEL'S ALLOWANCES IN INDIA.

MR. KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the continued loss which is being inflicted on Colonels in receipt of Colonel's allowances who have elected to reside in India, by paying them their allowances on retirement, of £1,124 5s. per annum, in rupees at a rate of 2s. ½d. per rupee, whereas the current rate of exchange has for some years ranged below 2s., and lately below 1s. 6d., while, at the same time, all Colonels similarly situated who reside in any other parts of the world are permitted to draw the full amount of £1,124 5s. in England in sterling, the Secretary of State will re-consider previous rulings on the subject, and take steps to remedy the grievance; and whether the loss now amounts practically to a fine of about 5,000 rupees per annum on a retired officer for electing to reside in India?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State in Council has recently decided that an officer, entitled to draw "Colonel's allowances" together with English pay, may, wherever he resides, draw the amount of £660 12s. 5d. together with his English pay from the Home Treasury in London, either personally or by agent.

INDIAN COUNCILS (No. 2) BILL.

MR. WALTER M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will undertake that the Indian Councils (No. 2) Bill shall be taken as a first Order of the Day, after due notice, when it is discussed; and if he can state when it will come on?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will see that I am not in a position at present to possess the information which would enable me to answer the question.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether he will undertake to bring it on as the first Order, and that he will give some substantial notice as to when it may be expected to come on?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I can only say that in the conduct of Public Business it is very difficult to say when any particular measure may be expected to be brought on.

MIDDLESEX MAGISTRATES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with regard to the fact that the privileges of the Justices of the Peace for the County of Middlesex, prior to the enactment of "The Local Government Act, 1888," were specially reserved by that statute, whether any disability to act attends them if their residence ceases to be within the present county area of Middlesex, but continues in that of the new County of London?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. As to the second, Justices of Middlesex who reside in the County of London will have in Middlesex jurisdiction to act in all cases in which the Summary Jurisdiction Acts enable a gentleman who is a Justice for two adjoining counties to act in one, although he resides in the other.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he proposes to re-introduce and press forward the Bills dealing with reformatory and industrial schools, in accordance with the wishes of the great majority of Managing Authorities; and, in the contrary case, if, having regard to the considerable proportion of the inmates of such institutions whose parents have forfeited all moral right to further control over them, and least of all to profit by their education and maintenance from public funds, he will re-introduce in a short Bill the clauses empowering the managers to provide for well-conducted boys, with their consent, as if they were their parents?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Managing Authorities were the most energetic opponents of the Bills dealing with the reformatory and industrial schools, and the chief cause of their withdrawal. I think it is doubtful whether time can be found for discussing them this year. If they are introduced they will contain provisions for the ultimate disposal of children, and for retaining control over them after their discharge. But I would remind my hon. Friend that the existing practice of the Home Office, founded upon Section 28 of the Act of 1866, goes nearly as far in the direction of clothing managers with parental functions as Parliament is likely to allow, and it would not be worth while to introduce a Bill dealing with this specific subject apart from the other provisions of the Bills.

INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the decision in the case of Weguellin v. Wayall, 14 Queen's Bench Division, 838, restricting the exemption of business premises from Inhabited House Duty to cases where only one caretaker is kept, irrespective of the size of the premises, and that this decision prevents bankers and others who have a watchman from employing a caretaker unless they pay the duty on the entire premises, thus injuriously affecting porters and messengers who, but for this restriction, would be employed also as caretakers in large buildings in the City of London; and whether the Government will take steps to remedy this grievance, either by exempting business premises entirely, or by making the duty payable only on the value of such part of the premises as may be occupied by the caretakers?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): In the case referred to, the Court decided that business premises in charge of a caretaker who has dwelling with her a son—in independent employment—a daughter, and a servant were not within the exemption in favour of such premises dwelt in by a caretaker of the nature of a menial servant. But in practice no objection is raised by the Board of Inland Revenue in cases where the Local Commissioners give relief where two caretakers are employed, provided they are both menial servants, nor in cases where the caretaker has residing with him members of his family who are dependent on him for protection and support. No legislation is necessary on the subject.

THE TOWER OF LONDON WHARF.

MR. MONTAGU: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he would state the number of barges moored at the Tower of London Wharf during 1890, and the number of barges so moored on the Saturdays of that year; and if he will state the result of the inquiries he promised to make, with the view of admitting the public to the riverside promenade on Saturdays and Sundays?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): There were 42 barges moored at the Tower Wharf during 1890, and of these a barge was moored alongside on three separate Saturdays. As regards the second question, perhaps the hon. Member will kindly repeat it in two or three weeks time.

GOLD COINAGE BILL.

MR. MONTAGU: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to introduce the Gold Coinage Bill?

MR. GOSCHEN: I will answer the question of the hon. Member in about a week's time.

THE ROUND TOWER OF ABERNETHY.

SIR JOHN KINLOCH (Perth, E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he can give the House any information as to whether the historic Round Tower of Abernethy is one of the monuments which have come under the control of the Commissioners of Works under "The Ancient Monuments Protection Act, 1882," and in whom the estate in the same is vested; and who has the right of access to, and control of, the same, whether the heritors, the parish minister, or other individual?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON): The Tower of Abernethy is not one of the monuments coming under the provisions of the Act referred to. I am informed that it belongs to the Earl of Home, and kept in preservation by him, and the privileges of access to the Town Council or parish officer which now exist are granted by him.

PENSIONS—MR. THOMAS CADMAN.

MR. J. W. SIDEBOTHAM (Cheshire, Hyde): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has yet obtained an opinion from the Law Officers of the Crown as to the legality of the pension award which has been made in the case of Mr. Thomas Cadman, late Her Majesty's Inspector of Mines for the South Western District; and, if so, what that opinion is?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Yes, Sir, as I promised my hon. Friend, I obtained the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown as to the legality of the award; and their opinion, dated September 9, was to the effect that the decision of the Treasury is within their legal powers, and cannot be questioned by the Courts of Law.

QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY.

MR. SEALE HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, in reference to the last account of the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty presented to Parliament, what is the nature of the ground rents on which capital sum of £285,916 5s. 6d. has been invested; whether they are terminable improved ground rents, or ground rents including the reversions, and where these properties are situated; and whether, in future annual accounts to be presented to Parliament, the same detailed information as to the nature and situation of these properties will be given by the Governors as is given in respect of their other Stocks, funds, securities and railway investments?

MR. JACKSON: I am able, by the courtesy of the Secretary of Queen Anne's Bounty, to give the information. The ground rents referred to are freehold ground rents, including the reversion. They are chiefly in London; others are being purchased. If the hon. Member will write as to any improvement that he thinks can be effected in the annual Return, the suggestion will receive careful consideration.

NAVAL ARMAMENTS VOTE.

MR. DUFF (Banffshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to paragraph 16 of the Fourth Report of the Committee on Public Accounts, recording their opinion to the further fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave an assurance to the said Committee (paragraph 14) that the irregularity complained of would be dealt with by an Inter-Departmental Committee, presided over by the Secretary to the Admiralty; and whether the Committee referred to have issued their Report; and, if so, whether there is any objection to lay the whole Report, or at any rate that portion of it dealing with the subject referred to, upon the Table of the House?

"That the present mode of administering the Naval Armaments Vote is not consistent with the provisions of the Exchequer and Audit Act;"

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The Committee have reported, and the War Office and Admiralty have taken such joint action as will enable the Admiralty to take charge, on April 1 of this year, of all Naval Ordnance Votes. The Committee's Report deals with both the quantity as well as the character of the stores to be transferred, and it would not be advisable to make it public.

WALL MARSH, SHEERNESS.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can explain why, on the 28th day of January last, the public were excluded, by order of the War Department authorities at Sheerness, from a football match played in Wall Marsh, Sheerness, although the said marsh has been open to the public for many years?

MR. BRODRICK: I must ask my hon. Friend kindly to postpone the question for a day or two, as we have not yet received the information that will enable us to answer it.

THE SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he received a Petition from the male sorters of the Savings Bank Department in November, 1889; whether his attention was again drawn to the Petition when he received a deputation from the London sorting force in June, 1890, and that he then promised to make inquiries and to give his decision with regard to the Petition; and whether he has had such inquiry made, and can give the sorters his decision upon their Petition.

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): The reply to the hon. Member's questions is in the affirmative. My decision was communicated to the sorters in the Savings Bank on the 2nd of August last.

BRITISH TRADE IN THE PACIFIC.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if the Government will consider favourably the Resolution adopted at the recent meeting of the Australasian Federal Council, praying that the restrictions on British trade with the Natives of the islands of the Pacific might be made to apply alike to all Nationalities?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): It will be desirable to receive the text of the Resolution before attempting to judge what can be done in the matter.

LATE SITTINGS AT ASSIZES.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has remitted the remainder of the sentence of five years' penal servitude, passed on a woman who was convicted at the last Chester Assizes, before a Court which had been sitting for over 14 hours; whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that similarly protracted sittings frequently occur in Crown Courts at Assizes; and whether he will take such steps as will render unnecessary the continuance of this practice?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I advised the remission of this sentence, not on the ground that there had been a long sitting of the Court, but on a careful review of all the facts of the case, and with the concurrence of the learned Judge. The attention of the Home Office has not been called to any frequent occurrences of protracted sittings at Assizes. They are sometimes rendered necessary, in order to dispose of the Crown cases before the Judge of Assize is obliged to proceed to another town; and I doubt whether it would be possible to make any arrangement which would prevent this necessity occasionally arising, unless the time allotted to each assize town were much prolonged, with the consequence that judicial time would be frequently wasted.

FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS WITH THE COLONIES.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the strong expressions of opinion which have recently emanated from high authorities in various portions of our Colonial Empire, in favour of the establishment of preferential fiscal arrangements between the Mother Country and the Colonies; and whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to afford an opportunity for these urgent questions being considered without delay at a Conference with the representatives of the self-governing Colonies?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The question is under the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and I am unable at present to give any more definite reply.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the extreme urgency of the question?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Yes, I am aware of it, and for that reason I have stated that the question is being carefully considered.

THE BEHRING SEA FISHERIES.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give any further information as to the telegraphic report that the Supreme Court of the United States has given its decision that it has direct control over the Courts of the territory of Alaska, and that it will entertain a motion for a Writ of Prohibition in the case of the British schooner W. S. Sayward arrested by the Alaska Courts for alleged illegal sealing in Behring Sea?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FER-GUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The following telegram has been received this morning from Her Majesty's Minister at Washington:—

"Sayward case. The Supreme Court to-day granted leave to file petition and suggestion for Writ of Prohibition, and directed issue of rule to show cause, returnable second Monday in April. The Chief Justice, in announcing this decision, said that opportunity had been afforded United States to oppose the motion for leave to file the application, and the argument had taken much wider range than was justified, but the Court was satisfied of its jurisdiction to issue the writ applied for. The Solicitor General stated that the United States desired matter promptly disposed of."

THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to insert in the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill any provisions fixing a maximum beyond which land stock cannot be issued, as was done in the Ashbourne Acts; whether, as the Bill now stands, the maximum amount to be issued could be doubled by doubling the annual Imperial contributions and grants to Ireland; and whether there is any precedent for providing by Act of Parliament for the issue of Stock to an amount unnamed?

MR. GOSCHEN: Of course, the hon. Member is aware that there is a maximum in one sense in the Bill, namely, the maximum of 25 times of the Guarantee Fund; but there is no other maximum. I am not aware that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary proposes to introduce one. As the Bill stands, no doubt the maximum amount may be increased as the Imperial contributions increase; but I do not think that the suggestion that the Government should double the annual Imperial contributions and grants to Ireland is within the range of practical politics. Of course, it will be open to any future Parliament to limit a sum if the contributions are increased. I have not had time to examine the third point raised by the hon. Member.

THE NEW MAGAZINE RIFLE.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Mark III. of the new magazine rifle is now in process of manufacture at Enfield, or is contemplated; who are the persons responsible for the selection of .303 as the calibre of the new rifle, in the face of the opinions of practical experts to the contrary; whether the same has been condemned by Government experts as too small for accurate shooting, owing to liability to accumulate fouling, and other defects; whether any increase in size of the calibre has been decided upon, or is contemplated; whether Marks I. and II. can be converted to Mark III. or not; and whether any, and, if any, how many, workmen have been recently discharged from the Enfield Factory; and, if so, can he explain for what reason?

MR. BRODRICK: Mark III. of the new rifle is not in contemplation. Every nation in Europe has adopted a smaller bore rifle; and Government experts in this country have not condemned it. During the four weeks ending on the 31st of January 90 men were discharged from the Enfield factory, a decreased output being required from Enfield now that trade firms are commencing supplies of the magazine arm.

LABOURERS' ALLOTMENTS.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the statement that in a communication from the Commissioners of Woods and Forests the people of Billingborough were informed that Sir Nigel Kingscote as—

"At present advised would not be disposed to grant to labourers allotments which, either in themselves or with other allotments now held by them, would exceed half an acre,"

whilst, under the Allotments Acts of 1882 and 1887, Charity Trustees and Sanitary Authorities may be called upon to provide allotments of an acre; and whether it is in the power of any Department to evade the intention of the law by declaring that where the land in a particular district is under the control of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests the labourers shall have only half an acre each instead of the acre they might have demanded had the ownership been invested in Charity Trustees or private individuals?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to the hon. Member, I have to say that there appears to be some misunderstanding as to the action taken by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The quotation made is not quite complete, and, as a matter of fact, the land which has been appropriated for allotments by the Commissioners of Woods has not been limited to plots of half an acre; on the contrary, where applicants could show that they could satisfactorily deal with the larger quantity, plots of one acre have been allowed. The Commissioners of Woods have never shown any desire or intention to evade the law; in fact, I believe the management of the property in charge of the Commissioners of Woods will compare favourably for liberality with any other estates.

REPORT OF THE CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF POLICE OF THE METROPOLIS.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Report of the Chief Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, 1889, was not circulated to the Members of the House until the 31st January, 1891; and whether he can promise that in future the Report shall be issued as soon as possible after the close of the year?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): I have been asked by my right hon. Friend to reply to this question. I regret that there has been delay in this case. The Report was received by the Secretary of State on the 28th August, which was not much later than the usual time, but which was after Parliament had risen. The opportunity for presentation in the Autumn Session was unfortunately overlooked until December 8th, on which day presentation was effected. The distribution to Members rests with the authorities of the House; and the Secretary of State has no knowledge of the causes which led to the delay between presentation and distribution. I cannot undertake that the Report shall be received in the Home Office much earlier; but will endeavour to secure in future cases its distribution to Members of Parliament and the public within a short time of its being received by the Secretary of State.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Is it not possible to produce and circulate this Report in time to enable Members to have it in their hands when the Police Estimates are discussed?

MR. STUART WORTLEY said that the Report never had been out soon enough to be available for discussion in Debate on the Police Vote.

THE METROPOLITAN WATER SUPPLY.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, with regard to his promise to offer facilities for referring to either a Select or Hybrid Committee the various Bills now before Parliament relating to the acquisition by some Public Body of the Water Companies of the Metropolis, whether he will give facilities for the passing of the Metropolitan Water Companies' Charges Bill, which contains provisions to prevent the companies from raising their rates through the quinquennial re-valuation of property, in prospect of the early purchase by the public?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It will be impossible for the Government to give facilities for such a Bill, as our responsibilities must be limited to finding time for Government measures. I will not enter into any argument as to the matters which are naturally suggested by the question of the hon. Member; but I may say that, if the various Water Bills were referred to a Committee, the Committee would have full powers to consider the terms and conditions on which the undertakings of the companies were to be acquired.

CIVIL SERVICE CLERKS.

MR. JOHN KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the exceptional promotions of specially meritorious clerks of the Second Division of the Civil Service to the higher grade of that Division, made under Clause 6, paragraph 2, of the Treasury Minute of 21st March, 1890, depend in any way upon or involve any change of organisation, but simply require the recommendation of the heads of Departments and the sanction of the Treasury; whether he can state how many Second Division clerks have been recommended by the heads of their various Departments for such exceptional promotion, and the dates of such recommendations; and whether any decision has been arrived at by the Treasury in these cases?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: A few applications have been received for an examination of Class I. of the Civil Service, and this is not wonderful, since the Government have not permitted an examination for Class I. to be held for more than four years, insisting that vacancies in that class should be filled by such measures as the transfer of redundant officers. I do not admit that the hon. Member cites the Report of the Commission correctly; but, however that may be, we shall, in deciding upon these applications, bear the recommendations of the Commission in mind, carefully considering the necessities of the case, and satisfying ourselves whether redundant officers, qualified by age and acquirements for transfer to other offices, are available.

MR. JOHN KELLY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether certain Departments of State are at the present time urging that an examination for clerkships (Class I.) in the Civil Service should be held in order to fill up vacancies in the First Division; and, if so, whether it is intended to hold such examination in spite of the fact that in the Report of the Civil Establishments it is repeatedly pointed out that the higher branches of the Civil Service are over-manned, and that there are at present plenty of redundant clerks to fill any existing vacancies?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I observe that this question is almost identical in terms with a question put by the hon. Member to me on the 27th ult., and I cannot add anything to the answer I then made.

LAND PURCHASE IN IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that, on 23rd November, 1888, Lord Waterford issued a writ in ejectment forth of the Queen's Bench Division (O. No. 109) against Michael Keily, of Tramore, for two and a half years' rent of a statutory tenancy at £5 10s. a year; that the tenant thereupon, to avoid eviction, agreed to buy the holding under the Ashbourne Act; what is the amount of the instalment Mr. Keily agreed to pay the Government annually, what is the date of the agreement, and the amount of the purchase money; in how many cases has Lord Waterford bought back from the Purchase Commissioners holdings sold by him to tenants, and since evicted by them; will the Government provide that holdings so repurchased by landlords shall not be assigned, redeemed, or resold by the owner under the Purchase Acts during the 49 years; and in how many cases, if any, have the Purchase Commissioners been obliged to proceed, specifying whether by eviction or otherwise, owing to non-payment of instalments, and the names of the landlords who sold in such cases?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The Land Commissioners report that on December 1, 1888, Michael Keily signed and verified an agreement for the purchase of his holding in the townland of Carrigantry South, containing 16 acres 3 roods 7 poles, held at a judicial rent of £5 10s., the tenement valuation being £7. The price agreed upon was £150, the annuity thereon £6. The Commissioners caused the holding to be inspected in June, 1889, and, being satisfied as to the security, they provisionally sanctioned the advance applied for, and the case was closed in December, 1889. The Marquess of Waterford purchased four holdings which were put up for sale for default in payment of the instalments, there being no competition at these sales. As stated in the Annual Report of the Commissioners (page 10), "These holdings were sold subject to the future payment of the annuity." The holdings are therefore subject to all the conditions laid down in Section 30 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881. The Commissioners cannot make a Return of the cases in which, during a period of more than five years, they may have instituted proceedings for the recovery of unpaid instalments. A Return, however, has recently been laid upon the Table of the holdings in which final proceedings were necessary by putting up for sale the holdings in which the instalments were in default. I am informed no pressure whatever was used to induce the tenant to buy; that he was never asked to do so; and that it was at his own desire, put forward by him on the ground that he was the only remaining tenant on the townland who had not purchased, that he was permitted to do so.

Mr. W. H. Smith

In reply to a further question by Mr. T. M. HEALY,

MR. MADDEN said: Whether the Government regards this state of things as satisfactory or not, the tenant appears to have regarded it as eminently satisfactory, seeing that the sale was effected at his urgent request.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Of course, it was at his urgent request in order to preserve the holding. Am I to understand that no duress was put upon the man?

MR. MADDEN: Certainly not. The holding was examined by the Land Commissioners, who considered the security sufficient.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to give notice that when the Land Purchase Bill is before the House I will move an Amendment to provide that the annual instalments paid under the Act shall not exceed the annual rent now paid.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): What security have the Government got?

MR. MADDEN: The 16 acres, the tenement valuation of which is £7 a year.

THE DONEGAL MILITIA.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if it is his intention to encamp the 5th Inniskilling Fusiliers (Donegal Militia) during their period of training, instead of billeting them as heretofore; and, if so, where; and whether he will, before directing any change, consult with the Chief Secretary as to the probable financial effect upon the poorer householders of Lifford of any sudden alteration of system?

*MR. BRODRICK: The Donegal Militia will be trained at Lifford, as heretofore; but since, for military considerations, billeting is avoided whenever possible, and the objections to it are so well known, it has been decided that this year the men shall be encamped.

CORK BANKRUPTCY COURT.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor has been called to the recent Report of the Cork Chamber of Shipping and Commerce with reference to the Local Court of Bankruptcy, and the importance and desirability of extending its jurisdiction to the Counties of Kerry and Waterford; whether this could be done with the existing local staff, and without involving any additional expense; whether the Court is at present worked at a loss to the Treasury but would pay its way if the two additional counties were added; and whether, in view of the close commercial relations which exist between the Counties of Kerry and Waterford and the City of Cork, the Lord Chancellor will now, by Order in Council, bring the counties mentioned within the jurisdiction of the Court?

MR. MADDEN: As I stated in reply to a similar question put by the hon. Member on the 11th of July last, the subject of the development of the local jurisdiction conferred by the Act of 1888 on this Court is engaging the careful consideration of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. He is, however, of opinion that it would not be wise to take the step suggested in the question until we have had further experience of the working of the Courts constituted by that Act.

THE CRIMES ACT.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can explain upon what charge, and upon whose authority, 11 women have been arrested in connection with an inquiry held at Castlereagh under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act?

MR. MADDEN: I have called for Reports to enable me to answer the question.

MOTIONS.

TRADING REGISTRATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Bill for the more effectual prevention of fraudulent Trading, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Addison, and Sir Albert Rollit.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 183.]

MAGAZINE RIFLE.

*(4.10.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berkshire) rose to call attention to the new Magazine Rifle; and to move—

“For the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into its merits and all the circumstances attending its adoption.”

The right hon. Gentleman said: I am afraid I shall be obliged to make a large demand on the patience and indulgence of the House in bringing this subject forward. I am bound to confess that the nearer I approach the task I have undertaken the more difficult it appears to me, because, while I cannot pretend to be an expert in mechanics and ballistics, I have undertaken to explain to the House the details of a most complicated and ingenious machine, in whose very complexity and intricacy some of its chief defects are to be found. I am still further placed in a difficulty, because Mr. Speaker has informed me that I should not be in order in bringing a rifle into the House, by means of which I might have given an object lesson to the House in regard to the many points of the rifle. Neither have I the power to exhibit drawings to House. This is not the only difficulty of the position, because I find that the House is absolutely wanting in any official knowledge of this weapon. The Report of the Small Arms Committee, who chose the weapon, has been refused to us. There is no Report whatever with regard to the 15,000 rifles which, we are told, were placed in the hands of the troops during 1890. I am informed that something, like 50 per cent. of these rifles have been returned to the armoury for repair, and I hear on the best authority that in the case of one single regiment 280 bolt-heads failed, and 400 mainsprings broke down in the weapons served out. The only Report before the House is the Report of a trial made of 350 rifles which were issued to various regiments and ships' companies in the year 1888. With regard to my own attitude, I wish to say that I am not the mouthpiece of any inventor. I come to the subject with an entirely open mind. My desire is, as I believe it is the desire of the Secretary for War and every official, that the country shall have the best possible weapon at the smallest possible cost. It has been said it is unfortunate that I, as a Party Whip, should have been called to bring forward this Motion, but I can assure the House that I have left the question of Party altogether out of sight. I have taken no advantage of my official position, and I think hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite will admit that I am hardly likely, from my position, and the Party to which I belong, to be the mouthpiece of the Times in the matter. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) opposes my request for an inquiry on the ground that it would weaken the responsibility of the officials of the War Office. Although the hon. Member appears to agree with me [MR. HANBURY assented] in the view I take of this weapon, and with regard to the way in which it has been introduced, the hon. Member appears to think that the proper course would have been to ask for a vote of censure on the War Office; but that vote of censure is contained in the Report of the Commission presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington). It seems to me that the best course the House can take is to order a review of the circumstances attending the adoption of this weapon. I shall have to go briefly into the details of the weapon, taking the barrel and ammunition, the body, the bolt, and magazine in order. The calibre of the barrel is .303. The rifling is seven groove, with the twist to the left on a modified Metford system. There is one turn for every ten inches, or three turns in all. The ammunition provided consists of a solid drawn brass cartridge, with a compressed pellet of black powder of $71\frac{1}{2}$ grains, and a composite bullet weighing 215 grains. I admit one great advantage has been gained, namely, a weapon in which there is practically no recoil. The recoil in this weapon is only 7 lb., while in the Martini-Henry it is 45 lb. Further, a comparatively flat or low trajectory is obtained; but these advantages might have been attained without any change whatever in the breech mechanism. A mere change in the barrel of the Martini-Henry would have given them. A very small bore has been adopted; what are its disadvantages? In the first place, it necessitates a composite bullet. A lead bullet cannot be used. The composite bullet is exceedingly expensive to make, and the cost of ammunition will be greatly increased. I believe that the smallest bore in which it is possible to use a simple lead bullet is .320, but I should not advise even so small a bore as this, believing .360 or .380 to be an amply sufficient reduction in bore for all military purposes. Secondly, there is a considerable loss of accuracy, the small, long, light bullet of the Lee-Enfield is very susceptible to lateral deviation from the influence of wind. I should like to know what any distinguished small-bore shot, were it Sir Henry Halford himself, would say if he were asked to use a .303 in the competition for the Elcho Shield. And, thirdly, there is a great diminution of striking power. Allusion to this will be repeatedly found in the Report of the trial of rifles in 1888. I do not believe there is an owner of a deer forest in Scotland who would allow a friend to go out to shoot deer with a rifle of this exceedingly small bore. The greatest amount of striking power is obtained in the Express rifle, in which is used a lead bullet with a hole in the top—a device, of course, impossible to adopt for a military arm—which expands in the animal struck, and prevents the bullet from passing through. The body of the rifle is an exceedingly delicate piece of mechanism, which, weighing in its rough forged state no less than 5lb., is reduced after 192 processes to $1\frac{1}{2}$ lb. Owing to the position of the magazine it is necessary to have a hole $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches long through the middle of the rifle.

Sir Thomas Esmonde

This most expensive portion of the rifle is a mere framework of unhardened iron, only .10 inches on the under side and that cut away very much for the cut-off. Next, I come to a still more important portion—the bolt of the rifle itself, which I hold in my hand. It has the appearance of being an exceedingly solid and strong piece of mechanism, but I can assure the House it is nothing of the kind; it is a fraud, a snare, and a delusion. This delusion is assisted by the bolt-cover, which I now remove. See the small diameter of the bolt, which is moreover in two parts—the bolt-head and bolt proper, the latter bored out through all its length to contain main-spring and striker. The bolt-head is attached to the bolt by means of the small bolt-head screw, which only projects one-tenth of an inch into a slot cut in the neck of the bolt-head. The wear and tear of the swivelling round of the two parts of the bolt in opening and shutting the breech, and the whole strain of extracting, must be borne by this small surface of the bolt-head screw. From a Return issued this morning, however, it appears that the bolt-head screw has been abolished altogether. This is a very sudden change to have taken place. So late as December last an exhibition took place in the House of an improved pattern of the rifle known as Mark II., and assurances were given that the bolt-head screw was adequate, that all that it required was to be a little better tempered in order to make it perfectly satisfactory. Yet within six weeks the bolt-head screw is abolished altogether. This is not very re-assuring. It leads to the impression that if those who are responsible for this rifle can change their mind so quickly, there may be other flaws of which they may hereafter be convinced. With regard to this bolt-head itself, it appeared to be weak and unsuited to support the great strain which would be thrown on it. This, indeed, was shown from the result of trials that had already been made. A Report has been given us with regard to the trial of 350 rifles. It is contained in a Blue Book, of which a single copy is in the Library, although it has not been presented to the House itself.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I told the right hon. Gentleman that if any Member will move for the Return it will be laid on the Table at once.

*MR. MARJORIBANKS: In the Reports I find that out of 350 brand new rifles no fewer than 12 had their bolt-head fractured, and in 8 the bolt-head cover was fractured. Thus, in 20 cases out of 350, or more than 5 per cent., either the bolt-head or the bolt-head cover was fractured. These figures show that there is great weakness in this portion of the bolt. Attached to the bolt-head is the extractor. It is not a direct extractor, like the Martini-Henry and all our quick-firing guns have, but is a spring snap extractor; it does not precede the cartridge into the chamber, but is pushed past and over the rim of the cartridge, where it is already seated in the chamber. This is a system acknowledged to be wrong in principle. The spring is small and weak, cannot be easily cleaned, will become rusty and corroded by the gases of explosion and be certain to give way. With regard to the striker and mainspring, they ought to be so adjusted as to be easily accessible from the base of the bolt, and not require a special tool to remove them in case of accident. When the bolt is drawn back a very slight touch will screw round the end of the striker and cause the jamming of the gun itself. This defect has been strongly commented on by the Inspector of Musketry at Aldershot, who reports that of the 40 rifles tried nearly all of them were injured at the shoulder from this cause and adds "this should be rendered impossible." When the rifle is at full cock the cocking piece projects $1\frac{3}{8}$ inches behind the bolt; a comparatively slight blow would bend the striker and throw the rifle out of gear. The arrangements for safety are most unsatisfactory. It is exceedingly difficult to place the rifle at half-cock, and when it stands at half-cock it is impossible to open it. Even in nimble and agile fingers it will be found difficult to let down the cocking piece to half-cock without its slipping from the hold. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War was good enough to lend me a rifle, which I tried and returned to him. Afterwards I wished to get one for myself and I managed to find one for sale in London.

Mr. E. Stanhope

I went to the shop and was about to take it up, when the head man said, "Don't touch that rifle, Sir; it's very greasy. I will show it you." Having wiped it, he proceeded to seize the bolt to work it, but could not open it. He said, "I don't know what's the matter with it." I said, "Why, you have it at half-cock." Now, if an expert like this man, in the quiet of a London shop, finds a difficulty in working the rifle, would not a soldier in the excitement of action, or on a dark night, experience much greater difficulty? One more word with regard to half-cock. If the bolt, instead of being shut home, is only half closed, the soldier may think he has closed it, and he pulls at the trigger. The rifle does not go off, but falls very nearly to half-cock. He sees the bolt standing nearly straight and gives it a knock to knock it down. It does then fall to half-cock, and the rifle refuses to open. Well, these are little things that are very likely to happen on active service, and they are things which a soldier ought not to be subject to. Then I find very great fault indeed with the fact that there is not a proper safety bolt on the rifle. There ought to be a bolt which would fasten at any time, and which, when closed, would still permit the rifle to be opened or shut. To say that the half-cock is any safety at all is simply ridiculous. On the contrary, the present arrangement would, in action, be a source of great danger to the front rank man. Unless it is altered, I, myself, would certainly far sooner be in the rear than in the front rank. Let me now allude to the magazine. A great deal has been sacrificed to this magazine, and yet it is one of the most flimsy things a man ever held in his hand. It consists of a flimsy platform, a weak and flimsy spring and a flimsy case. The magazine is to be attached to the rifle, and is supposed to form a reserve of safety in moments of extreme danger. It is supposed never to be called into play unless what is called, in technical phrase, "the supreme moment" has arrived, but who is to decide as to the occurrence of the "supreme moment?" The soldier, I rather fancy, will think that moment has arrived whenever he is too lazy to put his hand into his pouch. The soldier, it is understood, is to be taught never to use the magazine except under special orders. He is always to be taught to use the method of single-loading. Suppose the "supreme moment" has arrived, and the soldier has received the order and is firing away excitedly, he will most assuredly be likely to fall into the routine of his ordinary drill, and load as a single loader, with his magazine cut-off open. The result with this rifle will be that the cartridges will jam. I will give the House some official opinions on this magazine. From the 2nd Battalion Grenadier Guards we have this view—

"The magazine spring often gets out of order, and cartridges jam, both in filling and loading from magazine."

The Report from Her Majesty's ship Excellent says, with reference to the defects in the magazine—

"Springs become weak after much work. Base of a cartridge liable to get under spring cover and cause delay in loading. Jams caused by two cartridges trying to get in chamber together, due to defect of spring cover."

The Committee at Meerut says—

"Magazine flimsy, and could be easily knocked out of shape."

The Official Inspectors of Musketry at Hythe declares that the "Magazine was easily dented or otherwise injured. Difficult to clean if rusty or dirty inside—liable to be lost."

With special reference to the said magazine they say—

"No advantage can be discovered, and there are certainly many objections. Rapidity not greater than with single loader, when six or more cartridges have to be fired as well as magazine. When magazine fire is interrupted—that is, used in combination with loading from pouch—the rate of firing is very slow."

They add—

"We earnestly hope that even now the principle of detachable magazines may be reconsidered. We understand that the sole object in the introduction of a magazine rifle is to have for a certainty, on some critical moment in a battle, a supply of cartridges which can be fired with great rapidity. So important is this apparently considered, that rapidity in single loading is to some extent sacrificed for it. We are convinced that the machinery on which this effect, the raison d'être of a magazine arm, depends, should be a fixed integral part of the rifle, guarded jealously from injury or loss in its place, and effective at the required moment."

Now, Sir, though I do not pretend to have exhausted the list of defects to be found in this weapon, I will not go more into the details of the rifle, but I would wish for one moment to refer to these Reports themselves, and to the conditions under which they were made. 350 magazine rifles were sent out in the autumn of 1888, and 50 carbines, to be tried by various bodies of men. They were all at that time brand new. They were manufactured for the express purpose of being thus handed out for trial. We never have contended that this Committee, and the War Office, and the Enfield authorities were such utterly incapable people that they would turn out a rifle which would break down at the first touch. It would have been a thing beyond conception if these trial rifles had utterly broken down under such circumstances. I must complain of the way in which this Report has been, I might almost say, manipulated. Twenty-two questions were put to the various bodies to whom the rifles were issued. What is called a Summary of these Reports is given in page 144. In that Summary they do not deal with question by question, and give a Summary of the answers favourable or unfavourable to each. The 22 questions are compressed into 14. To show the method of compression, let me give an instance. The second question is as to the liability of clothing or equipment to be damaged by the rifle, and the third as to the liability of the arm, or any portion of it, to be damaged by the rough usage of the service. These are compressed into: "Is the rifle liable to become damaged or to injure the uniform or equipment?" I do think we had a right to expect that in the Summary of the Reports we should have been given a statement of the actual injuries suffered by the rifles, as reported by the various bodies to whom they were submitted. We have no such data. We are told the Reports were altogether practically satisfactory, and all mention of hostile criticism, except with regard to the ejector springs, is suppressed. It is curious to notice the different tone of the Reports received from the Army and from the Navy. There are two rather remarkable Reports from naval authorities with reference to the rifle. The officer commanding Her Majesty's ship Cambridge says he "Considers it a matter for the gravest consideration whether the naval rifle should be of so small a bore as .303 in. He is of opinion the .402 in. bore would be most suitable for naval service. He prefers 'block action' to the 'bolt.' He does not consider a magazine necessary for the Navy, it being unsuitable for ship work, and it would encourage waste of ammunition. A new weapon not so much required as a superior training to develop to the utmost the powers of the one we possess."

The Board of Officers of the Royal Marine Artillery who considered the matter, report—

"The present system of magazine not sufficiently advantageous to counterbalance disadvantages of rifle. Board are of opinion that a combination of the magazine rifle barrel and the Martini-Henry block system would constitute a better rifle."

Besides this, we have the Report from the officers and sergeant instructors at Hythe, and it does seem to me that if any body of men are worth listening to on such a matter it is they. I do not want to weary the House by reading their Report; I will merely read a Memorandum on that Report by General Sir Redvers Buller, which sums it up in a single sentence. He says—

"There is not much in this, except a general condemnation of the rifle which has just been approved."

I must say it seems to me very strong action to have lightly set aside so decided a Report from such a quarter. With regard to the Committee which was primarily responsible for the magazine rifle, no one Government can be held accountable for it. It was appointed as far back as April, 1883, and continued at work until 1888; and it consisted of three soldiers, General Philip Smith, Colonel Slade, and Colonel Tongue, one naval officer, Captain Jackson, Sir Henry Halford, a distinguished smallbore shot, and a late much lamented Member of the House of Commons, Mr. Guy Dawnay, a dear friend of my own and many other hon. Members. I do not want to criticise the individual members of the Committee. I do not think it was as good a Committee as might have been got together; but, admitting that the Committee was a satisfactory one for the purpose of deciding between the merits of different guns submitted for approval, I say it was a Committee utterly unfit to invent a gun on its own account; and that was what it turned its attention to. Between 1883 and 1885, though no public advertisement was given asking for rifles to be submitted, and no public trials instituted, no fewer than 31 different kinds of rifles were submitted, and by November, 1885, it was found that only two rifles had survived the trials. These were the Lee rifle and the Owen-Jones rifle. Between November, 1885, and September, 1886, the Committee appear to have held no meetings—a fact which is not easily explicable—but in September, 1886, the Lee rifle was finally adopted. The breech mechanism of the present rifle, however, has been evolved since the date of the adoption of the Lee rifle; and, indeed, little of the Lee principle is now left beside the fact that there is a detachable magazine placed in front of the trigger-guard, necessitating the use of a bolt system of breech action. Between September, 1886, and the period of the issue of 350 rifles for report, the Committee was at work building up a rifle. The members of the Committee were not mechanics, but they had the run of the Enfield yards, and the assistance of the Assistant-Superintendent, Mr. Speed. Mr. Speed took out various patents connected with the processes of manufacture of various parts of the rifle. I asked for a Return as to the amount of royalty paid in respect of these patents. I was told that no royalty had yet been paid, and that no decision had yet been come to as to what reward should be given. This may be the case with regard to the Government factory, but it is difficult to understand how the various private factories engaged in the production of the rifle can have avoided paying something for the patents. The House has a right to know what has been the cost of the experiments, and how much money the Small Arms Committee has expended in arriving at those particular points on which Mr. Speed has taken out patents. The result is, at any rate, that an exceedingly expensive rifle is being manufactured. The War Office put the cost of the weapon during the past year at £5 5s. a rifle, and the Financial Secretary told us the other day that the estimate taken out for next year was £4 a rifle, congratulating the House on the cheapness of the weapon. But the estimate for next year is a very different thing from the cost which may be actually incurred for these rifles. The French Lebel rifle costs 40f.; the Mauser rifle is now offered for sale for 80f.; the Mannlicher rifle is sold for 75f.; while for the British magazine rifle I have myself paid eight guineas in the open market. The Return just given to the House shows the necessity of the great cost of this rifle. The old Martini-Henry cost about two guineas, and had 61 component parts, as against 98 in the magazine rifle. In the manufacture of the Martini-Henry rifle there were 991 processes; in that of the magazine rifle there are 1,611. The number of workmen required to produce 1,000 rifles in 54 hours is for the Martini-Henry 751, and for the magazine rifle 1,310; therefore, the number of hours worked in the production of 1,000 Martini-Henry rifles is 40,554, and of 1,000 magazine rifles 70,740. I quite agree with the Secretary for War that it is quite impossible for the House to properly discuss the details of the new rifle; but when it is found that the rifle has been passed by a Committee who themselves invented it, when it is found that the cost of that weapon is double that of the old English one, and greatly exceeds that of all those recently adopted by foreign countries, and when it is found there is a vast body of military, naval, and non-professional opinion hostile to, or severely critical of, the mechanical principles on which it depends, surely it is time for the House to insist that a body of expert mechanics should examine it, to see whether it is constructed on sound mechanical principles. All I ask the House to do is to take proper precautions with regard to this rifle. After the Report of the Commission presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, it is impossible for the House to accept with blind confidence everything that is done by the War Office. Any right hon. Gentleman who possesses racehorses knows that a horse may be exceedingly good looking and exceedingly fast, and yet have some weak point. Such a horse may pass through all its preparations and trials satisfactorily, and yet break down when the supreme moment comes, owing, to a great extent, to the very trials which it has previously undergone. If the Secretary for War were buying a horse, he would not take the views of the breeder and the owner of the horse as final. He would probably call in an expert to find whether the horse was really sound. On the same principle, I now ask the House of Commons to refer the new rifle to a small body of mechanical experts outside the influence of the War Office, so as to enable the House to form an accurate judgment on this very difficult matter. I beg to move the Resolution standing in my name.

Mr. Marjoribanks

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the merits of the magazine rifle, and all the circumstances attending its adoption."—(Mr. Marjoribanks.)

(5.16.) MR. HANBURY (Preston): Whatever opinion we may have as to the reference suggested by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I think we must all congratulate him on the utter absence of all Party spirit from the tone of his speech. Surely, if there is one subject more than another on which upon both sides of the House there ought to be no Party animus, nor any charge of Party disloyalty, it is one like this, which is purely a matter of administration connected with the defence of the country. I do not pretend to follow the right hon. Gentleman into all the details, technical and mechanical, into which he has gone in regard to the new magazine rifle. On them I am not capable of forming an opinion, and I do not suppose there are many of us here who are capable of forming an opinion; but at the same time there are facts in connection with the introduction of this new rifle on which we are capable of forming an opinion. It is admitted that the Committee of experts—some persons say experts, and some say amateurs—but at any rate the Committee who had the selection of the new rifle, instead of being the judges of a number of rifles submitted to them, and having the opportunity of picking out the best and most effective weapon, constituted themselves rifle inventors, and became interested in pushing this particular rifle from first to last. At any rate, it is beyond doubt that at the Enfield Factory itself there were official patentees of this rifle, and when I state that one of the factory officials, Mr. Speed, out of 13 patents connected with this rifle, holds no less than 10 in his own name, I think the House will agree with me in saying that once for all we ought to put an end to this system of official patentees, because it is utterly unfair to the inventors who come before the heads of the Government establishments, where they get their brains picked by the officials, and have their ideas appropriated. Whether they get royalties I do not know, but I think that is a point on which we ought to have a distinct statement from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War. I will go one step further, and say that if there is one body in England which ought to be able to express an expert and qualified opinion on the new rifle it is those who are at the head of the School of Musketry at Hythe. Well, what happened? The School of Musketry at Hythe passed a severe condemnation on this rifle. Colonel Tongue, who was the head of the School at Hythe, was one of those who were put upon the Committee of Choice, and a more inappropriate man you could not possibly have had on such a Committee; because, as the head of the School of Musketry, he was one of those to whom appeal would be made as to the merits of the rifle in the last resort, and therefore he ought to have had no direct interest in pushing forward that particular weapon. The heads of the School at Hythe ought to be a body capable of giving a free and unbiassed opinion on such a subject. But what has been the case? Colonel Slade, who was one of the most energetic members of the Committee, is now the head of the School of Musketry at Hythe. That, I think, is not the way in which the Government ought to have proceeded. So far, I am in agreement with the right hon. Gentleman opposite; but when he comes to the remedy, I am obliged to differ from him. What I say is this,—either the War Office is right at the present moment or it is not. If it be right, the proposed remedy of the right hon. Gentleman would prove dilatory and mischievous, and would postpone the introduction of the new rifle for a considerable time, and we have already been nearly ten years considering what new rifle we should have. Moreover, if the War Office is right, the less we interfere with the Government establishments the better, and therefore the Royal Commission which is proposed would be an unnecessary evil. But, on the other hand, if the War Office is wrong, then I say the remedy would prove wholly inadequate. If, with all its money, all the talent it has at its command, and all the time it has at its disposal—it being now nearly eight years since the Committee began to sit on this subject—if, under these circumstances, the War Office cannot perform one of its most ordinary duties in regard to the supply of arms for the service of the country, I think we shall require something of a much more stringent and drastic character than a mere inquiry into the way in which it has dealt with the introduction of this particular arm. If it be the case that the War Office has been so thoroughly inefficient, as has been pointed out, then I say it wants overhauling from top to bottom, and not a mere inquiry such as is now suggested. The right hon. Gentleman says that this is exactly what Lord Hartington's Commission recommended; but are we right in trusting to Royal Commissions? We have already had so many of them sitting at the War Office that the War Office ought to be at the present moment one of the most perfect bodies under Heaven. On the question of the introduction of new arms and new materials of war into the Service, you had only two or three years ago a Royal Commission, which was presided over by Mr. Justice Stephen, and on which my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Horsham Division of Sussex (Sir W. Barttelot) sat. That Committee went fully into the question as to how the War Office should undertake the supply of arms to the Service; and what was the result? The way in which this Committee of experts, or amateurs, has recommended this rifle has been at the bottom of the whole mischief, and what has been done in regard to it has been done in the face of the recommendations contained in the Report of the Committee over which Mr. Justice Stephen presided. What did Mr. Justice Stephen say on the subject? He said—

Mr. Hanbury

“These Committees have no continuity; they involve no official responsibility; they are often unfitted to the work; they sit only when it suits their convenience; they are liable to be dissolved at any moment, or to be re-constituted or superseded at a moment's notice; and their proceedings are often dilatory, confused, and unsatisfactory to the last degree.”

And this is the very Committee on the recommendation of which we have been asked to adopt this new rifle. It is quite clear that Royal Commissions will not do the work for us, because the War Office does not carry out their recommendations. What we want is something more potent—something that will speak with a stronger voice than a Royal Commission. The only body that can speak with that strong and potent voice is the public; and, although the War Office does not mind these Reports of Committees and Commissions, it may be influenced by the voice of public opinion. No doubt the Government does not object to the appointment of a Commission to deal with matters of this kind, because they know that when the people see that a Royal Commission has been appointed they say, "Ah, now it will be all right. A Royal Commission has been appointed, and it will inquire into the whole facts, and take care of our interests." In this way public opinion is deadened, the subject is dropped, and nothing more is heard of the matter, at any rate, unless some catastrophe or accident should happen, or some great mischief result. When this is the case the War Office is then able to turn round upon its Royal Commission, and say—"That Commission was appointed to take all the responsibility off our hands, and therefore you must not blame us in the matter." That, Sir, is one reason why I do not want a Royal Commission. What I say is, that the proper thing for us to do is to lay the full burden of responsibility on the War Office, to see that that Department does its work, and to punish those who do not perform their duties in a proper manner. But it is said if you have a Royal Commission you will get a great deal of information out of it. I think there is already a great deal of information on this subject, even down to the most minute technical details. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War has been in receipt of the most valuable Reports, and he has also before him the extremely valuable letters which have appeared in the Times—letters which, I believe, will be found to be of considerable service. [Mr. E. STANHOPE shook his head.] Well, we shall see how that is by-and-by. At any rate, we can, after all, ensure the whole of the information we require without any Royal Commission at all, and it ought to be laid before this House as soon as possible. It lies with the War Office to furnish the information. Let us also see what has been done in regard to this matter elsewhere. We should like to know what the Indian Government has to say on the question of this rifle. We ought to have the opinion of that Government as an independent authority, because I think it would be a valuable thing for us to know what it has to say on the subject. I find that the Victorian Government, as is stated in the Melbourne Argus, gave an order for 5,000 of these rifles, and that all of a sudden that order was countermanded. We should like to see the correspondence between the War Office and these two Governments on this subject. But if we are in want of information, surely we can get it by word of mouth from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State in this House quite as well as by means of a Royal Commission. If the information is to be got in an official way we shall not get it any the better from a Royal Commission than from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War. I know that it is frequently said, on behalf of the Government, that papers which are asked for are confidential. But we want to get hold of the papers in this case, and to know what the Colonial Authorities and the Indian Government have to say in regard to these things. We shall, however, never get full information on these subjects until the House and the country are treated with a little less reserve on the part of the Government Authorities. These are matters on which the public has the right to full information, and we have pretty good evidence, as given before Mr. Justice Stephen's Commission, that the public does not get full information. The late Adjutant General Lord Wolseley stated that "One of the most serious complaints that can be brought against the system of the administration of the Army, and the system of Government as it bears on the Army, is that we do not tell the truth to the English people."

If we could only get more explicit answers to some of the questions that are put in this House, the country would be better informed as to how the service is to be supplied with proper and efficient arms. It is the system of secrecy that is adopted in regard to these matters which is doing the Government more harm than almost anything else; it is from this that its difficulties mainly arise. If the War Office would only take the country into its confidence, we should hear a good deal more about this rifle than we know at present; and, for my part, I think that after all a good deal may be said on the side of the new weapon. We have not heard what are the tests that have been applied to it by the Colonial and the Indian Governments, nor have we been informed as to what they have to say on the subject. I do, however, happen to know that this rifle was submitted to a very severe test by the Roumanian Government, who had it tried in competition with a certain number of other rifles of a similar character, and that the result was that the magazine rifle, which has been adopted by Her Majesty's Government, came out first. That being so, it is, as far as it goes, a justification for the selection of this rifle; and, at the same time, it is obvious that rival inventors would be only too keen in endeavouring to get the Government to put aside the rifle they have adopted in favour of their own particular weapons. There can be little doubt that a good deal of the opposition to the new rifle does come from these rival inventors. As a matter of fact, much the same opposition was raised against the Martini-Henry rifle, and it was fully two years or more after the first issue of that rifle that it was perfected. If the Government would only take the public into its confidence, it may be that there is much to be said for this rifle. I think it is the duty of the Government to do so. It is important, in the interests of the nation, that the soldier should not get into his head that he is armed with an inefficient weapon. Once get that into his head, and he will never like his weapon. This is what strikes me: either the War Office in this case is the most reckless and headstrong Department that ever existed, or it has got thorough confidence in its rifle, because it is going on with the manufacture of it, as the right hon. Gentleman said, "With a rapidity unexampled in the history of this country." In the face of Hythe, of the FitzJames Stephen Commission, and of the Indian and Colonial evidence, they are proceeding with the manufacture of this rifle at a rate unexampled in the history of this country. It is perfectly incredible that the War Office, if it has any suspicion of its own rifle, should go on with its manufacture at the pace it does. For these reasons I object to the Royal Commission suggested by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. We must have one of two things: If the War Office refuses inquiry into this rifle, and takes the entire responsibility on its own shoulders, then we ought to know exactly who it is we are trusting. What is the real and main object of my Amendment? If we are not going to have an inquiry by an outside body, then we must press home the responsibility of the War Office to the utmost extent.

Mr. Hanbury

Mr. E. STANHOPE*: Hear, hear!

Mr. HANBURY: My right hon. Friend says "Hear, hear!" to that. My right hon. Friend objects to anonymous criticism of this War Office rifle. I, on my part, object to the anonymous responsibility for this rifle. It is not the right hon. Gentleman who is responsible. That would be wanting in reason. It is utterly impossible that responsibility of this sort should be thrown purely on the Secretary of State for War. We all know what would happen. If the worst come to the worst, we should have a five-line Whip sent out on Government authority, and his sole responsibility would vanish. It is impossible that any one man, civilian or military, can be responsible for all the details of the War Office. And the right hon. Gentleman has very wisely and betimes guarded himself against any possibility of being made responsible for this rifle. I saw the other day what I thought was a very sensible letter on the subject, in which the writer says that whether the rifle is or is not a suitable weapon for the British Army, it is not a matter upon which any weight would, or ought to, attach to the Secretary of State's opinion. If that is the case, then we cannot hold him responsible. Again, Mr. Justice Stephen's opinion is worth nothing, and he was the head of the Commission which considered the subject; nor is the Small Arms Committee responsible. The extract from the Report says—"We cannot be held responsible in any sense." Then I want to know who is responsible? The right hon. Gentleman referred us to Sir Redvers Buller, but that officer says—"I know nothing about rifles; I do not profess to be any authority."

That would appear to suggest that you cannot hold him responsible. Going a step further, the right hon. Gentleman referred us to the large body—he does not tell us who they were—which passed judgment upon this rifle. He says that the reports of the trials being satisfactory a meeting was held at which were present the Duke of Cambridge, Mr. Stanhope, General Wolseley, Sir Redvers Buller, Major General Alderson, Sir Frederick Abel, Mr. Anderson, Mr. J. Rigby, and others. Well, that is a very lax responsibility—"and others." I want to know every one who was there. Sir Redvers Buller has generally disclaimed responsibility.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): He is incorrectly reported. The only statement made is that contained in an anonymous letter in the Times this morning.

MR. HANBURY: I beg pardon; I read the speech of Sir Redvers Buller, I think both in the Times and in the Broad Arrow. I have seen no contradiction of it. I understand he is to be held responsible. Then is everybody in this large body to be held responsible? That is really the gist of the whole question. I should say that the man who is to be held responsible is the Director of Artillery—General Alderson. He is an expert, at the head of this particular Department. My sole object in introducing the Amendment is to get a statement from the Secretary of State as to who, if anything goes wrong, is going to be dismissed from his position, who deprived of his pension, who punished for providing the British Army with a thoroughly bad weapon. We cannot have responsibility of a general character put upon the War Office; there have been too many breaks-down in that Department lately. The country has a right to demand from the right hon. Gentleman information as to who is responsible. If, as I firmly believe, to a certain extent this rifle is a good one, we want to know who will have the credit of it; and if it is a bad one, then who is the man who should be punished for handing a bad weapon to the British troops? I have introduced my Amendment with the object of ascertaining exactly where the responsibility lies. I beg to move the Amendment of which I have given notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "It is undesirable, by the appointment of a Royal Commission inquiring into a detail of military administration, to weaken the full responsibility of the officials, specially charged with that duty, for the recommendation and adoption of the new magazine rifle,"—(Mr. Hanbury.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to second the Amendment.

*(5.26.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): Sir, when the hon. Member for Preston speaks on military administration I very often support his views, and I agree with much, not all, that he has said on this occasion. This question is a very peculiar one, and it is one, beside the importance of which the question of responsibility of particular officers or bodies sinks into insignificance. The national existence depends upon whether the rifle with which our troops are armed is good or bad. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwick has enlightened the House by a most interesting speech, and he has given us most valuable information. On this question the right hon. Gentleman is a specialist. His performances with the rifle rival Locksley's, in Ivanhoe with the long bow. I myself have seen the right hon. Gentleman make 19 bull's-eyes out of 20. [Cheers.] The House has a right to cheer, for the occasion to which I refer was when the right hon. Gentleman was the champion of this House against the Representatives of another place. The right hon. Gentleman pulled various pieces of the rifle out of different pockets in the course of his instructive and interesting observations; and at one time I thought he had put on a poacher's coat, and that he was going to pull out the stock and barrel, which he could well have done, as the magazine rifle has a divided stock. The right hon. Gentleman divided his subject into four heads, and I will deal with them, though not from the mechanical point of view. I have gone through a special course at Enfield with respect to the rifle, so that I know something of the subject. I think the right hon. Gentleman made a mistake in going into too many details. But he has raised an important question, namely, the reduction of the bore. In Europe, up to five or six years ago, every country except, perhaps, Switzerland had a bore of 44 hundredths. That was the average over Europe. Some five years ago the French made a regular revolution in small arms by reducing the bore from 44 hundredths to 30 hundredths. They have the whole honour and glory of that movement, though the Swiss had shown the way to a certain extent. The reduction from 44 hundredths to 30 hundredths appears at first sight considerable. But that is quite insignificant. You must go by the cube of this ratio of 3 to 2, and I say that the change if measured by the cube increases the effectiveness of the rifle enormously. The reduction of the bore to which the right hon. Gentleman objects has enabled the authorities to reap tremendous advantages. In the first place, the trajectory is flattened. If a bullet from a Martini just grazed the head of a man at 1,000 yards' range it would fall 28 yards beyond him, while a bullet from the new rifle would fall 52 yards beyond him. When you come to using the rifle in action it may be taken that the difference in the execution done by the two rifles will be in proportion to those figures, or about five to three. Then the recoil is reduced. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire is an accomplished marksman and does not shirk the kick, but the ordinary soldier looks upon the Martini very much as he looks on a kicking horse—he is afraid of it, and under such circumstances you cannot expect him to aim correctly. But the right hon. Gentleman has said that the kick of the new rifle compared with the Martini is as 7 to 45, which means that the kick of the new rifle will have practically no effect on the shoulder. That will make it possible to train a soldier much more quickly, besides enabling him to fire a great number of rounds without the bruising of the shoulder which results from firing 45 to 50 rounds with the Martini. The right hon. Gentleman said the bore should not be reduced beyond the point at which a leaden bullet could be used. That view was discussed in the Times this morning, but the writers did not condescend to give figures. The right hon. Gentleman gives .320 as a bore which would stand a leaden bullet. That is very little larger than the present bore, which is .303, and I doubt whether the right hon. Gentleman can prove that his figure is correct. I know that experiments have been made at Enfield, from which it would appear that .400 is the smallest bore suited to a leaden bullet. I do not believe any force armed with .450 bore rifles could stand against troops armed with rifles of .303 bore, the advantages of which are so enormous. They would be out-shot at the long ranges, and also would not be able to carry so many cartridges. Every one wanted to reduce the bore. It was known that if that were done there must be a longer bullet, and, to prevent it turning, greater speed would have to be imparted to it, and then there was the danger that the rifle would get foul through powder lodging in the grooves. Therefore, it was decided to have a nickel or copper or iron and zinc covering instead of a pure leaden bullet. It was objected to by some military men that such a bullet would stick in the rifle, but there is really no practical difficulty with the bullet sheath, which only sticks when the rifle-barrel is perfectly clean. If an oiled rag is passed down the barrel, or if the soldier breathes down it, the sheath will not stick, even on the first shot afterwards the sheath never sticks. There need be no difficulty except that arising from utter and supreme carelessness. I do not think the "striking power" is of much consequence. That argument was used against the Minié rifle, as compared with the Brown Bess. I think men of ordinary courage will be stopped by one of the small bullets, but if not, then the magazine will enable the soldier to put in two or three bullets. Even if the small bullet will not stop a horse, as a general rule the rider will stop it if there is a shower of bullets. The second great difference between the old rifle and the new is the change from the falling block to the bolt system of breech action. The bolt system is, I think, much the simpler. There is nothing rash in that change, for the bolt action has been thoroughly tried all over Europe for 25 years. I believe the United States are the only people who follow us, and they have, I believe, not a falling but a rising block breech action. A falling block is probably incompatible with a magazine, for if the falling block is used the cartridges must be pushed in with the finger, while the bolt action pushes them in itself in the act of closing the breech. I repeat that in making this change we have done nothing rash; indeed we have taken a wise and prudent step, as the bolt system has been tried in any number of campaigns with every success. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has done the Government justice in not giving them credit for this change. As to the details of the breech action, I think them of secondary importance. I generally find when anything goes wrong with the breech mechanism of a fowling-piece that it is because the gunmaker has been trying to sail round somebody's patent. That can hardly be the case here, for the Government have annexed everybody's patents. The points of detail with which the right hon. Gentleman has found fault are chiefly questions of manufacture. The extractor is a well-known one, and there has only been one doubtful case of failure. At Woolwich only one bolt-head has been injured in the rifles used for proving ammunition, and that is a very small proportion after 20,000 rounds from that particular rifle. The right hon. Gentleman said that the extractor is weak, and that it is short; but in such mechanism the shorter a thing is the better, because it is less likely to bend, and this extractor always goes on pulling out the cartridges. The right hon. Gentleman also objected to the strikers and to the main spring. As a matter of fact, Hythe lately tried 100 new main springs; only one broke, and the rifle fired well with the broken one; but I think that we may now rely on the main springs, which are similar to those which have been tried on the Continent in great wars, while that in the new rifle has less pressure on it than was the case in the Continental rifles. I do not see how the extractor spring can break. Several have been tried during the last few weeks. Out of five in the hands of troops one broke; but, on the other hand, out of five which snapped 2,000 rounds none broke, and similar success attended five which snapped 40,000 rounds. With regard to sand, the rifle has been tried in Egypt, and after being buried 24 hours in the sand all has gone well. I therefore think that it may be assumed that the rifle will stand sand. I believe that now soldiers are in favour of the rifle. Of course, there have been some small faults, such, for instance, as in the screw which has joined the bolt-head to the bolt, but there is no fault now in that respect. We cannot expect to change from a large to a small bore and from a falling block system to a bolt system without some mistakes being made, especially when the rifle is being manufactured at a great rate. I will now pass from the details of the bolt to what has been called an essential feature of the rifle, namely, the magazine. The right hon. Gentleman did not object to a magazine very much, I suppose, because he considers that a magazine is, on the whole, a useful addition to a rifle. Nearly every country has a magazine rifle except Russia, which has a rifle which takes six or seven cartridges on the top of the barrel in a quick loader. But the right hon. Gentleman objects to this magazine on the ground that it ought to be fixed, and he also finds fault with the magazine spring. I am informed on the best authority that out of 100 which have been in daily use by soldiers for six weeks not one has failed or showed any sign of rust. I think that is a very fair test. Again, these magazines are not of very great importance; they can be rapidly changed. In the United States Navy they keep us in countenance in this matter, for they use a detachable magazine on the Lee system. It is easier to take out the magazine and put in another than to fill a fixed magazine with cartridges, and the magazine now in use cannot really drop out. In action fresh magazines can be brought up and supplied to the troops, and therefore I consider that a detachable magazine is a very valuable feature, and far surpasses any fixed one. I do not think that there is any fear of the cartridges not coming out of the magazine separately; of course, if a man tries to put a cartridge into the barrel without cutting off the magazine there will be two cartridges at once, but even then nothing will happen to put the rifle out of order. Of course, a great deal must necessarily be speculation. Hon. Members would like to know how these weapons would answer in warfare, but we cannot get up a first-class war in order to try a rifle. I believe that in 1885, in the war between the French and the Chinese, the Lee rifle proved an excellent weapon. Some 36,000 of these weapons were sent out, together with 36,000,000 rounds of cartridges, to the Chinese, and the defeat of the French at Lo Shoon is generally attributed to the Lee rifle, although the French had the Kropetsky fixed magazine rifle. We only differ from all the other nations with regard to the magazine rifle in one important point, and that is in reference to the detachable magazine. On every other broad point we agree with every other country in the world. As to the smaller points referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, I have no doubt they may be very usefully considered, and I think the Secretary for War ought to have them carefully inquired into. But they are only points of detail, and I believe that up to the present the rifle has been very successful.

Colonel Nolan

*(6.2.) Mr. E. STANHOPE: I shall have to ask for the indulgence of the House for the large number of details which it will be necessary for me to refer to in the course of my remarks, but I ask for it upon no other grounds. I have been attacked outside the House very bitterly; but, for my part, I should be very sorry to answer my critics in the same spirit in which they have attacked me. The object of every one in the House is, I am quite sure, to arrive at the truth, and, therefore, I appeal with the utmost confidence to this much fairer tribunal to deal with the matter in a spirit of absolute fairness. My hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) has asked us to show less reserve. I am not conscious myself of having shown any reserve. All the Reports which have been asked for have been laid on the Table of the House, and they could have been printed if it had been desired. Certainly, so far as I am concerned, I have no desire to keep back anything. I desire in every respect to take the House into our confidence, because I believe that the more we take the House into our confidence the more certainly shall we be supported in the steps we have taken. I think the House will be of opinion that, while I must go into many details, without unnecessarily wearying it with them, it is my duty, first of all, to dwell upon some points of principle that have been raised. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, about the tone or substance of whose speech I make no complaint at all, has asked for an inquiry by a Royal Commission. Well, I confess I should be exceedingly glad to take it upon myself to give an inquiry, if I saw my way to do so, that would relieve the War Office of some responsibility. We have got, we believe, a good rifle, and in our opinion the more inquiry we have the better that rifle will come out. My hon. Friend the Member for Preston has moved an Amendment to the effect that the House ought not to take away any of the responsibility from the War Office, which has chosen and issued the new rifle, by the appointment of any Commission of Inquiry or by any outside inquiry at all. I entirely agree with the proposition of my hon. Friend. The position is this—we have chosen and issued a new rifle. We fully accept the responsibility for what we have done, and I think it would be very unwise, and hardly in accordance with the practice of the House of Commons, were they to appoint a Commission of Inquiry to take away responsibility from those to whom it rightly belongs, and confer it upon some body constituted we do not know how. Therefore, if we come to a Division—and I hope we may not be required to do so—I shall certainly be prepared to vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend. Now, Sir, let me ask this question: What is the nature of the responsibility for this rifle? Who, in short, is to choose a new rifle which is to be put into the hands of the troops? On this question I believe I shall receive the universal assent of the House to the proposition I lay down. In the first place, it is not the Secretary of State upon whom devolves primarily the responsibility for the choice of a new rifle. A good deal has been argued out of doors on this question. But if I had overridden the opinion of all the authorities, and had given the troops on my own responsibility a rifle of my own choosing, I should like to know what would not have been said, and justly said, against me. The House will remember perfectly well how Sir FitzJames Stephen's Commission censured the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh for doing what he says, and I believe rightly says, he did not do—namely, for making some alteration in the detail of a rifle in contradiction to the view of the Military Authorities. We all remember perfectly well that a few years ago one of the greatest complaints made by soldiers at that time was that they had too little control over the weapons put into the hands of the Army. I certainly thought a good deal of that complaint was well founded. Now no such complaint can be made. Now the primary responsibility for the weapons of the Army rests with the Army. Then my hon. Friend very naturally says that he wants responsibility a little more particularised than that. Well, Sir, the primary responsibility for recommending a new weapon rests with the Director of Artillery. He is the man who has to recommend the new weapon to his official chief. That weapon having been proposed, it comes naturally after a time before the Secretary of State for approval. If he approves that rifle and issues it to the Army, he must then assume responsibility to the House of Commons for the weapon and for its manufacture. I accept that responsibility. I do not shrink from it in the least degree. That responsibility properly rests on me, and I hope the House of Commons will not deprive me of that responsibility, because I am confident—at any rate, so far as I am concerned, I have undertaken it in a serious spirit—that I have done my utmost to acquaint myself with every detail connected with this rifle, and I am prepared, not only in consequence of recommendations made to me by my military advisers, but also in consequence of the very careful examination I have given to the subject, entirely to endorse their opinion, and to accept that responsibility.

Colonel Nolan

MR. HANBURY: Leaving the Director of Artillery responsible to the Secretary of State?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Certainly. Now, Sir, let me state first of all the argument I propose to address to the House. I hope to be able to argue that this rifle has been chosen with the greatest care, and after full deliberation, that it is undoubtedly the best rifle that could have been chosen at the time it was chosen, and that at the present time it is a thoroughly good rifle for its purpose, if not absolutely the best rifle that could at this moment be chosen. How was this rifle chosen? A Committee was appointed in 1883. That Committee sat during two or three years, and was re-appointed, with one or two changes, in 1886, and examined every rifle that was submitted to them by any inventor who was willing to produce a rifle and submit it to the Committee. I do not think there was any rifle mentioned up to the last year or two that was not fully considered by the Committee, and on which they did not express a complete and absolute opinion. I was not the Secretary of State who appointed that Committee, even in its original or in its later form. What I did was this: I found the Committee ready constituted, and I thought it possible they might require the assistance of a manufacturer of rifles—an expert in that sense, who would advise them on questions of detail; and, therefore, about a year before this particular rifle was adopted for use in the Service, I appointed Mr. Rigby, a Dublin gunmaker and a man of great experience—the best man upon whom I could lay my hand—to assist the Committee in their choice of a rifle. As I am not responsible for that Committee, I think the House will allow me to say what I think about it. I believe, Sir, there could not have been, on the whole, a better Committee chosen. The points which had to come under the survey of the Committee were various, and, in my opinion, it would have been impossible to constitute a Committee for that purpose that would have satisfied everybody. There were upon this Committee three distinguished officers who had given special attention to this subject—General Philip Smith, Colonel Slade, now the head of the Musketry School at Hythe, and Colonel Tongue, at that time the head of the School at Hythe—and my dear and lamented friend Guy Dawnay, who thoroughly understood what was required in a sporting rifle, and had given great attention to military rifles. He gave up all his time and some of his holidays for the work that was being carried on by the Committee. Then there was Captain Meryon of the Royal Navy, who brought before the Committee the requirements of that branch of the Service, and whose valuable services every member of the Committee would, I am sure, readily acknowledge. That being so, the Committee, having examined every rifle that came before it, presented its Report in 1888. The result of that Report was that 350 rifles were manufactured and issued for trial in various directions. Some were sent to India, some to Egypt, some to Canada. Extensive trials were made, and it was some time before the Reports came in. I should like the House to consider what our position then was. We were being pressed on every hand. Everyone will remember what took place at that time, and how we were being pressed on all hands. Pressure was put on me in the House of Commons, and I was asked to explain why the War Office were not ready to produce a magazine rifle. The Press were unanimous in saying that if foreign countries had a magazine rifle, they wanted to know why we should not have one, too. Among these journals was one to which I should like to refer specially, as it has taken a very prominent part recently on this subject—I mean the Times newspaper. Everyone will remember the character of the criticism which the Times has lately been passing on what we have done. They have said that the rifle has been hastily chosen, that no magazine rifle is needed at all, that the rifle chosen is a bad rifle, and they also say, without any disguise, that they desire to advocate another rifle designed by Major Godsal. Let me quote a passage from an article in the Times, of September 4th, 1888, the whole of which is well worth reading—

"How necessary it is that no undue or avoidable delay should occur in the issue of repeating rifles to the British Army is proved by the almost universal adoption by Continental Powers of such a weapon."

And then, after referring to the difficulty about ammunition, it goes on—

"In other respects the Committee have reason to congratulate themselves and the Army, for they have devised a weapon which, take it all round, is probably superior to any other rifle yet adopted. . . . It may be hoped that the authorities will lay to heart the following sentence from Colonel Slade's Report:—'Perfection and finality are unattainable in military weapons, and, as the question has been so thoroughly threshed out and considered from every point of view, any further delay in issuing the new arm is very much to be deprecated."

Mr. E. Stanhope

With that extract I leave the criticism of the Times. I come back to the position of the Small Arms Committee. Can it be said by anyone that the trials of the new rifle were inadequate? The trials were carried out in every climate and under every contingency, as the following statement fully showed:—

"The trials were of the most exhaustive nature, both by the Committee and by the troops. Thousands of rounds were fired rapidly to test the action and the barrel, until in some cases the sights were melted off. The rifles were left loaded on the grass in the winter for 14 days and nights and then fired successfully; they were dropped heavily scores of times on the stones, dropped from a height, sunk in the water, exposed to a sand-blast, and passed successfully through the severe test of firing cartridges purposely made defective—a test which proved fatal to nearly every rifle that was submitted for trial to the Committee; in fact, the Committee utterly failed in their efforts to break down the rifle."

The Reports received of the trials in various parts of the world were so favourable as regards the suitability of the new arm as a military weapon that all doubts, if any existed, were removed. Accordingly, the famous meeting of November 1, 1888, was held in my room at the War Office. We had before us all the Reports upon this rifle, and every member of the Committee and every person concerned unanimously expressed the opinion that the manufacture of the new rifle may be safely proceeded with. And the manufacture has accordingly been proceeded with. Various changes were no doubt made—changes which increased the strength, the stability, and the simplicity of the new rifle—and it was issued last year for trial by the Army at large. Exception is taken to my having placed this rifle, which is a more complicated weapon than the Martini-Henry, in the hands of recruits. But I did so purposely, because to do so would, I thought, afford the best test—because if it passed such a test it would be all the more satisfactory, and because in the hands of recruits faults might perhaps be discovered which, when so discovered, might be remedied. The weapon was tried by an enormous number of persons in all parts of the country, especially at Aldershot, and the result of all the Reports has been that not one of my advisers has been shaken in his opinion of this weapon. No doubt the trials showed certain defects on some particular points which could be remedied, but they confirmed the opinion that the weapon was a good one, which could be made thoroughly satisfactory. I received only this morning a letter from a gentleman whose name I cannot give, as I have not had time to communicate with him and obtain his permission, but who, I may say, is one of the best shots in England connected with the Volunteer Service. He puts the case very well. He says—

"The difficulty of the position is this—that neither ordinary M.P.'s, nor newspaper writers, nor the public can be in any sense judges. The questions are of two kinds—mechanical and military. There are few men in the country who combine knowledge of these two sides of the subject sufficiently to be fair critics. The ammunition troubles have been unfortunate. When they are solved I have every confidence that we shall possess a rifle second to none in the world as a military arm."

I may also refer to the opinion of the Director General of Ordnance Factories, who is not himself interested in this rifle, it having been approved by his predecessor. Mr. Anderson tells us he is satisfied it is "a thoroughly good arm, and one that will give complete satisfaction to the Army." Then we are told it must be a very bad rifle because we have introduced what is called "Mark II;" that is to say, because we think that there are sufficient good improvements suggested to justify us in issuing a new mark rifle. I think we should be foolish if we did not avail ourselves of experience gained in many parts of the world—foolish if we did not take advantage of most valuable suggestions in respect to the magazine rifle. This is the reason why we are trying "Mark II." It holds more cartridges, and is more easily loaded. On the whole, we think that when we have thoroughly tested it this will be the best rifle we can supply to our troops. But we have not therefore withdrawn our confidence from "Mark I." That will be used during the coming year, and I have the strongest belief that the trials of "Mark I" will command the confidence of the country. It is said the rifle is a complicated one, but so are all magazine rifles. The German rifle, to which some reference has been made, is much more complicated than any single shooter, and so is the French rifle, but if you eliminate the parts connected with the magazine from the other parts, you will find then that the rifle has very little more complication than the Martini-Henry even at the present time. Let me come to some of the objections urged to this rifle. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Marjoribanks) has urged certain objections in detail, which I am sure the House has heard with great respect. He has had the advantage of using the rifle we were perfectly ready to lend him for personal experiment, but we asked him to communicate to us the results of the trials he made. Unfortunately he did not make his Report until after the criticisms in the Times appeared, but there are passages in his Report which I should like to read to the House. The right hon. Gentleman says—

"I have tried the rifle, and made good practice on both occasions. I was especially struck with the even results obtained as to elevation, which was well maintained, even when the rifle was hot and dirty. My experience of 110 rounds is there was no stripping of bullets, and no single wild shot, while the mechanism worked well."

Therefore, so far as that Report is concerned, we have no reason to be dissatisfied. Now, I come to some of the objections in detail. Objection has been taken with regard to the small bore, and in regard to the bolt, and on that subject I have not a single word to add to the admirable remarks of the hon. Gentleman who spoke last. He spoke with an authority on the subject to which I cannot pretend; but I should like to add that if it be said by the right hon. Gentleman on the one side that the small bore is objectionable, and that the bolt system is not so good as the drop-block system, then, on the other side, we have uniform European experience and the universal adoption of small bore and of the bolt action. We arrived at the same conclusion afterwards, but we arrived at it by independent experiments and experience, and I do not think we can be very far wrong when we arrive at the same conclusion as European authorities, but by independent experiments. There is one point upon which, as the hon. Member has fairly stated, we differ from European nations, and that is in the mode of using the magazine rifle, and I do not think this point is too technical for me to attempt to explain. In the case of foreign nations the magazine is always in use—that is to say, the soldier is always firing from the magazine, and when he has to re-load he has to put in a clip containing five cartridges, and cannot use his rifle as a single shooter. Now, in the action of our magazine rifles, the weapon is, until the supreme moment, used as a single shooter, and would be so used on ordinary occasions, but the moment the officers commanding may decide the time has come to bring the magazine into action, then the soldier will know that he has in his rifle 11 cartridges ready for use. With the foreign magazine rifle the soldier will not be certain when the crisis arises how many cartridges he may have in his magazine, and if they suddenly come to an end he must re-load his magazine. With our rifle a soldier knows he has 11 shots to account for the enemy, and we believe, if, as undoubtedly is the case, the morale of the soldier is largely affected by the weapon he uses, we think we have taken the best means of giving the soldier confidence in his rifle. I now touch on some of the minor defects. I may say that, undoubtedly, a good many of the mainsprings have failed. That is a defect of manufacture, and arises from the difficulty of making a large number of springs of exactly the same quality as the one turned out for pattern. The hon. Member for Galway has already pointed out that the tests applied show that more recent mainsprings are thoroughly satisfactory. It is believed we have got over the difficulty, and when anybody says that the rifles would have been put out of action by the failure of the mainsprings, I should like to say the failures were only discovered by the minute examination to which we subjected the rifles. The rifles issued last year were not left unexamined in the hands of the troops, in order that if no defects were discovered they might be considered serviceable; they were carefully examined by the inspection department, in order that the minutest defect might be discovered. Although a considerable number of the mainsprings broke at one end or the other, as a matter of fact very few of the rifles would have been put out of action. In any case, the substitution of one spring for another is an easy matter, and I am quite sure the matter does not operate to the disadvantage of the rifle as a useful weapon. Then there is the sight for the rifle, and this presented the greatest difference of opinion. The Committee were not all desirous of having the "Lewes" sight, but it was thought by some to be an improvement. Opinion has been divided; but, on the whole, the opinion of practical men is against the Lewes, and we accept that decision, and we shall issue the new rifle with the old form of sight. As to the bolts, some screws had undoubtedly given way under the severe trials to which they had been subjected, but I need not detain the House longer than to say we believe we have completely overcome that difficulty by substituting in the rifle of new manufacture a perfectly simple substitute for the screw where this gave way, and if "Mark II." is manufactured on a large scale, the screw will be done away with. Then, as to the magazine spring giving way on some occasions, that is a still smaller matter, easy to be remedied, and we are remedying it now. There is the extractor spring, and all I can say is our experience does not agree with what the right hon. Gentleman says. The Reports from the Army are entirely in the opposite direction—that the extractor spring does its work perfectly well. The more we try this, the more we find that the extractor does its work well, and hardly ever needs repair. Then there is an objection I will allude to, though we have not heard it urged to-day. It is said the rifle is not easy to clean or repair. But that is not our experience. When I was at Aldershot I asked one of the armourer sergeants a question on this point, he having thousands of rifles passing through his hands. He reported that the rifle is no more difficult to clean or keep in repair than any other rifle which he had in his hands. He says—

Mr. E. Stanhope

"There is no more difficulty in cleaning this rifle than in cleaning any other rifle I have ever had."

Now, Sir, I come to larger questions. Our difficulty with regard to these rifles has been the same as the difficulty experienced in foreign countries. First of all there is the jealousy of rival inventors; and, secondly, the defects in the ammunition. I do not hesitate to say that if our ammunition at first had been as good as it ought to have been, we should not have had three-fourths of the complaints that we have heard. I fully admit that the ammunition originally issued was not as good as it should have been. But I am also fairly entitled to remind the House that we have always told the House with the utmost frankness that we were not satisfied with the ammunition in its present form. There is no doubt that in our case, as in the case of foreign countries, the experimental stage as regards powder the bullets is not over altogether. But I am glad to tell the House that, so far as the compressed black powder is concerned, the ammunition we are now manufacturing is giving highly satisfactory results. We have heard of the "stripping" of bullets, but as we supply the new ammunition we do not hear this complaint repeated. We find the ammunition giving thoroughly uniform results, and are therefore under no apprehension as to the ammunition we are now able to manufacture for the rifle. But our task is not done until we are able to give ammunition charged not with compressed black powder, but also with the new smokeless powder. I am glad also to say that our experience, so far, with the new smokeless powder, which we call "cordite," has been satisfactory. Until we have received additional Reports from foreign climates, such as India and Canada and other places, we shall not be able to speak with absolute positiveness as to the keeping qualities of the powder, but it is exempt from some of the causes of deterioration which undoubtedly exist in the case of most foreign smokeless powders. Our powder, which we shall be able to produce on a large scale in April, has given special satisfaction in the new 12-pounder gun, and in weapons of a larger calibre. Its application to the rifle has been throughout much more difficult, but for the opposite reason to that generally alleged, because the new smokeless powder gives less, instead of greater, pressure than the black powder. But we are satisfied with the experiments, and have every reason to believe that before long ammunition charged with the new smokeless powder will be issued to the troops for trial. Now I come to the question of the cost of the rifle. Of course, all magazine rifles must be more costly than single shooting rifles, especially in the first stage of their manufacture. Our method of calculating the cost of rifles is, that we include a sum sufficient to pay off within a small number of years the whole of the expense of the machinery we have set up for producing the rifles. This is not usually the case abroad, nor was it when the Martini-Henry was produced. The Martini-Henry was first produced on a large scale for £3 18s. 4d. In 1888-89 it cost £2 2s. 10d. The magazine rifle when first produced on a large scale at Enfield cost £5 5s.; during the current year ending on March 31st I believe the cost will turn out to be about £4.

MR. HANBURY: Does it include any royalty?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I will come to that point presently. The trade price for the rifle has been no doubt heavy, but it must be remembered that we include in our calculation the whole of the cost of the machinery laid down for the purpose of manufacturing the rifle, and in order to provide for that cost, and for a reasonable margin of profit to the trade, we allow about 15 per cent. in addition to the cost of the rifle at Enfield. But this is only to be allowed in case of the first 100,000 rifles, afterwards the matter is to be the subject of consideration. I have seen it stated by Sir Charles Dilke that the cost of the French Lebel rifle was only 20f., and the right hon. Gentleman to-night has told us that the cost is 40f. Neither of these statements, however, approximate to facts. I happened to-day to be able to get information from a source which I know to be reliable, that for the French rifles produced on a much larger scale than we are manufacturing, the average manufacturing price of 3,000,000 rifles is 52f., but in this estimate no account is taken of the cost of laying down machinery. If you take that into consideration you must add 13f. to the cost of the weapon. On the other hand, the price does include the cost of the bayonet, which is 8f. or 9f. If you deduct that, you arrive at a cost for the rifle of about 57f. But it is always difficult to make a fair comparison between the cost of a rifle in this country and the cost of a rifle abroad. The main cost of a rifle is due to the labour expended upon it, and everybody knows that labour in France and Germany is very much cheaper than it is here. Therefore, you will see that a magazine rifle can be made abroad at a smaller cost than in this country. Rifles similar to some of our sporting guns are sold at Liège at half the price charged for those guns in this country. Whether they are as good and reliable I will leave sportsmen to say. I have been asked about the cost of ammunition, and the right hon. Member opposite said that the cost of the ammunition for the magazine rifle will be double the cost of the ammunition for the Martini-Henry. As a matter of fact, the price per 1,000, in the case of the magazine rifles to be manufactured in the coming year, will be £6 5s., while the contract price of the Martini-Henry ammunition has been £5 15s. The comparison must be made with the solid drawn case for the Martini-Henry, not with the rolled case, which is only used for practice, not for service, and which once fired cannot be loaded a second time. For the past two years the contractor's price for the Martini-Henry ammunition has been £5 15s., so that the cost for the new ammunition is far from being double. Undoubtedly the new ammunition is a little more expensive, but I am confident that when it comes to be produced on a large scale, and we have had a little more experience, the price will be found to be but little greater, if it is not actually less, than the cost of the Martini-Henry ammunition. The right hon. Gentleman has also called attention to the fact that patents have been taken out by Mr. Speed, who is in Government employment, in respect to the inventions made by him in connection with the magazine rifle. It may therefore be well if I explain shortly to the House the law with regard to this matter, and the position of men employed in the Government service. The matter was fully considered by the House in 1883, and at that time, although the War Office urged strong objections to that course, it was decided that patents should have effect against the Crown, and a provision to that effect was inserted in the Patents Act for 1883, with the addition that the Government might use any invention on terms to be fixed by the Treasury. In the same year a series of conferences began between the Admiralty, the War Office,

Mr. E. Stanhope

the Board of Trade, and the General Post Office, to consider the effect of this Act upon the Government service, and it was decided to allow Crown servants to patent because, in consequence of the Act of 1883, they would have a very strong inducement to patent, and, if not allowed, would patent indirectly, or would leave the service, and also because it was desirable to encourage inventions, but not by promotion in the service. Regulations were accordingly settled by the Law Officers of the day and made public. Under these regulations Mr. Speed and others have been allowed to take out several patents connected with the magazine rifle. Mr. Speed has not received from the Government any remuneration or royalty in respect of his inventions, some of which have no doubt been adopted, though all may not be the subject of valid patents. Any remuneration which may be paid to Mr. Speed will be assessed in accordance with the regulations, which lay down that regard is to be had

"To any facilities in working out and perfecting the inventions or improvements which the inventor may have enjoyed by reason of his official position."

Certainly, so far as I can judge, and without admitting the validity of any patent, more than one of his inventions is of great value to the public service, and it is impossible to say that any mischief has resulted from the encouragement which has been given to him and to others to suggest improvements. But I will frankly admit to the House that my experience generally in this matter leads me to doubt whether the deliberate policy of 1883 was a wise one. There are, of course, special difficulties attending the opposite course; and, upon the whole, I incline to the opinion that the best system would be to allow the patent to be taken out, but to require it to be assigned to the Government. This was the plan adopted in the case of the new smokeless powder, when Sir F. Abel and Professor Dewar patented their invention, and immediately assigned the patent to me. I have accordingly asked the other Departments of State interested in this matter to agree to a renewal of the Conferences of 1883, with the view of considering whether any alterations should be made in the regulations in the interest of the Public Service.

*MR. MARJORIBANKS: How about the royalties?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Mr. Speed gets no royalties from the Government, either at Enfield or at Birmingham. If hon. Members wish to ask further questions I shall be glad, with the permission of the House, to answer them; but I believe that I have now dealt, so far as can be in this House, with all the points that have been raised. Two of the previous speakers have referred in strong terms to what they call the system of Army administration, and they have urged that certain changes are requisite which were recommended by the Commission presided over by Lord Hartington. I have nothing to add to what I said to the House on that subject beyond this—that anyone who reads the Report of Lord Hartington's Commission will see that, whereas now the responsibility for choosing new weapons for the Army rests primarily with the Director of Artillery, so with the system recommended by Lord Hartington's Commission, the primary responsibility rests precisely in the same quarter. I think I have touched on the question of responsibility in a manner that can leave no doubt in the minds of hon. Members. We have not the least hope of satisfying rival inventors. We expected a good deal of outside criticism. If anyone will take the trouble to read the volume of Hansard which records the Debate on the Martini-Henry rifle, he will find that every single objection which is made against this weapon was made against the Snider was the best weapon in the world, and that there was no confidence to be placed in the Committee that tested the Martini-Henry. We were told also that every portion of the rifle was patched up and made to look its best, whereas it was very bad. We were told that it was going to be an excessively costly weapon; but we have lived through those fearful predictions, and I believe that we shall live through the fearful predictions that are now made about this weapon. I have never pretended that this rifle is a perfect weapon. No magazine rifle in existence is a perfect weapon, and I do not think that any rifle is a perfect weapon. All that we can do is to make the improvements in it that experience suggests, in spite of the unfair conclusions which are being drawn every day from the fact of altering even the smallest detail of the rifle originally proposed; and we are confident, even as it is, that we are putting into the hands of the troops a weapon which has been most carefully selected, which has been most exhaustively tried, and which time will prove to be thoroughly suited to all the wants and requirements of the service.

(7.7.) MAJOR RASCH: I will not detain the House for more than a moment or two, but I should like to say why I seconded the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Hanbury). The right hon. Gentleman opposite seems to be of opinion that to the Secretary of State for War responsibility in the matter of the momentous changes which have been made should be brought home, and if not to him to somebody else. The right hon. Gentleman did not seem to think so on the 15th November, when he wrote to the Times, stating that no weight could be attached to the opinions of the Secretary of State, and even now I fail to understand whether the responsibility is to rest on the shoulders of General Alderson or on those of the Secretary for War. If the strictures of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire are correct, it is in his judgment necessary that the responsibility should be brought home to some one, because the public will ask that the blame shall be laid at somebody's door for the rifle which has been brought out. It is very difficult for me to attempt to criticise the extremely technical though interesting speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan). The hon. and gallant Member is well known and respected in the Army as the inventor of the range finder, but as the Financial Secretary to the War Office, in an answer to a question of mine the other day, stated that 2,000 magazine rifles will be issued weekly, I should like to know whether the hon. Gentleman will give the House a little more information on one or two rather important points. It is stated, and I believe correctly, that owing to the weakness in the breech-block there is a certain tendency to jam. We had enough of that sort of thing in the Soudan in connection with the machine guns. Then the extractor is said by those who have had experience of the new arm at Aldershot to be weak and inefficient, and in order to bring it into play it is necessary to use force. I admit that the reduction in the bore and in the weight of the bullet is in favour of the new rifle. The Secretary for War states—and, of course, I am compelled to accept his statement—that the reduction in the bore does not increase the tendency to strip. I am told that it does do so, and that it makes the bullet leave the muzzle of the rifle a shapeless mass, so that it is impossible to have good shooting. As to the sight, I am told that no allowance has been made for windage, and this in a rifle sighted for 3,000 yards. I should like to know whether it is the fact that the Government of Victoria have, after inspecting the rifle, refused it, and that the Government of India have also refused it; and whether Papers will be laid on the Table having reference to an order by the Indian Government for 70,000 of these rifles. The Secretary for War alluded to the Report of September 5, and to the inability of the Committee to break down the rifle after repeated trials, but if the right hon. Gentleman will go down to Aldershot he will find that Tommy Atkins has broken it down very completely with his unaided ingenuity, and that something like 40 per cent. of the weapons in the hands of the troops have been sent back to the Sparkbrook factory, at Birmingham, for repairs. Yet the Report stated that the rifle was practically perfect. Sir Redvers Buller also said in November last year that the rifle was a good one, and on that statement the Secretary for War said that practically it was the best of rifles. In December Sir Redvers Buller admitted that, after all, he did not know much about it, so that I think the Committee have, to some extent, stultified themselves. What is wanted for rough work in the field is simplicity, strength, and cheapness; and I do not think that this new rifle combines those qualities. The shooting with it has been unsatisfactory, and the mechanism has been perpetually breaking down. I do not wish to trouble the House any further, and I should not have ventured to make these observations had I not noticed in the Times of this morning a statement to the effect that military Members always address the House on such subjects as increase of pay, but that when anything comes to the front concerning the efficiency of the Army they usually hold their tongues.

Major Rasch

(7.14.) Mr. SETON KARR (St. Helens'): As the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War has invited questions, I should like to know, in the first place, how many shots he has had fired out of one rifle? I put the question, because the method of manufacturing the bullet adopted in connection with this rifle is an entirely new one, a distinct innovation on all previous methods. The bullet consists of a metal cover, encasing a leaden core. I should like to know the result on the rifling of shooting 2,000 or 3,000 rounds out of this magazine rifle, because I believe that the shield covering the bullet is liable to be stripped off—as a result, the bullet leaving the muzzle of the gun in a shapeless mass. But there is another danger. Supposing the shield should stop in the rifle, I believe that an inevitable result would be that the rifle would burst. If the rifling is not hard enough to pare off the shield of the bullet it will get worn out in something like 1,000 rounds. These considerations make me most anxious to know whether the right hon. Gentleman has had a sufficient test made of the rifle. To my mind, the only good test would be to have some of the rifles fired 5,000 or 6,000 times. We cannot place too much importance upon this point. Then, as to the trajectory, I think the hon. Member for Galway has attached too much importance to the new rifle in this respect, and I venture to doubt the accuracy of the hon. Member's figures, having taken some interest in this matter for 18 years, and being somewhat conversant with the trajectory of firearms, especially of sporting rifles. Although the question is of more importance in modern rifles as compared with the obsolete weapon of many years ago, at any rate it is not of such importance as the hon. and gallant Member would have the House believe. It seems to me of great importance if the flatness of the trajectory is to do away with the elevated sight. In the case of the Army rifle, we cannot do away with the elevated sight, although we can in the case of sporting rifles, which are only intended to carry 200 yards. In the case of the sporting rifle, the trajectory is very flat, consequently the elevated sight is not required, the trajectory dropping in the case of the "Express" rifle from 10 to 12 inches. However, I do not attach so much importance to this as to the stripping of the bullet and the wearing out of the rifle. But there is one other question to which I wish to ask the attention of the Secretary for War. I desire to know what arrangements are being made for giving a variety in the length of the stock of the new rifle. We have heard a great deal about the necessity of Tommy Atkins having confidence in the weapon which is placed in his hands, and I should like to point out that nothing more disturbs the confidence of the soldier than the kicking of his rifle. It disturbs his shooting, and makes young troops almost afraid to shoot. It seems to me that one of the best ways to get over the difficulty will be to get rid of the present improper fitting of the stock. It does not matter how short, or how tall, how thin, or how stout the soldier is, all have served out to them the same rifle; at any rate, so far as I have been able to learn there are only two sizes, and we should have at least three sizes. Soldiers are simply useless if they do not have a good rifle. I came into the House to-day with the intention of supporting the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire, but, after having listened to the speech of the Secretary for War, I do not intend to do that. I do trust, however, that the Secretary for War will reply to these and other questions put to him, and will take care to have every test applied to this rifle that any human being can suggest.

*(7.23.) SIR W. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I desire to say a few words on this which seems to me one of the most important questions which can be brought before the House. I may say I am very glad the Motion has been brought forward in so moderate a manner as to show that the question is not in any sense one of Party. What we all desire, and the point to which we should all direct our attention, is to secure that the rifle used by our troops shall be the best that can possibly be procured. My right hon. Friend, in his most able and exhaustive statement, has shown us that the various parts of this rifle are of the best quality that can be obtained, and that the appliances are the most useful that can be given to the soldier. I would ask him, if this magazine rifle is so excellent in every way as he states, why not put it to a practical test? In the spring of the present year an expedition of 7,000 or 8,000 men will be marching in India, and part of this force might be armed with the new rifle, so that it can be seen how it answers in the field. It is true, as the right hon. Gentleman has pointed out, that there were many complaints when the Martini-Henry rifle was adopted, but the result was that there were no fewer than six classes of the rifle issued, and not one of them, except the first, was at all like the original pattern. When things of this kind occur we are driven to the conclusion that there must be some mistake in the way rifles are chosen a pattern sealed, and which pattern has to be repeatedly improved at very great cost. Looking at the fact that you now have the same sort of Committee that you had when the Martini-Henry was adopted—I am not saying or going to say one word against any member of that Committee, only against the system on which that Committee works, the Committee not being a Judicial Committee, as I think it should be, but a Constructive Committee as well—I would ask why, when the Committee had chosen the Lee rifle, the Secretary of State did not insist that any alterations which were necessary should be made by the inventor himself? Absolute power is given to the Committee, and they, with Enfield at their backs, spend as much as they please in experiments, and the country has to pay for all their failures. I have always thought that the sooner Enfield is abolished the better will it be for the taxpayers. It is too close to London. There is as good a factory as can be desired in Birmingham, where coal and iron can be obtained much cheaper than at Enfield, and where, when it is necessary to discharge men, they can at once find employment. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Director General of Artillery is solely responsible for the rifle. What, then, of the Committee who manipulates the rifle? Are they responsible, or are they not? If they are not, they should not have charge of the experiments. I should like to hear what the right hon. Gentleman has to say on this point, as I think it is a very serious one. I do not disguise my opinion on the matter—I never have done so. It is in the Report of the Commission, of which Sir James FitzJames Stephen was Chairman, that we ought to have an Ordnance Department; and I hold that until we have such a Department we shall never feel secure that we have the best arm in the world. Take care that you do not have amongst your warlike stores arms of different patterns for the Army and the Navy, so that when an emergency arises you do not find yourselves in a dangerous position. It is all-important, as to this arm, that we should have one authority dealing with it, and that an authority responsible to the House. To turn to another point, we have at last copied the bolt-action from foreign nations. English gunmakers are the best in the world; and surely the right hon. Gentleman will not say that if the Government had applied to them for the invention of a block action to suit the magazine rifle instead of a bolt action the required action could not have been obtained. We have also, in my humble judgment, reduced too far the rim of the bore. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway says that the bullets will not strip if a piece of dirty oiled rag is drawn down the barrel of the rifle after the first shot. But how can the soldier go through this process in face of the enemy?

COLONEL NOLAN: I said a piece of dirty rag might be used, or the soldier might produce the same effect by breathing down the barrel.

*SIR W. BARTELOTT: The first thing the soldier thinks of is the enemy. He concentrates his attention upon the enemy, and has no time to think of a piece of dirty rag. When an examination of the rifle was accorded the other day, I saw the process of cleaning with the apparatus carried in the stock of the weapon. Though this apparatus was easily taken out, I was assured by the officer in charge that a considerable time was required for restoring it; and I am certain that under these conditions nine soldiers out of ten would lose the cleaning apparatus.

Sir W. Barttelot

We want the most simple rifle that can be found for the class of soldiers we have at the present day. Look at the men of the Reserve and the recruits, and just see the condition they are in with regard to rifle instruction, and especially with regard to this new magazine rifle. Look at the regiments at home, even those in the First Army Corps, and see how you have to send out your best men when they are wanted for service in India or in the Colonies. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War says it is the best rifle that can be produced. I hope it may be so, but when I looked at the rifle for the first time I thought it one of the most complicated machines I had ever seen. I found that it contained no less than 24 screws, and that in all those screws the threads were different, so that if the rifle wanted to be repaired abroad it would be almost impossible to do it, inasmuch as the screws are not interchangeable. There is another point on which I wish to say a word: I have spoken of the breach action of this weapon. I do not like that action; I believe it to be constructed on a mistaken principle because of its want of strength. But all this has been so clearly shown by the right hon. Gentleman opposite that I will not go further into it. But in regard to the ammunition we are not at all certain about it. It is cased either in nickel, iron, or steel, and the twist in the barrel is increased to give the elongated bullet the necessary impetus. The result is that the bullet is stripped, and damage is likely to arise to the rifling of the barrel. These are serious difficulties with a new rifle. I should have thought you would have taken care not only to have perfect ammunition, but also perfect powder; but I am told that, notwithstanding what the right hon. Gentleman has said, and of course I accept his word, the black powder used is not all that can be desired. It may be good enough at home, but we may have to use the rifle in all parts of the world, and we ought to have no doubt about the quality of the powder to be employed. With regard to the question of responsibility, we ought certainly to know absolutely on whom the responsibility rests. The hon. Member for Preston has talked of wanting to hang somebody for the mistakes that are made. My right hon. Friend the Secretary for War has told us that when he orders the issue of the rifles he will be responsible to this House. No doubt that is so, but you cannot make him responsible for the rifle itself. The Director General of Artillery is said to be the man who is absolutely responsible; but I ask the House, could we do anything with that officer supposing this rifle were to fail? I am sorry my right hon. Friend opposite has asked for a Royal Commission, because I do not think a Royal Commission the right thing. I should have preferred a Committee of this House, not to take away responsibility from the Secretary for War, but to examine thoroughly into the whole question, and report as soon as possible in order to allay the feeling existing in the country upon this matter. That feeling, as my hon. Friend knows, does exist, and may be communicated to our soldiers themselves. A more disastrous thing than that could hardly be imagined. I hope my right hon. Friend will intimate his intention to propose such a Committee, so that it may report upon this rifle, and say whether we have the best rifle or not. If it is not, we should stop its manufacture; but if it is the best, its issue could be continued, and we should feel that we had done our best to allay the feeling which exists outside this House.

*(7.36.) CAPTAIN BOWLES (Middlesex, Enfield): I merely wish to say a very few words in answer to the remarks of the last speaker in regard to the Enfield Factory. The matter is one on which we ought to consider proofs rather than individual opinions. We know that rifles have been manufactured at Enfield, the cost and workmanship of which compare favourably with those manufactured at Birmingham; and with regard to the setting up of manufactories at Birmingham and other large towns, I think we ought to rejoice at seeing the Government factory set up at a place like Enfield, where the artisans can enjoy healthy exercise and country air. I think that the question as to whether this rifle is a good one, or the best that can be made, is one that ought to be left to military experts. I think the case is one in which individual opinions are of very little importance, because we do not know the circumstances under which they were arrived at. These individuals may have tried the rifle, but we do not know the particular tests applied, and, for my part, I would rather have the opinion of a Committee properly appointed—such as a War Office Committee—to decide which is the best weapon, than the opinion of any person either at Aldershot or elsewhere who may not have had proper opportunity of putting the rifle to the test. As regards the trials which are made at Enfield, I believe there is no neighbourhood better suited for this purpose. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to uphold the verdict of the Small Arms Committee.

*(7.38.) MR. E. LEES (Oldham): I think the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War has successfully proved every part of the case he undertook to prove. He has shown that the Department took every possible care to ascertain which was the best rifle, that the whole subject was thoroughly considered and examined, that the Times newspaper has been most inconsistent in the way in which it has attacked him, and that in the rifle which is now served out the Army has got, at any rate, a very serviceable weapon. But he did not undertake to prove, nor did he prove, that the rifle under discussion was the best rifle of its kind now in existence, which, after all, is the point on which both the public and the Army will feel most interested, although it has been proved that it was the best in existence at the time, the Committee sat to decide as to what rifle should be adopted. Since that time, notwithstanding that the right hon. Gentleman has sneered at rival inventions, the rifle produced by Major Godsal has been found to be superior to the rifle now being issued by the Government. I should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman whether we have gone too far with the present rifle to permit of the issue of a superior weapon, if it can be shown that there is such a weapon available, as a substitute. I do not wish to insinuate that the right hon. Gentleman has not fully proved that the Committee took every possible care to see that the rifle they recommended was the best then put before them; but if it be the fact that the Godsal rifle is the better weapon, I should be glad if he will tell us whether it is now too late to prevent the further issue of the new rifle.

*(7.42.) COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): I think it is clear that, whether we have now the best rifle or not, its manufacture should be proceeded with as rapidly as possible, because it is absolutely necessary that the country should be armed with magazine rifles. What we want from the Secretary for War is an assurance that if hereafter it is found that this new rifle is not a satisfactory arm he shall not allow the prejudices of any officers to prevent our Forces from obtaining a better rifle, no matter what amount of sacrifice the renewal of machinery for that purpose would entail. I desire to add one word as to the bayonet. The bayonet attached to the new rifle is a very short one, making the rifle and bayonet 10 inches or a foot shorter than the German and French weapons. In single combat this shortness is said not to be a disadvantage, but were two ranks of men opposed I think it would be a great disadvantage.

(7.44.) CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I should like to say a few words on the question of responsibility. The hon. Member for Preston referred pointedly to the responsibility of some person outside this House. I do not think he is either right or just in making this suggestion, because no one can have responsibility but the Secretary for War; it is he who has to approve the weapon which is issued; and whatever either the hon. Member for Preston or others may say, you may depend upon it that the House of Commons would not stop a man's pension for any mistake that may have been made in recommending a particular rifle. In point of fact, there can be no outside responsibility beyond that of the Secretary for War. I think the right hon. Gentleman is mistaken in contending that the primary responsibility rests with General Alderson or with anybody else outside this House. The ultimate responsibility rests, as I have said, with the Secretary for War, and it cannot be taken away from him except by Statute. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway has spoken of two important points—first, the diminution of the bore, which means accuracy of fire; and, secondly, the question of the magazine. For my part, I am extremely grateful to the hon. Member for Preston for the clear manner in which he has put his case before the House, and I think that, after his speech and that of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, the House will feel better satisfied with the new weapon than before this discussion commenced.

Mr. E. Lees

*(8.15.) MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I can only say a few words, by permission of the House, in reply to the questions that have been pointedly addressed to me, and which I will endeavour to answer as briefly as possible. I have been asked how many shots have been fired out of a single rifle at the trial of the weapon. On this point I am able to reply that at one trial 16,000 shots were fired out of one rifle, and it was thought that was a sufficient test of the weapon, and that it was not necessary to test its endurance any further. My attention has also been called to the length of the stock. That undoubtedly is a point of great importance, and I should not like to express any opinion with regard to it without consulting my advisers. I have been asked whether any orders for the magazine rifle have been given by the Indian Government. I am glad to say that orders have been received from that Government for magazine rifles for the purpose of arming our troops in that country. A certain number have been supplied to the Indian Government, and next year there will be a very large further supply of the weapons sent over. As far as I know, the tests of the rifle that have been conducted in India have been uniformly successful, and the Government have accordingly continued to manufacture the new weapon. I fully admit that there have been difficulties with regard to the supply of ammunition for the new weapon in India, because, if we are going to use smokeless powder, it is important to know whether such powder is suitable for India; but Her Majesty's Government do know that they can provide ammunition that is perfectly suitable for that country, and until the adoption of smokeless powder is definitely decided upon, black powder ammunition will be issued for use in India. With regard to the stripping of bullets, the Department believe that they have entirely overcome that difficulty, although in the ammunition that was first issued the powder was not suitable for the bullet. I am glad to say that, as far as I know, in the new ammunition the difficulty has been overcome, and in the new ammunition no stripping of the bullet need be feared with the black powder and the improved bullet that are now used. I have been asked to give the House an assurance that we have now got the best rifle. Of course, a time must come, in making experiments with these weapons, when something like finality must be admitted, and we must accept the best rifle that can be produced at some period or another and proceed with the manufacture of it. I believe that we have got the best rifle that can be made now; but it is quite possible that three, or four, or five years hence some improvement may be devised which will leave this rifle behind in the race. I am, at all events, sure that we have the best rifle that exists for the time being. Of course, if at any future time great improvements are made in rifles, and their power is so enormously increased that it becomes necessary to introduce a new one with which to arm our Army, the whole subject will have to be gone into again. As to the bayonet, I believe that the new one is a suitable and a most satisfactory one, the Reports from the different districts being generally in favour of it. It is true that it is shorter than the old one, but every country that has adopted the magazine rifle is using a shorter bayonet. I hope that the new bayonet which has been adopted will prove a very handy weapon, and that it will not be found at all too short. The hon. and gallant Member for Sussex has made the only really hostile speech in the course of the Debate with regard to the new rifle; but I must remind the House that the hon. and gallant Gentleman made a similar speech with regard to the Martini-Henry rifle, and I think that his present speech with regard to the new rifle will be attended with similar results to those he then experienced. The hon. and gallant Member asked me whether the expedition that is about to take place in India will not afford a good opportunity of testing the magazine rifle; but the fact is, that there is no .303 ammunition in India at the present moment. Some rifles have been issued for use in that country. Moreover, as our troops in India have not yet been trained and instructed in the use of the new weapon, it is quite impossible that the rifle could be issued for the purpose of an expedition that is to start next month. The hon. and gallant Gentleman made the extraordinary suggestion that the best mode of trying whether or not the rifle is a good one is to appoint a Committee of this House to examine and to decide upon it. I do not know whether hon. Members are inclined to accept such a responsibility; but even if they are so inclined, I very much doubt whether the country would consider that a Committee of this House is a proper body to decide such a question. Very few men in this House are competent to pronounce an opinion as to whether this rifle is suitable or not for the Army, although, doubtless, the hon. and gallant Member himself is one of the few who are. But, however that may be, I do not think that the decision of a Committee of this House on the question would be likely to increase the confidence of the Army or of the country in the fitness of the weapon, but, on the contrary, would be likely to decrease that confidence.

*(754.) MR. MARJORIBANKS: I mean, Sir, to say a very few words in reply to one or two points raised by various speakers. The hon. Member for Preston made rather a point of the fact that this rifle has been found very successful in certain tests in Roumania, and he also inferred that the rifle had been adopted by the Roumanian Government. I have here a letter from the wife of a Minister of War in Roumania, who writes and says that her husband assures her that magazine rifle .303 will not be adopted, and I believe has not been adopted as a matter of fact. Switzerland, too, has certainly put the magazine rifle aside, and the weapon was shown to a distinguished Russian War Office official, who instantly opened the breech, twisted aside the cocking piece, and said, "We know all about that; you do not suppose we are going to adopt such a weapon as that?" My hon. Friend the Member for Galway took some exception to the remarks I made with regard to the bore of the rifle, and he expressed doubt as to using a lead bullet in a bore so small as .320 in. I said that .320 in. was the smallest bore in which you could use a lead bullet but I did not recommend it. My own idea is that it would be much better to have a bore of .360 in. or .380 in. With regard to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, I think it was coloured by official optimism. The right hon. Gentleman was obliged to assume the responsibility of the rifle, and naturally held it was the best possible arm. I am not surprised that he should have adopted that line of argument. I do not believe that that is the case, and that opinion I think is shared by many people outside the walls of this House. The right hon. Gentleman, in quoting the letter of a distinguished rifle shot, said the rifle was very good, if only the right ammunition was obtained; but, Sir, that is a very big "if." Having adopted this very small bore, it is exceedingly difficult to get good ammunition. You have an expensive composite bullet admittedly imperfect, and far from having got smokeless powder, you have been compelled to fall back on a compressed pellet of black powder, which is smoky, dirty, and foul. I think it was hardly fair on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to insinuate that the letter which I wrote to the Financial Secretary on the rifle lent me by the War Office was founded on what appeared in the Times. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that my criticisms, such as they were, proceeded from my own, perhaps not too fertile, brain. He did me the honour to quote a single sentence of that letter, which suited his own purpose, but gave an utterly false idea of its general tenor. I endeavoured to say all the good I could of the rifle; I did not wish at all to take a partial or distorted view. I found that it shot very well, only that I thought the bullet was much affected by the wind. I believe that has been the experience of every one who has fired the rifle. My criticisms on its mechanism were similar to those I have now made in the House. It is perfectly true that the Martini-Henry was years ago objected to in this House on grounds in many respects like those brought forward about the new rifle to-night; especially was that the case with regard to the extractor, which was shown to work on wrong mechanical principles, depending on the short arm of the lever instead of the long one. The scientists on that occasion were sneered at, but in a short time they had their revenge, and full effect was given to their views by a reconstruction of the extractor. I must put the House to the trouble of a Division, because I wish to put on record that some, at any rate, do not agree that this rifle is the best possible of all rifles. I wish to put on record a protest against the decision of the Government in not allowing inquiry as to whether its breech action and various parts are founded on sound mechanical principles.

Mr. Marjoribanks

(8.0.) The House divided :—Ayes 74; Noes 108.—(Div. List, No. 33.)

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, "That it is undesirable, by the appointment of a Royal Commission inquiring into a detail of military administration, to weaken the full responsibility of the officials, specially charged with that duty, for the recommendation of the adoption of the new magazine rifle."

HIGHER EDUCATION (SCOTLAND).

*(8.41.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): The subject to which I invite the attention of the House is the effect of Government Grants on higher education in Scotland. I think that English Members who follow subjects of the kind may take an interest in it, for this reason—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present.

MR. C. S. PARKER: It is the good fortune of Scotland to possess a national system of education, which, as compared with that in England, comes down from an earlier date—if not from the time of John Knox, but, at all events, in statutory form, from William III. The system is also more comprehensive than in England. It has been the pride of Scotland that the humblest of her population have had the means at home of preparing, in the first place, for the Universities, and afterwards for the learned professions. I do not suppose there is in the world a country which has a larger proportion in the learned professions of those who received their first training at a humble parish school. I ask, then, that the question may be treated from a Scottish point of view. I do not propose that the House should necessarily accept the views of the Scotch Members, because in all educational questions there are principles involved which need mature consideration in consequence of their bearing upon England and Ireland. But I hope those who are going to vote on this question will endeavour to plant themselves in Scotland as regards the facts. I must say that on looking over the annual Reports of the Scotch Education Department I have sometimes wished they gave in a more prominent form the facts relating to higher education. Yet, even as it is, English Members may be surprised to find that, whereas in the English Reports you read of almost nothing but elementary education, in the Scotch Report of last year there are examination papers in high mathematics, Latin, Greek, and modern languages, including Italian and even Anglo-Saxon. But for most of the facts I must ask leave to refer to a Report made two years ago by a Committee, of which I had the honour to be a member, and to express my regret that I have not the support this evening of any of my colleagues. One of them, Mr. Cochran-Patrick, then an earnest advocate of education on the Conservative Benches, is now permanent Secretary of the Scotch Department; another, the hon. and learned Member for the Inverness Burghs (Mr. Finlay), is unfortunately called elsewhere by a political engagement; and a third, Dr. Craik, as Secretary for Education in Scotland, cannot take part in our Debates, and could not sign the recommendations. But for the facts set forth in the Report Dr. Craik as well as the other Members is responsible, and the Resolution I have to propose is taken almost verbatim from recommendations of this Committee, appointed by the Government to advise them on the question of higher education. It may be asked what I include in higher education. I am prepared to give a very broad and simple definition. I do not care whether it be classical, or mathematical, or scientific, technical or practical. I call higher education all that goes beyond the usual standard. I would even measure it by age, and say that by higher education I mean education continued beyond the usual age.

The question which is pressing for solution in England arises also in Scotland. It was preached with persistent iteration by the most distinguished man who ever served as an Inspector in the English Education Department, the late Mr. Matthew Arnold. "Organise," said he, "your secondary education." The chief attempt to do so in England is based on the Report of the Schools Inquiry Committee, who, on a survey of England and Wales, came to the conclusion that the safest way to discriminate between the different kinds of education was by the ages at which children would leave school. Elementary education they took as ending at 12, and the third, second, and first grades of secondary education as ending at 14, 16, and 18 years. In Scotland the case is different. The Scotch rarely keep their boys at school beyond the age of 17. Some go to the University before 17, but generally speaking at that age the University training begins. The higher education conducted in the Universities is subsidised by the State to the amount of £42,000 a year, and powers have been given to a University Commission, who, I trust, will take care that the Universities shall not encroach on school life, but shall give up the practice, fast dying out, of taking almost children and teaching them the elements of knowledge. Then, on the other hand, education in the ordinary Scotch schools cannot be regarded as ending at the age of 12. The recognised school age in Scotland is 14, and some stay at school until 15, which leaves only two or three years for secondary education elsewhere than in the ordinary schools. In short, higher education in Scotland is of two kinds. One kind, from the age say of 12 or 13 to 14 or 15, is found in the ordinary schools some of which have higher departments. But those who are to remain till 17 should be sent from the first to the secondary schools proper. In speaking of the education given between 13 and 15, I should like to remind the House that whatever we choose to call legally the school age in Scotland, as a matter of fact, statistics show that there is a falling off of 24 per cent. in the attendance from 12 to 13, and of more than 50 per cent. from 13 to 14. So that practically 12, or perhaps nearly 13, is the age at which the ordinary education terminates. But provision should be made for the few who remain longer. And first, I desire to say a word upon the country schools, in regard to which opinion in Scotland is very unanimous. As a member of the Committee to which I have referred, I had occasion to examine a good many teachers from the country and school Inspectors. We found these teachers and Inspectors unanimously of opinion that the country schools should, if possible, have sufficient teaching power to prepare any boys in the neighbourhood who may be thought fit for entrance to the Universities. At present, however, the present staffs of these schools are insufficient for such purpose. In a large number of schools in Scotland—about 1,000—there is only one certificated teacher who is assisted usually by a pupil teacher. We suggested the addition of an assistant teacher, in which case one or other could take charge of the boys in the higher subjects. All the children would be better taught, and the pupil teacher would be relieved of a great deal of pressure. I think pupil teachers are, as a general rule, called upon to do more school work than is good for them. If there were a staff of two competent masters they could relieve the pupil teacher of some school work, and would be better able to carry on his education in the evening. And this is of importance, because from the pupil teachers are drawn most of the future teachers. Again, in the country, as well as in the towns, it is very desirable there should be something in the nature of continuation schools, but it is hopeless to ask a single-handed teacher to do much evening work. It is estimated that each of these 1,000 schools could be provided with an additional master for £60 a year. One-half of that amount might be obtained from local resources, so that a grant of £30,000 a year would provide the schools in the rural parishes of Scotland with an adequate teaching staff. Passing now to towns, the question becomes more complicated. There are private schools in the towns—there is the Edinburgh Academy, for instance—which simply ask to be let alone, and that their competitors shall not be too heavily endowed. The Glasgow Academy and the Kelvinside Academy find themselves hard pressed by the competition of the State-subsidised schools, and it has been suggested that they would be only too happy if the School Board of the city could see their way to take over the whole establishment, employing, of course, as many of the present masters as possible. Next, there are endowed schools. I remember—it is now getting to be an old story—when the endowments for education in Scotland were running in some considerable degree to waste, and one of my earliest speeches in this House was in support of the then Lord Advocate (Lord Moncreiff), to enable a reorganisation of the endowments to be brought about. These are now admirable schools, only too powerful for their rivals in educational labour. This may be said of Gordon's College, in Aberdeen, of which I can speak with some personal knowledge. Gordon's College is an endowed school, with as admirable a plant for science teaching and applied mechanics as any school in the Kingdom. All I would remark in regard to these schools is—it is my opinion, but I am not sure whether I carry my colleagues on the Committee with me—that it is perfectly right to do as the Commissioners did in these endowed schools, to admit others than those who are the objects of the Charity to profit by the excellent education given. But I am inclined to agree with an increasing number of hon. Members who hold that it is hardly fair that parents in general who are well off should obtain for their children such education as they do at some of these endowed schools at the fees they pay. I think the resources of the school would go further, and it would be fair, if you required from well-to-do parents some substantial contribution to the funds of the school, as is the practice in the great English public schools. That would tend to diminish what I admit to be an evil, the rather formidable competition of these endowed schools with private enterprise. I now wish to draw attention to two remaining types of schools, rather sharply contrasted financially, but in all other respects tending to resemble each other. There are, on the one hand, a growing number of schools which conform to all the conditions of the Code, which keep within the conditions of the Code and are able to earn large Government grants, and at the same time have the one object and ambition to develop themselves as secondary schools. I really think it would be rather a revelation to the House if I were to read a prospectus of one of these schools, the Garnet Hill School at Glasgow. This is a grant-aided school. The building is designed as a secondary school, in accordance with modern views and requirements; it has chemical and other laboratories, a lecture room, a large hall to be furnished for art and science classes. English literature, modern languages, classics, mathematics, science, drawing, political economy, logic, and other higher subjects are taught. The full course occupies four years, and qualifies for the Universities or the higher grades of the Civil Service, as well as fulfilling the requirements of the Science and Art Departments; and girls are prepared for the junior and senior University examination. It must be admitted this is a somewhat ambitious institution; but at the same time I am not prepared to say a word against it. When I find such excellent work being done, I do not like to encourage hasty interference. I will just mention one other school of the type, at which recently I was present to give away the prizes. I mean the Harris Academy at Dundee. There I was invited to the class-rooms, not, as is sometimes the case, to ask questions and take a class one's self, which is a favourite resource of those who do not care to teach before the public, but to hear the classes taught, and I thought the method and manner of teaching excellent, comparing well with English public schools. I was shown the music room, where some 200 boys and girls were present, and I was asked which chorus from the "Messiah" I would like to have sung; they were prepared to take any chorus from the "Messiah." And I am told the singing there is better than in any other school in the Kingdom, and perhaps than any school in Europe. There were cookery classes also, where cookery of the national order was taught. I found a "haggis" in preparation, which was, of course, quite proper to be taught in a Scotch school, though it is a dish unknown to most Englishmen, and by them unappreciated. Now, what are the funds of the

Mr. C. S. Parker

Harris Academy? Roughly speaking, half the cost of the building came from the endowment of Mr. Harris, but the school draws a considerable sum by Government grants. The sum drawn in a year by this single school is £1,354 direct from the Government, and a larger sum in fees from parents. It is rather remarkable that we should have gone so far in subsidising schools which carry education so high, and it is done, I fear, on a principle that is not very satisfactory; for whereas the real object of the schools is higher education, they earn grants by conforming to every rule laid down by the Department with a view to elementary education. Under considerable difficulties they produce admirable results, but these would be better still if the schools were recognised as secondary schools, and were not under the necessity of keeping up the appearance of primary schools. Then there only remains one other kind of schools, and on behalf of these schools I ask the House to take a favourable view of my Resolution, what are technically called in the Scotch Education Act "higher class schools." That is rather unfortunate nomenclature. The other schools of which I have spoken are called "higher grade schools," but these under the Act are called "higher class schools." They teach very nearly the same subjects, classics, higher mathematics, &c. Yet, though the teaching is nearly the same, they are totally differently treated in matters of finance. At first the higher class schools got nothing in the way of help from the public except what already belonged to them, some share in the funds which handed down by tradition for education, became a legal claim upon Town Councils. The Education Act of 1872 gave them nothing beyond. They did not come upon the School Fund until some years later. Power was then given to the School Boards to spend on these high schools more freely, and in Edinburgh and Glasgow at least £400 a year is paid to the high schools; besides which there is a liberal expenditure in both cities in the way of keeping up buildings. But although this in Glasgow has worked admirably, and in Edinburgh fairly well under the School Board, and although it works after a sort in such a city as Aberdeen, if you look at the Grammar Schools there, it is in a position that compares very unfavourably with their rival Gordon's College. The question is whether it is fair to bring these schools under School Boards and under the supervision of State Inspectors, and at the same time to let them draw no funds whatever from a central source. What is the nature of the Resolution with which I propose to conclude? We ask the Education Department to consider the desirability of extending grants to these secondary schools, believing that the effect would be greatly to popularise them. Of course, good teaching cannot be had without payment of good stipends to masters, and these schools find themselves in a position where their only resource is to charge high fees, and so become less popular. They have no alternative but to impose high fees; and this, of course, they find it difficult to do where they have admirable endowed schools competing against them at very low fees. To the credit of their teachers, they mostly prefer, instead of falling into the position of higher class schools, to place themselves in a position to attract a large number of pupils by low fees. I couple the recommendation of grants in their favour with another recommendation, namely, that a certain number of free places should be thrown open for competition among children of grant-aided primary schools. In some foreign countries there are 10 per cent. of free places in such schools, and this greatly stimulates industry in other schools, bringing out the pick of the boys for higher education, and it would be a great benefit also to the high schools. They are poorly endowed, they are under public management, and they get very little from the rates. One reason is because the area of the rate is narrower than the area from which the children come, and I hope under County Government we shall have that reformed. Then they get nothing from the Government, and that is what I wish to remedy by this Resolution. I had a hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have been present this evening, and possibly he may be here before the discussion closes. He is a member of the Committee of the Council for Education for Scotland, and I should have been glad of the opportunity of appealing to him personally on the financial question. What I would say to him, and what I now say to the Lord Advocate, is this: In my humble opinion, money bestowed in this way would be an excellent investment. I am prepared to maintain that money thus paid for higher education would not only benefit those who attend the schools, but the standard would be raised throughout the country. There is more to be said for such investment than for money devoted to perpetually building new ironclads, or even to the magazine rifle. The second thing I wanted to represent to the Chancellor of the Exchequer is this: There is, we hope, going to be a great opportunity this Session. I am one of those who always wish well to the progress of business, and I wish especially that the Government may succeed in carrying a measure for free or assisted education in England. If they obtain assisted education in England on anything like the same scale as was given to Scotland, I suppose it is well understood they cannot take the funds from the rates, or money on its way to the rates, but will have to go to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for it. Well, then, I think Scotch Members will have something to say. We are very willing that the money should come from the Exchequer; but if England is going to take the cost from that source, then Scotland may fairly claim a further sum, perhaps as large as that which she has already obtained. I do not take it for granted that it is all to be spent in education. I should like to see it so expended, but it is to the credit of the rate-payers that they forewent their claims to relief in favour of education; and they may now put those claims forward. But besides £30,000 wanted, as I have shown, to strengthen the staff of county schools, at least a similar sum might be wisely spent in aid to secondary schools. The reason why there are no more of them is because the State is so much more ready to subsidise what are called the higher grade schools. School Boards say, although these are not what we want, let us have the schools that draw the Government grant rather than those that do not. The distinction is one that, I say, should not be maintained. I should be ruled out of order if I moved a direct money Resolution, but all we wish to do is to place on record what we believe to be the desire of Scotland in this direction. When money becomes available—and there is every prospect of it becoming available—I ask the Government to take a friendly view of the Resolution I now move.

Mr. C. S. Parker

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, for the better organisation in Scotland of Higher Education, it is desirable that there should be Grants in aid of it, not only as at present, to the Universities and to Primary Schools, but also (as recommended by a Departmental Committee in 1888) to the Public Secondary Schools, on condition of their general efficiency, and of free places being reserved in them for competition among children from the grant-aided Primary Schools.”
—(Mr. C. S. Parker.)

*(9.22.) MR. J. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I wish the Chancellor of the Exchequer were here, not that I feel that the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General for Scotland do not fully represent the Government, but I hope we may find that in urging our views upon them, we are pressing upon an open door; and I know the difficulty is one with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is concerned, and I believe if he were here he would find the same view expressed by Members from Scotland of all shades of opinion, that if money is forthcoming for Scotland, a fair slice of it should be devoted towards developing secondary education. The interest in this matter is general in Scotland, it is not confined to the few. I do not know that I can put the case clearer than by quoting the words used by Mr. Forster, when opening a higher grade school at Govan:—

“No class pays in taxes and rates so large a proportion out of income as the lower section of the middle class, and the higher section of the artisan class. They pay rates for the education of their fellow citizens, and they say we have a right to get a return for our rates by at least some amount of benefit in the education of our children, and they have such a right most undoubtedly.”

After the speech of my hon. Friend I need not go into the question at large, and I will only take one part of it. There is at present a very considerable amount of the secondary education which exists in Scotland, taught in the higher grades of the grant-earning schools, schools open to everyone; and in these a vast deal of work in higher education is now, and always has been done. It is an old Scotch tradition; and a combination of elementary and higher education has always existed, and the only serious fault found with the Education Act of 1872, is that it tended to discourage a large amount of higher education that could be got from the grant-earning schools. That is an old Scotch principle, and it seems to me that it is a principle we ought not to desire to dispute, our aim should not be to get rid of it. If you had a clear field for educationists, you might wish to make secondary education independent from the beginning, but that you have not got. You have got the schools as they exist doing good work, and to destroy them to gratify any theoretical educational principles would, it seems to me, lead to very great mischief. My hon. Friend has quoted the prospectus of the Garnet Hill school, but he did not quote the judgment of the Committee on this school, which was very favourable indeed as to teaching, and the progress of the boys in the school. In the opinion of the Committee, the attainments of the pupils were not quite up to those of the academies and high schools, but they came very near indeed. It is said the clever boys ought to be taken away from the grant-earning schools, and sent to the secondary schools, but that is not a policy you can fit in with the existing system pursued by schoolmasters in Scotland. To take these boys away would discourage the masters from carrying their teaching beyond the standards. They would not have the same keenness in their desire to help on boys who wish to go outside the standard. The secondary schools are very much handicapped by these higher grade grant-earning schools as they are called. It is not fair that a cheaper education should be given in these schools to those children whose parents are well able to pay a fair price for the better class of education they wish their children to have. If you are prepared to devote something to the further development of secondary education, the policy should be to give grants in aid to schools where secondary education comes in by some method that will not limit you to particular schools, but will enable good teaching to be acknowledged, and to receive grants wherever you may find it. It is a very unsatisfactory state of things in these higher grade schools that they are driven to resort, I might almost say, to subterfuges to bring themselves under the terms of the Code with power to earn grants, while at the same time they have a very strong and most laudable ambition to compete in their teaching with secondary schools. The present system severely handicaps the schools that are not grant-earning, and rivalry is difficult; but if you can extend the terms of the grant beyond its present limitation, then you will find the higher grade schools quite prepared to meet you. It is, no doubt, true that it would be more satisfactory for them not to have to be striving to have to keep themselves under the terms of the Code. But you would have them coming outside and proclaiming themselves as what they are—secondary schools. You might have either the higher departments of the school declaring themselves secondary schools, while the lower departments remained under the Code as at present, or you might have the whole school developing into a secondary school. That would be a matter of convenience depending, probably, upon the terms in which you give your grant to the school. At any rate, you would have the schools boldly declaring what they are, and not calling themselves less—not professing to be elementary, while they really give a considerable amount of secondary education. Let there be a grant in aid to schools that give secondary education. Let that grant depend upon the general efficiency of the schools, and also on local contributions from whatever source they may come. It seems to me that you ought not by any Government grant to put a school at all in the position of being independent of local contributions, but that you ought to recognise all local contributions equally, whether those contributions come from endowments, rates, or fees. I think also that in secondary schools, assisted by the Treasury, you should secure that which has been the charter of Scotland in this matter, namely, that the poorest and the wealthy alike shall obtain a fair share of education. In these schools you ought to have some system, either by bursaries or free places in schools, by which you will enable the son of a poor man, without putting himself on a false footing, to get the same education as the son of his more wealthy neighbour. You have that system in many of the public schools—at Winchester and Eton—where a boy on the foundation does not feel himself in a worse position than the son of the man who pays four or five times as much for the education. That system should be adopted in Scotland, and the Government should make it a condition in spending the money of the nation on secondary schools. In this way, I submit, you would be extending and developing the policy of education laid down in the Preamble of the Act of 1872, which says that it is desirable to amend and extend the provisions of the law of Scotland on the subject of education, so as to make efficient education available to the whole people of Scotland. It is not only to those who desire elementary education that the system of national education has always been extended. It is for the whole people of Scotland—to give to every clever boy, whoever may be his father, the opportunity of obtaining at the least expense the best education that Scotland can give.

Mr. J. Parker Smith

*(10.36.) MR. DONALD CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I think we are indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Perth for bringing this matter before the House. I have no doubt that, among the various legislative problems of interest with reference to Scotland which await the consideration of Parliament, there is none more important than that of secondary education. I am sure the Government will be fortunate—whether the present Government or its successor—to whose lot it falls to take this matter in hand and carry it through on right and successful lines. I may perhaps be allowed to advert for a moment to the way in which the subject presents itself to the University Commission of which I am a member. I say, and I do not think I should be disavowed by any of my Colleagues, that it is not possible to place University education itself on a right footing unless secondary education is properly organised as a part of the general system. Coming to the Motion before the House, I should be content with the affirmation of the principle that the organisation of secondary education ought to be the concern of the State. In saying that I think I go a little short of the terms of the Motion. My hon. Friend has adverted very skilfully to some of the practical difficulties and problems which meet the Legislature in working this matter out. He has pointed out how the higher graded schools in a particular part of Scotland, which form a subject of burning controversy there, while they are doing excellent work, find themselves somewhat in a false position. If the scheme he proposes were carried out they would be apparently relieved from that position, and would be placed definitely and frankly in the position of secondary schools. Again, the higher class schools, which are specially noticed by the Education Act of 1872, are in a somewhat difficult and starved situation at present. This also, he argues, would be remedied, if we adopted the principle of subsidising secondary schools. But though he has thus given reasons of no little weight for adopting that course, I should be content with something short of it—with the affirmation of the principle that secondary education was to be a part of the national system. I would work that out a little further in this way. I think that one of the most important remarks that my hon. Friend made was that the area of rating for the support of secondary schools is at present insufficient. You have got no authority in Scotland at present to manage the higher schools any more than the lower schools, except the School Board, and the area of the jurisdiction of the School Board is too limited for the support of the higher class schools; and, accordingly, what I would ask the Government to keep in view is the idea that the county is the proper area of rating, and that the County Council is the body to which the administration of the secondary schools should be entrusted. The education would not always be the same. In the industrial districts of a county no doubt great weight would be given to technical education. In other parts of the same county agricultural education—which I suppose also comes under the head of technical—would receive great attention, and it seems to me that you would not easily find a better body for the administration of these schools than the County Councils. As to the best way of dealing with any aid from public funds, it seems to me that the best course to adopt might be not to make it a grant payable under the control of the Education Department, as in the case of elementary schools, but to deal with it in the same way as was done in the case of the Spirit Duties. The Spirit Tax was given to the Local Authorities, with power to apply it to technical education if they thought proper. That is one way that might be tried—I do not say it would be the best way—to give the money to the counties and let them apply it for secondary education in whatever way they may think wise. But my only object in rising was to join my hon. Friend in urging on the Government the extreme importance of this question of the organisation of secondary education in Scotland, and the desirability of giving it equal prominence and equal recognition with elementary and University education.

*(9.47.) MR. J. A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities): I agree with the hon. Member who has just spoken, that the House is under an obligation to the hon. Member for Perth for introducing this matter. There is no doubt the subject of secondary education is one that attracts much attention in Scotland, and with regard to which the intervention of the Government is very desirable. University education has been dealt with, and primary education also; we are still without anything like a proper treatment of the equally important subject of secondary education. The higher grade schools established at present under the Education Act are doing useful work in this department of education, but they place those higher class schools which do not receive State aid in a very unfortunate position, inasmuch as these are left without the assistance which their rivals enjoy. It is extremely desirable that something should be done to remove this inequality, and at the same time to improve the general organisation of higher education. I would point out that the improvement of secondary education has already been taken in hand by the Government, although it has not been thoroughly dealt with. In the Report of the Scottish Education Department there is a chapter dealing with secondary education. The Department has organised a system of inspecting and examining secondary schools, not only those under the Department officially, because under the management of School Boards, but other secondary schools also, which are willing to place themselves under the Department for the purpose of being inspected. That of itself is a considerable step in the way of dealing with secondary education—and a very useful work it is that the Department does. In addition, the Government has of late years introduced a system of leaving certificates, which has reference to the study of the higher subjects. In this way the Department is already committed to having some care of secondary education. What I believe the hon. Member for Perth desires is that the work should be more completely carried out, and that some positive encouragement be given to it by assistance from Imperial funds. How this assistance should be given and applied is a detail on which I would not venture to speak. I think we may hope that there will be money available for a purpose of this kind. In the meantime, I think it is enough for us to express an earnest trust that the Government will take this subject into consideration, and propose something effectual for the improvement of secondary education in Scotland. I hope, however, that this will be done in such a way as not to interfere with the responsibilities of parents who are able and willing to pay for the education of their children; that it will not be a wasteful system of giving cheap education to those who are quite willing and able to pay higher fees; and that the grant shall not be given so as to stand in the way of private benefactions. I believe some assistance in the way of a money grant to secondary education may be given in such a way as to encourage, and not to supersede, private benefactions. We may have further private endowments, and I believe these would be encouraged rather than hindered by some tangible expression of the interest the Government takes in this department of education. I thank the hon. Gentleman opposite for introducing the subject, and I trust we shall have such a reply from the Lord Advocate as will satisfy us that we have the sympathy of the Education Department and the Government in the object we have in view.

Mr. J. A. Campbell

*(9.53.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I join with those who have gone before me in expressing our indebtedness to the hon. Member for Perth for bringing this subject under the consideration of the House. No one who has given the most superficial attention to education in Scotland can be unobservant of the present difficulties between primary and University education. Speaking on behalf of a county, I may say that the difficulties which exist there far exceed those in Scottish cities with respect to secondary education. In the cities there are the old high schools, participating more or less in the corporate endowments instituted generations ago. They have also very large private benefactions for higher grade education. I would take the liberty also of thanking the Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen, as one of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, for the great assistance Scotland has received from them in the diverting the money of those endowments, which have heretofore been too contracted in their administration, to the general purposes of higher grade education within the reach of the poor. But I must join issue with the hon. Member for the Universities, and with some of those who have already spoken, as to the desideratum that they are continually harping upon with regard to getting those who are in better circumstances to pay for their education. We have a national system of education or we have not. If we have a national system upon a fair basis, then, I maintain, it is our own fault if we do not make the wealthier classes pay their fair share by regulating the incidence of taxation. But the difficulty, in my opinion, can be much better met—by taking such sum of money as we have in endowments and otherwise, and giving them to competition, in such a way that the scholars attending the poorer schools may gain their education on their merits. I was rather surprised that the hon. Member for Perth did not devote a little more attention to the present machinery which we have for higher grade education. I do hope that the counties and the cities, which are counties in themselves, will so apply the £40,000 which they at present have within their reach, as to show that Scotland is all alive to the interests of higher grade education. I should deplore it exceedingly were our counties not to take up this subject, and so apply the money as to demonstrate to the House that we are anxious and ready for a much larger amount of attention to be bestowed on higher grade schools. But let me put before the Lord Advocate one difficulty which exists in the system as outlined in the Motion before the House. A difficulty is felt in Scotland among poor parents in maintaining their children, anxious for higher education, away from home; and I therefore advocate the establishment in the counties of Scotland of a more comprehensive system than the present School Board. There are some School Boards in the counties where there is only one school. However excellent that school may be there will not be many poor parents who will be able to take advantage of it. We should, therefore, have these higher grade schools in at least five mile areas. I agree most heartily with the hon. Member for Lanark in saying that an affirmation of the principle in this House is all that we desire at present. I have no doubt if the principle is affirmed the people of Scotland will find a means of working it out, and let me press on the Lord Advocate this further consideration. We are paying now a large sum for elementary education, and the children are leaving school at an early age, in consequence of the excellence of the education they are receiving. It is no uncommon thing for boys and girls of 11 and 12 to pass the compulsory standards, and to go into service. From 12 to 20 these children are absolutely without education, and the result is that the elementary education they have acquired is absolutely lost. It should not be forgotten that we do not hesitate to vote large sums for the Scotch Universities in aid of the education of the sons of noblemen and other persons of means, and this being so, why should we allow the higher grade schools to remain unsupported by grants from the State? I hope we are approaching a period when the present distinctions as to the standards will be done away with, and there will be no difference in regard to the grants made, as between the 5th and 6th or any other standards, so that every child may be enabled to receive such an education as will enable it to compete with those who are, both on the Continent and elsewhere, favoured by the strong efforts now being made in aid of technical and higher education.

(10.1.) MR. M. STEWART (Kirkcaldy): The question before the House is one in which I have taken the greatest interest for the last 20 years. Living in a somewhat remote part of the country, I find that the greatest difficulty exists on the part of the farmers and other comparatively well to do people in regard to sending their children to better schools than the ordinary parochial schools. After these children have finished their education up to the 6th Standard, they require something higher to fit them for going out into the world, and the consequence is that many of them leave their homes at an early age, and have to be boarded out in some neighbouring town for the purpose of attending better schools, at the cost of a good deal of expense and self-denial to their parents. It occurs to me that the proper thing to do would be in every large parish to have at least one school set apart for the purposes of secondary education in that particular district. I cannot but think that it would be a very desirable thing if the Department could see its way to giving a Parliamentary grant to schools of that kind, if they are found to fulfil all the requirements of good secondary schools. I can hardly agree, however, with the last speaker, as to the necessity of doing away with all class distinctions, because in the existing state of things they cannot be avoided. There may be something very grand, and very Scotch, and very patriotic in the idea that the sons of the poor man and the nobleman should be educated together; but we know that that is not what actually goes on in the different communities with which we are acquainted, and I think we must be content to take the 19th century as it is, and endeavour to develop our views of education in accordance with existing circumstances. At the same time, it seems to me that in regard to certain points we are practically unanimous, although I fear that in asking the House to sanction this Resolution we are practically putting the cart before the horse. We must catch our hare before we cook it, and at present we have no money to do what is proposed. If we had the means, then no doubt it would be right and fitting that such a Resolution as this should be brought forward. If there were a sufficient amount of money at their disposal, I am quite sure that no Government would be inclined to resist such a proposal, no matter from which side of the House it came. As it is, I should hope that my hon. Friends opposite will be satisfied with the discussion they have elicited; there is practically no opposition to the principle of the Motion, inasmuch as we are all of us anxious to benefit our country in every possible way, especially in regard to the secondary education given in our schools. It has been suggested that certain grants from the Excise, which are given to the County Councils, should be utilised for the purposes of education, but it is also felt that the ratepayers are quite as deserving of consideration as the educationalists. No doubt when Government are in a position to make the grants required for the purposes of this Motion, they will be desirous of meeting my hon. Friends opposite, if not in the exact manner they desire, at any rate in a way that will greatly assist the object they have so much in view.

(10.6.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I do not think any apology is needed for my interposition in this discussion, because these educational questions discussed by Scotch Members are of great interest to the English Members as well as to the English taxpayers. What Scotland does to-day in the education question England will do, not perhaps to-morrow, but at any rate the day after to-morrow. We hope that in these discussions we shall learn a good deal from the results of Scotch experience, and thus be enabled to improve our education in England. I am sorry that the Vice President of the

Mr. M. Stewart

Council only looked in for a few minutes and then went away, because I think it would have been a liberal education to the right hon. Gentleman had he stayed to hear the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Perth (Mr. C. Parker) and the Debate which has followed. In Scotland there have been very large advances in the matter of higher education, and I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Lanark (Mr. Crawford) that if Her Majesty's Government are prepared to accept the principle of this Motion and ready to give a grant in favour of secondary education when they are enabled to do so, that will satisfy the reasonable views of the House. I fail to see how any Member of the Government or of the House can refuse to accept the principle that the time has arrived when State aid ought to be given to our secondary and higher schools. We have State aid for the elementary schools and State aid for our Universities, and why the intermediate stage of national education should be altogether neglected, I am totally unable to conceive, especially when we consider the very growing demand that exists throughout the Kingdom for improvement in our national education. We have of late years done much to place elementary education on a sounder and better basis, and we have a strong demand, not only for an increase in the age at which the children now leave school, but also for raising the standard of examination, for the abolition of the school fees, for the improvement of the examinations in the schools, and the enlargement of the general curriculum. It has been well said that we ought to have a ladder rising from the gutter to the Universities, and we have such a ladder planted at the present moment, but some of the rungs are unfortunately either missing or in an unsound condition. It is that part of the ladder which we ought to strengthen, because we are desirous of establishing a national system of education in order to enable the rising citizens of this country to compete with their foreign rivals. Anyone who has at all studied the competition which is taking place between ourselves and the great nations of France and Germany, will have perceived that while we have been neglecting the secondary system of education, those two commercial rivals have been doing more and more year by year to strengthen and increase that part of their national educational system. What we want is to give an opportunity to the children of the working classes, I will not say to work their way up in the social scale, but to acquire such an education that they will be the better able to compete with the keen rivalry which is going on abroad. My hon. Friend has taken objection to the proposal that some of the places in these secondary schools should be free in the grant, and has maintained that there ought to be no distinctions as between class and class. Although I agree with him on this point, I think that, at the same time, we must be content to move step by step; and we can hardly at the present moment expect the Government to accept all at once a system of free secondary education in addition to a free system of elementary education. What we should insist on as a principle is, that in regard to these secondary schools to be assisted by Government grants, the fees ought to be uniform, and that there should be no distinctions of class and class. But there might also be local contributions from which a certain number of free places might be obtained, together with a number of scholarships for the children of the elementary schools. The present system is full of anomalies, and has the effect of discouraging the system of secondary schools. It encourages, in fact, a sort of hybrid schools to compete with the real secondary schools. I agree with the hon. Member who has said that if you have a system of secondary schools with Government assistance, they ought not to be semi-elementary and semi-secondary, but a system wholly secondary kept in touch by means of free places with the elementary schools. I trust that the Government will accept the principle of State aid to secondary schools, so that before many years are over we may have a complete national system of education, reaching from our elementary schools to our Universities.

(10.16.) THE LORD ADVOCATE
(Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute) : Sir, the hon. Member has certainly adopted a reasonable and considerate time in bringing the subject forward. It is fortunate that there is no conflict of opinions upon it among any of the sections of the House. Indeed, in all quarters there has been a very full and direct recognition of the importance of secondary education, and of the need of the State adopting some practical means of advancing its interests. The Debate has also revealed one common ground, and that is that it is impossible to separate secondary education from its near relation to the general system of national education. It forms in itself a most attractive subject of disquisition and discussion, but it can only adequately and satisfactorily be treated when it is regarded as correlated with primary education on the one hand, and to a certain extent with the universities on the other. Viewed in that light it is not unimportant to observe how much may be and has been done in the furtherance of secondary education by the improvement of primary education. Undoubtedly useful secondary education can only be realised if you have a sound system of primary education, and I do not think there can be two opinions as to the efficacy and the earnestness of the means that have been adopted to improve the primary education of Scotland. Parliament has shown its anxiety on the subject by legislation in the past two years. In the technique of education also there have been changes, which have met with universal acceptance, and which have rendered more elastic the training schools, and afforded an encouragement and stimulant to the energies of teachers which formerly were entirely wanting. The latest development in reference to that part of the subject is to be found in the change, recently suggested, in the certificates given to pupils in primary schools. I have no doubt that will have the effect of rendering more solid and satisfactory the connection which ought to exist between the primary and secondary schools. My point is, that we must, in the first place, ensure solid primary education as conducting to secondary education; and we must also ensure a due relation between the primary and secondary schools. I am very far from saying that these indirect methods of advancing secondary education are all that are available at present. On the contrary we have, at all events, two methods of encouraging secondary teaching, which are appropriated by two different sets of societies in Scotland. The House will remember that there have been special grants to schools which, owing to their isolated geographical position, stand in disadvantageous circumstances. A grant has been given, in order to add to the staff of the schools in remote districts where they were unable to give higher education without disparagement to the primary work. I think something has been already done in the way of improving the organization of the existing secondary schools, following the lines which the hon. Member for Perth approves. There is a system of State inspection, and it is satisfactory to know that that has not been imposed on reluctant schools; on the contrary, it has been welcomed by those who desire the attestations and the imprimatur which inspection gives. There is also a certificate which performs an exceedingly useful and somewhat novel function in education. These are steps in the direction of the improvements which the hon. Member suggests. On the question of State aid, it is fortunately unnecessary that I should exercise more than the due amount of reserve. I confess I have little to add to what my predecessors have said on the subject. It is at all events a matter, I will not say certain, but, at all events, in immediate prospect, that further money may be available for education in Scotland. The event is not distant in which more means may be at the disposal of the Government and Parliament to enter upon a well considered measure of secondary education; and I am not transcending the language of this Bench during the last Session of Parliament when I make this statement. It may be satisfactory to hon. Members that I should repeat and emphasise the statements made by those who have preceded me here. The House, however, must consider that prospect with that due amount of caution and reserve which must be shown by those who do not know at present the exact amount of money. It is on grounds of that kind that I think the hon. Member for Perth, as a man of good sense, will see that it is impossible for the Government to accept his Motion. I am certain that the House will accept the declaration, which I have less made than repeated as representing the Government, and that it will not be at all appropriate to press a Motion of this kind to a Division. The subject is one upon which there is general agreement—that is to say, that public money may well be spent upon secondary education, and some effective means may be adopted for carrying out that general desire. On the other hand, the best mode of applying the money must be determined with reference to the amount available; and it is also a subject on which the most mature consideration is not thrown away. I want to add another word, which I hope will be accepted with the frankness with which it is spoken. We have not abstained from coming to close quarters with this question. We have had the subject under direct and anxious consideration; and plans are under the consideration of the Government, from which in due time we shall be able to make a selection. We have been anxious to utilise the time available between the earlier period when this money came to be a matter of prospect and the time when we would have to deal effectively and decisively with the question. The Government has invited and received suggestions, and I am not rash in saying that when the proper time comes we shall be able to bring forward plans which, at all events, are definite and intelligible. I hope the Government will accept the view which I have stated; it is one which is not characterised by inertness or indecision. The problem is one which requires to be looked at from several points of view. How are we going to do it, and upon what principle? We have three classes of schools teaching secondary education in Scotland. We have public schools, endowed schools, and voluntary schools, each of which require separate consideration and treatment, and in each case there is an equity which must be carefully attended to. There is another main objection which the House would desire to have carefully in view. It is most desirable that we should not make the giving of public money the means of losing instead of conserving other resources which are at present applied to secondary education. Probably, unless the matter is very carefully attended to, and with a nice appreciation of the risks to be run, the grant of public money to secondary schools, might tend to the subtraction from the aggregate resources of schools, taken as a whole, by dissipating contributions which at present are willingly rendered, and which might less readily come in if the grants were to be indiscriminate. That is a subject which will require very full development. I am suggesting rather than stating the difficulties, and I do this for the purpose of assuring the House that the subject is under the anxious consideration of the Government, in order that they may make no loss to the cause we all have at heart—that is to add to, instead of diminish or impair, the resources of secondary education throughout the country. I do not doubt, when the time comes, Parliament will be able to accomplish the objects we have in view. There are, as I take it, two main objects which have to be attended to in regard to these secondary schools. One is to increase the general efficiency of secondary education throughout the country. The contribution of the State ought to be so given as to raise the standard and increase the efficiency of the teaching given to all pupils who attend school. Then there is another object which is dear to the hearts of those interested in the subject, and that is that children, whose parents are not in a position to send them to the secondary schools, but who have the qualities and inclination which would enable them to profit by that education, should have the opportunity of going there. Those are two subjects which, when considered closely, are entirely separate in this sense, that we may attain the one and not the other, and the great thing is to accomplish both. The hon. Member for North-East Lanarkshire, in his very valuable contribution to the Debate, has referred to the area and management of those schools. That is one of the particulars of the scheme which requires attention. I do not need to remind the hon. Member of the exceeding difficulty of introducing the kind of management he suggests, inasmuch as it will to a certain extent involve a dislocation of the present administration of public money and local administration. I do not pronounce at all emphatically upon the part of the Government upon that subject. That is a subject upon which it is necessary to exercise an amount of reserve. I hope I have made it manifest if I say, as I now do, that the Government cannot accept the Resolution, that I do so in no spirit of antagonism to the general object the hon. Member has in view, or to the general principles which have found acceptance among hon. Members.

Mr. J. P. B. Robertson

(10.35.) MR. W. A. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I am certain the statement made will be received by Scottish Members with the greatest satisfaction, because the main interest attaching to the Motion was connected with the grant which we hope will come to Scotland shortly. I believe the almost universal feeling in Scotland is that any money we may get for educational purposes shall be first applied in aid of secondary education. I think the hon. Member may rest satisfied with the position in which the question has been left by the right hon. Gentleman. In dealing with this question of intermediate or secondary education, I hope the Government will do so in a bold, thorough and liberal spirit. The bolder and more ambitious the scheme, the more satisfaction it will give in Scotland. I may also remind the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the funds of the Universities of Scotland are far short of what is required for the development of modern science. I hope that this requirement will be kept in mind, and that the Government will not hesitate to move a very considerable increase in the grant to the Scotch Universities.

(10.37.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I do not think that Members in any part of the House who are interested in this question will find anything to complain of in the tone or terms used by the Lord Advocate. He has shown he is aware of the great interest Scottish Members take in this question, and has assured us that the Government are desirous of meeting our views. He sees no difficulty in accepting the proposition that secondary education is a proper matter for Government aid; the only question is whether the hon. Member for Perth, to whom we are much indebted for having brought on this opportune and valuable Debate, shall rest satisfied with what has been said, or whether he desires to have put upon the Journals of the House the assertion that this is a proper matter for Government aid. I hope, when the fund becomes available, secondary education will be one of the first objects which will attract the Government's attention. I do not suppose the Government would object to the Motion if it were modified so as to convey very little more than the Lord Advocate himself has said. The right hon. Gentleman has said that this is a matter not free from difficulty. While sympathising with the Motion, I find difficulty in adopting its details. It is not the case that all over Scotland secondary education is defective. It is not so in large towns like Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, and Aberdeen. In the larger cities there are some very efficient elementary schools; but it is in the smaller burghs where it is defective, the Grammar Schools in some of them being in a very unsatisfactory condition. In the rural districts, also, the new education system has changed and lowered the character of the parish schools. The superior element has been withdrawn from them, and therefore we have not only to revivify and improve secondary education in the smaller towns, but, in the rural districts, to bring back the parish schools to the position which they held 50 years ago, and, in many of them, to introduce what may be called a secondary department. We want in Scotland that the rural schools shall be able in the future, as in the past, to send pupils direct to the Universities. When I was a student at Glasgow University there were in the classes many young men who worked at their trades during the long Summer vacation, and were yet among the leading students. They had had no education but that of the parish school. As to the propositions of my hon. Friend the Member for Perth, I must say they seem to me to go a little beyond the evidence which he has adduced on behalf of them. I understand my hon. Friend to mean by a Government grant a grant awarded in something like the same way in which Government grants are awarded now to elementary schools, except that he desires it to be on the principle of general efficiency, and not of payment by results. I understand that he does not propose there shall be anything like payment by results in the case of individual scholars. I am not sure we are prepared at once, on the first blush of the matter, to go quite so far in putting our secondary education under the control of the Government. I quite admit that the system of leaving certificates, which the Scottish Education Department introduced, has so far worked very well, and that the secondary schoolmasters themselves seem to be prepared to admit somewhat more interference on the part of the State Authority, provided it is accompanied by a grant. We know, however, that State interference has a habit of growing, and there are examples in other countries in which the principle of State interference has been carried so far that it has tended to produce rather dreary monotony and uniformity. I think we ought to pause before entering on the course which my hon. Friend seems to recommend. It is quite true we cannot expect the State to give money except upon the condition of having some guarantee that efficiency is maintained; but I hope that when consideration is given to the matter, the Government, while recognising the right to be satisfied that the schools maintain their proper standard, will contrive to associate some independent element with them, and will not put them under Government control, in the same sense in which the elementary school now is. I hope also the Government will bear in mind, in considering this question, that it is not simply a question of extending education or of cheapening it. It is more a question of improving the quality of education. On the whole, we have in Scotland now an adequate provision of school accommodation, and if we have not an adequate staff it is, after all, not so much in the matter of numbers as in the high qualities of education that improvement is needed. Under the present system there has, perhaps, been some decline in the quality of the school teachers, and I believe that now there is not so large a proportion of teachers in elementary schools who have been through a University course. I hope, therefore, that in the plans which the Government are framing, a very important part will be allotted to improving the position and education of the schoolmaster—to seeing that not only his special training, but his general education will be well cared for and secured. As to the question of free places, I should be a little unwilling to assent to the proposition that free places must necessarily be given by competition. I believe that the result of experiments, particularly in London, as regards the carrying out of the instruction of the better boys in secondary schools, has not so far borne quite as good fruit as we expected from them. I do not do more, however, than throw out such a question for the consideration of the Government. At present, in our elementary schools, even in London, where teachers are perhaps above the average, the system is somewhat mechanical. Looking at the fact as it stands now, it is rash to conclude that the best way in which we can provide a ladder from the poorer to the higher class of education is by the application of the competitive system. I think we shall all feel that this Debate has had a valuable result in the way of preparing us for the scheme which is to be put forward at a later period. I hope the Government will bear in mind there is an absolute consensus of opinion among Scottish Members as to the need of applying money to the aid of secondary education, and there is also an equally general desire that this shall be done in a broad and liberal spirit, and that we should feel that the old connection between the elementary schools and the University, which has been the honour of Scotland, now requires nothing more than the fuller and better development of secondary schools to make it complete, and in order to give to Scottish education that one touch of perfectness which is all that is required.

Mr. Bryce

(10.54.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I wish to express my satisfaction that the Member for Perth has brought this subject before the House. I think Scotland, as compared with other countries, is deficient in the matter of secondary education. We have good primary education, and we believe we have a good University education. In some of the larger towns we have efficient secondary schools; but it is undoubtedly the fact that throughout Scotland there are few of the secondary schools on what may be termed a satisfactory foundation. In the burgh which I represent there is, according to the limited means at its disposal, a tolerably efficient Grammar School, but it is not such a school as such an important place ought to have. I think it is an entirely reasonable demand that some assistance should be given by the Government, and I am very glad to hear we have a reasonable hope of soon obtaining it. I confess I was a little disappointed with my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, as to a certain extent he threw a little cold water on some of the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Perth. In my opinion, it is rather dangerous to put too much secondary education into the primary schools. It is apt to take away the energy of the teachers from the proper function of teaching primary education. I am inclined to think that good secondary education is so little developed among the ordinary schoolmasters, that if we give secondary education in the primary schools we shall be apt to get old-fashioned dominie education instead of the more modern education which is required for the industrial and commercial interests of the country. No doubt it is the case that in special places in the Highlands it is desirable to select centres where schools shall give secondary education; but I am inclined to think that instead of two grades of education we should have three, and should confine our primary schools to a thorough and good primary education, and have a system of secondary schools at considerable centres. The Member for Aberdeen is jealous of too much interference which might follow Government grants. I confess there might be too much of that interference; but, on the other hand, we may have too little of it, especially with the condition of things existing in this country. There is nobody so Conservative as are schoolmasters, and at the great public schools in this country there is a great deal too much in their hands, and the schools are managed too much for their benefit. Now, desiring to improve the character of secondary education as we do, I am not at all jealous of a good deal of Government interference in the Department referred to. I am entirely of the view of the hon. Member for Perth, that it is desirable we should have Government assistance, and that that Government assistance should be accompanied by inspection and direction, so that we may reform and improve the character of our secondary education.

(10.59.) MR. C. S. PARKER: I only wish to say with regard to the Lord Advocate's speech that I fully admit its satisfactory tone. I can congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the almost revolutionary change which was made in the Code last year. I admit that the system of inspection which has been organised for higher schools is welcome to those who have it, and envied by those who have it not. As regards prospects of further progress, I think this Debate has been valuable. I agree with the remarks made from two sources, that it might be well to distribute grants through County Authorities instead of directly from the State. I should be willing to revise the terms of the Motion, but perhaps the better course would be to ask leave to withdraw it, and leave the matter in the hands of the Department. My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy has referred to the unsatisfactory state of secondary schools in some of the smaller burghs. I trust the Government will turn their attention to such schools, and that they will also give consideration to the very important question of the establishment of continuation schools both in town and country.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR).

(11.1.) The following Notice stood in the name of Sir M. Hicks Beach:—

"That, having regard to the fact that the employment of Railway Servants for excessive hours is a source of danger both to the men themselves and to the travelling public, a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether, and, if so, in what way, the hours worked by Railway Servants should be restricted by legislation."

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the Sir G. Campbell

Motion for the appointment of a Select Committee is preceded by a preface which is in the nature of a separate Resolution, and does not come within the order of Reference. The more proper and ordinary course would be for him to move that a Select Committee be appointed. What the terms of Reference should be it will be for the House to judge.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I beg to move the Motion in that form.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether, and, if so, in what way, the hours worked by Railway Servants should be restricted by legislation."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

(11.2.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): It appears to me that the Amendment of which I have given notice falls to the ground, in consequence of the alteration in the form of the notice of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. Gentleman intended that the words he has placed on the Paper should come after the first word "hours." There is no reason why they should not come after the second "hours."

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I have to thank you, Sir, for that suggestion. Perhaps I may be permitted to explain why I desired to move my Amendment. I regret that the preparatory part of the right hon. Gentleman's notice has disappeared, because that preparatory part contains the word "excessive," which really is the whole point of the Resolution. I think we must read the appointment of this Committee in the light of the discussion which took place on the 23rd of January. On that day the feeling on both sides of the House was such that a very unusual step was taken by the Government. The President of the Board of Trade suggested that the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Channing) should withdraw his Resolution, and that he (Sir M. Hicks Beach) should substitute for it a very strong declaration on the part of the Government, and propose a Select Committee. I will not dwell upon the policy of appointing a Select Committee, further than to say that I by no means see its necessity. The Board of Trade, in my opinion, are in possession of ample information in the shape of Returns from the companies and Reports from their own Inspectors; and I cannot understand why they do not at once proceed to take action. However, the President of the Board of Trade proposes a Select Committee, and I am not here to oppose its appointment, but I submit that the Committee ought to be founded upon, and guided by, the very strong declarations which fell from the right hon. Gentleman in his speech on the 23rd of January. Let me recall some of the right hon. Gentleman's statements, because they are extremely important, falling as they do from the Member of the Government who represents the relations of the State to the railways. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"I am bound to admit that in my opinion the Reports of the Inspectors of the Board of Trade show that the safety of the officials and of the travelling public is affected by excessive overtime worked. In the years 1889 and 1890 there were 122 inquiries into railway accidents by Inspectors of the Board of Trade. In 14 of these cases the accident was found to have been more or less due to excessive hours of work on the part of railway servants, principally of drivers and firemen, and 24 separate instances of overtime were given in these cases."

And then the right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"But the question is whether these Returns do or do not prove excessive overtime, extending far beyond any necessity of this kind, and I am bound to say that in my judgment they do; and more, that they show that there is more overtime on some lines than can be required by any difference between the circumstances of their traffic and the circumstances of other lines with less overtime."

The right hon. Gentleman, from his gestures and voice, still stands to his declarations, and, therefore, we have it that, in moving for this Committee, he believes that a case has been made out of excessive overtime. My object in proposing this Amendment is to prevent what sometimes happens on Select Committees, namely, that when a Committee sits upstairs those interested who do not take the view that a case has been made out at once proceed to call evidence at more or less wearisome length, and claim that the case has still to be proved.

The other night the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works came down to the House with a pile of papers, and argued that there was no excessive overtime. That kind of thing should not be permitted on this Committee; but the Committee should act on the assumption that excessive overtime has been proved, and proceed at once to apply a remedy. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, after the word "hours," to insert the words—

"As disclosed in the Returns from the Railway Companies, and the Reports from Inspectors of the Board of Trade."—(Mr. John Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(11.13.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I think hon. Members will admit that in this matter I have been fair and straightforward, and have endeavoured to carry out to the letter the promise I made to the House. You, Sir, have ruled that the first sentence in my Resolution is out of order. Of course, I do not for a moment question your ruling. I adhere absolutely to the words which the hon. Member has quoted from my speech on the Resolution of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, and I can assure the House that I will be no party, if it should be my lot, as I suppose it will, to serve on this Committee, to an attempt to delay the proceedings by an inquiry into matters which I consider to have been proved. I hope that with that statement the hon. Member will be content, because I would point out to him that owing to the alteration of the Resolution the insertion of the words he has moved would rather weaken the powers of the Committee than otherwise. It would not at all carry out what he intended when he gave his notice. I entirely abide by the words I used the other evening, as to the excessive hours worked by railway servants.

(11.14.) MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): As the Motion out of which the proposition for the appointment of a Select Committee springs was in my name, I may be permitted to make one or two remarks upon the present position of the question. I cordially accept what the right hon. Gentleman has just said as to the manner in which he approaches this Committee, but I must say I think we require a little more. I believe that those interested in this question will only be satisfied if they hear from the right hon. Gentleman a distinct indication that if the Committee reports, as I hope it may do, and without any undue delay, in favour of some legislation in the matter, the right hon. Gentleman will take the necessary steps to carry such legislation in the course of the present Session. I do not know whether we are to understand the President of the Board of Trade as assenting to that proposition; but if there is no assurance we shall continue, in spite of the goodwill expressed by the right hon. Gentleman, to regard the appointment of a Select Committee at all with a certain amount of suspicion. I must say I regret there has been any necessity in the view of Her Majesty's Government for the appointment of a Select Committee. I should very much prefer to see legislation entered upon at once. We have it acknowledged in the speech of the President of the Board of Trade, we see the evidence in the Returns placed before the House, that these men have been grossly overworked; we have this further acknowledged in the repeated representations and recommendations of Board of Trade officials, who have urged the desirability of a reduction of the hours of duty for railway servants. I really think that, just as two years ago the continual accidents showed the necessity for the adoption of a certain brake on railways, so the Scotch strike might have brought the Board of Trade to its senses and have shown the necessity of action in regard to hours of service. I hope inquiry will be confined to really practical evidence bearing on the method of carrying out the positive pledge that something shall be done to meet these excessive hours of work and to put an end to them. There should be no undue delay in the proceedings of the Committee. Further, I must press most strongly upon the right hon. Gentleman the absolute duty which lies upon him, in case the Committee report in favour of doing something to end this state of things, which according to the Returns has continued for six years past, that he will take such steps as are possible for legislation this Session.

Mr. Channing

*(11.19.) MR. SALT (Stafford): I hope the inquiry will, at any rate, be a thorough one. I do not see any reason why it need be an inquiry of any great length; a week or two, I might say, would be sufficient time to put before the Committee the necessary and particular facts of the case. There is one point which I think has not been quite grasped. It is not the interest or desire of any well-managed Railway Company that there should be any overtime when it can be avoided. Overtime arises very much from the necessities and peculiarities of certain kinds of traffic, and that is one question which might be fairly considered by the Committee. Another remarkable part of the question is that in the great majority of cases overtime is by no means disagreeable to the men themselves. I have many friends among the men working on railways, and I know that some of them have complained that they have not been allowed to work overtime. That is a point upon which the Committee may make careful inquiry, and if in the result it is shown that the companies should be restrained from employing overtime work under some sort of penalty, it will also be necessary to establish some sort of penalty to prevent the men from engaging in overwork. I am very anxious the Committee should enter on its investigation, not on behalf of the Railway Companies, but in order that the wishes and wants of the men may be ascertained; that what is fair to the men should be ensured by legislation, and that any fear of danger to the public from lengthened hours of railway service should be removed. All that is necessary is a fair and impartial inquiry into matters extremely difficult, and in regard to circumstances having many peculiarities and varieties.

*(11.22.) MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): If my hon. Friend (Mr. J. Ellis) had decided to proceed with his Amendment I should have suggested the addition of the words "and from other sources," and I think the President of the Board of Trade will admit there are other sources, in addition to the Inspectors' Department and the official Returns, from which the Committee might derive valuable information and assistance. But my hon. Friend does not intend to move his Amendment. I understand he rests satisfied with the very emphatic assurance given him by the right hon. Gentleman that he intends this to be a thorough and exhaustive inquiry, and that no time shall be lost before the Committee enters upon its proceedings. It think it will be generally regretted in the House that there is no Representative of railway workmen in the House who could take his place on the Committee, where his knowledge would be of the greatest assistance; such a man as Mr. Tait or Mr. Harford, for instance. Mr. Tait is a distinguished law-abiding citizen, and, had he a place here among us, would be an ornament to the House of Commons, and would greatly assist our deliberations. This I say without fear of contradiction. Under the circumstances, we may trust the assurances of the President of the Board of Trade, and I hope he will do his utmost to secure that the railway servants will have early and ample opportunity of representing their views to the Committee.

(11.25.) MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the terms of Reference would allow the Committee to consider other, and what I may call indirect, ways of checking overtime, as well as the direct way of legislation, or passing an Act to prevent it. I know a great many railway servants strongly hold, as I incline to do myself, that the best method of checking overtime is to make each day stand by itself as a matter of work and payment, not computing each week as 60 or 72 hours' work, and reckoning the overplus as overtime. Let each day stand by itself, and the time over 10 or 12 hours be paid for as overtime at the rate, say, of time and a half, not setting the hours, long or short, against each other over the week. I am not going to argue the question whether this is the best way of treating overtime, but I should like to know whether it will be possible to deal with a suggestion of that kind?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Certainly.

MR. M'LAREN: That satisfies me entirely. I thought it would be so, but was not clear on the point. I am extremely glad the Committee is to be appointed, and was quite prepared to adopt the proposal when it was made during the Debate the other night. As the right hon. Gentleman has not made up his mind as to the best form of legislation on the subject, it is desirable we should have a Committee to take evidence from railway servants and experts, and I believe the inquiry will result in valuable recommendations. I think it is reasonable to ask that there should be legislation this Session on the lines of the Report of the Committee; for if the Committee should disagree, or should the Government disregard the findings of the Committee, I fear we shall be little better off, for we have no chance of dealing with the subject this year without the assistance of the Government. However, I cordially welcome the prospect of an inquiry.

(11.28.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I cannot join altogether in the satisfaction expressed at the proposal to appoint a Committee, but I rather join in the protest against the appointment of a Committee at all. The case for some restriction of the excessive hours of overtime was clearly made out in the Debate last week; it was supported by evidence in the hands of the Board of Trade, and I cannot see what useful purpose a Committee is to serve. The result, judging from some of the speeches we have heard from the other side of the House, will be that the Committee will present a divided Report. Some hon. Members who spoke during the Debate certainly gave no indication of supporting a proposal under which there would be Government intervention in the question of railway hours of labour, while other hon. Gentlemen on this side are pledged in favour of interference, so the result may be expected of a divided Report, and that may be regarded as a means of shelving the question. The experience we have had in Scotland lately shows that whatever may be the experience of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Salt) in regard to the sentiments of railway men as to these take such steps as are possible for legislation this Session. those views are not shared by the men in Scotland. A case is clearly out for Government intervention, and the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Michael Hicks Beach) has expressed himself in favour of such intervention. In his speech at Kilmarnock he warned the Railway Associations that the number of railway accidents due to overwork might necessitate the framing of regulations by the Board of Trade to ensure the safety of the travelling public. I protest against referring this subject to a Committee—a proceeding which will probably end in shelving the question for another Session.

*(11.30.) SIR CHARLES DALRYMPLE (Ipswich): It is unfortunate that hon. Members should attempt to disparage the work of the Committee before that Committee is appointed. All along, with few exceptions, an endeavour has been made on the other side of the House to throw doubt on our sincerity on this side in this matter, and to make out that they alone have the interests of the men at heart. In truth, the charge of insincerity has no foundation whatever, and if anything were wanted to show how baseless is the suggestion, it would be the line adopted by the President of the Board of Trade himself in Scotland last autumn, and long before the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton was heard of, when the right hon. Gentleman, in the most impressive and solemn manner, warned Railway Companies of the responsibility they were incurring in this matter, and that if steps were not taken to remedy the evils it might be necessary to proceed to legislation. That ought to be a sufficient answer to the suggestions of insincerity. I quite understand the position of the hon. Member (Mr. Channing), who brought forward his Motion on January 23, and it is quite natural he should wish to press his efforts to a conclusion; but it is unfortunate that since January 23 he should have written to Scotland pointing out the value of his suggestion as compared with the very small value of the Government proposition. It is very well for the hon. Member for Leith to

Mr. Munro Ferguson

*(11.19.) MR. SALT (Stafford): I think the inquiry will, at any rate, be a useful one. I do not see any reason why there should be an inquiry of any great extent, and, in a week or two, I might say, the inquiry would be a waste of time to put before the House. The inquiry is a necessary and part of the subject. There is one point on which the House may be interested. The Trade certainly has not been quite indifferent in the interest or desire to see that good railway Company proposed inquiry, but the result will be the same as it arises at the present Session.

(11.34.) MR. MORFITT (Leamington): Probably we on the other side of the House are more interested in the masses of the people than the hon. Member opposite, and therefore I am anxious to see this matter settled. I make no charges of insincerity, and least of all I make such a charge against the President of the Board of Trade. I quite agree that it would be better for the House to proceed at once to a remedy, especially as the right hon. Gentleman admits there is a grievance, but the inquiry is for the purpose of finding out the remedy, not for deciding if there is a grievance, and I accept the proposal for a Committee as the best thing we can get, and probably it will result in something being done in a year. I have a proposal in the nature of a Motion, which I presume will be affected by the appointment of a Committee, but I am satisfied that, if the Government chose, at once to proceed to consider what by legislation ought to be done to settle these disputes before they come to strikes and damage to the interests of the entire community. As I am a Representative of a constituency in which there are a large number of railway men, I may express a hope that the men will have the full opportunity of being heard before the Committee. If the grievance of the men is not fully presented, it will be impossible to find a remedy that will satisfy them, and I particularly urge this point.

(11.36.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I do not think that in a discussion of the terms of Reference for this Committee, charges of insincerity should be exchanged. It is our duty to define as clearly as we can the position the Committee is to take up. But I particularly wish to refer to a point alluded to by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt). He said he found a great number of men were in favour of overtime, and that may well be. But the reason is, that the ordinary wages are so low that men find it necessary to work long hours to augment their ordinary remuneration. I am confident that if the Committee does not inquire specially into this question of overtime, its labours will be worthless so far as railway men are concerned. Before all things, when we come to the question of hours of labour, the question of overtime must be considered, and unless some strong impediment is put in the way of overtime you will not reduce the hours of labour, and the Committee will not attain the object for which it is appointed. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not rely on any other methods of checking overtime, but will take into consideration the best means of suppressing it. We have had an illustration as to what can be done by the result achieved on a railway line south of the Thames. At a meeting of the shareholders last week the Chairman showed how the Directors had voluntarily, in the interest of their men, brought about the result we desire to attain by this Committee. If other Directors would act in the same spirit there would be no need for a Committee, but this instance demonstrates the possibility of doing that we desire to see carried out.

(11.40.) MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): In my view the scope of the Reference is too limited, and it seems to me we might have made this an opportunity for obtaining information as to the relations between employers and employed in all cases where the two interests work together for the public in a direct fashion. We have had in times gone by troubles between employers and employed in the matter of gas supply, and we may look forward to possible troubles in relation to Electric Light Companies; we have also had disputes between Tramway Companies and their servants. Disputes in these various departments of labour concern the whole community, and the real justification for this Committee is the public safety, and it might well be that in the mind of Parliament the public convenience is an equally good justification. Therefore, I regret that this opportunity should be lost for obtaining a sound and well-considered opinion from the House on this matter, and I trust that before long the wisdom of Parliament may be turned in this direction.

(11.41.) MR. J. E. ELLIS: Having regard to the satisfactory assurances given by the right hon. Gentleman, I do not propose to trouble the House with a Division.

(11.41.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I did not take any part in the discussion on January 23, but I take this opportunity of pointing out what appears to me to be the essence of the objection taken on this side of the House to the terms of the Motion. It appears to me the Motion is a little illogical, because it commences with reciting the fact that the employment of railway servants for excessive hours is a source of danger both to the men themselves and to the travelling public, and that, indeed, has been established by the Returns presented to the House, and, therefore, it may be taken as indubitable that such excessive hours are a source of danger; but then the Motion goes on to propose that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether the hours should be restricted by legislation.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must remind the hon. Gentleman that the Preface to the Motion has been struck out.

MR. CONYBEARE: I apologise for my error, Sir. I was not present during the earlier part of the discussion. Another point I wish to mention has reference to what has been urged by my hon. Friend—that a proper amount of evidence shall be taken from the men themselves. I make no doubt the right hon. Gentleman will ensure that this is done, but may I ask, in addition, that he will guarantee that the men who give evidence, possibly against their own Directors, shall be protected from the consequences of their action? It is exceedingly difficult to get men whose livelihood depends on the will of their employers to give evidence that may tell against the action of their employers, without being satisfied that they will not suffer in consequence. We know the insidious methods sometimes used by employers to get rid of men who have had the boldness to stand up for their rights, and I hope this matter will not be overlooked. In my opinion, a strong case has been made out for immediate action, and it is a pity that time should be wasted on an inquiry by Committee, and I hope that legislative action on the Report of the Committee may not be thrown over for another year.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether, and, if so, in what way, the hours worked by Railway Servants should be restricted by legislation.”

RELIEF OF DISTRESS (IRELAND) ACT ADMINISTRATION.

(11.45.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I desire to call attention—and I will do so very briefly at this hour—to the inadequate manner in which the Relief of Distress Act is administered. The Government have undertaken a great responsibility by this Act, and very properly they have undertaken it; but they are now acting in a manner—hanging up the Act and not working it—that will really intensify the distress very much, and put the people in a worse position than they would be in if the Act had not been passed at all, and that for many reasons. The people now will be relying on the operation of the Act, and but for the Act there might be more assistance from private sources and from America. It is true that in isolated instances, and chiefly on the sea coast, the Act has been put into operation, and I do not say that the Government have not used it in the most distressed districts. But the House will be aware, from an answer given by the Chief Secretary, that in the greater part of Galway and Mayo the potato crop has failed to the extent of a half or two-thirds, but no relief works have been started in these districts. What I know to be true of Galway and Mayo I believe is also true of Donegal, Kerry, Clare, and other counties. All I ask the Government to do is to immediately put the Act in force to a moderate extent, which they can do at a trifling expense. They have already fixed the rate of wages, and the rate is so low that only dire necessity will induce anybody to apply for the work. Consider what it means, that in August the people had only half or a third of the expected yield of potatoes. By this time, in most instances, the stock must be exhausted, and the consequence is that upon the Chief Secretary's own showing the people are without food, and such, I believe, is really the state of the case. It may be said the people should come under the Poor Law. But they are a class of people whom it is very difficult to relieve by the ordinary Poor Law administration. The Poor Law Guardians will relieve the old and destitute; but the people who are suffering now are just above that class. In many instances they have a pig, a calf, a few sheep perhaps, or a horse and cart, and eke out a livelihood by cartage, and the Guardians cannot relieve them unless, first, the people have parted with their property. What the people want is a small amount of work to relieve them at once, and I would urge the Government at once to start relief works on a moderate scale.

Mr. Conybeare

In the West of Ireland, not only on the sea coast, but elsewhere, and more especially in Galway and Mayo, a few weeks' work until seed time would do an immense amount of good. The Government have the power; they have assumed great responsibility, and I hope they will take into consideration the extreme necessity, and put the Act into immediate operation.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Relief of Distress Act should at once be put in operation over a larger area."—
(Colonel Nolan.)

*(11.49.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I will only detain the House for a moment or two in seconding the Motion. There is a certain amount of unfairness in the distribution of relief, and among my own constituents there is a strong feeling that because they did not make a poor mouth about it soon enough they are entirely neglected. It is true Inspectors were sent to different parts of Ireland, and an Inspector was sent to Cavan. He put up at an hotel and enjoyed himself; he drove over the country with one of the Relieving Officers; but he did not consult a single Guardian of the Poor, ex officio or elected. I was present at a full meeting of Guardians called to consider the subject, and each one of them complained that he had not been consulted by the Inspector. These Inspectors come down and spend a few days in a place; they do not consult the clergy, or those who know the condition of the people; they do not consult the Guardians, and then, I suppose, they go back to Dublin Castle and report that there is no distress in the district. That is the sort of exclusive information in the possession of the Chief Secretary. The people of the district, who alone have knowledge as to whether there is distress or not, are not consulted. Guardians have since made representations stating that they can point out many families in great want, and that they are ready to point out these families, and prove the existence of distress to the satisfaction of the Inspector if the Inspector will come down again; but though a month has elapsed no Inspector has been sent down, and nothing whatever has been done to inquire into the existence of the distress, or means taken to relieve it. I do not want to embarrass the Government, whose task in this matter is difficult; but I do think it is their duty to do what they can to find out how much distress exists in other places besides the immediate neighbourhood of the Western seaboard.

*(11.54.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): Speaking from personal knowledge of certain portions of Ireland, I disagree absolutely and entirely from what has fallen from the previous speakers. It would be disastrous, in my opinion, were the Government to put this Relief Act into operation over a larger area than that which the Official Inspector has determined is the proper area wherein relief should be applied. Speaking of a remote part of the West of Ireland with which I am acquainted, I am thankful that such measures have been taken as the Government have adopted not with the advice of those gentlemen always ready to err on the side of too much liberality, but by measures adapted to the justice and necessities of the case.

*(11.55.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The time at my disposal is very limited; but even had I much more I do not think the House would expect or desire that I should now enter into any detailed statement upon the important subject which has been brought before the House in a moderate and temperate manner by the hon. and gallant Member. I will, shortly, remind him of the position of affairs. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary obtained some time ago a Vote for a nominal sum in respect of the works undertaken by the Government in Ireland for the relief of exceptional distress in certain districts. On that occasion my right hon. Friend stated the general character of the works to be undertaken by the Government, and his statement met with the approval of both sides of the House. It will be necessary, however, before the conclusion of the present financial year, to have that question again brought before the House for the purpose of taking a Vote for a substantial sum; and it is the intention of the Chief Secretary to state on that occasion in detail the measures which are undertaken for the relief of distress in Ireland. Therefore, if I had more time than the Rules allow, I ought not now to anticipate any statement that will have to be made. I assure the House that all possible means are being adopted by my right hon. Friend to ascertain the precise necessity of the different districts in Ireland to which reference has been made. The hon. Member for Cavan has referred to the information before the Chief Secretary as exclusive, but I can assure him it is nothing of the kind. Every means has been taken to procure the best information through the medium of disinterested persons in a position to know the exact state of the facts.

It being midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

M O T I O N .

TOWNS IMPROVEMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Knox, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Improvement of Towns in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Knox, Sir Thomas Esmonde, and Mr. Webb. Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 185.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.—(No. 110.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I object.

*(12.4.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I hope the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his objection. I am under an engagement if the Bill passes through all its stages this week that I will give Monday next for the discussion of the Vote of Censure of which the right hon. Member for Newcastle has given notice. Otherwise that cannot be done.

Mr. Madden

*(12.5.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I hope the hon. Member will not press the objection. It was arranged that the Bill should pass through Committee on Monday, and so far as the Opposition is concerned that arrangement would have been carried out. It is necessary to get the Bill through Committee to-night in order that we may have the Report on Thursday.

*MR. SPEAKER: If there is anything further to be said it must be said with the Chairman of Committees in the Chair.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(12.6.) MR. CONYBEARE: I do not wish to defer the Committee stage. I only objected because, on principle, I object to any Government business being taken after 12 o'clock. If hon. Members around me, who are more interested in the measure than I am, are not disposed to object to the course proposed by the Government, I will not stand in the way of the general feeling of the House.

(12.6.) THE CHAIRMAN: The Manuscript Clause in the name of the hon. Member for Carnarvon cannot be moved, as a provision similar in principle has already been dealt with.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I will move it on Report.

Bill reported.

*(12.7.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I should like to state that we propose to take the Report stage on Thursday. I understand that the reprinted Bill will be ready for distribution to-morrow. I will place on the Paper to-night the Amendments I propose to move on Report.

Bill, as amended, to be considered upon Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 184.]

House adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 4th February, 1891.

NEW WRIT.

For Borough of Northampton, v. Charles Bradlaugh, Esquire, deceased.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SPIRITS.

Ordered, That the Minutes of Evidence taken before the Select Committee on British and Foreign Spirits in Session 1890 be referred to the Select Committee on British and Foreign Spirits.—(Sir Lyon Playfair.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

RELIGIOUS DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.—(No. 4.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.25.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): When it fell to me to undertake charge of a Bill for removing from the Statute Book of this country an anomaly, an injustice, and a discredit, I was in hopes that it would only be necessary for me to spend a few minutes in introducing the Bill to the notice of this House; but those hopes have been so far disappointed as to make it necessary for me, I fear, to trespass at somewhat greater length on your time. Murmurings and mutterings there have been in various quarters, as was to be expected. We have just seen presented Petitions which filled the arms and taxed the muscular strength and calibre of the hon. and gallant Member who presented them, and one of them appeared to me, Sir, to conceal within itself, under the appearance of a mere roller, what might, in fact, be a formidable weapon of offence. Not only have we these manifestations from quarters which are usually wakeful in these matters, and where everything in the nature of a disability, though it be the merest rag and merest shred, most woefully torn and tattered, to be found in the world, yet remains so dear to the inmost heart of that party that no opportunity can possibly be lost to testify on behalf of a principle so valuable; but there have been rumours even with respect to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government—I cannot tell whether they may be true or not. I know that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1868, took part along with myself in pleading for the opening of the most difficult of these offices, and the one with respect to which the greatest objection was taken, and I doubt not he intends to pursue a similar course in the present Debate. He may not, however, be able to command the assistance of his colleagues, for the right hon. Gentleman now has upon his left one (Mr. Chaplin) whom I have always regarded as the prop and pillar of everything that deserved to be overthrown and removed. I am afraid I have shown ample cause why I cannot confine myself within the ten minutes I had contemplated as sufficient time for explaining the nature and character of the Bill; but I will endeavour not to be unreasonable in my demand on the time of the House, which I believe to be precious, and which I am anxious to treat in a spirit of perfect husbandry. The first point I have to mention—and which may appear to many Members of this House, and amongst others to those who have presented Petitions, as one of a very singular nature—is to this effect. I believe it to be in law seriously doubtful whether Roman Catholics are at this moment disabled from holding the offices of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and Lord Chancellor of England. The argument, in the main, may be stated in a few moments. The Roman Catholic Relief Act, the 10 George IV., does not impose upon Roman Catholics in so many words disability for holding those offices; but it does provide that no Roman Catholic shall be entitled to hold them “otherwise than as he may be by law now entitled.” That was the legal position before the passing of the Act of 1829. Every subject of Her Majesty is presumably entitled to hold every office under the Crown; but in the case of the Roman Catholic he was obviously and effectually barred by the Test Act. I am not aware, and I believe some good lawyers are not aware—I believe I may quote among others the eminent man who now holds the post of Lord Chief Justice of England, not with reference to any judicial decision, but with regard to opinions given in this House and supported by argument—that there was any other disability except that of the Test Act. The Test Act was removed by repeal in the year 1863. I do not enter now into the argument further, because, on the other hand, it is seriously contested by other lawyers whether that repeal has been effectual to qualify Roman Catholics for these offices. At any rate, I believe this is true: that when Parliament repealed the Test Act it had no distinct and specific intention of opening these offices to Roman Catholics. Well, Sir, it is quite plain that if the law is doubtful it ought to be made clear. It is quite plain that no person charged by Her Majesty with the solemn duty of forming a Government in this country could venture to recommend to Her Majesty this or that individual for either of these great offices while there was the smallest doubt attaching to the law which would place the validity of his acts in controversy. Consequently, I have thought it my duty not to be deterred from prosecuting this Bill, and I think that in arriving at that decision I shall so far have the unanimous assent of the House, if, indeed, the opponents of the Bill be in a frame and temper of mind in which it is possible for them to assent to any proposition whatever issuing from my unworthy lips. I will say one word on the drafting of the Bill. When this Bill was drafted, it was drafted as it was thought in conformity rather with precedent than with abstract ideas, and the consequence is that it lays down conditions with respect to the discharge of certain functions which it may be held are rather in the nature of religious tests. Whether they are so or not I do not know—I do not undertake, at this moment at any rate, to decide—but I certainly, and I think my right hon. and hon. Friends who are immediately responsible for the Bill, have come to the conclusion that it would be better not to embarrass ourselves with any considerations of that kind. Our object is simply to remove the anomaly which is supposed to exclude, and which perhaps excludes, certain subjects of Her Majesty from holding certain offices under the Crown, and to make provision, or to be certain that satisfactory provision is made, with regard to any duty ecclesiastical in its character, or not purely civil, that attaches to either of those offices. We think that those duties may be handed over with advantage to such person as Her Majesty, under the provisions of the Bill, may be pleased to select, and that it is not necessary for us to have any reference whatever to religious profession in the description of such person. Consequently, the course I should propose to take is this: If the House is pleased, as I hope it will be pleased, to read this Bill a second time, I should, with the consent of the House, revert to the convenient practice which I have not known to be applied for the past few years to any Bill of great importance, but which used to be applied to Bills even of great importance with great advantage to the country, namely, the practice of passing a Bill through Committee pro forma so as to present it in that form which the promoters, with the consent of the House, think the proper form in which to submit it, reserving the substantial Committee to be taken after the Report of the Bill from that Committee pro forma. Sir, I must next refer to a matter personally affecting myself, which I am extremely reluctant to introduce to the notice of the House, only because such personal matters are not fit or convenient for the general consideration of the House. But the publications I have seen on this subject make it quite certain that gentlemen foraging after topics in connection with this Bill will fall back upon those personal questions which always, it must be observed, have the advantage of creating a lively interest in the House at the moment. A pamphlet has been put into my hands within the last five minutes, entitled Mr. Gladstone Exposed. I have not yet had the opportunity of profiting by the wisdom and learning which no doubt it contains; but it seems to me that I must relieve myself from what I know, by the inspection of other documents relating to this Bill, will be thought a very convenient and advantageous topic on this occasion. The argument is that I, of all persons, am not the man to propose this Bill. Well, Sir, I will take the liberty of exactly inverting that argument, and saying that, so far as all previous declarations are concerned, I, of all persons, am the man to propose it. The allegation which I have seen made is that I myself am a man who, by certain pamphlets published in 1874-5, proved that Roman Catholics were not fit to be intrusted with the discharge of high and responsible duties, inasmuch as their allegiance was impaired by certain tenets of their religion. I wish to state the case fairly, and my answer is this—it is perfectly distinct, and I will bring it to the test of distinct words. It is perfectly true that I did impeach in 1874 certain declarations of the See of Rome as dangerous to the civil allegiance of those who adopted and concurred in them, and I invited, in a pamphlet termed Vatican Decrees, my Roman Catholic fellow-subjects to give assurances to their fellow-countrymen on the question whether they did or did not profess a full, entire, and undivided allegiance. The effect of that pamphlet was to draw forth a considerable number of replies, and I myself, having published the tract in November, 1874, and having read and considered those replies, published a further tract termed Vaticanism in February, 1875, and in that tract I inserted a passage which I will now read to the House, but which evidently, for some reason or other, has never met the eyes of a single person connected with the opposition to this Bill, or any officer of any institution that has been concerned in getting up that opposition. A blindness, such as was inflicted on the sorcerer in the New Testament, seems to have struck them when they were engaged in the perusal of that particular page of the book, and I am now obliged to appeal to another sense, namely, the sense of hearing. What was the conclusion at which I then arrived with regard to the allegiance of my Roman Catholic fellow-subjects? In page 14 of the pamphlet termed Vaticanism, published in February, 1875, will be found these words—

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

“I cannot but say that the immediate purpose of my appeal has been attained, in so far that the loyalty of our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects in the mass remains evidently untainted and secure.”

And, Sir, it is because I am the man who upon examination and challenge has deliberately—16 years ago—announced that, in my opinion, whatever might be the claims of the Roman See, their loyalty was untainted and secure, I am the very man, if I have no other qualification, to be so far at least qualified to propose the Bill now before the House. Let me endeavour to impress upon the House that that is the whole question. Unless you can show that the loyalty of the Roman Catholic is tainted you have no right to inflict a disability upon him. I affirm that the opponents of this Bill have no locus standi failing that. They must attack that loyalty, and unless they can attack that loyalty with effect they are contradicting the principles of our Constitution, old and new, the principles of our Statute Law, and the principles which we have inscribed on that Statute Law in the very clearest terms. Is that doubted? I affirm, and I do not intend to give it as my individual opinion, as a mere dictum proceeding from me, as it would proceed, without the smallest authority—my affirmation is that the principles of the British Constitution admit and allow of no civil disabilities on account of religious opinion. Is that principle clearly declared in our law, or is it not? I will read a very few words from the Statute of 1867, chapter 75, from the preamble—a Statute highly creditable to the Parliament which passed it, and which was passed and took its place in the laws of this country when a Conservative Government was in office, thus supplying a good omen of what we ought to expect on the present occasion. That Statute begins with these words—

“Whereas certain of Her Majesty’s subjects are now on the ground of their religious belief subject to civil disabilities,” and so forth,

“and it is expedient to remove such disabilities and to substitute one uniform oath for the several oaths now required to be taken by different classes of Her Majesty’s subjects.”

Pray observe who are the persons in contemplation. Not certain selected persons, distinguished either by property, rank, influence, or religious profession, or by local habitation. They are not merely inhabitants of these small islands; they are the vast and almost innumerable populations in almost every quarter of the globe who bear the light burden of allegiance to Her Majesty, and who together approach 300,000,000, and constitute one-fifth part of the population of the globe. Pray observe this, for it lies at the very root of the question; it is no selected portion of Her Majesty’s subjects whom the Bill has in contemplation. The declaration is clear; the grievance is stated at the beginning of the preamble, that certain of Her Majesty's subjects are now under disability on account of religious opinions, and the result is as clear and broad, for it is to provide that one uniform oath be taken by all persons "in lieu of several oaths now taken by different classes of Her Majesty's subjects." I hope, therefore, that there will be no controversy on this question of principle, that our law has for its basis the universal qualification—unless there be exceptions, and the exceptions I am coming to—of all Her Majesty's subjects of all religious opinions in all quarters of the globe, wherever they may be found, and there is no power of lodging a case against a Bill which aims at an emancipation or enfranchisement of that kind, except in the one only narrow path of impeaching the allegiance of some portion of them, which impeachment I have shown, from the passage read to the House, I, at any rate, have emphatically and explicitly renounced. Such is the principle of our Constitution. Let me point out that in this case to except is to proscribe. It is the question of proscription with which I have now to deal. I will not enter into the question of whether proscription is or is not persecution, but I think that causeless proscription is persecution. It is the only kind of persecution that remains open or accessible to the lovers of that amiable pastime. But I say that exception is proscription, and I want to know what is the view of proscription taken by our Constitution, and what is the case of proscription if any proscription is to be maintained? Now, Sir, what are the apparent cases of proscription under our Constitution? Everybody will say the Crown. Some people have taken a very broad view of this thing indeed. I possess a letter from one who is at least a courteous correspondent, who says—"Sir,—Your Bill is the first step towards relighting the fires of Smithfield." It is a much more moderate statement to say that it is the first step towards altering the conditions of the succession to the Crown. Sir, it has nothing whatever to do with the succession to the Crown, and I will tell you why. In the first place, the Crown is not concerned in any of these Statutes, and no law has been laid down with respect to the Crown such as was laid down in the Statute of 1868. The Crown is not open to competition. If the Crown were open to competition between A and B, and it was found that A was the man best fitted to wear it, but could not be appointed because he was a Roman Catholic, and therefore the Protestant must be appointed, then you would have achieved the first step towards proving an analogy. But there is no competition. The Crown has a single function, which is to be discharged by a single person; it is a mistake to suppose that the laws relating to the Crown inflict a proscription on a particular class of believers. The whole principle is entirely different on that point. These proscriptions are negative in form. They do not punish a person for believing. On the contrary, with regard to the Crown, what the law requires is that the person wearing the Crown shall be a Christian believer of a particular profession. It is not merely—though it has constantly been so called—a requisition that the Crown shall be worn by a Protestant; it must also be worn by a person communicating in the Church of England. This is a distinction. The distinction between requiring a positive belief and proscribing a positive belief is a distinction which has become famous and historical through the writings of Mr. Burke on the penal laws of Ireland. Every one must have in his memory those immortal writings of Mr. Burke upon Irish history and law, in which he contrasts the Irish and English penal laws, but the Irish especially, with the persecutions of old times, to the disadvantage of these penal laws, for, he says, the object of those persecutions was to drive people into some religion which it was thought it would be for their advantage to profess, but the object of the penal laws was not to drive or induce or bring people into any belief whatever, but only to drive them out of a certain belief, only to ascertain that they did not believe. That is exactly the principle of the little miserable shred and tatter of proscription which I now invite the House to sweep away. Now, with regard to the question of the Crown, this is not the occasion for me to give any opinion at all. It is a very high constitutional question, which, in my opinion, it would be very unwise to disturb. Its abstract merits constitute such a subject and occupy a field so wide that it is totally unsuited for the present limited discussion, and I pass it by by saying that I do not believe that the present settlement is regarded as irrational or creates discontent, and I, for my part, am not in any manner or degree prepared to touch it. But I pass on to another class of exception which is noticed in the Relief Act of 1829. That is the exception of an office, the very existence of which I suspect is unknown to some Members of this House—and I do not think it proves them to be men generally ill-formed if that be the case, though I have no doubt Scotchmen may be shocked at the utterance of so lax an opinion—that is the office held by Her Majesty's Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Established Church of Scotland. That office is excluded from tenure by a Roman Catholic. It is not the only office mentioned in the Relief Act. There are others, of which I shall not endeavour to give a catalogue. But there are those in this House who are now acting as Ecclesiastical Commissioners—I myself have acted in that capacity—and certainly my recollection is that the law requires to be taken—I myself have taken—a declaration stating that I am a member of the Church of England. I believe I am right in that respect; I am not aware that the law has been changed; and it falls under the same category as the case of the High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. But the principle of those limitations—though I do not say that they are limitations very necessary to be maintained—is clear, and cannot be said to be offensive, because the duties to be performed are not civil duties, and consequently the disability to perform them is not a civil disability. With that observation I pass on. I will only say with regard to the Regency of this country that it is treated by the Act of 1829 as an appendage to the provisions of the law relating to the succession to the Throne, and I do not see that there is anything unreasonable in the provisions of the Act. Then these apparent proscriptions are not proscriptions in either case attaching to the Crown; they lie in a totally different sphere, because they are not affecting the discharge of duties properly civil. With regard to the question of the Crown, I wish to avail myself of an authority which, not inconsiderable in itself, I think ought to have weight with gentlemen on the other side of the House. I daresay we shall hear in to-day's Debate that we are touching the Constitution of this country. [Ministerial Cheers.] Yes, I thought so; I endeavoured to get that cheer. I wish to say that when these questions were raised in 1867 Mr. Disraeli took part in that Debate, and expressly said that he approved, relatively to all the circumstances, of the restraints imposed upon the tenure of these offices by the Act of 1829, but he did not hold—on the contrary he denied—that they were any part of the Constitution of the country; he treated them as principles with which you could deal without exposing yourselves to that reproach, which he deemed absurd. Having endeavoured to clear all obstacles away, I have arrived at the contemplation of this one solitary proscription which remains on the Statute Book. I beg the House to contemplate it in all its beauty, or in all its ugliness and deformity. What is this proscription? What offices does it affect? Out of the whole vast variety of employments under the Crown it affects only two. And why does it affect them? Now, let us try that. My point of departure is that you have no right, except on proof of disqualification, to impose these disabilities. You cannot call on me to prove competency or ability; the burden of proof is on those who deny and exclude, and the sole part open to you, the sole proposition on which you can found yourselves, is that the allegiance of Roman Catholics is tainted and imperfect. That is the proof. Now, let us look at these cases. I take, first, the Viceroyalty of Ireland, because I am told and believe that the consciences of gentlemen are less vividly affected with respect to the Viceroyalty of Ireland than with respect to that most sacred fortalice of the Constitution, that inner sanctuary and Holy of Holies, the Lord Chancellorship. I wish to take the opportunity of stating to my Scotch friends that I think, in virtue of their nationality, they ought to look out pretty sharply, for I am very considerably shocked to find in our statutes the expression "the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain." I am not aware in what sense the Lord Chancellor is termed the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, and as Member for Mid Lothian, until I am better informed, I protest against that expression as an aggression analogous to the old raids across the Border—an attempt to place upon Scotland a servitude which we utterly repel. The "Lord Chancellor of Great Britain," I contend, should be "Lord Chancellor of England." In 1867, I think, the question was raised whether the Viceroy of Ireland ought to continue to be under a disability with respect to the profession of the Roman Catholic religion. I think Mr. Disraeli, then Minister and Leader of the House, took part in that Debate. He denied it was a constitutional principle to exclude a Roman Catholic; but he asserted that the Viceroy of Ireland had ecclesiastical duties to perform, the performance of which would hardly be compatible, so Lord Naas and Mr. Disraeli contended, with the Roman Catholic religion. I wish to point out that he based his opposition to the proposal, so far as the Viceroyalty was concerned, entirely and exclusively—if my memory serves me right—upon a ground which has now altogether disappeared. When, happily, we passed the Act in 1869 to disestablish the Church in Ireland, we swept away all disabilities in the shape of those ecclesiastical functions on the part of the Lord Lieutenant. It is for those who still contend that Roman Catholics ought to be excluded from this office to show why it ought to be done. Do not let them attempt to shelter themselves under the authority of Mr. Disraeli. This office of the Viceroyalty of Ireland is, I believe, an office as purely civil at this moment as any office under the Crown. If there are any ecclesiastical functions, they are totally unknown to me. I do not believe in their existence. I have never heard them asserted to exist; and I submit that any principle which justifies your excluding a Roman Catholic from the office of Viceroy of Ireland is just as good and rational for excluding him from the office of Viceroy of Canada or the office of Viceroy of India. Ah! there you have, indeed, if anywhere, open to you a source of danger. Whatever the Viceroy of Ireland does, he does under our own eyes. The Viceroy of India is at a distance of many thousands of miles, operating within the precincts of a Government of which we have only the most partial, rare, and occasional cognisance. If they want an exercise for their ingenuity in showing the dangers that arise from the discharge of civil duties by Roman Catholics, I would seriously advise hon. Gentlemen opposite, the gallant Colonel who presented a Petition, and others, to study carefully the Viceroyalty of India, and see whether they cannot in some manner or other obtain from the duties of that office, where responsibility is so indirect and where the power of our watching is so incomplete, a show of reason, or, at all events, a fairer show of reason for exclusion than any they can show in this case. I go on now, Sir, to the Lord Chancellorship. The objections to a Bill of this kind are but two, so far as I know. One is the doctrine that is set up to the effect that the Lord Chancellor is the Keeper of the King's or Queen's Conscience. Now, Sir, what is the meaning and what is the value of that doctrine? There was a time when it was perfectly, absolutely, and literally true. I have not been able to find any distinct and consecutive history of the idea; but it appears to me very like the case of one of those streams which flow through certain strata over the surface of the earth, and then, coming into other strata, are absorbed, covered over, and disappear. The Lord Chancellor was Keeper of the King's Conscience at the time when he was the head of the King's chapels, and when, in virtue of that headship, he was, at a period long before the Reformation, Private Confessor to the Sovereign, and so he was literally and truly, or, at any rate, distinctively, the Keeper of the King's Conscience. At that time the Lord Chancellor was a very secondary person, for Lord Campbell or Blackstone, I do not remember which, informs us that he was only sixth among the great holders of office of that period, and the head of the law at that period was not the Lord Chancellor, but the Chief Justiciary of the country. In course of time the Lord Chancellorship became important, and other offices dwindled, and the Chancellorship passed from the head of the King's chapels into the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury, or of some other great ecclesiastical functionary, and so remained until the reign of Henry VIII. I believe that at that time he had ceased to be Keeper of the King's Conscience, and there was no personal relation between them from that time onwards, so far as my information goes, and though I have endeavoured to inquire, as I have said, I can find no consecutive or full history of the case. I believe that the doctrine entirely slept until George III. wanted to intrigue with Lord Thurlow against his own Prime Minister, Mr. Pitt, either as regards Roman Catholic emancipation or some other matter. He consulted the Lord Chancellor of the Cabinet against the head of the Government, and he did it upon the pretence that the Lord Chancellor was Keeper of the King's Conscience, he knowing beforehand that this Keeper of the King's Conscience exactly coincided with the opinions he held. Who is the Keeper of the Queen's Conscience now? Are you prepared to replace Lord Halsbury in the position of private confessor to Her Majesty? If you are, well and good. Propose your Bill for that purpose, and let us see what we can make of it. But until you do that, and until you place your law upon this footing, do not talk any more about the Lord Chancellor being the Keeper of the King's Conscience. But, then, Sir, the Lord Chancellor is the possessor of great ecclesiastical patronage, and when I speak of ecclesiastical patronage, I speak of benefices, I do not include the appointment of chaplains and so forth, which may be considered civil appointments. But the Home Secretary is possessed of ecclesiastical patronage. The patronage in the Isle of Man belongs to the Home Secretary, just in the same manner as ecclesiastical patronage of other descriptions belong to the Prime Minister; and I rather believe, but of this I am not quite certain, as I have had no opportunity of knowing from personal experience, that the Channel Islands are in the same category as the Isle of Man with respect to ecclesiastical patronage. We have had for five years a distinguished gentleman, who, in the language of the law, professes the Roman Catholic religion, and fills the office of Home Secretary; nor can it be said that any difficulty, or doubt, or debate has arisen in consequence of his being by law invested with the discharge of that function. He has not corrected me about the Channel Islands, and I, therefore, assume the Channel Islands are in the same position as the Isle of Man. I am sure the Protestant Association ought to be much obliged to me for pointing out to their minds the existence of this great and frightful Constitutional danger. I have been told that the right hon. Gentleman since he has held that office has handed over to the Prime Minister the discharge of this duty of ecclesiastical patronage. I do not know whether that is so or not, and he does not appear disposed to give me any information.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Since I have had the honour of holding the office of Home Secretary I have never submitted any name whatever to the Queen for any ecclesiastical appointment. From the first moment of my being appointed Home Secretary I asked the First Lord of the Treasury, then Lord Salisbury, and since then my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. W. H. Smith), to submit to the Queen the names for the appointment to benefices in the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, instead of myself.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I think that as regards the position of the right hon. Gentleman, two things may be said—first of all, I would say that I am quite convinced that, if he had submitted any name for the purpose, he would have done it with the most perfect honour and impartiality; and, secondly, that the proceeding which he has described is most honourable to his disposition. He is in the condition of Cæsar's wife, who ought not to be suspected; but I must question the regularity, if not the legality, of the proceeding. If it be within the moral competency of the First Lord of the Treasury to hand over ecclesiastical patronage, say, to the President of the Board of Trade, that would be a very extraordinary proceeding; and therefore of his own authority and of his own notion the right hon. Gentleman appears distinctly to have broken the usages of the Constitution. I do not think any one Minister of the Crown has, as a general rule, a title to hand over any of his duties to any of the other Ministers of the Crown. But there is another matter. I understand that the First Lord of the Treasury has exercised this patronage, and has recommended to the Crown, and that the Crown has nominated to benefices in the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands, in consequence of the supposed disability of the right hon. Gentleman himself. Sir, I am extremely sorry to propound for the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman a legal difficulty which I am afraid he may find to be rather serious. He has handed over his ecclesiastical patronage to the First Lord of the Treasury; but the Statute Law of this country has been beforehand with him, and has handed it over to somebody else. I hope I am not making revelations.

MR. MATTHEWS: No.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Is the right hon. Gentleman conversant with the 17th section of the Roman Catholic Relief Act? This section, which is, I believe, still in force, says—

“Provided always, and be it enacted that when any right of presentation to any ecclesiastical benefice shall belong to any office in the gift or appointment of His Majesty, his heirs, or successors, and such office shall be held by a person professing the Roman Catholic religion, the right of presentation shall devolve upon and be exercised by the Archbishop of Canterbury.”

MR. MATTHEWS: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for having reminded me of that section, but it was perfectly present to my mind. This ecclesiastical patronage, such as it is, does not belong to the Home Secretary, but to the Queen herself, and the intervention of the Home Secretary is merely to suggest candidates for Her Majesty's approval.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The business of recommending for ecclesiastical appointments does not belong to the Prime Minister either. There is no law and no binding authority attaching to any of those functions in the office of Prime Minister. It seems to me most plain that when Parliament speaks of duties attaching to offices held under Her Majesty, it speaks of those duties which, by constitutional usage, attach to the office, and if these duties by constitutional usage attach to the office of Home Secretary, he is entitled to make the presentations, and such presentations made by the Prime Minister are void and without effect. I admit that to disable in point of patronage, when it is held by a particular person in office, is not the same thing as a civil disability. I think such a disability of patronage ought, undoubtedly, to be general if it is to exist at all. It ought not to be a disability inflicted on the professors of a particular religion; but for those who read our history, there is no doubt that with respect to the Roman Catholic religion the principle followed was this—not that the Roman Catholic religion was specially to be condemned, not that it was designated as a religion more remote from the prevailing religion of the country than many other forms of religion, but that it was a rival religion and a rival Church, and that, having been a rival religion and a rival Church, there might be a motive in the case of the Roman Catholics which might operate to render it unsatisfactory for them to exercise the duties of ecclesiastical patronage. In consequence, we adopt the method which is pointed out by the Statute of 1829, and by the facts of our history, and we propose to sever from the Lord Chancellor the exercise of ecclesiastical patronage. What right have we to inflict this disability? I will not speak merely of policy. Nothing can be clearer to me than that, in point of policy, it is a gross and monstrous error. What right have you to do it? Your principle is, no civil disabilities on account of religious opinions. What right, with respect to the civil duties of the Lord Chancellor, have you to inflict this disability? I have read a statement to the effect that were this disability removed from the Viceroy, he would not allow so much as what is called a “removable” to exist in Ireland unless he was a Roman Catholic, because everybody would be Roman Catholic, but that is not an objection to my Bill. It is an objection to the declared principle of the law, which makes the whole of Her Majesty's subjects alike qualified and entitled to the possession of office for the discharge of every kind of civil duty. And here I come to the odious part of this proscription, which is the selection of a particular body of Christians, and that the largest of all bodies of Christians, to inflict upon it this stigma and disgrace, to record in the face of the world the constitutional belief that, although the duties of the Viceroy and Lord Chancellor are, under this Bill, purely civil, and although everybody else is qualified to discharge them, one class of persons, and one only, is disabled by law from undertaking them. The Home Secretary, I do not hesitate to say, in the possession of his office, stands quite as near the Sovereign as does the Lord Chancellor, and he stands a great deal nearer than the Viceroy of Ireland, for there is no act in which the Crown is concerned that the Viceroy of Ireland can perform, except through the medium of the Home Secretary. Yet the right hon. Gentleman, and I rejoice to say it, professing the Roman Catholic religion, holds the office of Home Secretary, and no human being has ever complained—no armfuls of Petitions are presented against this appointment, praying Her Majesty to remove him; and I believe if I were, instead of this Bill, to introduce a Bill for the removal of the Home Secretary, the very gentlemen who have appeared to-day as champions of the Protestant Constitution would vote against my Bill as dishonourable, and reject it summarily from the notice of this House. Now, Sir, Roman Catholics are ineligible for these two offices. Who, then, are eligible? Consider what the British Empire is. Consider whom it includes. Consider all the professions of religion and all the professions of non-religion that make up the vast body of the community of the Queen's subjects. It might seem invidious to draw any distinction between one body of Christians and another; but pray recollect that there is no legal obstacle, so far as I can learn—and I rejoice that there is no legal obstacle to going beyond the Christian pale—no legal obstacle to the holding of the Lord Chancellorship, ecclesiastical patronage and all, by a Jew, by a Mahomedan, by a Buddhist, by a Hindoo. All these, under your Protestant Constitution, can hold the office of Lord Chancellor, and exercise, as the right hon. Gentleman truly says, not by the mere recommendation of the Crown, but in virtue of the legal powers of the office itself, the right of presentation to, I think, 800 benefices in the English Church. So much for the religion. The Jews are the possessors of a great tradition, in common with ourselves, as I rejoice to think; but those who do not accept that tradition at all—not only the Mahomedans, but the professors of all those Oriental religions—you affirm by your law to be qualified to hold these offices and to exercise ecclesiastical patronage. Yet you deny it to the Roman Catholics. That is the inequality I ask you to proceed to remove—the inequality which you refuse to remove. What are we to say of the non-religionists? Secularists, materialists, agnostics, atheists—all these are not religions, but non-religions. Every professor of every one of those non-religions, every man who comes to you saying, "I will tell you nothing of what I believe, but I will tell you a great deal of what I do not believe," and then proceeds to sweep aside everything that constitutes your consolation and your hope, your guide in conduct through life until death—all these people are qualified to hold the Lord Chancellorship of this country, and to recommend for ecclesiastical benefices. But the successors of Pascal, of Thomas à Kempis, and of old Pope Gregory the Great, who sent missionaries to the southern part of this country—they are all to be disabled. Oh, Sir, I have shown that the principles of your law require the passing of this Bill. I have shown that your policy demands it, for what can be so absurd as that when a gentleman is engaged in the constitution of a Government for this country there should be a particular man whom he finds to be, on the whole, best qualified to be Lord Chancellor or Viceroy of Ireland, but whom he is compelled to pass by because he is a Roman Catholic, and to put someone else who, whatever his merits, is less fit for that particular office? In that noble profession, the Bar of this country, every man rises by free and open and unbiased and glorious competition. It is a grand thing, morally as well as socially, for a man to rise and become the head of the English Bar; and is it worthy of you and your traditions, when a man has arrived at such a position, and when the prize is his by every principle of right, to say to him, "Pass onwards; you are disabled from filling the Chancellorship, for you are a professor of the Roman Catholic religion?"

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

Thus the last and only test that remains is the test of religion. People have written to me saying, "Is it possible that you can be a Christian"—I might almost imagine that I was not from the tone of these communications—"and can you, remembering the religious responsibilities of all Christians, propose this Bill?" Yes, Sir; I can, I will, and I do. We ought to do it because we are Christians. There is nothing more fatal to the interest of religious belief than the setting up of fictitious, unreal, sham standards of belief. If we are to have such standards at all let them be of an intelligible character. A distinguished man and admirable Member of this House was laid yesterday in his mother-earth. He was the subject of a long controversy in this House—a controversy the beginning of which we recollect and the ending of which we recollect. We remember with what zeal it was prosecuted; we remember how summarily it was dropped; we remember, also, what reparation has been done within the last few days to the distinguished man who was the immediate object of that controversy. But does anybody who hears me believe that that controversy, so prosecuted and so abandoned, was beneficial to the Christian religion? The people of this country saw through the imposture which blinded many Members of this House; and it is in the name even of that religion which the vast bulk of us believe to be holy, believe to be the greatest and only true treasure of mankind—it is in that name, if I must fall back upon such a resource, and, of course, it is primarily and broadly and mainly on the ground of that which we are here to discuss, namely, constitutional law and political wisdom, that I ask you to give your assent to the Second Reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone.)

*(1.35.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. Smith, Strand, Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the House has listened with the greatest possible interest to one of the most able and eloquent speeches which the right hon. Gentleman has ever delivered here. But it does seem extraordinary that this speech should be delivered now, and should not have been delivered during many of the many previous years when it might have been delivered.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

Mr. W. E. Gladstone: I did deliver similar speeches both with reference to the Viceroyalty and the Lord Chancellorship in the year 1867.

Mr. W. H. Smith*: The right hon. Gentleman reminds me that he delivered speeches of this character in 1867, when the right hon. Gentleman was in Opposition. But the right hon. Gentleman was in office between 1868 and 1874, and again between 1880 and 1885, and during those years, when he was responsible for the Government of the country, the right hon. Gentleman did not deem it necessary to propose a measure of this kind to the House. Now, circumstances are so urgent that he thinks it necessary, only for the third time in his remarkable Parliamentary history, to propose this Bill as a measure which is to remove a great wrong. The right hon. Gentleman had opportunities of considering this question when he was directly concerned in the government of the country. In 1881 the right hon. Gentleman, who was First Lord of the Treasury, was asked "Whether, in view of the general principle of absolute religious toleration in the government of this country, he is prepared to advocate the abolition of all remaining religious checks at present existing, such as those which prevent the Lord Chancellor and Sovereign of Great Britain from being a Roman Catholic, and thus to endanger the Protestant succession as established by law."

What did the right hon. Gentleman answer?

"No, Sir: the Government have no intention of advocating anything of the kind."

We, therefore, have this remarkable fact established—that the Government in 1881 had no intention of advocating that the disabilities affecting the Chancellorship should be abolished. The House will observe that the Lord Chancellor is categorically included in the question which was put, and that no reservation was made by the right hon. Gentleman, whose answer was, "The Government have no intention of advocating anything of the kind." The right hon. Gentleman has to-day spoken of these disabilities as anomalous, unjust, and discreditable. Well, if those epithets can be fairly applied to the disabilities which prevent the office of Lord Chancellor of Great Britain and the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland from being held by a Roman Catholic, how was it, I repeat, that the right hon. Gentleman when he had full power in his hands and a large majority at his back did not exercise his power to remove this "anomaly, this injustice, and this discredit?" The right hon. Gentleman has remarked that in law it is extremely doubtful whether there is any necessity for this Bill, and he drew attention to the opinion given by Lord Coleridge when he was Attorney General in the right hon. Gentleman's Government in 1872. I always speak with hesitation when endeavouring to interpret a lawyer's dictum, especially when it is uttered in answer to a question asked across the floor of the House. It is only fair to recognise that an opinion expressed under such circumstances must be given in a narrower compass and with less consideration than an opinion given on a case submitted in the proper and ordinary form. But if I read this opinion correctly it amounts to this: that there is no occasion for the Bill which is being presented to the House for consideration to-day. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that doubt exists whether there is any occasion or necessity for this measure. How is it, then, that the right hon. Gentleman now moves in a matter which, in the time of his power, he declined to touch at all? What condition of things has brought about such extraordinary urgency that he proposes, as leader of the Opposition, this Bill for adoption by the House? Another remarkable point to which I would draw attention is this: The right hon. Gentleman has indicated clearly that this Bill is not the Bill with which he proposes to proceed in Committee of the Whole House, but that it is a Bill which is to be the subject-matter of a mere declaration of principle. As soon as it has been read a second time it is to be committed pro forma, and then some other provisions are to be introduced with respect to the disabilities attaching to the Chancellorship. In fact, the Bill is to be withdrawn and a new one is to be introduced. I am not, I think, saying too much when I state that the Bill, although it deals with large principles, is so small in itself that if the character of its limitations and restrictions is to be seriously altered the better course would be to withdraw it altogether, and to introduce a new measure, in order that we may realise fully what it really is that we are asked to read a second time. The Bill, be it observed, proposes to remove all religious disability, but declares practically that as to a large and serious portion of the duties of the Lord Chancellor, that official, if a Roman Catholic, is not to be held fit to discharge them. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the pamphlets which he wrote in 1874 and 1875, and said that he had no doubt that he would be met by some references to those pamphlets. He read some words in which I heartily concur, if he will allow me to say so. I think he stated on page 14, in language equally outspoken and more consistent—

"I cannot but say that the immediate purpose of my appeal has been attained, in so far that the loyalty of our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects in the main remains evidently untainted and secure."

But, Sir, what were the conclusions at which the right hon. Gentleman arrived in this matter? I have read accurately the quotation on which he relied to show that he was satisfied of the absolute loyalty of our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. I regret for myself that any statesman in his position should have thought it necessary to cast a doubt on that loyalty. For my own part, I have never doubted the absolute and complete loyalty of the Roman Catholic subjects of Her Majesty, but I must remark on the conclusion at which the right hon. Gentleman arrived. He says—

"I have now, at greater length than I could have wished, but, I think, with ample proof, justified the following assertions:—(1) That the position of Roman Catholics has been altered by the decrees of the Vatican on Papal infallibility and on obedience to the Pope; (2) that the extreme claims of the Middle Ages have been sanctioned and have been revived without the warrant or excuse which might in those ages have been shown for them; (3) that the claims asserted by the Pope are such as to place civil allegiance at his mercy."

Those were the conclusions at which the right hon. Gentleman arrived, after having satisfied himself of that which no man who knows what society is in England, and has lived on terms of amity and friendship with his countrymen, could doubt—and that is, the perfect loyalty of the Roman Catholics. I cannot but express the greatest possible sorrow and regret that this question has been raised at the present moment. Why, Sir, has this great effort been made by the right hon. Gentleman? What is there in the present condition of circumstances and politics which differentiates it from the condition which existed between 1868 and 1874 and between 1880 and 1885, when the right hon. Gentleman held office? Why did he not then make these changes which he now asks the House to sanction? Sir, there is no demand for any change that I am aware of on the part of the Roman Catholic subjects in Great Britain. I have heard of no desire expressed whatever in favour of the change. No Petitions in favour of the demand have been presented. No public opinion exists in its support. I rejoice with the right hon. Gentleman in his belief in the absolute and complete civil equality which exists between the Roman Catholic subjects and all other subjects of the Queen. There is also this question which arises: whether the doctrine of civil and religious equality compels us to place officers in the position of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and Lord Chancellor of England who are Roman Catholics—whether the influence they would exercise in those positions would be regarded with alarm and distress by large classes of Her Majesty's subjects. The right hon. Gentleman, in his eloquent peroration, referred with feelings in which all must sympathise to the case of a man of great eminence who, having arrived at the head of his profession, nevertheless must be passed over, in spite of his talent, in the attainment of the highest office to which by talent and ability he could aspire, on the ground of his being a Roman Catholic. But I ask the House to consider, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider, whether the appointment to an office is alone the right of the individual to be appointed, or whether the Government has not to consider whether, on the whole, the officer should be one who will be free from prejudice and free from any other objectionable epithets which might apply to the emotions which influence men. I say that if a prejudice of a wide and deep-rooted character exists which prevents such an officer from commanding absolute confidence in his impartiality in the discharge of the trusts of his office—if such a feeling exists it is one which ought to be taken into consideration, even though it be a prejudice. Now, Sir, my objection to this Bill is that, while it applies only to two persons, it alarms, and distresses, and affronts very large classes of Her Majesty's subjects. The Member for Kilkenny (Sir J. Pope Hennessy) gave notice of an Instruction to the Committee which he has since withdrawn. He sought to free the Sovereign from the restraints which are imposed upon her with regard to the profession, I think the right hon. Gentleman says, of the religion of the Church of England. I think the right hon. Gentleman laid it down that under the Act of Settlement the Sovereign must be a member of the Church of England.

Mr. W. H. Smith

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Communicant.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes. And I am bound to say that I think the hon. Member for Kilkenny is perfectly logical in the course he suggested. I do not think it was an extreme suggestion to make. It is one that has been suggested by Members from that side of the House who represented Roman Catholic constituencies. I find that Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Mr. O'Donnell, and Mr. Bellingham made that suggestion in this House, and it was only consistent with the position which he occupies that he should draw attention to a matter which, perhaps, the Member for Mid Lothian may at some future time say is another anomaly and injustice. I think I am not straining the argument too far when I say that the right hon. Gentleman himself refrains for the present, and guarded himself as to the future against suggesting any change in the Act of Settlement. I cannot see how it is that the Lord Lieutenant, who is the representative, the alter ego of the Sovereign, should be relieved from what is called, what the right hon. Gentleman regards as a disability, but which I am sure the vast mass of our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, loyal and contented as I believe them to be, do not regard as a disability. There cannot be a doubt that the Roman Catholics in this country enjoy greater freedom than in many Roman Catholic countries. I believe they enjoy in this country greater freedom than in almost any other country in any part of the world. There is no restriction of their institutions which distinguishes them from any other subjects of the Queen. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the fact that Her Majesty's present Government has fully recognised the claims of Roman Catholics to hold high office under the Queen. The question is whether it is wise, or necessary, or expedient that these two remaining offices should be open to Roman Catholics. Now, Sir, I cannot help referring to the singular procession of dates which accompanies this question. It was in 1867 that Sir Colman O'Loughlen proposed to relieve the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Lord Chancellor in England from disability. In 1872 Sir Colman O'Loughlen brought in a similar Bill, but the then Attorney General (Sir John Coleridge), in a learned argument, declared that there were no disabilities, and the Bill was withdrawn. In 1874 the right hon. Gentleman published his pamphlet to which I have referred, and then in 1881 Mr. Bellingham asked the question to which I have referred, and in answer to which the right hon. Gentleman said he had no intention of advocating the relief of the Lord Chancellor or the Crown from the disability under which they rested.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: And the Crown.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Well, the Lord Chancellor was included in the question. In 1886 the right hon. Gentleman brought in his Home Rule Bill. This is the singular procession of dates, and one cannot help connecting—and, I think, not unfairly connecting—the whole policy of the right hon. Gentleman, and arriving at the conclusion that but for the Home Rule Bill of 1886 the necessity for this measure would not have arisen. The opportunity was afforded before 1886 of passing it into law, but it was not availed of. In 1890 and in 1891 it becomes a measure of great urgency, because the right hon. Gentleman no doubt looks forward to the introduction of a Home Rule Bill when he comes into power with a large majority. Then we have this condition of things: We have a measure of Home Rule to be proposed by Her Majesty's future Government, which no doubt will meet the views of the Irish Members, or we are told so. The Irish Members, we know, do not consent to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. I do not profess to be acquainted with the negotiations, if there have been any, with the view of bringing together the two sections of the Irish Party, nor with the result of negotiations, but there can be no doubt that at no period will the Irish Party accept less than the complete independence of their Parliament. Equally there is no doubt whatever that the right hon. Gentleman will agree to that complete independence. I have not the least doubt that before that period which is looked forward to with great desire and hope by hon. Gentlemen opposite—the General Election—the agreement will be sealed, signed, and delivered under which the absolute independence of the Irish Parliament will be recognised, and the sole link of control that will remain will be the Lord Lieutenant representing the slender thread of the Crown as the connection between the Government of England and the Government of Ireland. We arrive, therefore, at this singular result: that under the legislation which will be proposed by the right hon. Gentleman we shall have an independent Irish Parliament which will consist chiefly and mainly of Roman Catholics; we shall have a Government chiefly and mainly of Roman Catholics responsible to that Irish Parliament; and then we shall have a Lord Lieutenant, qualified beforehand by the Bill which the right hon. Gentleman is now seeking to pass, who will also be a Roman Catholic; and this is the language in which the right hon. Gentleman in his pamphlet speaks of those who may be selected for this important office:—

“A convert, in case of any conflict between the Queen and the Pope, will follow the Pope and let the Queen shift for herself—and that she can very well do.”

Now I should be very sorry to identify myself with the opinions or the conclusions of the right hon. Gentleman on every point, but I want the House to follow the chain of events. The right hon. Gentleman supports a measure in 1867; he writes a pamphlet in 1874, to which I have no doubt he entirely adheres at the present time; in 1881 he declines to take any steps which may or may not have been necessary to relieve the Lord Chancellor, and I suppose, therefore, also the Lord Lieutenant, from any disability; and in 1886 he proposes a Home Rule Bill, having written this book, in which he says that converts, and therefore presumably the person who may probably be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, will follow the Pope first of all, and not the Queen. I do not wish to enter at any length upon the details of the measure; but I want to point out this one thing—either the measure is necessary or it is not necessary. If it is not necessary, it is open to the objection which the right hon. Gentleman himself indicated—that it does impose a fresh and new disability; and the point I wish to draw the attention of the House to is that, while it disqualifies the Lord Chancellor from exercising ecclesiastical patronage, and from discharging any trust of any corporation or institution which may attach to the Church of England, it leaves him open to declare the law and the policy affecting such trusts, so that the Lord Chancellor is to be rendered incapable of discharging an executive duty within the plain direction of the trust, and the plain direction of an instrument which no man would seek to evade for a single moment, be he Roman Catholic or Protestant; but he is not debarred from discharging the duties effecting the policy and the legal interpretation of such trusts. I can hardly regard that as either wise or satisfactory. It is, I can only repeat, the setting up of a new scheme of disability, declaring at one moment that a Roman Catholic lawyer is to be fully capable of discharging the duties of Lord Chancellor, and the next moment cutting off from him a very large proportion of the most important duties which devolve upon him. I am not, I believe, straining a point at all in saying that the right hon. Gentleman must have contemplated all these consequences with reference to the future government of Ireland by the light of the book which he has written, and the opinions he has expressed therein. I regard this Bill as most unfortunate and inopportune. I do not know why it is proposed, unless it be in connection with the scheme of Home Rule with which the right hon. Gentleman is identified. We have fellow-subjects of the Catholic faith in all parts of the world. We trust them, we rely upon them to discharge their several duties, and there is no disability of any kind upon them other than those to which reference has been made in the Bill. It seems to me that those who stir questions of this kind incur an enormous and grave responsibility. The revival especially of religious controversy is a matter that ought to be avoided by all who have any regard for the peace and well-being of the country. We are in peace, and I earnestly hope that the House and the country will allow us to remain so, and that this Bill may not pass into law. I beg to move, Sir, that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. W. H. Smith

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question, to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(2.30.) MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): I regret the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian at the present moment, as I shall have to quote his words to a considerable extent. It seems to me that we can look at this matter either from a political or a religious point of view. My intention in the greater part of the few remarks I shall submit to the House is to deal with it from the political side, because it is indeed a political question, and religion only comes in incidentally. When I first read this Bill I naturally turned back to the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829, which it would have the effect of modifying very considerably. I read most of the speeches made by leading Members, both in this House and the House of Lords, when the Catholic Emancipation Bill was under discussion. I suppose no question was ever more fully discussed, because Debate took place not only upon the different stages of the Bill, but also upon the presentation of Petitions for and against it. I naturally turned to the opinions expressed by the leaders of the side which promoted the Bill. The measure was brought in by a Conservative Government, but was largely supported by the Whigs. I find that Lord Brougham, then Mr. H. Brougham, said—

"The Bill went to the entire length that any reasonable man ever did or ever could demand. It requires no securities but such as the most zealous Catholic must readily admit to be of necessity part and parcel of so comprehensive a measure."

These securities consisted in leaving the religion of the Sovereign untouched, and providing that the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland should be Protestants. Now, I ask on what principles we should decide the question whether such securities should be removed or maintained? For an answer I will quote Lord John Russell, one of the leaders of those who favoured civil and religious liberty. In his great speech on the Test and Corporation Act, which was published in the authorised selection of his works before his death, Lord John Russell said—

"If the religion of any body of men be found to contain political principles hostile to the State, or militating against that allegiance which is due from every subject to the Crown, in that case the question ceases to be a religious question, and you have a right to interfere, and to impose such restrictions as you may deem necessary; because you do not impose them on religious opinions, you impose them only on political doctrines."

I will attempt to show that the religion of the body of men, whom we call Roman Catholic or Papists, does contain principles hostile to the State and militating against that allegiance which is due from every subject to the Crown. In order that I may not be accused of going to rabid Protestants or to those incapable of doing justice to men from whose opinions they differ, I will quote simply and safely from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) himself. My quotations will be taken from what I understand to be the very last edition of his book called Rome: Newest Fashions in Religion. The edition bears the date 1875, and contains the latest published authentic record of the right hon. Gentleman's opinions on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman had arrived at that time at the ripe age of 65; he had been Prime Minister twice, and I think we may conclude that he had sufficient knowledge of the matter to arrive at a sound conclusion. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman does not repudiate, but he still holds the opinions expressed in the pamphlet to which I allude. In the preface of 1875, the right hon. Gentleman thought it necessary to call public attention to

"Not only the tendency, but the design of Vaticanism to disturb civil society, and to proceed, when it may be necessary and practicable, to the issue of blood, for the accomplishment of its ends."

He speaks also of

"The intention of the Roman Church, whenever she thinks it may be safely ventured, is to trample the law under foot."

In another passage in the preface he writes—

"The hierarchical power of the Latin Church, aiming internally at the total destruction of right, not as opposed to wrong, but as opposed to arbitrary will. Externally, it claims 'to over-ride at will, in respect of right and wrong, the entire action of the civil power and to employ force when necessary.'"

In another passage he speaks of female converts as "converts," and of male converts as "captives." He says—

"No one can become her convert, without forfeiting and renouncing his moral and mental freedom, and placing his civil loyalty and duty at the mercy of another."

When the right hon. Gentleman, in the preface, published in 1875, comes to the word "renouncing," he drops it, and inserts "forfeiting," which, I think, makes the expression stronger, because forfeiting means a compulsory giving up without any action of the will. Therefore, what is true of converts being true of Catholics as a body, every Papist, whether born in the faith or whether he be a convert, places his civil liberty and duty at the mercy of another. Yet the right hon. Gentleman asks us to admit such persons, placed in such a dilemma, to two high and confidential positions in the estate from which they were excluded by universal consent in 1829. It may be said that Rome used to be very dogmatic on matters of this kind, but is not so now. The right hon. Gentleman himself puts an end to that belief. He says—

"The Church of Rome has abandoned nothing and has retracted nothing. She unconditionally maintains what the mediæval Popes maintained—a claim to universal monarchy."

He says—

"We were told that the dangers of deposition and persecution, of keeping no faith with heretics, and of universal dominion, were obsolete without revival—mere bugbears."

"All these claims," he says in the pamphlet, "are revived; and everyone is in full force, and is necessary to salvation."

He says—

"The words, 'A Catholic first and an Englishman afterwards,' I take to mean that the convert, in case of any conflict between the Queen and the Pope, intends to follow the Pope and let the Queen shift for herself."

I will quote one more passage from the right hon. Gentleman, and then I will have done with him as far as quotations are concerned. He says, with regard to Popery generally, two things. In the first place, he says—

“No more cunning plot was ever devised against the freedom, the happiness, and the virtue of mankind than Romanism.”

Then, on the 95th page of his paper on the Vatican Decrees, he says—

“To secure rights has been, and is, the aim of the Christian civilisation; to destroy them is the aim of the Romish policy. This has become its undisguised, unchecked rule of action and law of life.”

I am very sorry indeed that we, who live on terms of harmony with our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects and fellow-Members, and who desire that they should have full liberty to worship God as they like, are obliged to get up and quote these things, written by a distinguished Member of the House whom nearly all the Roman Catholic Members of the House are now following. But this is no fault of ours; we never raised the question, or thought of raising it, but when it is raised we are bound to see whether Rome has in any sense modified her intentions. In 1886 the English Roman Catholic Bishops sent up to Rome for beatification the names of several persons who were called martyrs, and who had been put to death in England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Of that number the Pope and the Court of Rome selected four for beatification. I do not know what beatification is exactly, or what relation it bears to canonisation, but the fact, at all events, will show the class of men whom Rome delights to honour. The first of these men was named Plumtree, and he was hanged for rebellion in 1579; and the second was Felton, who was executed because he nailed to the door of the Bishop of London's Palace the Pope's Bull deposing Queen Elizabeth; the two others were executed for, in obedience to that Bull, refusing allegiance to the Queen. We may take it that if the Pope issued a Bull deposing Her Majesty Queen Victoria from the Throne every Roman Catholic would be bound to renounce his allegiance to the Queen and let Her Majesty shift for herself. Well, Sir, we take the chance of that with confidence as regards our hon. and right hon. Friends as Members of this House; but it is a very different thing to put anyone, who is in the unfortunate position of having to make up his mind whether he will obey Her Majesty or the Pope, in a place in which he will be confidential adviser to the Crown, the keeper of Her Majesty's conscience, or her representative in the Sister Island. With regard to the position of Lord Chancellor, I would point out that young ladies of property are continually being made wards of Court. When such ladies desire to enter into an engagement to marry, the Lord Chancellor has to consider whether he will give his consent. Now, what is the rule of the Roman Catholic Church at the present time in regard to civil marriages and religious marriages which are not in accord with the Decrees of the Council of Trent—decrees which may at any time be made binding upon Catholics in this country? The Lord Chancellor, if he were a faithful Catholic who obeyed the Pope, would, under such circumstances, be obliged to hold that any marriage celebrated before a Registrar in this country was no marriage, but “a filthy concubinage.” So, at least, says the right hon. Gentleman. I ask whether Members of this House are going to put their daughters, and nieces, and granddaughters into a position in which such a term may be applied to them by the man whom this law will make their guardian? With regard to the patronage of livings the Bill makes provision. The right hon. Gentleman distrusts the Papist Lord Chancellor, and rightly takes from him the patronage of the livings; but what provision does he substitute? At present the Lord Chancellor exercises his patronage in the light of day, and with full Parliamentary responsibility; but under this Bill, his patronage would be handed over to some person nominated by Her Majesty, and who need not even be, as the Bill is drawn up, a member of the Church of England. The responsibility of a Minister for his patronage is not illusory. Lord Westbury, having misused his patronage, was compelled to resign the Woolsack; and the right hon. Gentleman's exercise of his patronage as Premier with regard to what was called the Ewelme Rectory scandal contributed greatly to his downfall in 1874. With regard to trusteeships, it is provided that the Chancellors place is to be taken by a Judge who must be a member of the Church of England.

Mr. Sydney Gedge

There are in the patronage of the Lord Chancellor 12 canouries and 663 livings, and it is proposed that this patronage may be exercised by a person who is not a member of the Church of England. Now let me contrast the position of the present Bill with that of the Roman Catholic Emancipation Bill of 1829. The latter measure came before the House after having been before the country for 30 years, and when there were real grievances to be removed. The Bill was introduced by the Government with a full sense of their responsibility as being answerable for the peace of the country. How is this Bill moved now? It is brought forward by a right hon. Gentleman who had full power when he was in the same position as the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel to bring in a Bill to the same effect and to pass it; but he did not do so. He waits until he is in opposition and in a minority, and then introduces it, with the evident intention not to quell religious strife, but to provoke it. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I cannot, of course, look into the recesses of the right hon. Gentleman's heart, but I have a right to draw inferences from the facts before me, and I say that when, under such circumstances, he brings forward a Bill which he knows will not pass, in order to raise a discussion and put the Government, as he hopes, in a false position, mischief and not good is his object. The Bill of 1829 was loudly called for. There is no call for this; it has been termed, indeed, a "Ripon-Russell Relief Bill." I do not believe it is intended to benefit the hon. Member for Hackney; I believe the only one who would be relieved by it would be the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Healy); at all events, it is promoted only in the interests of individuals, and not in the general interests of the country. The right hon. Gentleman is credited by some with having brought the Bill forward in the interests of the Nonconformists. In old times the Nonconformists saw so clearly the political danger, the risk to freedom of giving powers to Papists, that they united with Churchmen in passing the Test Act. One of the leading Nonconformists, when the Test Act was under consideration, said, in this House—

"If the Bill included Dissenters they had rather live under the severity of the law than clog so necessary a work."

VOL. CCCXLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

I appeal to my Nonconformist friends to remember that the same motives which existed in former days on this Bill ought to still weigh with them now. I ask them not to leave all the battle against this Popery—which I do not describe, but which the right hon. Gentleman himself has so graphically pictured—to members of the Church of England alone. Let them stand shoulder to shoulder, side by side with us, instead of going over to the enemy. It seems to me that the proposed Instruction of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Sir J. Pope Hennessy) was a most logical sequence of the Bill. He, no doubt, burst the bag and let the cat out of it, and I am not surprised that he has been requested to withdraw his Instruction. I ask the House whether they intend that this country shall remain a Protestant State or not? Nearly every office is open to Roman Catholics; there are but two of a very special character not so open. It is urged that the law does not prevent the Prime Minister being a Roman Catholic, but that is because he is an officer unknown to the law. He may be the holder of any office. If you want to prevent the Prime Minister being a Roman Catholic, you must prevent Roman Catholics holding any office whatever, and that no one wishes to do. I say, if you remove the just and wise securities which, in the opinion of Lord John Russell and Lord Brougham, were absolutely necessary, you take away the Protestant character of this country, and we shall have Roman Catholic priests presented to English Bishops; we shall see a Roman Catholic priest coming up to that Table and reading prayers; and we shall find that what has been the palladium of English liberty for the last 200 years will be done away with, and this will cease to be a Protestant State.

(3.0.) Mr. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): We have just listened to a somewhat panic-stricken orator, but the question we have to discuss is not whether or not the Protestant religion shall cease to exist, but a much more limited proposition, whether it is right, just, wise, and politic to maintain an exclusion of this kind on the ground of religious belief. I confess it was with a feeling of very great regret that I heard that Her Majesty's Government felt it incumbent upon them to resist the Bill. I know the opinions of various gentlemen holding high positions in the Government, and their action upon questions involving high religious considerations. Actually the Government went out of their way to select a member of the Roman Catholic Church as Home Secretary, and I never heard them blamed for it. But why that same Government, which selected a Roman Catholic as Home Secretary, should now insist that no Roman Catholic shall be appointed to the position of Lord Chancellor or Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, I am not able to understand. I listened to the remarks of the leader of the House, and I confess I could not find out how far the right hon. Gentleman based his opposition to the Bill on the merits of the case. The right hon. Gentleman said that what the Bill proposes would outrage public opinion. But I want to hear it discussed on its merits, and if the opinions entertained by the Government at all resemble the opinions which we have just heard expressed by the hon. Member (Mr. Gedge), I cannot help believing that they must have yielded to the pressure of bigoted, narrow, and altogether out-of-date sentiments, at variance with the views which now prevail among the generality of men in all parts of the Kingdom. The only possible suggestion of an argument, if it deserves to be called an argument, came from the contention that if the Bill is passed we must logically go further, and alter the Act of Settlement of the Crown. I do not suppose that any hon. Gentleman seriously considers that to amend the Act of the 10th of George IV. — the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act—which has been already amended in several particulars in the direction in which it is now proposed to amend it, is at all analogous to altering the Act regulating the succession to the Crown. There are many distinctions which have been pointed out by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, and there is this also to be said: If we make a mistake in the case of a Lord Chancellor or Lord Lieutenant, if either is found acting to destroy the Constitution or the Protestantism of the Kingdom, it is not impossible to remove the particular Lord Lieutenant or to get rid of that particular Lord Chancellor. But if we alter the succession, and a mistake is made, that is a matter which cannot be so easily remedied. When you deal with the settlement of the

Mr. A. Elliot

Crown you deal with matters that are settled for generations. It is not a matter to be easily altered. It is one of the fundamental statutes on which the Constitution rests. And, further, it is perfectly reasonable that the head of a great Protestant Empire, the governing part of which is in the main Protestant, should, as representative of the nation, also remain Protestant. But we enter into different considerations, and are extending the Act of Settlement most unreasonably, if we say that the Governor of a colony shall not be a Roman Catholic. And if we consider the matter with reference to Ireland, surely we are not to say that an able man, a loyal subject, a man respected as loyal by the people, and fitted to represent Her Majesty, is to be excluded because he is of the religion of the great majority of the Irish people. Those who are maintaining that position—and it has not yet been justified—would have some difficulty in justifying it. And how useless is this law in any way as a bulwark of the Constitution! The Prime Minister may be a Roman Catholic. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down said that it would be impossible to prevent it, but it cannot do much harm because the Prime Minister is only the head of the Cabinet, which is a thing unknown to the Constitution. Well, religious tests are now abolished; the Prime Minister, the Cabinet Ministers, and other Advisers of the Crown may be of any religion, or may be of none; but to maintain that the Lord Chancellor's opinion in the Cabinet is so great as to outweigh the authority of the other Ministers is to reverse the notorious facts of the situation. It is to say that the Lord Chancellor's position is of greater importance than we know it to be. The question of patronage I will only touch upon for a moment. I gathered from what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian said that before going into Committee practically on the Bill he would make some new suggestion as to patronage. For my part I think it is very much required, for the effect of Clause 3 might be to narrow rather than to widen the scope of the measure in the powers the occupant of the Woolsack might possess. There is no bar to a member of the Church of Scotland becoming Lord Chancellor. If so, he would have the right to exercise ecclesiastical patronage. It is not the law of England at the present time that the appointment to benefices in the Church of England shall be exercised only by members of the Church of England. It is only a matter of property, and any person has a right to exercise the patronage belonging to his office, or which is his in right of possession of an advowson. It requires great consideration before we find ourselves convinced it is desirable to narrow that right. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has said that Scotch Members ought to be careful in allowing the Lord Chancellor to be described as Lord Chancellor of Great Britain. But the Lord Chancellor is Lord Chancellor of Great Britain by virtue of the Act of Union with Scotland, which says that there shall be one Great Seal for England and Scotland. The Great Seal is a mark of the nationhood of Scotland. Her Majesty may give her sanction to some important Treaty or some great Imperial Act; and is Scotland not to be represented by that Great Seal? I dislike to see the narrower word "England" substituted for what is by Act of Parliament the rightful designation of "Great Britain." I like to think that in these great Imperial Acts Scotland as well as England is represented in the form of the Seal. I do regret, as I said before, that the Government have not accepted the Bill, that in the strong position they occupy they have not been able to clear themselves from any suspicions of old-fashioned, out-of-date origin, and that they have yielded to pressure from the least wise section of their supporters. I am sorry to have to vote against the Government, whose general course of policy I approve. What the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian may have done 15 or 20 years ago is not the question. We have to judge of the matter on its merits. Are we to go on in the direction of advance in which this country has been going for two centuries—in the direction of throwing open these offices—or are we now to stand still? I believe that the country has been advancing in the right direction, and I shall be sorry if the Government, in consequence of its action on this occasion, should seem to try to check that steady progress.

*(3.14.) COLONEL SANDYS (Lancashire S.W., Bootle): I confess the temptation to speak at length on this subject is very great. I do not often trouble the House with my remarks and opinions, and under present circumstances, and seeing the House is anxious for a Division, I will not express my views at any great length. I am afraid that I may perhaps be classed in that category referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian as of those who champion everything that ought to be swept away. But, at any rate, I venture to stand before this House as the upholder of principles which I believe are held by a very large majority of the people of England, and I believe of Scotland too. I have this morning had the honour of laying on the Table of the House Petitions signed by over 50,000 English people, a large number being members of the Baptist persuasion. That is, I venture to say, a strong and conclusive argument that they are not in favour of the Bill. Other Petitions in the same direction have also been presented, and I may state that, having had the honour of addressing large meetings in different parts of the country in reference to this particular Bill, I have invariably found a unanimity of opinion ranged against it; and if the House of Commons is to reflect the views of the majority of the people of this country, it will reject the Bill. I oppose the Bill, because I believe that the cession of these two great offices of State to the professors of another faith would logically lead to a course which would endanger the constitutional liberties of the people of this country. The present measure, unlike that of last year, makes no provision, in the event of the Lord Chancellor for the time being being a Roman Catholic, for the State ecclesiastical patronage being exercised by the Archbishops of the Church of England. Sub-section 1 of Section 3 of the present Bill provides that any right of presentation to any ecclesiastical benefice belonging to the office when held by a Roman Catholic shall be exercised by such person or persons as Her Majesty may appoint. There is no provision that such person shall profess the Protestant faith. There is no mention of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, as was the case in the Bill of 1890, and as, has already been pointed out, there is no condition at all that this person or these persons shall be of the Protestant faith. I think that is a very important point of difference which certainly does not tell in favour of the present Bill. The Bill is entitled "The Religious Disabilities Removal Bill," but it should more properly be called "The Political Disabilities Removal Bill." There is no question of religion in this matter at all. At the present moment none of Her Majesty's subjects suffer under any religious disabilities at all. A Roman Catholic is not objected to because of his religious faith, but because of his political views. I agree in according to every Roman Catholic the free exercise of this religion. I have no objection whatever to Roman Catholicism as a faith for those who can accept it. What I object to, and the ground upon which I oppose the Bill, is the Roman Catholic system, and not the Roman Catholic faith. That system is of a two-fold nature. It has its own faith and form of worship, which concerns only the members of that faith, and this is not the time or place to discuss that. What I will briefly deal with now is the political side of that faith. The Roman Catholic Church is a great political power, and its Bishops and other functionaries are political agents. This is why the people of this country, whose instincts, where their constitutional freedom is concerned, are unerring, have condemned this Bill. They feel that, if this Bill were carried, great political influences would be brought to bear against their liberties. That may be a strong statement, but I am prepared to support it by quotation and argument. Let us look for a moment at the Bill itself. I have mentioned the difference between this and a former Bill in reference to ecclesiastical patronage. Now, suppose for a moment that the Lord High Chancellor is appointed under the circumstances contemplated by the framers of the Bill. Will anyone deny the importance of the position occupied by the Lord Chancellor? The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has ridiculed the title of Keeper of the Queen's Conscience, which attaches to the Lord Chancellor, and has pointed out that the title comes down from pre-Reformation times; but, at any rate, the Lord Chancellor is still the most intimate adviser of the Sovereign. How can you expect the holder of that high and responsible office to discharge the duties attaching to the intimate adviser of the Sovereign when the conscience of the Lord Chancellor himself would, under the circumstances, be in the keeping of the Roman Catholic priesthood, and his first allegiance be due to a foreign Power? I do not see how you can appoint such a man to be intimate adviser of the Sovereign of this realm in accordance with the spirit and terms of the Act of Settlement. I have taken the trouble to look out the duties that devolve upon the Lord Chancellor, and hon. Members may judge of the importance of the position of this State functionary and the influence he exercises—Excluding for a moment the ecclesiastical patronage, the Lord Chancellor is ex officio a Privy Councillor and Member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; he is Prolocutor of the House of Lords; appointer of the Justices of Peace throughout the country; keeper of the Sovereign's conscience, or in other words the intimate adviser of the Sovereign; visitor of all Hospitals and Colleges of Royal foundation; patron of all Crown Livings entered in the "King's Book;" he is general guardian of all infants, idiots, lunatics, and wards; general superintendent of charitable uses throughout the Kingdom, besides his jurisdiction in the Court of Chancery over wards; he is Keeper of the Great Seal of England—and I may mention that this seal having been once affixed to a document has a force only to be set aside by an Act of Parliament, and it is not difficult to imagine that in certain social crises the Broad Seal of England thus used might lead to very serious complications—[a laugh]—that statement is treated with ridicule by some person, but the House will, I doubt not, appreciate my allusion and do justice to it. The Lord Chancellor is, moreover, President of the House of Lords Appellate tribunal, and of Lords Justices of Appeal; of the Chancery Division of the High Court; he appoints all the Law Officers, Puisne Judges, County Court Judges (removable) and Justices; he appoints to 12 canonries and to over 600 livings in the Church of England; he reads the Royal Speech, and is always a Member of a Royal Commission to represent the Crown. Does the House think that an official exercising all these functions should be the subject of a foreign Power, for I presume it will be conceded that the allegiance of a Roman Catholic is first to the Pope of Rome and to the entourage of the Papal Throne?

Colonel Sandys

I repeat, to the entourage—or the power behind the Papal Throne—and gentlemen from Ireland will understand the force of this remark. The right hon. Gentleman has challenged us to prove that the loyalty of our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects may be tainted. While I am ready to admit the loyalty of a great number of Roman Catholics, it cannot be denied that the Roman Catholic owes a divided allegiance, and that in the hour of danger it must be a question with him whether his allegiance is due to the Pope of Rome or to the Sovereign of this country. A dispassionate study of history will show such junctures have arisen, and they may arise again. But to a good Catholic there is no question as to where his allegiance is first due. The question has been raised and answered fully by those most competent to do so.

"It is idle to expect that the most solemn promises and sworn declarations of the highest Romish dignitaries in this country can in any degree bind the consciences of the rulers of the Church of Rome, or fetter its action in dealing with or enforcing obedience from its subjects in this country."

Who was it ridiculed the idea? No less an authority than the late Cardinal Newman. Dealing in his reply to Vatican Decrees with the declaration made by English and Irish prelates in 1826 he says—

"At that time the clergy both of Ireland and England were educated in Gallican opinions, and had modes of thinking foreign altogether to the minds of the entourage of the Holy See."

He goes on to say—

"British Ministers ought to have applied to Rome to learn the civil dates of British subjects, and that no pledge from Catholics is of value to which Rome is not a party."

So we see that there is then to be an application to Rome when the duties and allegiance of British subjects to the Crown are in conflict with Papal claims? On page 14 we find these words. "No pledge from a Catholic will be of any value to which Rome is not a party." (Remember, I am here quoting the right hon. Gentleman's own words.) He adds—

"The English statesmen of the future will remember these words, and recollect from whom they come. The lesson to be received is this: although pledges were given, although these pledges were firmly and even passionately asserted, although the subject was one of civil allegiance, no pledge from a Catholic was of any value to which Rome was not a party."

In the light of this statement I leave the House to judge of what value the allegiance of Roman Catholics is likely to be. A good Catholic dare not go against his rule, and I hold that it would be in the last degree unwise in us to leave in any sort of doubt the allegiance of any high officer of State through whom the reputation of the Crown might be imperilled. I therefore trust the House will reject the Bill without entertaining any Amendment whatever.

*(3.33.) Mr. ASQUITH (Fife, East): Whatever may be the fate of this Bill, I think that its promoters may fairly congratulate themselves upon the success which it has already achieved in testing the reality and genuineness of some of our current political professions. As has often been pointed out, in this matter of religious disability our legislation has passed through three stages. We began with an era of exclusions, which was followed by an era of toleration, to be succeeded in the present century by an era of liberty. After 60 years experience of growing freedom, we had believed that the doctrine of religious liberty was at last accepted by men of all parties and creeds in this country as part of that common stock of opinion which we may take for granted in all political controversies. From this Debate, however, it appears that some of us have been living in a fool's paradise. The doctrine of religious liberty is that the State in entrusting civil and political rights to its subjects, and in selecting men for its service, has no more duty and no more right to concern itself with their religious opinions than it has with the cut of their clothes or the colour of their hair. That is the principle underlying our legislation of the last 60 years, by which, beginning with Roman Catholics, going on to Jews, and finally dealing with those who profess no religion at all, we have opened the avenues of public life to all without distinction. But speeches have been made by the hon. Member who has just sat down, and by the hon. Member for Stockport, which show that, so far from the principle being universally accepted, there are still those who have not the dimmest and most distant apprehension what it means. The last speaker transported us into the remote past, and repeated phrases and appealed to prejudices which I at least imagined had been buried, and buried beyond the hope of resurrection—in the grave of Lord Eldon. We witness many surprising things in politics in these days; but since I have been in the House I have seen nothing more surprising than the procession of argumentative and rhetorical ghosts which have stalked along the floor of the House in the broad daylight of this Wednesday afternoon in the last decade of the 19th century. If the arguments against the Bill are good for anything they are good as an indictment against the spirit of the legislation of the last half-century. With one exception there is not an argument that was not met and refuted a hundred times in the first 20 years of this century by the leaders of the Liberal Party of the day, who suffered, and suffered gladly, exclusion from place and power—not a bad thing to happen, sometimes, in the history of a Party—rather than abandon the advocacy of Catholic claims. The one exception is the argument of the hon. Member for Stockport, and others, that the Church of Rome, whatever it may have been in 1829, has now become a different and a much more dangerous body, and has adopted dogmas which have made her a more formidable enemy to human enlightenment and political loyalty. I am not going to take up the cudgels for the Vatican Decrees or the Syllabus, but all history shows that it is hazardous to assume that men's conduct will conform to the logical necessities of their speculative or theological creed. Let us rather look at actual facts. During the 20 years which have elapsed since the decrees were promulgated we have seen Roman Catholic subjects of the Queen in the Army and the Navy, we have seen them exercising the offices of Magistrates and Judges, sitting amongst us in this House, filling high positions in every Department of the service of the State, and admitted to the highest positions in the councils of the Sovereign. Will anyone assert that these men have been less constant in their allegiance, less devoted to duty, less trustworthy in all the relations of public and of private life, than the members of any other Church? That is a dangerous line of argument, because, if a tree is to be known by its fruits, something might be said of the political dangers of a form of faith which in these days keeps alive in its votaries the spirit and the temper of religious persecution; operating, it is true, not by the antiquated methods of the torture chamber and the stake, but in the subtler and equally effective form of social and political ostracism. Why have not the opponents of this Bill the courage of their convictions? If one-half of their arguments were good, they would not content themselves by opposing this modest little measure, but they would, like bold men, propose to re-enact, with all the additional safeguards that the modern developments of Roman doctrine require, the whole apparatus of tests and shibboleths, of declarations and oaths—by which for 150 years you excluded from the rights of citizenship thousands and millions of the most loyal subjects of the Crown. Why do they not apply to their sympathising and somewhat taciturn friends on the Treasury Bench to give them a day for the discussion of such a proposal—and if they do we shall be glad to meet them on that broader platform. But until this question is presented to us we have nothing to do with it. Assuming that we are not going to reverse the current of our legislation, the burden of proof lies upon those who oppose the Bill. What is there to differentiate the office of Lord Chancellor from other high offices of State? Nothing, except the fact that in some books the Lord Chancellor is described as the Keeper of the Queen's Conscience—a relic of the time when the Lord Chancellor was an ecclesiastic, because no one else was well educated enough to discharge the duties of the office. The Lord Chancellor was intrusted with the presentations to the King's livings under 20 marks, and, afterwards, under £20 in value, in order that he might be able to provide pensions and rewards for clerks in the Court of Chancery. The clerks, like their master, were necessarily ecclesiastics, because they could read and write and had sufficient education for the duties they had to discharge. The Lord Chancellor is no longer an ecclesiastic, and the clerks are no longer ecclesiastics, and the whole question of patronage is provided for by the Bill; but the matter is one of detail, subject to amendment in Committee. Suffice it that it would be impossible for a Catholic Lord Chancellor to have any voice whatever in the distribution of patronage. How far is the argument to be carried? The Queen's Conscience may be kept by a Jew (when the patronage is exercised by the Archbishop of Canterbury); by a Nonconformist, bound by his principles to look upon the Established Church as an offence, and yet entitled to present to each living as it becomes vacant; or by an agnostic, a man who will not assert or deny any of the principles which all religious people believe to be of the very essence of religion. He may present to any living he pleases. Will anyone get up, and, by argument, endeavour to demonstrate to the House, all these things being within the law, that a Roman Catholic ought to be excluded from the office which members of all these creeds or of no creed at all may fill? All the other high offices of State a Roman Catholic may fill. The First Lord of the Treasury may be a Roman Catholic. The Secretary of State, with whom rests the prerogative of mercy, may be a Roman Catholic. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whose duties may include delicate transactions with the Curia of Rome, may be a Roman Catholic. Is any principle involved in excluding the Lord Chancellor where he is a Roman Catholic? Only two arguments have been, or can be, brought against this Bill—both of them equally irrelevant. The first is derived from the Act of Settlement, and from the suggestion that if we pass the present Bill we shall be logically driven to pass another Bill afterwards for a different purpose. The Bill before the House does not purport to touch the Act of Settlement. When, if ever, that Act comes up for revision, the religion of the Sovereign is only one of several matters which will have to be carefully and independently considered. The other argument is still more grotesque. I have not heard it put forward in this House, but I have seen it at least covertly insinuated elsewhere. It is that that Bill is promoted in the interests of particular persons. Is there anybody who seriously believes that to be true? If there is, I beg to assure them that, so far as I am aware, no person engaged in the promotion of this Bill, or who will vote for this Bill, knows or cares what influence it may have on the political or personal fortunes of any man living. What is the attitude of Her Majesty's Government on this question? They are going to oppose the Bill for reasons which I have not been able entirely to understand; but I do not greatly blame them. They have during the last few years inflicted heavy blows upon, and have yet more hard knocks in store for, their Orange friends in Ireland. There have been, too, certain compromising adventures in connection with Ireland and Malta, the recollection of which it is desirable should be effaced as soon as possible. The Government may well think this an opportune occasion to indulge in a little cheap Protestant sentiment. But Her Majesty's Government and those who sit behind them do not constitute the majority in this House. We are curious to know what course is going to be adopted by those supporters of the Government who are good enough to sit amongst us. I do not see many of them in their places; important public engagements appear to have detained some of them in other parts of the country. Until I hear to the contrary, I shall hope and believe that they will follow the manly example of the hon. Member for Roxburghshire and stand true to the old principles of the Liberal Party. Surely it cannot be that the principle of religious liberty is to go with so many others, to be sacrificed to satisfy the devouring requirements of the sacred cause of the Union. However that may be, our course is clear. Sixty years ago the principle of religious exclusion was entrenched in this country behind an imposing fabric of legal safeguards and securities. One after another its strong places have been captured and its walls battered down, until all that remains is this paltry little corner—the solitary and belated relic of a past which can never be rebuilt. The finger of fate is upon it; and although by your votes this afternoon you may for a few years retard, depend upon it you cannot avert its downfall.

Mr Asquith

(3.51.) COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): I am glad to have the good fortune to follow a gentleman belonging to the legal profession, because I have always found that, however apposite and unanswerable lawyers' arguments may be, we may depend upon it there is another lawyer in the House who can refute and confute them all. What struck me in the speech of the hon. and learned Member was that there was one work of great interest which he never could have read—Vatican Decrees.

The hon. and learned Member has conjured up before the House a vision of ghosts marching down the floor, a procession of bigots reviving musty and rusty traditions of a long past age. If the hon. and learned Member had read Vatican Decrees, he would have seen, marching at the head of that procession, his revered leader the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. I notice that the hon. and learned Gentleman did not, in the course of his eloquent speech, touch one of the main objections to the Bill—the question of the appointment in Ireland of a Catholic Lord Lieutenant, to which I will refer later on. With regard to the Bill itself, and the speech in which it was introduced, I must say that from a Party point of view there never was a move taken in this House more likely to strengthen the Party to which I belong; but I regret that the right hon. Gentleman or any Member of the House should have thought it his duty to bring before the House and the country a question which, in my opinion, is, more than any other, likely to raise those bitter religious hatreds and dissensions which it is desirable should be buried. I, however, find it difficult to regret the raising of a question which has been the occasion of a speech from the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian which, if the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say so, afforded me very much pleasure to listen to. I believe the whole House, whether they agree with the right hon. Gentleman or not, listened with delight to the wonderful speech which he delivered, so full was it of eloquence, fire, and wit. I do not intend to wander into the legal question, with which I am absolutely incapable of dealing, but I will confine myself to the general question as it presents itself to the ordinary minds of the country, which, after all, will have to record the final verdict on this subject. I wonder why the right hon. Gentleman has brought in this Bill. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman intends to give satisfaction to some part of the community. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman denies that the Bill touches a very important and fundamental question in our Constitution. Who is it the right hon. Gentleman intends to satisfy? Undoubtedly there are certain Roman Catholics in the country who will be glad to see the Bill pass, but, as a rule, they belong to the “classes,” with whom the right hon. Gentleman has so little sympathy. The “masses” do not care one farthing about the Bill. Is it to satisfy the sensibilities of his Irish Roman Catholic supporters that the right hon. Gentleman has introduced the Bill? It cannot be that, because they are going to sweep the whole board; they are going to remove every vestige of the British rule from the other side of the Channel. We have heard a great deal about the Keeper of the Queen’s conscience. I do not know what that is. But whatever doubt there may be as to who is the Keeper of the Queen’s conscience, there is no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman has for some time been the keeper of the Nonconformist conscience. Is it to satisfy the Nonconformists that he has brought forward this Bill? Even among the right hon. Gentleman’s most vigorous supporters in this country there have been meetings held absolutely condemning the principle of the Bill. I think it will require all the ingenuity of Radical Members opposite, when they go back to their constituents, to so enlarge the Nonconformist conscience, which I admit is an elastic thing, as to cause Nonconformists to swallow a principle which is absolutely opposed to the true Protestant principles of this country, which I believe are mainly to be found among the Nonconformists. I absolutely fail to see what Party in the country it is that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to gratify. The main part of the right hon. Gentleman’s argument was enforced in a most eloquent appeal to the House not to choose out one religion at which this blow is to be aimed, and he pointed out that disqualifications are not placed on Buddhists, Mahomedans, or Hindoos. The disqualifications which at one time were placed on Roman Catholics were aimed at their Church for a great reason and object, and that was that the Roman Catholic Church sought to establish supreme authority in this land, which none of the other religions did. But I have not the shadow of a doubt that if any of those other religions had attempted to establish in this country—as the Roman Catholic Church attempted in former times—a political domination and supreme authority, exactly the same restrictions would have been imposed upon them. But the right hon.

Colonel Sanderson

Gentleman—and, for my own part, I must say that I admire above all the marvellous agility which the right hon. Gentleman has displayed in skating over very thin ice—the right hon. Gentleman must have known that if he brought this forward we should improve our mind by a careful study of all he has said or written on many subjects from various points of view in former times, and that he would be undoubtedly confronted with the views which he has expressed in those two pamphlets. The right hon. Gentleman has been very strong on the line which he took with regard to removal of Catholic disabilities in 1867. But that was before 1870; and I should have liked the right hon. Gentleman when he was dealing with the subject to have proved to the House that, on mature consideration, having regard to all he has learned since, the opinions he recorded in Vatican Decrees and Vaticanism are erroneous. Now, what is the argument the right hon. Gentleman employs in Vatican Decrees? The right hon. Gentleman points out that in 1829, when Catholic Emancipation was passed, it was passed on the express understanding, deliberately given by the Roman Catholic Bishops, that the authority and power of the Court of Rome did not touch civil obedience, and the right hon. Gentleman reasoned in the Vatican Decrees that it had only been on that ground that Catholic Emancipation had been carried; and we are, therefore, led to believe that, according to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, had the House of Commons been confronted with these Vatican Decrees it never would have passed the Bill for Catholic Emancipation. That is a logical deduction. But it is idle to deny that the Roman Catholic Church is not only a religious community, but a great political power. That is a fact which no statesman can deny. We all know at the present moment that the hopes of the right hon. Gentleman himself of returning to power depend altogether on the success or non-success of the Roman Catholic priests in confronting the hon. Member for Cork. If they succeed in beating the hon. Member for Cork, and return to this House the old style of Irish Nationalist-Liberal-Radical, who at one time were very remarkable for their fondness for place and power, then the right hon. Gentleman may come into power.

But from whom would these Roman Catholic priests get their orders? Why have Archbishop Croke and Archbishop Walsh gone to Rome to obtain the last orders of the Vatican and then come back to adopt a very distinct line of policy, which would undoubtedly have an effect, whether for good or for evil, on the destinies of the Empire? Therefore I maintain that it is impossible to deny that the Roman Catholic Church at the present time is a most powerful political machine, and that being so I venture to say that there is a far stronger argument at the present time against removing these two disabilities which exist in our Constitution than there was at the time of the Emancipation. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to read his own writings in 1874 and then try to refute what I say. The right hon. Gentleman laid down in his admirable pamphlet four propositions, two of which dealt with religious subjects, and I therefore will not consider them; but the right hon. Gentleman laid immense stress on two of these propositions. I will call the hon. and learned Member for Fife, who hates ghosts, to listen to the words of his leader, though I must do him the justice to say that he could never have had the slightest or faintest indication from the right hon. Gentleman that he has changed his mind on the subject. Well, these are the right hon. Gentleman's opinions, and as he does not deny them they are his opinions still—

"That she (the Church of Rome) has refurbished and paraded anew every rusty tool she was fondly thought to have disused."

So much for ghosts. Then comes the third proposition, which the right hon. Gentleman descants most upon in this pamphlet—

"That no one could now become her convert without renouncing his moral and mental freedom, and placing his civil loyalty and duty at the mercy of another."

Those were the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman then, and they are his opinions still. That being so, I entirely share the views of the right hon. Gentleman, who is a very good judge of these subjects, and I maintain that it would be a fatal and disastrous thing for the country to remove these two disabilities which, in its wisdom, the Parliament of 1829 left within the boundary of the Constitution, and to remove the last two hedges which they built round the Protestant succession to the Crown. The hon. Member who last spoke on the opposite side of the House has asked whether we do not believe that our Catholic fellow-countrymen are as worthy of high place, and as capable of high honour and patriotism as any in the land. I cordially share that opinion, and I am sure that if my hon. Friend below me (Mr. De Lisle) ever receives the reward of his energy and talent and should become Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, he would absolutely repudiate and refuse to allow any foreign interference with his well-known loyalty. But there are others whom I would not trust at all. They have been described most admirably and accurately by the right hon. Gentleman, and I really believe that when the right hon. Gentleman wrote this admirable work he was endowed with the spirit of prophecy, and must in his innermost conscience have conceived the probability that some statesman at some remote period might propose a similar measure to this, and it was in order to guard against that probability that he described the position of a convert to the Church of Rome. It is most interesting. The right hon. Gentleman points out in this pamphlet that the Roman Catholic Church has undoubtedly made considerable strides in England, but he qualifies that by saying that it is among the classes. The right hon. Gentleman used these words—

“It is certainly a political misfortune that during the last 30 years a Church so tainted in its views of civil obedience, and so unduly capable of changing its front and language after emancipation from what it had been before, like an actor who has to perform several characters in one piece, should have acquired an extension of its hold upon the highest classes of this country. The conquests have been chiefly, as might have been expected, among women; but the number of male converts, or captives (as I might prefer to describe them), has not been inconsiderable. There is no doubt that every one of these secessions is in the nature of a considerable moral and social severance. The breadth of this gap varies according to the varieties in the individual character. But it is too commonly a wide one; too commonly the spirit of the neophyte is expressed by the words which have become notorious, ‘a Catholic first and an Englishman afterwards’—words which properly convey no more than a truism, for every Christian must seek to place his religion even before his country in his inner heart, but very far from a truism in the sense in which we have been led to construe them. We take them to mean that the ‘convert’ intends in case of any conflict between the Queen and the Pope to follow the Pope and let the Queen shift for herself, which happily she can well do.”

Colonel Sanderson

If the Home Rule policy of the right hon. Gentleman is successful, we may see one of these interesting captive neophytes placed in the position of Prime Minister; and with a Roman Catholic Parliament we shall have Roman Catholic Judges, Roman Catholic juries, Roman Catholic police, and a Roman Catholic Lord Lieutenant. I should like to know what chance the Protestant minority in Ireland would have against an array of that sort. Have we not been amply justified by the step which the right hon. Gentleman has taken in offering, and in proposing to offer for the future, every opposition in our power to this policy? I do not oppose this Bill from any feeling of bigotry. If hon. Members call me a bigot, what do they call the writer of Vatican Decrees? I can truly say that in all the many speeches I have made since I became a speaking man I have never in my life uttered words so strong as those I have quoted. I challenge hon. Gentlemen opposite to discover in any speech I have made a single word insulting to the Roman Catholic faith. It is absolutely alien to our sentiments. We are Protestants, and are not ashamed of being Protestants. We are willing to admit the freedom of any one of our neighbours to choose what faith he may. But in opposing this Bill I believe I am giving voice to the wishes and desires of the vast majority of the people of this country, whose opposition to it is not a sign of bigotry or intolerance. If opposition to this Bill is a sign of bigotry, then I am a bigot, and the vast majority of the people are bigots, and are proud to think that this is a Protestant Kingdom. Some people are ashamed of the name Protestant. Those people are generally to be found among the classes, and not among the masses. You do not find Anglicans among the masses. We are proud of the name Protestant; we are not ashamed of what Protestantism has done; and I believe that there are no people who ought to be more faithful to this country than the Roman Catholics themselves. We have swept away all their disabilities except these two, and certainly we ought to draw the line at the Throne. It was through the Protestant Revolution that the present Royal Family was set upon the Throne. We owe our allegiance to the Throne, being Protestant, and we feel that any blow at the Protestant character of the Throne should be resisted to the utmost. Protestantism is what has made our country great; it is what has secured us our liberty; it is the source of our civilisation; and, above all, I believe that Protestantism has secured those free institutions, which confer, alike on Roman Catholics and Protestants, the best blessings of freedom.

(4.20.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): Mr. Speaker, I desire to record my vote in favour of the Second Reading of this Bill, and I hope the House will allow me in a few sentences to state the reasons, and also to make one reservation, in respect to one of the provisions of the Bill. I am not about to enter into any debate with the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just spoken. All I will attempt to do is, in a few practical words, to compose his alarm, and not to answer his arguments. I can assure him that among those who support this Bill there are many who are loyal in their devotion to the cause of Protestantism in this country, and many of us who believe that much of the greatness of this country is traceable to the Reformation, and to the Protestantism which, happily, is the foundation of our Constitution. But we do recollect that one of the great reasons why Protestantism has been a blessing to this country is its willingness to show toleration to those who differ from it in their religious belief. I should therefore agree with those rounded periods of my hon. and gallant Friend's speech when he told the House of the blessings of Protestantism. I agree, and I think many who support this Bill would agree, that the Catholic Church, as a political institution, is not one in which we should put our trust and faith, and I hope I do not hurt the feelings of anyone if I draw a distinction between the Church of Rome as a political institution and the belief of one who communicates in that Church. If I thought this Bill would add one iota of strength to the Roman Church as a political body or that it would injure the Protestant power of this country in the slightest degree, I should find myself surrounded by many on this side of the House who would this afternoon be opposing this Bill. As to the existence of the Church of Rome as a political body, it occurred to me during the speech of my right hon. Friend, to which everyone who heard it listened with the greatest admiration—especially that portion of it which reminded us of the great contest of 10 years ago—when he told us of the commencement of the contest and of its end—it occurred to me that there was another deduction to be drawn other than that which he applied. It may be for political purposes hon. Gentlemen opposite fought the action of my right hon. Friend step by step, and successfully fought, in favour of the view they entertained. But there was a body of Members in this House more violent than they, who for other reasons, I believe, opposed the attempted legislation of my right hon. Friend on religious grounds, and they were the Roman Catholic Members who sit below the Gangway, and in every Division they acted in opposition to that toleration of which my right hon. Friend is now the champion. What inference ought we to draw from that? Ought we not rather to act consistently with our own faith and doctrine and declare that in this Protestant country there shall be full and complete toleration and no distinction between men on account of creed? If we treat this matter as a political matter, I would yield to the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite; but what right have we, if we can get rid of this political consideration, to impose this disability on our fellow-subjects because they do not think on religious matters as we think? If it can be shown that you are doing more than giving freedom of religious belief, then new considerations will arise, on which, I think, much sympathy will be felt with the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite. Is there anything in the nature of political interference under this Bill? Two offices are mentioned. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has argued against the desirability of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland being a Roman Catholic. He drew a picture, fairly enough for the purposes of debate, in inverted commas from the pamphlet of my right hon. Friend, and he says, What would be the protection to be given to the Protestants of Ireland? I should say, in the first place, they would have exactly the same protection as the Catholic majority has in these days. But, Sir, the protection they would have is so great that we can afford, I do not say to be generous, but at least to be just. Great Britain is strongly Protestant, the Parliament of Great Britain is Protestant also, and the Government of the day, founded on a Parliament elected by the people, will be Protestant likewise. And if there should be a Lord Lieutenant of Ireland who should be a Roman Catholic, the Government of the day will be answerable for every act of his. Thus, Parliament will be answerable to the people, the people will be answerable to themselves, and the result will be, therefore, that if a Roman Catholic were appointed, there would be a jealous watchfulness of his acts, which certainly would create that protection which the hon. and gallant Gentleman rightly, I think, wants.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: When I spoke of a Roman Catholic Lord Lieutenant I contemplated Home Rule.

SIR H. JAMES: That is exactly contrary of what I am contemplating. I heard an argument addressed to the House before to-day, which at the time I thought was worthy of notice. It was said, "If you are contemplating that you ought to shut out the justice of this Bill because Home Rule will come into existence, then I fancy you will hear the argument used that you ought to let Home Rule come into existence in order to carry out the provisions of this Bill." I do not think the day for Home Rule has come yet. When it does come we must deal with it; but we who are defending what we regard as the sacred cause of the Union are under the impression that it is our duty to adopt legislation in reference to a state of things which we think will keep Home Rule far off. One word with reference to the office of the Lord Chancellor. As in the case of a Roman Catholic Lord Lieutenant, if a Roman Catholic were appointed to the Chancellorship he would be carefully watched in every act he did, and the safety of the people would lie in the Protestant power being in the ascendant in the country. Then, Sir, one word as to the reservation with which I support this Bill. I must ask my right hon. Friend's attention to the words of the 3rd clause, by which the delegated power is proposed to be given to any person selected by the Crown. I take exception to that provision. If the Lord Chancellor exercises ecclesiastical patronage, he and the Government are answerable for the proper exercise of that patronage. The Government can be censured for it. It will be in the recollection of the House that some 20 years ago there was a Debate in respect to Ewelme Rectory in this House. If you delegate this power of patronage, whether to the Archbishop or any other fitting person, you would never be able to make the Government responsible. If the Bill becomes law as it stands, that responsibility will be evaded. What I am asking the consideration of my right hon. Friend for is whether or not the delegation ought to be limited to a Minister who will bring in to share his responsibility the other members of the Government? I have given my reasons for supporting the Second Reading of this Bill; but I shall certainly in Committee desire to raise again this question to which I have referred. I thank the House for the attention with which it has listened to me.

Sir H. James

(4.31.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

(Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I do not intend to detain the House at any great length, but there are one or two matters to which I think the attention of the House should be specially directed. But, in the first place, may I be permitted to join in the tribute of admiration of the great speech delivered to-day by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian? I have listened to many speeches by the right hon. Gentleman, but never with greater interest than to this one; and, although I am unable to cope with the right hon. Gentleman in point of eloquence, I am bound to say there are some points in the speech upon which I take issue with the right hon. Gentleman, and to which I desire to refer. The right hon. Gentleman began by telling the House that there was grave question as to whether any disability existed at all. If that is so, then this Bill ought not to be introduced at all. It is a Bill to remove certain alleged religious disabilities, and must arouse feelings which, in my judgment, might have been allowed to lie dormant, and which, it must be admitted, ought not unnecessarily to be stirred. The right hon. Gentleman said he had been advised by able lawyers that the view taken and expressed by Lord Coleridge was correct. Then, again, I say that this Bill ought not to have been introduced. The right hon. Gentleman ought, in that case, to be satisfied with the legal position of

Roman Catholics. But he gave a remarkable reason for this Bill, even though no disability in fact exists. He said that although there were grave doubts on this question, and although competent authorities asserted that Roman Catholics could fill the offices of Lord Chancellor and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, yet no Prime Minister would venture, in the present state of the law, to appoint Roman Catholics to those offices. But why not? Because, apart from the question of law, there exists, as the right hon. Gentleman must have known, a widespread and national feeling that these offices have something about them which caused them to be excepted from the Catholic Emancipation Act, and that such exception ought to exist. This proposal is an attack made on that national feeling without any reason or demand. The right hon. Gentleman used the argument that the opponents of this Bill attacked the loyalty of Roman Catholics. There is no shadow of foundation for that statement. Over and over again in these Debates testimony has been borne to the loyalty of Roman Catholics. I have heard the right hon. Gentleman himself refer to such loyalty. It is not because we on this side of the House distrust the loyalty of Roman Catholics in the slightest that we think this measure ought to be opposed. It is because we believe that there may be, and, indeed, ought to be, in the minds of some men who would be qualified for these appointments if this Bill passed, a feeling which is stronger than loyalty—namely, adherence to their religious faith. That is why we oppose this measure, without reference to the question of loyalty or disloyalty. The right hon. Gentleman said that removing these disabilities, so far as the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Lieutenant were concerned, was not even indirectly making an attack upon the Protestant succession. The language which the right hon. Gentleman used was curious, and seemed to convey some reservation with regard to the possibilities in the future of this question. The speech of my hon. and learned Friend who followed the right hon. Gentleman has given further ground for this suspicion. The right hon. Gentleman said the question of the Crown was far too wide to be now discussed—that the present settlement was not irrational, and that he was not prepared to disturb it. I venture to think that the language used by the right hon. Gentleman was certainly not very felicitous or re-assuring, and it will, I fear, give rise to a lurking feeling that the right hon. Gentleman has been careful to say nothing that will show that he thinks this matter as to the Act of Settlement may not still be a matter for future discussion. That will be the impression conveyed by the language of the right hon. Gentleman, and this impression will be confirmed by the eloquent speech of the hon. Member for Fife, who said there were a great many questions besides the religious question which will have to be discussed when the Act of Settlement comes to be considered. If this impression is erroneous, if it is desired to remove the impression that this measure is in the nature of an indirect attack on the Protestant Succession, it would be well for any right hon. Gentleman who may address the House from the Front Opposition Bench to deal with this matter in clear and distinct language, and not by phrases that are capable of being explained away. There is a curious uncertainty about this part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech to which I think I ought to call attention. He said the Sovereign must be a member of the Church of England. But is that so? The Act of Settlement, as far as I can remember, uses the word "Protestant," and a "Protestant" includes all persons of the Christian Faith who are not Roman Catholics or members of the Greek Church. Now, what are the disabilities that it is proposed to remove? Have the supporters of this Bill satisfied themselves that there are any existing? If they do exist, under what statutes do they exist? If, on the other hand, they do not exist, then this question ought certainly not to have been raised. The Bill contains certain provisions as to the exercise of patronage, but if no disability exists at present, it is rather inconsistent to impose restrictions as this Bill proposes. It is said that Roman Catholics in other positions have fairly exercised their patronage, but it is not sufficient that the holder of an office should perform his duties without cause of complaint. It is extremely important that the public should be satisfied that those duties are satisfactorily executed. It must be borne in mind that the patronage of the Lord

Chancellor, to which reference has been made, is of an ecclesiastical character, which has come to be regarded as being only fitly exercised by a member of the Protestant Church. I desire to thank the right hon. Gentleman very sincerely for his expression of respect for the profession of which I am the unworthy representative. He spoke of it as a glorious profession, and pictured the hardship of a young man going to the Bar, and, by his own talent, becoming the head of his profession, and then being deemed unfit to fill the highest office open to the members of that profession because of his religious belief. Large numbers of men of the Catholic religion have gone to the Bar, and I think it is a strong testimony to their high principles that they have recognised that their first duty is to their religious belief, and that they have not, therefore, sought to take offices to the qualifying oath for which, on religious grounds, they could not subscribe. That is a sentiment which ought to be encouraged, and no man ought to regret his personal disability in that respect. But why, I wish to know, is this Bill brought forward now? Its supporters admit that it is doubtful whether it is required for the removal of legal disabilities; and they also admit that, if required for that purpose, they have had opportunity after opportunity of initiating such legislation. Why, then, is the Bill proposed now? Can its supporters say that it has no connection with their Home Rule schemes, and will the electors of this country think that it has no connection with those schemes? What has been one of the most important arguments we have used on behalf of the Unionist platform in this House? It has been in defence of the Protestants of Ireland. If Home Rule is granted to Ireland the Protestant community will probably look upon the Protestant Lord Lieutenant as their sole remaining protection. Some people may think that protection would only be nominal, others that it would be substantial; but what justification is there for removing it at a time when it is most important that the idea should not spread further that there is an intention of separating the kingdom of Ireland from Great Britain? It is in this connection that the question of the Crown comes in, for the Lord Lieutenant is the representative of the Crown; he is, so far as anyone can be in Ireland, the representative of the Sovereign. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, I may point out, has never retreated from the position taken up by him in the pamphlets, from which extracts have been read. In the later pamphlet he has, it is true, inserted a paragraph saying that his object has been gained by the collection of a large amount of testimony as to the loyalty of Roman Catholics; but he has, at the same time, repeated in still stronger language his views as to the dangers that might arise in consequence of the ascendancy of the Roman Catholic church over the followers of that religion. Those who support the Bill have not been able to say that the bulk of the Roman Catholics of England, Scotland, and Ireland, demand that it should be passed, and they have not ventured to say that it has no connection with the Home Rule scheme of 1886. I maintain that no case has been made out for passing the measure, and I trust that it will be rejected by a substantial majority.

Sir R. Webster

*(455.) MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Mid): I crave the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I explain the delicate position in which the attitude of the Government has placed me. As a Catholic I have no doubt as to the side on which I should vote; but when I view the question as a Unionist the matter appears to be a little more complicated. As one who supports the legal status of the Church of England my position is yet more complicated. Politically I support the legal status of the Established Church on the grounds laid down by the late Cardinal Newman, in the well-known passage, Apologia, Note E—

"I recognize in the Anglican Church, a time-honoured institution, of noble historical memories, a monument of ancient wisdom, a momentous arm of political strength, a great national organ, a source of vast popular advantage, and, to a certain point, a witness and teacher of religious truth. . . . Doubtless the National Church has hitherto been a serviceable breakwater against doctrinal errors more fundamental than its own, and my own idea of a Catholic's fitting attitude towards the National Church is that of assisting and sustaining, if it be in our power, in the interests of dogmatic truth."

Fortified by this opinion, I asked the suffrages of the electors of Mid Leicestershire as a supporter of the legal status of the Established Church, and bitterly I was attacked on that account by many co-religionists. And now to connect my position with regard to this Bill. It seems to me that the position of the Lord High Chancellor is closely connected with the Established Church, but the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland's position is different, because the Protestant Church in Ireland has been disestablished. If I thought that by voting for the Bill I should assist those who desire to disestablish the National Church I should not feel myself justified in voting for it; but it has been made clear in the Debate by Her Majesty's Ministers that it is not necessary that the Lord Chancellor should be a member of the Established Church. If by my vote I were to express the view that a Roman Catholic could not be trusted to perform honestly duties which a Jew or an agnostic may be entrusted with, I should be casting a slur upon my co-religionists. Now, as to the question of the Lord Lieutenantancy of Ireland; what is my attitude? I came forward as a Unionist, not with the intention of supporting the Protestant ascendancy in Ireland, but because in my belief Catholic interests would be best served by the maintenance of the Union. That is not the opinion held by gentlemen representing Irish constituencies, but it happens to be the opinion of the vast majority of the English Catholic Unionists; and I believe as time goes on it will become the opinion of what I may call the Clerical party in Ireland. I very much regret the position the Government have taken up, and I challenge any of the law officers to prove I am wrong in what I am going to say. The Government have taken up a position of hostility to this Motion, although they know the disability has been already abolished. The Tests Act of Charles II. imposed, and the Catholic Emancipation Act maintained, the disability in regard to the oath, but the Act of 1863 abolished the oath altogether, which hitherto prevented the Catholics occupying any high position. I, as a Catholic, thank the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian for his magnificent speech, which will go far to remove the feelings of soreness which his Vatican Decrees created. What has the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian to do when he is in Office? Why, to make Lord Ripon Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and the hon. and learned Member for Hackney (Sir C. Russell) Lord High Chancellor of England. What will happen? All that anybody can do is to ask those gentlemen to take the Oath of Allegiance. Should they refuse to do so they would be fined the sum of £500. But once they had taken the oath, and there is nothing contrary to the Catholic Faith to prevent them, they can perform the whole of the duties connected with the offices. It is quite true that in 1863 Parliament did not intend to abolish the disability, but they did so nevertheless, and all the king's horses and all the king's men cannot set it up again. Well, I entered the House to day with the intention of abstaining from voting, because it seemed to me perfectly immaterial whether I voted for a Bill which had no operative force, or abstained from voting for a disability which no longer exists; and if there had been no glorification of the Reformation I should have abstained from voting. But my hon. and gallant Friend's (Colonel Saunderson) glorification of the Reformation makes it impossible for me to absent myself from the Division, and I should like to remind my hon. Friends who have glorified the Reformation that the opinion they hold is fast fading away in this country. What is the opinion which is fast obtaining in this country? I will quote, not a Roman Catholic, but a Protestant historian—Cobbett's History of the Reformation—showing how it has impoverished and degraded the main body of the people, p. 2—

"Now, my friends, a fair and honest inquiry will teach us that this was an alteration greatly for the worse; that the 'Reformation,' as it is called, was engendered in beastly lust, brought forth in hypocrisy and perfidy, and cherished and fed by plunder, devastation, and by rivers of innocent English and Irish blood; and that as to its more remote consequences they are some of them now before us in that misery, that beggary, that nakedness, that hunger, that everlasting wrangling and spite which now stare us in the face and stun our ears at every turn, and which the Reformation has given us in exchange for the ease and happiness and harmony and Christian charity, enjoyed so abundantly, and for so many ages, by our Catholic forefathers."

The classes—and I am still sufficiently a Tory to think the classes understand the question better than the masses—the classes are already ashamed of the word "Protestant;" they call themselves Catholics, and not Roman Catholics. If you look at the Test Act of Charles II., you will find we were not even honoured by the title of Roman Catholics, we were called Popish recusants. The reason why I refer to this is that it brings me back to the question of the Union, and it is from the Unionist point of view I am now going to direct my remarks. I am of opinion that if there had not been the cruel attempts to compel the Irish people to adopt the reformed religion, the present strained relations between England and Ireland would never have existed; and it is because I look forward to the day when the Irish people will be as attached to the Union as I am that I deprecate the introduction of these questions, and feel compelled to vote for the Bill. My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury was mistaken in saying these two were the only religious disabilities left in the Statute Book. If the Union is to be a success we must gain over the clergy of Ireland to the cause of law and order; but I ask any sensible Englishman how he can expect the clergy of Ireland, unless they ascend to the practice of heroic virtue, to support law and order, as they ought to as clergymen, so long as these statutes remain unrepealed? There are two sets of clauses of the Act of Emancipation which have not been repealed. One prevents priests of the Church of Rome being elected as Members of Parliament. I have no wish to introduce 50 Irish priests into this House; but I maintain that if you inflict upon priests this disability which is removed from Wesleyan, Methodist, and Presbyterian ministers, you ought to allow them to be represented in the Upper House, as you allow the clergy of the Church of England. Then there are half a dozen other clauses explicitly intended to gradually sweep away all the Religious Orders in Ireland, and making it a penal offence for any men to dwell together in religious brotherhoods or communities, and these disabilities continue to rankle in the minds of the clergy of Ireland. I remember Abbot Fitzpatrick, of Mount Melleray, the head of the Cistercian Order in Ireland, saying to me, "How can you expect us to be enthusiastic in favour of law and order when our very existence, when the very practice of our religious duty is as unlawful in this country as either boycotting or the Plan of Campaign?" By Section 28 and following sections the practice of religious duties by religious bodies is unlawful. It is the same in England, but we are not a sentimental people rather a practical people, and once a law has become a dead letter we are content to ignore it. That is not so in Ireland. I ask the House how they can expect a body of clergy to be devoted to the support of law and order when statutes such as I have cited remain in force? It seems to me that the particular disabilities to which I have referred are well worthy the attention of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, and I hope he will soon introduce a Bill to repeal these real hardships. Under all the circumstances, it will be impossible for me to refrain from voting, and therefore with very great regret, but without any wish to blame too seriously the position the Government have taken up, I shall have to go into the Lobby against them. [Ironical cries of "Oh, oh!"] If the Union were still trembling in the balance, I might still consider it my highest duty to support the Government in difficulties, but having no fear of the future, confident that Home Rule is dead, I am going to vote for the inoperative Bill of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. De Lisle

*(5.15.) Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I am sure the whole House has listened with much sympathy to the recital which the hon. Member has given of his honest efforts to steer a course amongst the various currents which move him in opposite directions, but the House will expect some answer to be given to the questions urged in the Debate from the other side of the House. We have had the advantage of two speeches from the Ministerial Bench, but I am bound to say they left me and others in complete doubt as to whether the Government are in favour of the principle of the Bill or against it. The First Lord of the Treasury asked, "Why was the Bill not introduced long ago?" He said to my right hon. Friend, "You were in power for a great many years, and you never touched these disabilities of which you now complain so loudly." Well, the right hon. Gentleman must be aware that the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian was not altogether unoccupied in those years when he was at the head of Her Majesty's Government. The First Lord of the Treasury's inquiry is one which might be addressed on every occasion when a new reform is proposed. But then the right hon. Gentleman also asked, "Are you sure the Bill is necessary? Have not eminent lawyers stated that, in their opinion, these disabilities are already abolished?" It is a complicated question of legal decision; but one thing, at all events, is certain, namely, that, whether the effect of the Acts of 1863 and of 1867 is or is not what Sir John Coleridge has said it is, if the disqualification has been abolished it has been done without the cognizance and intention of Parliament, and until the intention of Parliament is declared on the subject no one could act on the supposed effect of the law. The spokesmen of the Government have been lavish in their admiration of the loyalty of their Catholic fellow-subjects; but I imagine the Roman Catholics of England, Scotland, and Ireland, would more appreciate those compliments if they saw the Government doing something to relieve them of these disabilities, and did not content themselves with mere empty words. The First Lord of the Treasury submitted that it is undesirable to open these offices in view of the strong prejudice which existed in certain quarters of this country. The House of Commons, then, is to yield to prejudice. That is the dictum of the representative of the Government which is the great bulwark against the progress of democratic feeling? and the great protector of right principle against outside clamour. Surely it is a remarkable fact that three executive offices, and three only, were reserved in 1829 from the general provisions of the Emancipation Act. There was also the ceremonial office of Lord High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland—but everyone must agree that that is not an executive office, and therefore not open to the same considerations as the offices of Lord Chancellor and Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and also that it would be altogether unreasonable to throw that office open to a person who was distasteful to every member of the body whose presence he represented. If the object and basis of that reservation of offices was the anticipation or allegation of possible political danger, surely it is reasonable to suppose that the area of restriction would have been very much larger, and that many more offices would have been reserved. When one remembers the state of feeling at the time—when we remember that the whole municipal life, the whole Parliamentary life, the whole official life of the country was for the first time being thrown open to Catholics—surely it is an extraordinary fact, considering the angry and suspicious feeling which existed, that three offices only were selected for reservation. I will tell the House why these offices were reserved, and no other. It was for no other reason than this, that the offices possessed Church patronage. It is obvious to anyone who considers the matter that many other offices—the Home Secretary, the Foreign Secretary, the Colonial Secretary, the First Lord of the Treasury—if there had been a suspicion of danger to the Constitution and the liberties of the lieges, would have been reserved, rather than those of the Lord Chancellor in England or the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. That what I have just stated was the only reason for the reservation is clear from the speech of Sir Robert Peel, in introducing the Relief Bill of 1829, who said—

"It would nevertheless be quite consistent with its general principle"— that is, the general principle of Catholic Emancipation—

"to exclude Roman Catholics from a certain limited number of offices which have special and peculiar duties attached to them connected with the patronage of the Church, or with education, or with the administration of ecclesiastical law."

The position, then, with regard to these offices is briefly this:—The Irish Lord Chancellorship was opened to Catholics by a Conservative Government in 1867, and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has lost any Church patronage he had by the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, and there only remains, therefore, the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, as to whom the point is still open that he possesses the right of patronage and other interference in Church matters. My right hon. Friend made a statement in introducing the Bill which, I think, requires a little explanation. He said we had followed precedent in the drafting of the Bill, but there were some particulars in it which we thought ought to be altered. Undoubtedly, Clause 3 as it now stands does appear to impose a certain new disability upon Nonconformists and persons who are not members of the Church of England, and therefore my right hon. Friend suggested that the Bill should be committed pro forma for the purpose of making the alteration. That is the proper and regular and old-fashioned way of doing it; but it could be done, of course, by way of Amendment in Committee. The clause runs—

“In case the office of Lord High Chancellor should be held by any person not being a member of the Church of England, then his right of presentation should pass.”

We propose to leave out “not being a member of the Church of England,” and substitute “professing the Roman Catholic religion.” That would leave all Nonconformists, and others who at present have this right, untouched. We would also strike out the words “being a member of the Church of England,” which occur later in the clause.

(5.30.) The House divided:—Ayes 224; Noes 256.—(Div. List, No. 34.)

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

MOTIONS.

VOLUNTEER ACT (1863) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Boord, Bill to amend “The Volunteer Act, 1863,” ordered to be brought in by Mr. Boord, Colonel Laurie, Mr. Howard Vincent, and Mr. Gourley.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 186.]

FALSE MARKING BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Howard Vincent, Bill to check the false Marking of worthless goods by the use of “blind” or fictitious names, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Howard Vincent, Mr. Frank Hardcastle, Mr. Jasper More, and Mr. Blaine.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 187.]

FACTORIES, CERTIFICATES OF BIRTH (FEES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. David Randell, Bill to reduce the Fees payable in respect of Certificates of Birth of young persons employed in Factories, ordered to be brought in by Mr.

David Randell, Mr. Burt, Mr. James Maclean, Mr. William Abraham (Rhondda), Mr. Kenyon, and Mr. Samuel Evans.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 188.]

FIRST OFFENDERS.

Address for—

“Return of the number of cases within the Metropolitan Police District, the West Riding of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Staffordshire, Warwickshire, and Durham, in which persons convicted of first offences have, by reason of their youth or the trivial nature of the offence, been released under recognizances on probation of good conduct in the years 1888, 1889, and 1890, under ‘The Probation of First Offenders Act, 1887;’”

“And, of the number of cases in which such persons have been called upon to appear and receive judgment, or are known to have been subsequently convicted of a fresh offence.”
—(Mr. Howard Vincent.)

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Ordered, That the Committee on Public Accounts do consist of 12 Members.

Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth, Mr. Barran, Sir Walter Barttelot, Mr. Sydney Buxton, Mr. Crawford, Mr. Jackson, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Salt, Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Webb, and Mr. Wodehouse nominated Members of the Committee.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.—(Mr. Jackson.)

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Second Report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion for Adjournment,

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Perhaps the House will allow me to refer to the arrangements for Public Business. I made a promise that if the Tithe Bill passed through all its stages this week I would give the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne the first place on Monday for his Motion with respect to Irish affairs. The Tithe Bill is down for Report to-morrow, and it is therefore necessary, if its stages are to be concluded this week, that it should also be read a third time on Friday. If, therefore, I ask for a Morning Sitting on Friday, I hope the proposal will be acceptable to right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I think it will be the most convenient course.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to give notice that if the right hon. Gentleman makes a Motion for a Morning Sitting on Friday I shall oppose it.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for fulfilling his engagement with regard to Monday. I would remind him that he promised two nights for the discussion of the Motion. May I take this opportunity of asking that the Government will give full notice of their intention to proceed with the Indian Councils Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will endeavour to do so; communications are, I believe, passing between my hon. Friend and hon. Gentlemen opposite. I trust we may have the assistance of right hon. Gentlemen opposite in our endeavour to keep the engagement for Monday; but if we are driven over to Monday for the Tithes Bill, then I cannot offer the right hon. Gentleman that day.

MR. J. MORLEY: Supposing that catastrophe should happen, would the right hon. Gentleman be content to give me first place on Thursday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That, of course, would be the only course open to me.

But I think it will be more convenient to adhere to the arrangement made, and that it will be seen I have not made an unreasonable proposal.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): With reference to the Irish Bills, will the right hon. Gentleman say in what order it is proposed to take them?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Money Resolution will be proposed first, and then the Land Purchase Bill will be proceeded with from day to day.

POLISH POLITICAL PRISONERS.

*SIR J. POPE HENNESSY (Kilkenny, N.): May I ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether the Government have any information with respect to the treatment of political prisoners in Poland, as referred to in the Times of to-day?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): We have received no information on the matter referred to in that article.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

[INDEX.]

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

VOLUME CCCXLIX.

FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1890-91.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

Bills, Read 1^o, 2^o, 3^o, or 1^a, 2^a, 3^a, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches. 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Adj., Adjournment.—Admy., Admiralty.—Amendt., Amendmont.—A., Answer.—As., Answers.—Att. Gen., Attorney General.—Ch. of Exch., Chancellor of the Exchequer.—Chf. Sec., Chief Secretary.—Cols., Colonies.—c., Commons.—Com., Committee, Committed.—Con., Considered, Consideration.—Dept., Department.—Fin. Sec., Financial Secretary.—Fn. Affrs., Foreign Affairs.—l., Lords.—Ld. Adv., Lord Advocate.—Obs., Observations.—P.M. Gen., Postmaster General.—Pres., President.—Pres. Bd. Ag., President of the Board of Agriculture.—Pres. Bd. Trade, President of the Board of Trade.—Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd., President of the Local Government Board.—Q., Question.—Qs., Questions.—R.P., Report Progress.—Re-com., Re-committed, Re-committal, Re-commitment.—Res., Resolution.—Sec., Secretary.—Sol. Gen., Solicitor General.—Treas., Treasury.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

The subjects of Debate, as far as possible, are classified under "General Headings:"—e.g., ARMY—NAVY—INDIA—IRELAND—SCOTLAND—WALES—PARLIAMENT—POOR LAW—POST OFFICE—METROPOLIS—CHURCH OF ENGLAND—EDUCATION—LAW AND JUSTICE AND POLICE—LABOUR, TRADE, AND COMMERCE—LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—BOARD OF AGRICULTURE—BOARD OF TRADE.

A BRAHAM, Mr. W., Glamorgan, Rhondda

Mines, Secretary for, Rcs. 1188
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 322;
Com. 1108, 1307, 1571, 1572, 1593

Access to Mountains (Scotland) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 27, 156

Accumulations Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 27, 156

ACLAND, Mr. C. T. D., Cornwall, Launceston
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1354

ADMIRALTY—(see NAVY)

ADMIRALTY—First Lord (see HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord G. F.)

VOL. CCCXLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

ADMIRALTY—Civil Lord (see ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, Mr. E.)

ADMIRALTY—Secretary to (see FORWOOD, Mr. A. B.)

ADVOCATE, The Lord (see ROBERTSON, Right Hon. J. P. B.)

AFRICA

Anti-Slavery Conference (see BRUSSELS)
Portuguese and English in Africa—Mozambique Company, South Africa Company, &c., Q. Mr. Bryce; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Dec 5, 653; Q., Obs. Earl Granville, The Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Dec 8, 685; Qs. Mr. Bryce, Mr. Buchanan; As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Dec 9, 760; Qs. Mr. Bryce, Dr. Clark; As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Jan 23, 897; Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs.

AFRICA—cont.

Jan 26, 1028; Qs. Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Conybeare, Sir G. Campbell; As. The Under Sec. for Cols., Mr. Speaker Jan 27, 1141; Qs. Mr. Conybeare, Mr. Labouchere; As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Jan 29, 1283

AFRICA (CENTRAL)

Emin Pasha Relief Expedition, Charges Against the Members of, Q. Mr. Cremer; A. The First Lord of Treas. Nov 25, 37; Qs. Mr. Labouchere, Mr. C. Graham; As. The Att. Gen. Dec 5, 661

AFRICA (EAST COAST)

Mozambique Company (see AFRICA—Portuguese, &c.)

Slave Trade and Portugal, Q. Mr. A. M'Arthur; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Dec 1, 234

Vitu, Sultan of, Qs. Mr. S. Buxton; As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Nov 27, 128; Dec 5, 651

AFRICA (SOUTH COAST)

South Africa Company (see AFRICA—Portuguese, &c.)

AFRICA (SOUTH EAST)

Affray in Mutaca's Country (see AFRICA—Portuguese, &c.)

AFRICA (WEST COAST)

Crozet Islands and Her Majesty's Vessels, Q. Mr. Leng; A. The First Lord of Admy. Dec 8, 697

Gold Coast—Akoto Mamley, Q. Mr. Picton; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Dec 1, 235

King Ja Ja of Opobo, Qs. Mr. Picton, Sir W. Foster; As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Dec 2, 342; Qs. Sir W. Foster, Mr. Picton, Mr. W. Redmond; As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Dec 5, 643

Oil River Districts, Administration of, Q. Mr. Picton; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Dec 2, 343

Slave Trade, Q. Mr. Picton; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Dec 1, 234

Agricultural Department (see Board of Agriculture)

Agricultural Holdings Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 113

Agricultural Tenants' Improvements Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Jan 23, 903

Alien Act

(See Emigration)

Allotments

Labourers' Allotments, Qs. Sir W. Foster; As. The First Lord of Treas. Jan 23, 901; Feb 3, 1624

Allotments Bill

Q. Mr. Cobb; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Jan 27, 1145

ALLSOPP, Hon. G. H., Worcester

County Councils and Pleasure Boats on the Severn, 126

AMBROSE, Mr. W., Middlesex, Harrow

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1095, 1098, 1324, 1586

AMERICA (SOUTH)

Chili—Revolution, Q. Mr. Duncan; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Jan 30, 1392

AMERICA (UNITED STATES)

Behring Sea Fisheries, Q. Mr. Bryce; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Jan 23, 898; Q. Mr. Gourley; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Jan 26, 1019; Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 3, 1623

Cattle, Carriage of, Q. Mr. C. Wilson; A. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Jan 27, 1145

Scotch and American Mails, Q. Mr. Leng; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 29, 1291

Washington—International Maritime Conference, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Jan 29, 1287

Anglo-Portuguese Convention (see PORTUGAL)

Anti-Slavery Conference (see BRUSSELS)

Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill

l. Presented; Read 1° * Nov 25, 32

Read 2° and com. to Com. of the whole House Dec 2, 335

Com. *; Reported Dec 8, 687

Read 3° * and passed Dec 9, 745

c. Read 1° * Jan 29, 1381

Architects' Registration Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Dec 9, 768

ARDILAUN, Lord

Parliament—Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 11

ARMENIA

Papers Relating to, Qs. Mr. Bryce, Mr. F. S. Stevenson; As. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Nov 27, 128; Q. Mr. Leveson-Gower; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Jan 26, 1021

ARMY

Barracks

Cavalry Barracks at Windsor, Q. Sir S. Wilson; A. The Sec. for War Dec 9, 750

Wellington

Crimean Guardsmen, Q. Mr. Baird; A. The Sec. for War Dec 2, 347
Married Men's Quarters, Q. Mr. Bartley; A. The Sec. for War Dec 2, 347

Woolwich, Theatrical Entertainments at, Q. Mr. Pickersgill; A. The Fin. Sec. for War Jan 29, 1286

Ceylon—Military Expedition, Q. Sir R. Lethbridge; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Dec 2, 346

India

Colonel's Allowances, Q. Mr. King; A. The Under Sec. for India Feb 3, 1615
Military Stores, Q. Mr. Bradlaugh; A. The Under Sec. for India Dec 6, 642; Q. Mr. Bradlaugh; A. The First Lord of Treas. Dec 8, 695

Ireland — Donegal Militia, Q. Mr. A. O'Connor; A. The Fin. Sec. for War Feb 3, 1629

Medical Department—Proposed Changes, Q. Dr. Farquharson; A. The Sec. for War Dec 8, 700

Miscellaneous

Battery and Earthworks near Sunderland, Q. Mr. Gourley; A. The Sec. for War Jan 27, 1148

Inchkeith Island, Purchase of, &c., Q. Sir D. Currie; A. The Sec. for War Nov 28, 165

Tower of London Wharf, Q. Mr. Montagu; A. The Fin. Sec. for War Feb 3, 1618

Wall Marsh, Sheerness, Q. Mr. H. Knatchbull-Hugessen; A. The Fin. Sec. for War Feb 3, 1620

Officers

Colonels, Senior, Qs. General Fraser; As. The Sec. for War Nov 27, 125; Dec 4, 534
"Mitchell v. Regina," Q. Mr. C. Graham; A. The Sec. for War Nov 28, 164; Qs. Mr. C. Graham; As. The Home Sec., The First Lord of Treas. Dec 4, 529; Q. Mr. C. Graham; A. The Att. Gen. Dec 9, 761

Royal Engineers—Petition to the Queen, Q. Mr. C. Graham; A. The Home Sec. Dec 4, 527

Ordnance and Manufacturing Departments

Magazine Rifles, Qs. Mr. Hanbury, Colonel Nolan, Sir W. Barttelot; As. The Sec. for War, The First Lord of Admy. Dec 4, 517; Q. Mr. Woodall; A. The Sec. for War Dec 5, 648; Qs. Mr. Marjoribanks; As. The Fin. Sec. for War Jan 26, 1022; Jan 27, 1151; Q. Major Rasch; A. The Fin. Sec. for War Jan 30, 1395; Q. Mr. D. Thomas; A. The Fin. Sec. for War Feb 3, 1624; Motion Feb 3, 1631

Woolwich Arsenal—Private Contractors and Discharged Workmen, Qs. Mr. C. Graham; As. The Sec. for War Dec 5, 649; Dec 9, 749

ARMY—cont.

Pensions and Superannuations

Higham, J., Case of, Q. Mr. Lawson; A. The Fin. Sec. for War Feb 2, 1518
Royal Warrants, Q. Mr. C. Graham; A. The Sec. for War Dec 9, 749

Army Rifles

Address for Return Jan 23, 903

Artificial Manures, &c. (Adulteration) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 26, 115

ASHER, Mr. A., Elgin, &c.

Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1207

ASQUITH, Mr. H. H., Fife, E.

Religious Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 1774

ATHERLEY-JONES, Mr. L., Durham, N.W.

Eviction of Miners, 1147

ATKINSON, Mr. H. J., Boston

Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 725
Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 435
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 301

ATTORNEY GENERAL (see WEBSTER, Sir R. E.)

ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (see MADDEN, Right Hon. D. H.)

Australasia Federal Council (see PACIFIC ISLANDS)

AUSTRALIAN COLONIES

Queensland

Separate Colonies, Q. Mr. H. Heaton; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Dec 9, 752
South Sea Islands Labourers, Q. Mr. S. Smith; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Dec 5, 647

AUSTRIA

Zone Fares on Railways, Q. Mr. B. Maple; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Dec 1, 236

BADEN-POWELL, Sir G., Liverpool, Kirkdale

Behring Sea Fisheries, 1623
International Maritime Conference at Washington, 1287
Portugal and East Africa, 1028
Post Office—Central Post Office Accommodation, 693
Railways—Automatic Electric Signalling, 646
Trade and Treaties Committee Reports, 1146

BAIRD, Mr. J. G. A., Glasgow, Central Crimean Veterans at Wellington Barracks, 347
 Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 963

BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH, Lord (Secretary to the Board of Trade)
 Railway Accident at Wortley, Res. 1010

BALFOUR, Right Hon. A. J. (Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland), Manchester, E.

Ireland

Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act (1887) — Tipperary Prosecutions, 691

Distress—Failure of Potato Crop—Relief Works, &c., 133, 704, 708, 759, 763, 1294, 1296, 1398, 1399, 1403

Drainage Board, 131

Education—National Education Board—Vacancy, &c., 134, 764

Land Acts and Land Commission

Advances Under Land Acts, 227

Ashbourne Acts, Purchases Under, 162

Judicial Rents, 708

Land Purchase Acts Returns, 131

Land Purchase—Unappropriated Money, 349

Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1469, 1484, 1488, 1489, 1491, 1493, 1496, 1497

Law and Justice and Police

Coroner for Tipperary, 166

"Heffernan v. Carter and Tuohy," 134

Police

Constables Waters and O'Shea, 1293

Constabulary Force Fund, 1297

Miscellaneous

Census Returns, 1403

Church Surplus, 1297

Clare Slob Lands, 734

Irish Private Bill Legislation, 165

Land Bills, 228

Railways (see sub-heading Distress—Relief Works)

Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 710, 711, 712, 713, 738

Parliament

Adjournment — Christmas Recess, Res. 778, 779

Tea Room—Map of Proposed New Railways in Ireland, 704

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 1R. 137, 147; 2R. 360, 372, 378, 386, 402, 403, 424, 425, 431

Notice of Motion, 36

Sinking Fund, 705

Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1217

Seed Potatoes Supply (Ireland) Bill, Com. 677, 678

Supply—Ireland—Supplementary Relief of Distress, 543, 554, 562, 563, 570, 574, 575, 576, 582, 589, 592, 594, 595, 596; Report, 680

BALFOUR, Right Hon. A. J.—cont.

Tramways Order in Council (Ireland) (Athenry and Tuam Railway) Bill, 2R. 770

Transfer of Railways (Ireland) Bill, 1R. 154; 2R. 452

Bankruptcy (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 27, 156

BARCLAY, Mr. J. W., Forfarshire

Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1214

BARTLEY, Mr. G. C. T., Islington, N.

Army—Wellington Barracks—Married Men's Quarters, 347

Industrial Profit Sharing, 1023

Parliament—Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 86

South Kensington Museum, Plans for the Completion of, 1152

BARTHELOT, Colonel Sir W. B., Sussex, N. W.

Army—Magazine Rifles, 518; Res. 1673, 1675

Parliament—Mr. Bradlaugh and the Parliamentary Oath, Res. 1175

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 267; Com. 1337

BAUMANN, Mr. A. A., Camberwell, Peckham

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 578

Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1516

BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. E. Hicks (President of the Board of Trade), Bristol, W.

Alien Act, 1145

Board of Trade

Foreign Fruit, 161

Merchandise Marks Act, 161, 699, 1147

Merchandise Marks Committee, 347

Trade and Treaties Committee Reports, 1146.

Weighing Machines, Stamping of, 758

Electric Lighting in London, 748

Emigration and Immigration — Destitute

Immigrants—Polish Jews, 122

Industrial Profit Sharing, 1023

Ireland—Fisheries—"Harold," Wreck of, 539

Labour Bureau, 124

Merchant Shipping

Life-Saving Appliances, 658

New Load Line Law, 652

Merchant Shipping Act, 692

Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 1200

Parliament—Business of the House, 1384

Railways

Automatic Electric Signalling, 646

Eastleigh, Accident near, 118

Fares—Printing on Tickets, 531

[cont.

[cont.

BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. E. H.—cont.

Rates, 531, 1029

Return Tickets, 1397

Scotch Strike, 891, 903, 1287

Servants—Hours of Labour, 525, 526, 656, 790, 896, 1023; Res. 985, 993, 1000, 1007; Select Com., Res. 1716, 1718

Taunton Accident, 164

Railway Companies Return Tickets Bill, 2R. 1199

Tithes

Goods Liable to Distraints, 1524

Royal Commission, 537, 1029, 1396

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 1288;

Notice of Motion, 36; 1R. 136; 2R. 241,

258, 265; Order for Com. 619; Com. 1031,

1032, 1038, 1039, 1042, 1043, 1045 1047,

1048, 1049, 1052, 1057, 1060, 1066, 1067,

1068, 1069, 1070, 1073, 1075, 1077, 1078,

1079, 1080, 1086, 1088, 1089, 1091, 1092,

1100, 1300, 1311, 1313, 1315, 1323, 1324,

1328, 1329, 1330, 1331, 1340, 1365, 1367,

1376, 1378, 1534, 1535, 1537, 1539, 1540,

1545, 1548, 1550, 1551, 1557, 1560, 1561,

1563, 1564, 1578, 1579, 1588, 1601, 1602,

1604, 1608, 1609, 1610, 1732

BEADEL, Mr. W. J., Essex, Chelmsford

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 262; Com. 1360

Beer Adulteration Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 111

Beer Adulteration (No. 2) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 27, 156

Behring Sea Fisheries (see AMERICA)

BELMORE, Earl of

Ireland—Ordnance Survey, 1269

BENTINCK, Right Hon. G. A. C., Whitehaven

Charity Commissioners — St. George's Church, Botolph Lane, 657

BETHELL, Captain G. R., York, E.R., Holderness

Army—Magazine Rifles, Res. 1679

BIRRELL, Mr. A., Fife, W.

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 975

Blind and Deaf Mute Children (Education) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 5, 667

BLUNDELL, Colonel H. B. H., Lancashire, S.W., Ince

Army—Magazine Rifles, Res. 1679
Mines, Secretary for, Res. 1188

BOARD OF AGRICULTURE—President (see CHAPLIN, Right Hon. H.)

Board of Agriculture

Agricultural Education, Qs. Mr. Cobb, Mr. Gardner; As. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Dec 2, 341

Agricultural Labourers and the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Act, Q. Colonel Hambro; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 2, 1524

Cattle, Importation of, Qs. Mr. Gray, Mr. Leng; As. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Dec 1, 236; Q. Mr. C. Wilson; A. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Jan 27, 1145

Contagious Diseases—Cattle, Q. Mr. C. Darling; A. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Dec 2, 342; Q., Obs. Marquess of Huntly, The Ld. Privy Seal, Feb 2, 1502

Muzzling Order, Q. Mr. Dixon-Hartland; A. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Dec 5, 652

Tubercular Diseases—Professor Koch's Cure, Q. Sir W. Foster; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Dec 2, 349; Q. Mr. C. Spencer; A. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Dec 9, 761; Qs. Colonel Nolan, Dr. Tanner; As. The First Lord of Treas. Jan 29, 1289

BOARD OF TRADE—President (see BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. E. HICKS)

BOARD OF TRADE—Secretary (see BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH, Lord)

Board of Trade

Cattle (see title Board of Agriculture)

Electric Lighting in London, Q. Mr. R. Chamberlain; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 9, 747

International Maritime Conference at Washington, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Jan 29, 1287

Lighthouses

Illuminants (South Foreland Experiments), Return ordered and presented Nov 25, 36

Tory Island—Telegraphic Communication, Q. Sir E. Watkin; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 23, 893

Merchandise Marks Act

Foreign Fruit, Q. Mr. H. T. Knatchbull-Hugessen; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Nov 28, 161

Prosecutions, Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 27, 1147

Select Committee, Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 2, 346; Q. Sir R. Lethbridge; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 8, 699

Merchant Shipping

Life-Saving Appliances, Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 5, 657

Merchant Shipping Act—Provision for Disabled Seamen, Q. Mr. Leng; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 8, 692

New Load Line Law, Q. Mr. Gourley; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 5, 651

Ships—"Harold," Wreck of, Q. Mr. M'Cartan; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 4, 538

[cont.]

Board of Trade—cont.Miscellaneous

Commercial Treaties (see title Labour, Trade and Commerce)

Industrial Profit Sharing (see title Labour, Trade and Commerce)

Weighing Machines, Stamping of, Q. Mr. Causton; A. The First Lord of Treas. Dec 8, 708; Q. Mr. Causton; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 9, 758

Railways

Automatic Electric Signalling, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 5, 646

Eastleigh, Accident near, Q. Mr. Provand; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Nov 27, 118

Fares—Printing on Tickets, Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 4, 531

Midland Railway Act, 1890, Evictions Under, Q. Mr. T. H. Bolton; A. The Home Sec. Jan 23, 890

Rates, Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 4, 531; Q. Mr. Cobb; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 26, 1029

Regulation of Railways, Res. Jan 27, 1176

Return Tickets, Q. Mr. Morton; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 30, 1396

Scotch Strike (see title SCOTLAND)

Servants—Working Hours, Q. Mr. Philipps; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 4, 525; Qs. Mr. Provand, Mr. C. Graham; As. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 5, 656; Qs. Mr. Leng, Mr. Buchanan; As. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 22, 793; Q. Mr. Provand; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 23, 895; Qs. Mr. Channing, Sir W. Harcourt; As. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 26, 1023; Motion on going into Com. of Supply Jan 23, 904; Motion for a Select Com. Feb 3, 1715

Single Letters by Railway, Q. Mr. T. H. Bolton; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 23, 891

Taunton Accident, Q. Mr. C. Graham; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Nov 28, 164

Telegraphic Messages, Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 29, 1279

Wortley Accident, Motion for Report [Lords] Jan 26, 1009

Boilers Registration Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 26, 105

BOLTON, Mr. T. H., St. Pancras, N.

Naval Prison at Lewes, 1391

Railways—Midland Railway Act, 1890, Evictions Under, 890

Single Letters by Railway, 891

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 315; Order for Com. 606; Com. 1043, 1047, 1055, 1064, 1072, 1081, 1082, 1093, 1094, 1324, 1359, 1546, 1599, 1601

BULNOIS, Mr. E., Marylebone, E.

Post Office—Registered Addresses, 229

BOWLES, Captain H. F., Middlesex, En-

field Army—Magazine Rifles, Res. 1677

BRABOURNE, Lord

Parliament—Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 30

BRADLAUGH, Mr. C., Northampton

Customs—Statistical Abstracting Department, 754

Education—School Board Attendance in London, 159

Factories, Bow—Insanitary Condition of, 160

India

Burma State Railway—Employés, 226

Military Stores, 642, 695

Punishments, Unequal, 225

Labour Bureau, 123

Law and Justice

Hardwick, Catherine, 343, 702

Hargan, Walter, Res. 683

Northampton Meeting—Prohibition, 315

Navy—Charts and Surveys—Forth of Clyde, 160, 642

Parliament

Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh), Res. 1158

Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 73, 74, 75, 80

Time of the House, 349

Pensions, Perpetual, Res. 185, 186, 194, 196, 197, 202, 208

Post Office

Postal and Telegraph Service, 754

Savings Bank Clerks, 229

Registration of Deaths, 123

Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 569, 570

Breach of Promise of Marriage Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 26, 107

Brine Pumping (Compensation for Subsidence) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 27, 155

British and Foreign Spirits

Select Com. appointed Jan 29, 1380

Minutes of Evidence ordered Feb 4, 1733

British Museum (see Literature, Science, and Art)BROADHURST, Mr. H., *Nottingham, W.

Parliament—Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 90

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Select Com., Res. 1720

BRODRICK, Hon. W. St. J. F. (Financial Secretary, War Department), *Surrey, GuildfordArmy

Barracks, Woolwich—Theatrical Entertainments at, 1286

Ireland—Donegal Militia, 1630

Ordnance and Manufacturing Departments—Magazine Rifles, 1023, 1395; Res. 1624, 1649

[cont.]

BRODRICK, Hon. W. St. J. F.—cont.

Pensions—Higham, J., Case of, 1518
Tower of London Wharf, 1618
Wall Marsh, Sheerness, 1621

BROOKFIELD, Mr. A. M., Sussex, Rye
Police—Public Assisting, 520

BRUCE, Mr. G., Finsbury, Holborn
Conspiracy Law Amendment Bill, 2R. 1237,
1239

BRUNNER, Mr. J. T., Cheshire, Northwich
Parliament—House of Commons Tea Room
Table, 120, 524
Post Office—Mails, 119, 660
Public Roads—Barbed Wires, 345
Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Select
Com., Res. 1725

BRUSSELS

Anti-Slavery Conference, Qs. Mr. S. Buxton,
Mr. Buchanan; As. The Under Sec. for
Fn. Affs. Nov 27, 127; Q. Mr. S. Buxton; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affs.
Dec 5, 651

BRYCE, Mr. J., Aberdeen, S.

Africa — Mutaca's Country —Disturbances,
653, 760, 897
Armenia, Papers Relating to, 128
Behring Sea Fisheries, 898, 899
City of London Parochial Charities Act,
1883 (Central Scheme), Res. 1020, 1021,
1030
County Councils and Education, 533
Indian Councils Bill, 2R. 1611
Indian Councils (No. 2) Bill, 1616
Parliament—Business of the House, 536
Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R.
841
Scotland—Higher Education, Res. 1710

BUCHANAN, Mr. T. R., Edinburgh, W.

Africa—Mutaca's Country, Affray in, 760
Anglo-Portuguese Agreement, 163
Brussels Conference, 128
Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland)
Act, 758
Railways
Scotch Strike, 1287
Servants—Hours of Labour, 791; Res.
923
Town Holdings Committee, 1154

Building Feus and Leases (Scotland)
Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 111

Building Lands (Scotland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 27, 156

Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill

Q. Mr. Esslemont; A. The Ld. Adv. Dec 5,
655; Q. Mr. Watt; A. The Ld. Adv.
Jan 29, 1276

Burial Acts (England and Wales)

Llanaher—Alleged Burial Scandal, Qs. Mr.
G. O. Morgan, Mr. Lloyd-George; As.
The Home Sec. Jan 29, 1281

Burials Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 107

BURMA (see INDIA)

BURT, Mr. T., Morpeth

Mines
Deduction from Earnings—W. Armstrong,
664
Explosives Act, 1275
Secretary for Mines, Res. 1188

BUXTON, Mr. S. C., Tower Hamlets, Poplar

Africa—Sultan of Vitu, 128, 651
Brussels Conference, 127, 651
Education
As-isted Education Bill, 892
Higher Education (Scotland), Res. 1703
Government Contracts—Birmingham Post
Office, 650, 701
Parliament—Adjournment—Christmas Re-
cess, Res. 780

CADOGAN, Earl (Lord Privy Seal)

Parliament—Standing Committees, Standing
Orders Relating to, Select Com., Res.
1129; Report, 1613
Pleuro-Pneumonia Order, 1503
Seed Potatoes Supply (Ireland) Bill, 1R.
689

CALDWELL, Mr. J., Glasgow, St. Rollox

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R.
884 Scotland — Education — Ardochattan and Muckairn School Board, 1018, 1522

CAMERON, Dr. C., Glasgow, College

Ireland—Ether Drinking, 230
Parliament—Adjournment—Christmas Re-
cess, Res. 773
Post Office—Telephones, 695

CAMPBELL, Mr. J. A., Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities

Scotland—Higher Education, Res. 1689

CAMPBELL, Sir A., Renfrew, W.

Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1222

CAMPBELL, Sir G., Kirkcaldy, &c.

Africa—South Africa Company, 1143
India—Dum Dum Murder Case, 1272
Natural History Museum—Electric Lighting,
652, 746
Parliament—Adjournment—Christmas Recess, Res. 775, 783

[cont.]

CAMPBELL, Sir G.—cont.

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, Order for Com. 667, 675, 676

Scotland—Higher Education, Res. 1713

Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 582

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1372

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN; Right Hon. H., Stirling, &c.

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 801, 861, 886

Religious Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 1796

Canal Development Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 107

Cargoes on Sundays in Foreign Ports

Address for Return Feb 3, 1614

Cathedral Churches Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 108

CAUSTON, Mr. R. K., Southwark, W.

Metropolitan Water Supply, 1626

Weighing Machines, Stamping of, 708, 758

CEYLON

Military Expenditure, Q. Sir R. Lethbridge;

A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Dec 2, 346

CHAMBERLAIN, Right Hon. J., Birmingham, W.

Law and Justice—Hargan, Walter, Res. 684

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 866

Scotland—Crofters Districts—Public Works, 762

CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. R., Islington, W.

Electric Lighting in London, 747

CHANNING, Mr. F. A., Northampton, E.

Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 740, 741

Parliament—Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 94, 97

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 454; Order for Com. 674

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, 1023; Res. 904, 922, 934, 943, 944, 993, 1718

CHAPLIN, Right Hon. H. (President of the Board of Agriculture), Lincolnshire, Sleaford

Board of Agriculture

Agricultural Education, 341

Cattle, Foreign, Importation of, 236, 1146

Dutch Cattle, 342

Muzzling Order, 653

Tubercular Diseases—Professor Koch's Cure, 761

Charitable Endowments (Denbighshire)

Return ordered Dec 8, 709

Charitable Trusts Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 28, 184

Charity Commissioners

Christ's Hospital, Q. Mr. Mundella; A. Mr. J.

W. Lowther Dec 9, 761

City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883 (Central Scheme), Res. Jan 26, 1111

City Parochial Charities, Q. Sir R. Fowler; A. The Vice Pres. Dec 9, 746; Q. Mr. Bryce; A. The First Lord of Treas. Jan 26, 1030

Elementary Education (Schemes of Charity Commissioners), Return ordered Jan 29, 1271

Lambeth Charities, Q. Mr. Morton; A. Mr. J. W. Lowther Jan 29, 1287

St. George's Church, Batolph Lane, Q. Mr. C. Bentinck; A. Mr. J. W. Lowther Dec 5, 657

Cheap Trains (London) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 110

Children's Life Insurance Bill

l. Presented; Read 1^o * Dec 8, 686

Read 2^a and com. to Select Com. Jan 22, 786

Select Com. nominated Jan 23, 889

CHILI (see AMERICA (SOUTH))

CHINA

Opium Traffic with India, Q. Mr. S. Smith;

A. The Under Sec. for India Nov 28, 158

Piracy in the Chinese Seas, Q. Mr. A. E. Hardy; A. The Under Sec. for Fo. Affrs.

Feb 2, 1520

Church Building Acts (Compulsory Powers Repeal) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 28, 184

Church of England

Chapel Royal, Whitehall, Qs. Mr. James, Mr. Mundella; As. The First Com. of

Works Jan 29, 1276

Revenues—Return, Q. Mr. Picton; A. The Home Sec. Dec 1, 230

Civil Contingencies Fund, 1889-90

Return ordered and presented Jan 22, 792

Civil Service

Clerks, Q. Mr. Cobb; A. The Sec. to Treas. Dec 4, 528; Qs. Mr. J. Kelly; As. The First

Lord of Treas. Jan 27, 1153; Feb 3, 1627

Orders in Council, Q. Mr. J. Kelly; A. The Sec. to Treas. Dec 9, 752; Q. Mr. Pickers-gill; A. The Sec. to Treas. Jan 22, 788

Savings Bank Clerks (see title POST OFFICE)

Writers—Statistical Abstracting Department,

Q. Mr. Pickersgill; A. The Sec. to Treas. Jan 27, 1149

CLANCY, Mr. J. J., Dublin Co., N.
Ireland—National Education Board, 764

CLARK, Dr. G. B., Caithness
India—Dum Dum Murder Case, 1272
Parliament - Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 100
Pensions, Perpetual, Res. 206, 208
Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 627, 853
Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 436
Railway Companies—Return Tickets, 2R. 1198
Scotland
Crofter Commission, 656
Highlands and Islands Commission, 1289
Transfer of Railways (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 452; Com. 625

CLARKE, Sir E. G. (Solicitor General), Plymouth
Conspiracy Law Amendment Bill, 2R. 1260, 1262
Corrupt Practices Act, 1026
Parliament—Mr. Bradlaugh and the Parliamentary Oath, Res. 1160

Coal Mines Act (see title Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

Coal Mines Regulation Act (1887) Amendment Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nor 26, 112

COBB, Mr. H. P., Warwick, S.E., Rugby
Agricultural Education, 341
Allotments Bill, 1145
Civil Service—Clerks' Promotion, 528
District Councils Bill, 1290
Education Grant—Return, 1145
Law and Justice
Corrupt Practices Act, 901
Inquests—The Late Duke of Bedford, 789, 893, 1024, 1518
Parliament—Business of the House, 1527
Railway Rates, 1029
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Order for Com. 603

Coinage (see Currency)

COLLINGS, Mr. J., Birmingham, Bordesley
Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 497, 498

COLOMB, Sir J. C. R., Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.
Ireland
Distress—Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act—Administration, Res. 1730
Land Tenure (Arbitration), R s. 1475, 1478

COLOMB, Sir J. C. R.—cont.

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 464, 469
Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 567

COLONIES—Secretary of State (see KNUTSFORD, Lord)

COLONIES—Under Secretary of State (see DE WORMS, Right Hon. Baron H.)

COLONIES

Australasian Federal Council, Q. Sir T. Esmonde; A. The Under Sec. for Co's. Feb 3, 1621
Colonial Securities—Trust Funds Investments, Q. Mr. P. McDonald; A. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 9, 750
Self-Governing Colonies—Treaties of Commerce, &c., Q. Sir R. Lethbridge; A. The Under Sec. for Co's. Dec 2, 346; Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Under Sec. for Co's. Jan 26, 1020; Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Jan 26, 1020; Qs. Mr. O. V. Morgan, Mr. H. Vincent; As. The First Lord of Treas. Jan 26, 1027; Q. Mr. J. Lowther; A. The Under Sec. for Co's. Feb 3, 1622

Colonisation

Select Com. ordered and nominated; Papers, &c., ordered Jan 26, 1128
Minutes of Evidence ordered to be referred to Com. Feb 8, 1615

COLVILLE OF CULROSS, Lord

Railway Accident at Wortley, Res. 1011, 1012

COMMINS, Dr. A., Roscommon, S.
Supply—Ireland—Distress, 681

COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION—Lord President (see CRANBROOK, Viscount)

COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION—Vice President (see DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W. H.)

Companies Act (1862) Amendment Bill

c. Ordered* Nor 26, 112
Read 1^o * Dec 4, 542

COMPTON, Earl, York, W.R., Barnsley
Post Office—Provincial Officials, 124

Conspiracy Law Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nor 26, 103
2R. put off for six months Jan 28, 1223

Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act (see Board of Agriculture)

Conveyancing and Law of Property Act (1881) Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 101

CONWAY, Mr. M., Leitrim, N.

Ireland

National Teachers—Widows' and Orphans' Fund, 1531

Post Office, Dublin, 1531

CONYBEARE, Mr. C. A. V., Cornwall, Camborne

Africa

British and South Africa Company and the Portuguese, 1143, 1283

India

Bombay Salt Act, 1272

Dum Dum Murder Case, 1271

Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 742

Mines, Secretary for, Res. 1182

Post Office Officials, Res. 220, 221

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Select Com., Res. 1726

Solicitors' Magistracy Bill, 2R. 623

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1610, 1731, 1732

COOKE, Mr. C. W. R., Newington, W.

Parliament

Communication with Libraries and Smoking Rooms, 526

Royal Standard, 526

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 1288; Com. 1559, 1560

Copyright Bill

l. Presented; Read 1^o * Nov 25, 32

Corn Averages

Return ordered and presented Feb 3, 1615

Corn Sales Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 23, 184

Corporal Punishment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 4, 629

Corporate Associations' Property Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 2, 350

Corrupt Practices Act (see Law, Justice, and Police)

County Cess (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 108

County Councils (see Local Government Board)

County Councils (Contracts) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 113

Court of Exchequer (Ireland) (Lord Chief Baron's Observations on Application for Habeas Corpus)

Return ordered Dec 9, 767

COURTNEY, Right Hon. L. H. (Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means and Deputy Speaker), Cornwall, Bodmin

(Rulings as Chairman of Committees and Deputy Speaker)

Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 711, 724, 725, 730, 740

Land Purchase in Ireland, 663

Law and Justice—Hargan, Walter, Res. 684

Parliament—Queen's Speech, 39, 97

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 353, 435, 516; Order for Com. 667, 670, 674, 676

Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 594

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Order for Com. 451, 452, 599; Com. 1031, 1069, 1081, 1082, 1299, 1325, 1375, 1539, 1555, 1572, 1576, 1603, 1605, 1606, 1732

Transfer of Railways (Ireland) Bill, Com. 626; Lords' Amendt. 743

COX, Mr. J. R., Clare, E.

Ireland

Clare Slob Lands, 537, 704

Distress—Relief Works, 576, 577, 704, 1293, 1399

Drainage

Drainage Boards, 131

River Scarriff, 540

Evictions, Priests at, 1015

Land Commission—Decisions of Sub-Commissioners, 541

Post Office—Ennis, 1298

Railways—Ennis and Scarriff, 538

Parliament—Adjournment—Christmas Recess, Res. 771

CRAIG, Mr. J., Newcastle-upon-Tyne

Solicitors' Magistracy Bill, 2R. 888, 1008

CRANBORNE, Viscount, Lancashire, N.E., Darwen

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 622, 1074, 1342

CRANBROOK, Viscount (Lord President of the Council)

Education Code, 686

CRAWFORD, Mr. D., Lanark, N.E.

Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 723

Parliament—Adjournment—Christmas Recess, Res. 774

Parliamentary Oath (Mr. Bradlaugh), Res. 1160

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 930

[cont.]

CRAWFORD, Mr. D.—cont.

Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1212

Scotland

Higher Education, Res. 1696

Law and Justice—Charge of Intimidation
—R. Smith, 1524CREMER, Mr. W. R., Shoreditch, Haggerston

Emin Pasha Relief Expedition, Charge against the Members of, 37

Government Contracts — Messrs. Brass, 1150

Parliament—Business of the House, 39

Post Office Officials, Res. 223

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 512

Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act (1887) (see IRELAND)

Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Nov 26, 111

Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) (No. 2) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Nov 26, 112

CROSS, Viscount (Secretary of State for India)

Ireland—Ordnance Survey, 1269

CROZET ISLANDS

Missing Vessels, Q. Mr. Leng; A. The First Lord of Admy. Dec 8, 697

Currency

Light Gold, Q. Mr. Montagu; A. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 1, 239

Notes, Qs. Mr. E. Spencer, Mr. Lea; As. The Ch. of Exch. Nov 27, 125; Postponed Q. (Sir W. Houldsworth) Jan 30, 1391; Q. Sir W. Houldsworth; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 2, 1526

(Refer to Gold Coinage Bill)

CURRIE, Sir D., Perthshire, W.

Army—Inchkeith Island, Purchase of, 165

Custody of Children Bill

c. Read 2^a and com. to Com. of the whole House Feb 2, 1505

Customs, Excise, and Inland Revenue

Customs and Excise

Customs' Entry Trade and the Merchandise Marks Act, Q. Sir R. Lethbridge; A. The Prov. Bd. Trade Dec 8, 699

Statistical Abstracting Department, Q. Mr. Bradlaugh; A. The Sec. to Treas. Dec 9, 754

Wine Duties, Q. Mr. Leng; A. The Ch. of Exch. Jan 29, 1275

Customs, Excise, and Inland Revenue—cont.

Inland Revenue

Firearms—Licence Duties, Increase of, Qs.

Mr. Talbot, Mr. J. Lowther; As. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 4, 519

House Duty and Income Tax, Q. Mr.

Morton; A. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 9, 752

Inhabited House Duty, Q. Mr. Montagu;

A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 3, 1617

Itinerant Musicians—Licences, Q. Mr.

Jacoby; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 2, 1516

Methylated Spirits—Trade in Ireland, Q.

Mr. O'Neill; A. The Ch. of Exch. Jan 26, 1013

CYPRUS

Criminal Administration, Q. Mr. E. Robertson; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Dec 1, 238

Revenue and Expenditure, Q. Mr. Leveson-Gower; A. The Under Sec. for Fin. Affrs. Dec 1, 237

DALRYMPLE, Sir C., Ipswich

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Select Com., Res. 1723

DALTON, Mr. J. J., Donegal, W.

Ireland

Census Returns, 1403

Distress—Relief Works, 1296

Donegal Evictions, 1014

Police at Evictions, 1292

DARLING, Mr. C. J., Deptford

Conspiracy Law Amendment Bill, 2R. 1247, 1252, 1253, 1254, 1255

Dutch Cattle, 342

DAWNAY, Colonel Hon. L. P., York, N.R., Thirsk

Law and Justice—Hargan, Walter, Res. 682

DE COBAIN, Mr. E. S. W., Belfast, E.

Ireland—Post Office—Mails, 130

DE LA WARR, Earl

Ceylon—Arabi Pasha, 1501

Railway Accident at Wortley, Res. 1009, 1011, 1012

DE LISLE, Mr. E. J. L. M. P., Leicestershire, Mid

Malay Peninsula, Reported Cession of, 1149

Parliament—Mr. Bradlaugh and the Parliamentary Oath, Res. 1174

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 957

Religious Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 1792

DENMAN, Lord

Duration of Speeches in the House of Lords Bill, 2R. 687

[cont.]

DE WORMS, Right Hon. Baron H. (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies), Liverpool, East Toxteth

Africa (East Coast)
Portugal and the East African Slave Trade, 234

Africa (South Coast)
South Africa Company, 1142

Africa (West Coast)
Gold Coast
Akoto Mamley, Case of, 235
Slave Trade, 235

Ceylon—Military Expenditure, 346
Colonies—Self-Governing Colonies—Commercial Treaties, &c. 346, 1020, 1622
Cyprus—Criminal Administration, 238
Hong Kong—Opium, Sale of, 1280

Pacific Islands
British Trade—Australian Federal Council, 1621

Labourers, 647
Tonga—Rev. S. W. Baker, 1283

Queensland, Northern—Separate Colony, 752

West Indies
Leeward Islands Constitution Bill, 1521
Tobago—Chief Justice, 233

DICKSON, Mr. T. A., Dublin, St. Stephen's Green

Ireland—Educational Endowments—Rainey School, Magherafelt, Res. 635

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea, Town

Conversion Scheme, 523
Parliament—Business of the House, 1384
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 332

District Councils Bill

Q. Mr. Cobb; A. The Pres. B1. Trade
Jan 29, 1290

DIXON-HARTLAND, Mr. F. D., Middlesex, Uxbridge

City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883 (Central Scheme), Res. 1115, 1121
Muzzling Order, 652
Post Office—Colonial Letter Postage, 129

Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 110
Order for 2R. read and deferred Dec 4, 628
Read 2^o Jan 27, 1195
Com.—R.P. Feb 2, 1612

Drainage Separation Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 112

DUFF, Mr. R. W., Banffshire

Naval Armaments Vote, 1620
Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 832, 862
Scotland—Marine Police Force, 1018

DUNCAN, Mr. J. A., Barrow-in-Furness
Chili, Revolution in, 1392

Duration of Speeches in the House of Lords Bill

l. Presented; Read 1^o * Dec 2, 339
2R. put off for ten months Dec 8, 687

Duration of Speeches (Parliament) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 2, 350

Dwelling Houses Re-Letting (Scotland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 1, 332

DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W. H. (Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education), Kent, Dartford

Bow Factories, Lusanitary State of, 161
City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1983 (Central Scheme), Res. 1124
City Parochial Charities—Central Scheme, 747

Education Department

Assisted Education Bill, 892
Blind, Education of, 527
Board School Attendance in London, 159
Education Code, 703
Education Grant—Returns, 1145
Latimer Road Board School, 699
National School Fees—Pauper Children, 656
Rawnsley Board School, 1152
South Kensington Museum—Attendants' Pay, 523

EAST INDIA (see INDIA)

Ecclesiastical Commissioners

Church of England Revenues Returns (see Church of England)

EDUCATION—Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education (see DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W. H.)

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT

Agricultural Education, Qs. Mr. Cobb, Mr. H. Gardner; As. The Pres. Bd. Ag. Dec 2, 311; Q. Colonel Hambro; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. B1. Feb 2, 1524

Assisted Education, Legislation, Q. Mr. Mundella; A. The First Lord of Treas. Dec 4, 536; Q. Mr. S. Buxton; A. The Vice Pres. Jan 23, 892

Blind, Education of, England and Wales, Q. Mr. Mundella; A. The Vice Pres. Dec 4, 527

City of London Parochial Charities and Christ's Hospital (see title Charity Commissioners)

County Councils and Education—Local Taxation Act, Q. The Marquess of Hartington; A. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 4, 528; Q. Mr. Bryce; A. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 4, 534

[cont.]

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—cont.

Education Code, Q., Obs. Lord Norton,
The Lord Pres. Dec 8, 685; Q. Sir
R. Temple; A. The Vice Pres. Dec 8, 763
Grants—Returns, Q. Mr. Cobb; A. The
Vice Pres. Jan 27, 1145

Pauper Children—National School Fees, Q.
Sir W. Foster; A. The Vice Pres. Dec 5, 654

Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Q. Mr.
H. Vincent; A. The Home Sec. Feb 3, 1616

Schools and School Boards

Board School Attendance in London, Q. Mr.
Bradlaugh; A. The Vice Pres. Nov 28,
159

Latimer Road School, Q. Sir R. Lethbridge;
A. The Vice Pres. Dec 8, 699

Raensley Board School, Q. Mr. Labouchere;
A. The Vice Pres. Jan 27, 1151

Educational Endowments (Ireland)

Raivey School, Magherafelt; Motion Dec 1, 629

Educational Endowments (Scotland)
(Anderson's Institution, Elgin)

Answer to Address Dec 1, 240

EGYPT

Arabi Pasha, Qs., Obs. Earl De La Warr,
The Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 2, 1501

Suakin and the Soudan, Q. Sir R. Temple;
A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Dec 2, 348

Water Supply, Q. Sir J. Swinburne; A.
The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Dec 9, 753

Eight Hours Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 113

Election (Expenses) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 108

Election (Personal Agents) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Jan 28, 1268

Electoral Disabilities Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Feb 2, 1533

Electors Qualification and Registration
Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 107

Electors Registration (Acceleration)
Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 4, 542

Electors Registration (Acceleration) Bill

Qs. Mr. J. Rowlands, Mr. T. M. Healy; As.
The First Lord of Treas. Dec 8, 706

Electric Lighting (see Board of Trade)

Elementary Education (Continuation Schools) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 105

Elementary Education (England and Wales) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 116

Elementary Education (Schemes of Charity Commissioners)

Return ordered Jan 29, 1271

Elementary Education (Schemes of Charity Commissioners) (No. 2)

Return ordered Jan 29, 1271

ELLIOT, Hon. A. R. D., Roxburgh

Parliament—Adjournment—Christmas Re-
cess, Res. 771

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R.
809

Religious Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R.
1766

ELLIOT, Hon. H. F. H., Ayrshire, N.

Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1201, 1223

ELLIS, Mr. J., Leicestershire, Bosworth

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Order for
Com. 611

ELLIS, Mr. J. E., Nottingham, Rushcliffe
Ireland

Land Acts, Advances Under, 226

Land Purchase Acts Returns, 131, 896

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts
(Ireland) Bill, 2R. 351, 356, 368

Railways

Fares on Tickets, 531

Rates, 531

Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 1716, 1726

Telegraphic Messages, 1279

Emigration and Immigration

Alien Act, Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Pres.
Bd. Trade Jan 27, 1145

Polish Jews—Immigrants, Q. Mr. Howorth;
A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Nov 27, 122

Employers' Liability Act (1880)
Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 105

Endowed Charities (Cumberland)

Return ordered Feb 2, 1513

Endowed Charities (Derby)

Return ordered Feb 2, 1513

Endowed Charities (Northampton)

Return ordered Feb 2, 1513

Endowed Charities (Surrey)

Return ordered Feb 2, 1513

ESMONDE, Sir T. G., Dublin Co., S.

Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Arrest of Women at Castlereas, 1630

Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1426

Police Force Fund, 1297

Pacific Islands

British Trade, 1621

Samoan Treaty, 1282

Tonga—Rev. S. W. Baker, 1283

West Indies—Leeward Islands, 1521

ESSLEMONT, Mr. P., Aberdeen, E.Parliament—Adjournment—Christmas Re-
cess, Res. 773

Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 655

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R.
816Purchase of Land and Congested Districts
(Ireland) Bill, Order for Com. 674Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1216

Scotland—Higher Education, Res. 1700

Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 595

EVANS, Mr. S. T., Glamorgan, Mid,

Mines, Secretary for, Res. 1186

Parliament—Business of the House, 1383

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 310;
Com. 1034, 1038, 1043, 1044, 1047, 1048,
1049, 1057, 1059, 1060, 1063, 1065, 1075,
1077, 1080, 1081, 1088, 1089, 1090, 1091,
1094, 1095, 1104, 1300, 1301, 1303, 1311,
1312, 1315, 1318, 1322, 1323, 1376, 1378,
1538, 1539, 1549, 1552, 1553, 1555, 1556,
1557, 1563, 1565, 1572, 1590, 1602, 1608,
1610Wales—Chief Constable of Cardiganshire,
522Evictions (London and Suburbs)

Address for Return Nov 27, 134

EWING, Sir A. Orr, DumbartonPrivate Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R.
852Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1212Factories (see Labour, Trade, and Commerce)*Factories, Certificates of Birth (Fees)
Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Feb 4, 1799Factory and Workshops Act (1878)
Amendment Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 101Factory and Workshops Act (1878)
Amendment (No. 2) Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 109Factory and Workshops Billl. Presented; Read 1^o * Feb 3, 1613False Marking Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Feb 4, 1799False Marking Prevention Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 2, 350Farm Servants' Housing (Scotland)
Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 114Farm Servants' Wages (Scotland) Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Jan 29, 1380FARQUHARSON, Dr. R., Aberdeenshire, W.

Army Medical Department, 700

Tithes—Goods Liable to Distraint, 1523

FARQUHARSON, Mr. H. R., Dorset, W.Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1055, 1067, 1317, 1345, 1537, 1554, 1562FENWICK, Mr. C., Northumberland, WansbeckClarendon Press—An Unvaccinated Lad, 1525

Coal Mines Act, 1525

Conspiracy Law Amendment Bill, 2R. 1233,
1235, 1237, 1252, 1253, 1254, 1255Intimidation—The Conspiracy and Property
Act, 524

Mines, Secretary for, Res. 1191

FERGUSON, Mr. R. C. Munro, Leith, &c.Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R.
837Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res.
959, 1722

Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 589

FERGUSON, Right Hon. Sir J. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Manchester, N.E.

Africa

England and Portugal in—South Africa
Company, &c. 653, 760, 897, 1028, 1285

Africa (East Coast)

Vitu, Sultan of, 128, 651

Africa (West Coast)

King Ja Ja, 343, 643

Oil River Districts, 343

Anglo-Portuguese Agreement, 164

Armenia, Papers Relating to, 129, 1021

Austria—Zone Fares on Railways, 236

Behring Sea Fisheries, 898, 899, 1019, 1623

Brussels Conference, 127, 651

Chili, Revolution in, 1393

China—Piracy in the Chinese Seas, 1520

Colonies—Commercial Arrangements, 1021

Cyprus—Revenue and Expenditure, 238

Egypt

Suakin and the Soudan, 348

Water Supply, 754

[cont.]

FERGUSSON, Right Hon. Sir J.—cont.

Germany—Professor Koch's Cure, 349
International Industrial Conference at Madrid, 1526
International Maritime Conference at Washington, 1287
Malay Peninsula, Reported Cession of, 1150
Mexico—Arrest of Officers of the "Seaforth," 1025
Polish Political Prisoners, 1802
Samoan Treaty, 1283

FINUCANE, Mr. J., Limerick, E.
Ireland—Distress—Loans to Farmers, 763

First Offenders

Address for Return Feb 4, 1800

FISHER, Mr. W. H., Fulham
City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883 (Central Scheme), Res. 1123

Fishery Board (Scotland) Bill
l. Presented; Read 1st Dec 8, 690

Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 26, 104

FITZGERALD, Mr. R. U. P., Cambridge
Irish Tithepayers, 1529

FLYNN, Mr. J. C., Cork, N.
Ireland
County Cess in Kerry, 1529
Criminal Law, &c. Act—Long, Mr. 1530
Distress—Relief Works, 1532
Land Purchase—Case of Michael Keily, 1629
Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1460

FOREIGN AFFAIRS—Secretary of State (see SALISBURY, Marquess of)

FOREIGN AFFAIRS—Under Secretary of State (see FERGUSSON, Right Hon. Sir J.)

Forged Transfers Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1st Dec 9, 767

FOSTER, Sir B. W., Derby, Ilkeston
Africa—King Ja Ja, 343, 643
Education—Pauper Children—National School Fees, 654
Germany—Professor Koch's Cure, 348
Labourers' Allotments, 901, 1624

FOWLER, Right Hon. H. H., Wolverhampton, E.
Parliament—Business of the House, 1109
Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 865
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1102, 1732, 1304, 1317

FOWLER, Sir R. N., London
City Parochial Charities, 746
City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883 (Central Scheme), Res. 1111
Parliament—Standing Orders, Select Com., Res. 1, 385
Police Stations, 756

Franchise (Ireland) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 26, 105

FRASER, Lieutenant General C. C., Lan-beth, N.
Army—Officers
New Warrant, 125
Senior Colonels, 534

FRASER-MACKINTOSH, Mr. C., Inverness-shire
Post Office—Bible Classes in Officials Rooms, 694
Scotland
Electors in the Crofter Counties, 1515
Salmon Fishery Rights, 1514

Friendly Societies
Music at Meetings, Q. Mr. W. Isaacson; A. The Home Sec. Dec 9, 763

Friendly Societies Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 27, 156

FULTON, Mr. J. FORREST, West Ham, N.
Parliament—Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 50

GARDNER, Mr. H., Essex, Saffron Walden
Tithe Rent-Charge Commission, 537, 902, 1029, 1396
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 1R. 136; 2R. 249, 257; Order for Com. 613; Com. 1056, 1083, 1092, 1093, 1098, 1305, 1329, 1330, 1362, 1534, 1574, 1576, 1578

GATHORNE HARDY, Hon. A. E., Sussex, East Grinstead
China—Piracy in the Chinese Seas, 1520
Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 945. 950

GEDGE, Mr. S., Stockport
Religious Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 1760
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1037, 1042, 1045, 1047, 1050, 1057, 1059, 1061, 1067, 1070, 1091, 1103, 1346, 1549, 1570, 1590, 1604, 1610

GERMANY
Koch, Dr. — Reward for Discoveries (see heading Board of Agriculture)

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E., Edinburgh, Mid Lothian
Ireland—Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1417

[cont.]

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E.—cont.

Parliament

- Business of the House, Res. 175
- Mr. Bradlaugh and the Parliamentary Oath, Res. 1166
- Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 52, 70
- Speaker, Mr.—Death of Mrs. Peel, 665
- Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 358, 360
- Religious Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 1733, 1746, 1747, 1752, 1756, 1757

Glebe Lands Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st * Nov 26, 116

Gold Coinage Bill

Q. Mr. Montagu; A. The Ch. of Exch.
Feb 3, 1618

GOLDSMID, Sir J., St. Pancras, S.

- Parliament—Business of the House, 535; Res. 175
- Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 1154; 2R. 888
- Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Order for Com. 616; Com. 1038, 1068, 1070, 1074, 1344, 1552, 1553, 1564

GORST, Right Hon. Sir J. E. (Under Secretary of State for India), Chatham

India

Army

- Colonel's Allowances, 1615
- Military Stores, 642
- Bombay Salt Act, 1273
- Burma—State Railway Employees, 226
- Child Marriages, 341
- Crops, Yield of—Distress, &c. 157, 899, 1388
- Factories—Hours of Labour, 117
- Finance—Rate of Exchange, 695
- Law and Justice and Police
 - Dum Dum Murder Case, 1272
 - Police—Mr. W. M'Grath Drysdale, 340
 - Unequal Punishments, 225
- Licences—Out-Still Licences, 642
- Opium Traffic, 158, 1274
- Parliament—Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 75, 79, 80
- Post Office—Irish Mails, 240

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), St. George's, Hanover Square

- Conversion Scheme, 523
- County Councils and Education, 528
- Currency
 - Light Gold, 239
 - Notes, 125, 1526
- Customs and Inland Revenue
- Firearms—Licence Duties, 519
- House Duty and Income Tax, 753
- Inhabited House Duty, 1618
- Itinerant Musicians' Licences, 1516
- Wine Duties, 1275

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J.—cont.

- Cold Coinage Bill, 1618
- Government Securities—Sinking Fund (see sub-heading Purchase of Land, &c. Bill)
- Ireland
 - Education—National Teachers—Widows' and Orphans' Fund, 1531
 - Ether Drinking, 230
 - Fiscal Relations between Great Britain and Ireland, 1029
 - Methylated Spirits, Trade in, 1013
 - Tithepayers, 1529
- Local Taxation, Relief of, 654
- Parliament—Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 73, 74
- Pensions, Perpetual, Res. 194, 196, 197, 198, 200, 205
- Public Trustee Bill, 1144
- Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill—Sinking Fund, &c., 759, 1017, 1149, 1623
- Savings Banks
 - Cardiff, 1013
 - Chelsea, 119, 1013
- Trust Funds and Colonial Securities, 750
- Trustee Savings Bank Bill, 892

GOURLEY, Mr. E. T., Sunderland

- Army—Battery and Earthworks near Sunderland, 1148
- Behring Sea Fisheries, 1019
- Merchant Shipping—New Load-Line Law, 651
- Navy
 - Ships
 - "Barracouta," 1278
 - "Mohawk" and "Sandfly," 1278
 - "Sans Pareil"—The 110-Ton Gun, 1515
 - "Serpent," 121

Government Contracts

- Birmingham Post Office, Qs. Mr. S. Buxton; As. The First Com. of Works Dec 5, 650; Dec 8, 701
- Cleaners of the Houses of Parliament, Qs. Mr. Labouchere; As. The First Com. of Works Jan 27, 1143; Jan 30, 1394
- Messrs. Brass, Qs. Mr. Cremer, Mr. J. Rowlands; As. The First Com. of Works Jan 27, 1150

Government Department Securities

- Conversion Scheme, Q. Mr. Dillwyn; A. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 4, 523
- Queen Anne's Bounty, Q. Mr. Seale-Hayne; A. The Sec. to Treas. Feb 3, 1619
- (Refer to heading Purchase of Land, &c. (Ireland) Bill—Guarantee and Sinking Fund)

GRAHAM, Mr. R. C., Lanark, N.W.

- Africa—Emin Relief Expedition, Offences Committed Under, 661
- Agricultural Education, 842
- Army
 - "Mitchell v. Regina," 529, 761
 - Persons Royal Warrants, 749

cont.

GRAHAM, Mr. R. C.—cont.

Royal Engineers—Officer's Petition, 527
Woolwich Arsenal—Discharge of Workmen, &c. 649, 749

Gas Strike, 532

India—Hours of Labour in Factories, 117
Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 739, 740

Manchester Ship Canal—Number of Accidents, 749

Mines—Weighing Minerals, 531

Railways

Servants—Hours of Labour, 656
Taunton Accident, 164

GRANVILLE, Earl

Parliament

Business of the House, 685, 785
Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 16, 27

Portugal and England in Africa, 685

GRAY, Mr. C. W., Essex, Maldon

Cattle, Foreign, Importation of, 236
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 257, 258; Order for Com. 609; Com. 1041, 1055, 1073, 1085, 1331, 1342, 1372, 1535, 1550, 1557, 1577

GREY, Sir E., Northumberland, Berwick

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 439

GURDON, Mr. R. T., Norfolk, Mid.

Post Office—Irish Lotteries, 663

HALDANE, Mr. R. B., Haddington

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 404, 408
Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 1004

HALSBURY, Lord (Lord Chancellor)

Custody of Children Bill, 2R. 1505, 1512
Law and Justice—Scale of Punishments, 338
Parliament—Queen's Speech, 1
Transfer of Railways (Ireland) Bill, Com. 686

HAMBRO, Colonel C. J. T., Dorset, South

Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Act, 1524

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord G. F. (First Lord of the Admiralty), Middlesex, Ealing

Navy

Charts and Surveys—Forth of Clyde, 642

Docks

Haulbowline, 1155

Portsmouth, 1141

Miscellaneous

British Naval Hospital at Lisbon, 123

Naval Armaments Vote, 1620

Naval Prison at Lowes, 1392

VOL. CCCXLIX. [THIRD SERIES.] [cont.]

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord G. F.—cont.

Officers—Lieutenants' List, 643

Ordnance—Magazine Rifles, 518

Scotland—Naval Reserve, Employment of, by an Officer for Private Purposes, 691

Ships

"Barracouta," 1279

Crozet Islands—Missing Vessels, 697

"Mohawk" and "Sandfly," 1278

"Polypheumus," 1389

"Sans Pareil"—110-Ton Gun, 1515

"Serpent," 121

"Shannon," 1156

"Tyne," 658

HANBURY, Mr. R. W., Preston

Army—Magazine Rifles, 517; Res. 1642, 1648, 1649, 1657, 1666

Handloom Weaving (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Dec 5, 666

HARCOURT, Right Hon. Sir W. G. V., Derby

Conspiracy Law Amendment Bill, 2R. 1256, 1262

Pensions, Perpetual, Res. 198, 199, 200

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, Instruction to Com. 886

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 451, 452

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, 1023; Res. 996, 1000, 1003

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Order for Com. 451; Com. 1031, 1032, 1036, 1037, 1039, 1047, 1048, 1061, 1063, 1066, 1069, 1070, 1071, 1073, 1076, 1078, 1079, 1080, 1084, 1096, 1099, 1104, 1299, 1300, 1302, 1303, 1306, 1308, 1309, 1315, 1321, 1338, 1340, 1367, 1577, 1582, 1583, 1584, 1587, 1588, 1589, 1594, 1599, 1600, 1604, 1605, 1606

Hares Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 102

Hares and Rabbits Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Dec 5, 665

Hares Preservation Bill

l. Presented; Read 1° * Nov 25, 32

Read 2° and com. to Com. of the whole House Dec 2, 335

Com.; Reported Dec 8, 687

Read 3° * and passed Dec 9, 745

HARRINGTON, Mr. E., Kerry, W.

Ireland—Land Purchase Acts—Returns, 132

HARRISON, Mr. H., Tipperary, Mid.

Ireland—Coroner for Tipperary, 166

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of Lancashire, Rossendale

County Councils and Education, 528

HEALY, Mr. M., Cork

Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 628

Ireland

Law and Justice — Cork Bankruptcy Court, 1630

Post Office, Cork, 1533

HEALY, Mr. T. M., Longford, N.

Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Walsh, Mr. 163, 663, 705, 755, 1401

Distress and the Land Commission, 708

Educational Endowments—Rainey School, Magherafelt, Res. 639

Land Purchase

Case of Michael Keily, 1628

Reserved Rights—Marquess of Waterford, 1527

Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1433, 1434, 1439, 1441, 1483, 1491

Law and Justice—Crown Prosecutions—Appointment of Mr. P. Olphert, 708

Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 710, 711, 712, 721, 722

Parliament

Adjournment—Christmas Recess, Res. 776, 778, 779

Business of the House, 1382

Standing Orders, Select Com., Res. 1387

Pollen Fisheries (Ireland) Bill, Com. 1612

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) [Advancer, &c.], Com. 768, 769

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 1R. 137; Com. 1596, 1600, 1602, 1603, 1605

Tramways Order in Council (Ireland) (Athenry and Tuam Railway) Bill, 2R. 709

Transfer of Railways (Ireland) Bill, Lords Amdnts. 743, 744

HEATH, Mr. A. R., Lincoln, Louth

Post Office—Mail Service to Stornoway, 1147

HEATON, Mr. J. H., Canterbury

Ireland—Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1465, 1469

Mines, Secretary for, Res. 1189

Queensland, Northern—Separate Colony, 752

HENEAGE, Right Hon. E., Great Grimsby

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1349

HENNESSY, Sir J. POPE, Kilkenny, N.

Polish Political Prisoners, 1802

HERSCHELL, Lord

Custody of Children Bill, 2R. 1511

Law and Justice—Punishments, Scale of, 338

Parliament—Standing Committees, Standing Orders Relating to, Select Com., Res.

Historical Manuscripts Commission (List of Reports)

Address for Return Dec 3, 453

HOBHOUSE, Mr. H., Somerset, E.

Local Taxation (Exchequer Contributions) Returns, 159

Post Office—Telegrams—Compensation for Non-Delivery, &c., 158

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1352

HOME DEPARTMENT, Secretary of State
(see MATTHEWS, Right Hon. H.)

HOME DEPARTMENT, Under Secretary of State (see WORTLEY, Mr. C. B. Stuart)

HONG KONG

Opium, Sale of, Q. Mr. Webb; A. The Under Sec. for Cons. Jan 29, 1279

Piracy in the Chinese Seas, Q. Mr. A. E. Gathorne-Hardy; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 2, 1520

Hop Substitutes Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Dec 2, 350

HOULDSWORTH, Sir W. H., Manchester, N.W.

Currency—Notes, 1391, 1526

Hours of Adult Labour

Address for Return Dec 1, 240

HOWELL, Mr. G., Bethnal Green, N.E.

Law and Justice—"Regina v. Curran and Others," 900

Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 1200

Savings Banks

Cardiff, 1013

Chelsea, 1012

Trustee Savings Bank Bill, 892

HOWORTH, Mr. H. H., Salford, S.

Corrupt Practices Act, 900

Immigrants, Destitute—Polish Jews, 122

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 920, 922

HOYLE, Mr. I., Lancashire, S.E., Heywood

India—Rate of Exchange, 695

HUGHES, Colonel E., Woolwich

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 974

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1321, 1322

HUNTER, Mr. W. A., Aberdeen, N.

India—Madras—Threatened Famine, 1388

Parliament—Mr. Bradlaugh and the Parliamentary Oath, Res. 1158, 1175

[cont.]

HUNTER, Mr. W. A.—cont.

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R.
820
Scotland—Higher Education, Res. 1710

HUNTLY, Marquess of
Pleuro-Pneumonia Order, 1512

ILLINGWORTH, Mr. A., Bradford, W.
Parliament—Business of the House, Res.
181

Immigration (see Emigration)

INDIA—Secretary of State (see CROSS, Viscount)

INDIA—Under Secretary of State (see GORST, Right Hon. Sir J. E.)

INDIA

Agriculture

Crops—Threatened Famine, &c., Qs. Mr.
Keay; As. The Under Sec. for India
Nov 28, 157; Jan 23, 899; Q. Mr.
Hunter; A. The Under Sec. for India
Jan 30, 1388

Army

Colonels' Allowances, Q. Mr. King; A.
The Under Sec. for India Feb 3, 1615
Military Stores, Qs. Mr. Bradlaugh; As.
The Under Sec. for India Dec 5, 642;
Q. Mr. Bradlaugh; A. The First Lord of Treas. Dec 8, 695

Burma—State Railway—Employés, Q. Mr.
Bradlaugh; A. The Under Sec. for India
Dec 1, 226

East India (Scarcity in Kumaon and Garwhal),
Address for Return Feb 2, 1513

Factories

Address for Return Feb 3, 1614
Hours of Labour, Q. Mr. C. Graham; A.
The Under Sec. for India Nov 27, 117
Finance—Rate of Exchange, Q. Mr. Hoyle;
A. The Under Sec. for India Dec 8, 695

Law and Justice and Police

Bombay Salt Act, Q. Mr. Conybeare; A.
The Under Sec. for India Jan 29, 1272
Dum Dum Murder Case, Qs. Mr. Conybeare, Sir G. Campbell, Dr. Clark; As.
The Under Sec. for India Jan 29, 1271
Police—Mr. W. M'Grath Drysdale, Qs. Mr.
S. Smith, Mr. M. Stewart; As. The
Under Sec. for India Dec 2, 339

Unequal Punishments, Q. Mr. Bradlaugh;
A. The Under Sec. for India Dec 1, 225

Licences — Out-Still Licences, Q. Mr. S.
Smith; A. The Under Sec. for India Dec
5, 641

Miscellaneous

Child Marriages, Q. Mr. S. Smith; A. The
Under Sec. for India Dec 2, 341
Opium Traffic, Q. Mr. S. Smith; A. The Under Sec. for India Nov 28, 158; Q.
Mr. M. Stewart; A. The Under Sec. for India Jan 29, 1274

Indian Councils Act (1861) Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 110
2R. deferred Feb 2, 1611

Indian Councils Act (1861) Amendment (No. 2) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Jan 26, 1030

Indian Councils Act (1861) Amendment (No. 2) Bill

Qs. Mr. W. M'Laren, Mr. Bryce; As. The
First Lord of Treas. Feb 3, 1616

Industrial Agricultural Education Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 115

Industrial Schools (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 109

Infectious Disease (Notification) Act, 1889, Infectious Disease (Preven- tion) Act, 1890, and Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890

Return ordered Jan 29, 1270

Intermediate Schools, &c. Sites Bill

l. Presented; Read 1^a * Nov 25, 32
Read 2^a Dec 2, 333

International Industrial Conference at Madrid (see Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

International Maritime Conference at Washington (see Board of Trade)

Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 106

Intoxicating Liquors Licences (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 113

IRELAND

Army

Donegal Militia, Q. Mr. A. O'Connor; A.
The Fin. Sec. for War Feb 3, 1629

Criminal Law and Procedure Act

Administration—Tipperary Trials, &c.,
Q. Mr. T. W. Russell; A. The Chf. Sec.
Dec 8, 691; Qs. Mr. J. Morley; As. The
First Lord of Treas. Jan 27, 1156; Jan
29, 1290

Notices of Motions (Mr. J. M'Carthy)
Dec 8, 641; Jan 23, 890; (Mr.
Parnell) Jan 22, 787

Arrests of Members of Parliament, Letter received by Mr. Speaker Nov 25, 33

Castlereagh—Arrest of Women, Q. Sir T.
Esmonde; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland
Feb 3, 1630

Long, Mr., Q. Mr. Flynn; A. The Att.
Gen. for Ireland Feb 2, 1530

IRELAND—Criminal Law and Procedure Act—cont.

Nully, Mr. P., Q. Colonel Nolan; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 2, 1530
Walsh, Mr., Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Nov 28, 165; Dec 5, 663; Dec 8, 705; Dec 9, 755; Jan 30, 1401

Distress—Failure of the Potato Crop

Congested Districts—Report, Q. Sir L. Playfair; A. The Chf. Sec. Dec 9, 758

Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act—Administration, Motion (Colonel Nolan) Feb 3, 1727

Relief Works, &c., Qs. Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien; As. The Chf. Sec. Nov 27, 132; Dec 8, 703; Q. Mr. Cox; A. The Sec. to Treas. Dec 4, 540; Q. Mr. Cox; A. The Chf. Sec. Dec 8, 704; Qs. Mr. J. McCarthy, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. The Chf. Sec. Dec 8, 708; Q. Mr. Finucane; A. The Chf. Sec. Dec 9, 763; Qs. Colonel Nolan; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 23, 892; Feb 2, 1531; Qs. Dr. Tanner; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 26, 1017; Jan 27, 1155; Qs. Colonel Nolan, Mr. Sexton, Mr. J. Morley; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 26, 1025; Qs. Colonel Nolan, Mr. Cox, Dr. Tanner, Mr. Sexton; As. The Chf. Sec., The First Lord of Treas. Jan 29, 1293; Q. Mr. Dalton; A. The Chf. Sec. Jan 29, 1296; Qs. Dr. Tanner, Mr. A. O'Connor, Mr. Cox, Mr. J. Morley; As. The Chf. Sec., The Sec. to Treas. Jan 30, 1397; Q. Colonel Nolan; A. The Chf. Sec. Jan 30, 1402; Qs. Mr. Flynn, Mr. A. O'Connor; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland, The Sec. to Treas. Feb 2, 1532

Seed Potatoes, Qs. Colonel Nolan; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Dec 4, 538; Q. Colonel Nolan; A. The Ld. Adv. Jan 26, 1016; Q. Dr. Tanner; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 26, 1022

Drainage and Navigation

Drainage Boards, Q. Mr. Cox; A. The Chf. Sec. Nov 27, 131

Shannon, Q. Mr. Sexton; A. A Lord of Treas. Jan 29, 1298

(Refer to sub-heading Distress—Relief Works)

Education

Educational Endowments—Rainey School, Magherafelt, Motion Dec 4, 629

National Education Board—Vacancy, &c., Q. Mr. T. W. Russell; A. The Chf. Sec. Nov 27, 133; Q. Mr. Clancy; A. The Chf. Sec. Dec 9, 764

National School Teachers

Promotions, Q. Mr. D. Sullivan; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 22, 788

Widows and Orphans Fund, Q. Mr. Conway; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 2, 1531

Fisheries — Wreck of the "Harold," Q. Mr. McCarthy; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 4, 538

IRELAND—cont.

Land Acts and Land Commission

Advances Under Land Acts, Qs. Mr. J. E. Ellis, Mr. S. Lefevre; As. The Chf. Sec. Dec 1, 226

Belfast — Fair Rent Appeals, Q. Mr. McCarthy; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Dec 4, 539

Decisions of Sub-Commissioners—Ennistimon Board of Guardians, Q. Mr. Cox; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Dec 4, 541

Distress — Failure of Potato Crops — Judicial Rents, Qs. Mr. J. McCarthy, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. The Chf. Sec. Dec 8, 708

Land Purchase Acts—Returns, Qs. Mr. J. E. Ellis, Mr. J. Morley, Mr. E. Harrington; As. The Chf. Sec. Nov 27, 131; Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 23, 896

Land Purchase Acts (Applications), Returns ordered Nov 28, 224

Land Purchase Acts (Default Instalments), Return ordered Dec 4, 639

Litton, Mr. Justice, Death of, Q. Mr. Lea; A. The Chf. Sec. Nov 28, 166

Purchases Under Ashbourne, &c. Acts, Qs. Mr. Keay, Mr. Sexton; As. The Chf. Sec. Nov 28, 162

Amount Unappropriated, Q. Mr. J. Morley; A. The Chf. Sec. Dec 2, 349

Case of Michael Keily, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Flynn; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 3, 1628

Reserved Rights—Marquess of Waterford, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 2, 1527

Land Bills, Q. Mr. T. W. Russell; A. The Chf. Sec. Dec 1, 228

Land—Purchase of Land, &c. Bill—Guarantee and Sinking Fund (see title Purchase of Land, &c. (Ireland) Bill)

Landlord and Tenant

Donegal Evictions, Q. Mr. Dalton; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 26, 1014

Land Tenure (Arbitration), Motion on going into Com. of Supply Jan 30, 1404

Police at Evictions (see sub-heading Law and Justice and Police)

Law and Justice and Police

Cork Bankruptcy Court, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 3, 1630

Coroner for Tipperary, Q. Mr. Harrison; A. The Chf. Sec. Nov 28, 166

Court of Eschequer (Ireland) (Lord Chief Baron's Observations on Application for Habeas Corpus), Return ordered Dec 9, 797

Crown Prosecutors—Appointment of Mr. R. Olphert, Qs. Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Dec 8, 707

"Heffernan v. Carter and Tuohy," Q. Mr. J. O'Connor; A. The Chf. Sec. Nov 27, 134; Q. Mr. J. O'Connor; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Dec 4, 532

[cont.]

[cont.]

IRELAND—Law and Justice and Police—cont.

Jurors, Q. Mr. T. W. Russell; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 29, 1296

Litton, Mr. Justice, Death of, Q. Mr. Lea; A. The Chf. Sec. Nov 28, 166

Police

Constabulary Forces Fund, Qs. Sir T. Esmonde, Mr. Sexton; As. The Chf. Sec. Jan 29, 1297

County Cess in Kerry, Q. Mr. Flynn; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 2, 1529

Evictions, Police at, Q. Mr. Dalton; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 29, 1292

Waters and O'Shea, Constables, Q. Mr. Webb; A. The Chf. Sec. Jan 29, 1292

Supreme Court of Judicature, Return ordered and presented Jan 22, 791

Lighthouses

Tory Island—Telegraphic Communication, Q. Sir E. Watkin; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 23, 893

Local Government and Poor Law

Distress—Guardians' Resolution (see sub-heading Distress—Relief Works)

Ennistymon Board of Guardians—Land Sub-Commissioners' Decisions, Q. Mr. Cox; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Dec 4, 541

Labourers' Cottages in Ossory, Q. Mr. A. O'Connor; A. The Sec. to Treas. Feb 2, 1532

Magistracy—Magistrates' Pensions, Q. Dr. Tanner; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 26, 1015

Miscellaneous

Catholic Priests at Elections, Qs. Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Cox, Mr. B. Reed; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 26, 1015

Census Returns, Q. Mr. Dalton; A. The Chf. Sec. Jan 30, 1403

Church Surplus, Q. Mr. Keay; A. The Chf. Sec. Jan 29, 1297

Clare Slob Lands, Q. Mr. Cox; A. The Sec. to Treas. Dec 4, 537; Q. Mr. Cox; A. The Chf. Sec. Dec 8, 704

County Cess in Kerry, Q. Mr. Flynn; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Feb 2, 1529

Ether and Methylated Spirit Drinking, Q. Dr. Cameron; A. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 1, 230; Q. Mr. O'Neill; A. The Ch. of Exch. Jan 26, 1013

Fiscal Relations between Great Britain and Ireland, Qs. Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Sexton; As. The Ch. of Exch. Jan 26, 1029

Ordnance Survey, Q., Obs. Earl of Belmore, Viscount Cross Jan 29, 1269

Tithepayers, Q. Mr. P. Fitzgerald; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 2, 1529

Navy

Haulbowline Docks, Q. Dr. Tanner; A. The First Lord of Admy. Jan 27, 1155

"Shannon," Repairs of, Q. Dr. Tanner; A. The First Lord of Admy. Jan 27, 1156

[cont.]

IRELAND—cont.

Post Office

Cork—Postal Arrangements, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 2, 1533
Dublin, Q. Mr. Conway; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 2, 1531

Ennis Post Office, Q. Mr. Cox; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 29, 1298

Irish Lotteries, Q. Mr. Gurdon; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 5, 663

Mails—Larne and Stranraer, &c. Qs. Mr. Lea, Mr. M'Cartan, Mr. Sexton, Mr. De Cobain; As. The P.M. Gen. Nov 27, 129; Q. Mr. Picton; A. Sir J. Gorat (for the P.M. Gen.) Dec 1, 239; Qs. Mr. M'Cartan, Mr. Sexton; As. The P.M. Gen. Dec 5, 658; Qs. Mr. M'Cartan, Mr. Johnston; As. The P.M. Gen. Dec 9, 755; Q. Mr. Sexton; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 23, 895; Q. Captain M'Calmont; A. A Lord of Treas. Jan 30, 1397

Sunday Delivery of Letters, Postponed Q. Mr. M'Cartan Dec 4, 539

Tory Island—Telegraphic Communication, Q. Sir E. Watkin; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 23, 893

Prisons

Prisoners Convicted Under the Criminal Law, &c. Act (see sub-heading Criminal Law, &c. Act)

Railways—Light Railways

Crookstown and Enniskeane, Q. Dr. Tanner; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 27, 1155

Donegal, Q. Mr. Lea; A. The Sec. to Treas. Dec 9, 764

Ennis and Scarriff, Q. Mr. Cox; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Dec 4, 538

Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889, Return ordered Jan 29, 1381

Maps of Proposed New Railways for the House of Commons Tea Room, Q. Mr. S. Smith; A. The Chf. Sec. Dec 8, 708
(Refer also to sub-heading Distress—Relief Works)

Irish Society and London Companies (Irish Estates)

Select Com. ordered and nominated; Orders for Papers, &c. Jan 26, 1127

ISAACSON, Mr. F. W., Tower Hamlets, Stepney

Friendly Societies—Music at Meetings, 763
Post Office Officials, 696; Res. 217

ITALY

Bread, Price of, Q., Obs. Lord Stanley of Alderley, The Marquess of Salisbury Dec 2, 335

JACKSON, Right Hon. W. L. (Secretary to the Treasury), Leeds, N.

Civil Service

Clerks' Promotion, &c. 528, 752
Writers, 1149

Customs—Statistical Attracting Department, 754

[cont.]

JACKSON, Right Hon. W. L.—cont.

Ireland

Clare Slob Lands, 538
Distress—Relief Works, 541, 1399, 1532
Labourers' Cottages in Ossory, 1533
Railways—County Donegal, 764

Literature, Science, and Art

Natural History Museum—Electric Lighting, 746
South Kensington Museum—Attendants' Superannuation, 228

Parliament

Business of the House, 1381
Sessional Papers—Annual Index, 700, 788

Pensions

Mr. T. Cadman, 1619
Perpetual Pensions, Res. 186, 193
Post Office Savings Bank Clerks, 789, 1021
Queen Anne's Bounty, 1620
Scotland—Salmon Fishery Rights, 1514
Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 586
Transfer of Railways (Ireland) Bill, Com. 624, 625; Lords' Amendt. 744

Wales

Gwylwyr Sett Quarry, 647, 1146
Sale of Crown Property, 698

JACOBY, Mr. J. A., Derbyshire, Mid.
Itinerant Musicians, 1516

JAMES, Hon. W. H., Gateshead
Chapel Royal, Whitehall, 1276

JAMES, Right Hon. Sir H., Bury, Lancashire
Religious Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 1785, 1787
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1036, 1041, 1101, 1102, 1322

JEFFREYS, Mr. A. F., Hants, Basingstoke
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 308; Com. 1320, 1358

JENNINGS, Mr. L. J., Stockport
Perpetual Pensions, Res. 191, 193

JOHNSTON, Mr. W., Belfast, S.
Irish Mails, 755

JOICEY, Mr. J., Durham, Chester-le-Street
Corrupt Practices Act, 901
Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 488

Jurors (Ireland) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 107

Justices of the Peace Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Jan 23, 903

KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Right Hon. Sir U. J.,
Lancashire, Clitheroe
Petty and Quarter Sessions, Jurisdiction in, 521
Reformatory and Industrial Schools Bill, 707

KEAY, Mr. J. S., Elgin and Nairn

Hyde Park, Skating in, 899
India—Crops, 157, 899
Ireland
Church Surplus, 1297
Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 729, 730, 738
Land Purchase, 162, 661
Parliament — Adjournment — Christmas Recess, Res. 775
Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 393, 402, 403
Sinking Fund, &c. 704, 759, 1017, 1140, 1623

KELLY, Mr. J. R., Camberwell, N.

Civil Service Clerks—Promotion, &c. 752, 1153, 1627
Law and Justice—Probate and Divorce Court, 1154
Licensing—Tied Public Houses—"Keen v. Usher and Others, Limited," 1389
School Board for London (Superannuation) Bill, 2R. 1111
Teachers (Registration and Organisation) Bill, 2R. 1110

KENNAWAY, Sir J. H., Devon, Honiton
County Councils—Roads and Footpaths, 120

KENNY, Mr. M. J., Tyrone, Mid
Irish Private Bill Legislation, 165
Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 732

KENTON-SLANEY, Colonel W., Shropshire, Newport
Parliament—Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 39

KIMBERLEY, Earl of
Parliament—Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 29

KING, Mr. H. S., Hull, Central
India—Army—Colonel's Allowances, 1615

Kingston-upon-Hull Court of Record Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 9, 767

KINLOCH, Sir J. G. S., Perth, E.
Scotland—Round Tower of Abernethy, 1619

"Kirk v. Connor"
Address for Return Jan 28, 1201

KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Mr. H. T., Kent, Faversham

Army—Wall Marsh, Sheerness, 1620
 Foreign Fruit—Merchandise Marks Act, 161
 Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Order for Com. 602; Com. 1054, 1351, 1551

KNOWLES, Mr. L., Salford, W.

Parliament—Sessional Papers—Annual Index, 700, 787

KNOX, Mr. E. F. V., Cavan, W.

Ireland—Distress—Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act—Administration, Res. 1729

Koch, Dr. (see Board of Agriculture)LABOUCHERE, Mr. H., Northampton*Africa

Emin Relief Expedition, Offences Committed Under, 661

England and Portugal, 1141, 1284

Education—Rawnsley School, 1151

Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 742

Law and Justice—Corrupt Practices Act, 1026

Mines, Secretary for, Res. 1192

Navy

Docks—Portsmouth, 1141

Ships—"Tyne," 658

Parliament

Business of the House, 791, 1381; Res. 168

Cleaners of the Houses of Parliament, 1143, 1394

Mr. Bradlaugh and the Parliamentary Oath, Res. 1171

Post Office—Savings Bank Clerks, 1393

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 1R. 146, 147; 2R. 408, 416, 417, 421, 424, 425, 508, 511, 516

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 622, 1370, 1378, 1538

Labour, Trade, and Commerce

British Trade in the Pacific—Australasian Federal Council, Q. Sir T. Esmonde; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Feb 3, 1621

Commercial Treaties, Q. Sir R. Lethbridge; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Dec 2, 346; Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Jan 26, 1020; Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Jan 26, 1020; Qs. Mr. O. V. Morgan, Mr. H. Vincent; As. The First Lord of Treas. Jan 26, 1027; Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 27, 1146

Factory Acts

Bow Factories, Qs. Mr. Bradlaugh; As. The Home Sec., The Vice Pres. Nov 28, 160

Clarendon Press, Oxford—Unvaccinated Youth, Q. Mr. Fenwick; A. The Home Sec. Feb 2, 1525

Legislation, Q. Mr. Baumann; A. The Home Sec. Dec 2, 345

Labour, Trade, and Commerce—cont.

Hours of Adult Labour, Address for Return Dec 1, 240

Industrial Profit Sharing, Q. Mr. Bartley; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 26, 1023

International Industrial Conference at Madrid, Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 2, 1526

Labour Bureau, Q. Mr. Bradlaugh; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Nov 27, 123

Manchester Ship Canal—Number of Accidents, Q. Mr. C. Graham; A. The Home Sec. Dec 9, 749

Mines

Burnbank Colliery—Weighing Minerals, Q. Mr. C. Graham; A. The Home Sec. Dec 4, 531

Coal Mines Regulation Act, Q. Mr. Fenwick; A. The Home Sec. Feb 2, 1525

Deductions from Earnings—W. Armstrong, Q. Mr. Burt; A. The Under Home Sec. Dec 5, 664

Explosives Act—Miners with Gunpowder, Q. Mr. Burt; A. The Home Sec. Jan 29, 1275

Inspectors, Qs. Mr. D. Thomas; As. The Home Sec. Jan 30, 1390, 1391; Q. Mr. J. W. Sidebotham; A. The Sec. to Treas. Feb 3, 1619

Secretary for Mines, Res. Jan 27, 1176

Selsworth Colliery—Eviction of Miners, Q.

Mr. Atherley-Jones; A. The Pres. Loc.

Gov. Bd. Jan 27, 1147

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Q. Mr. Philipps; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 4, 525; Qs. Mr. Provand, Mr. C. Graham; As. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 5, 656; Q. Mr. Provand; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 23, 895; Motion on going into Com. of Supply Jan 23, 904; Motion for Select Com. Feb 3, 1715

Strikes

Gas Strike—Government Supplying Labourers, Q. Mr. C. Graham; A. The Home Sec. Dec 4, 532

Scotch Railway Strike, Q. Mr. Watt; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 23, 891; Q. Mr. J. Stuart; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 23, 902

Trade and Navigation, Account's ordered Jan 27, 1157

Trades Unions

"Kirk v. Connor," Address for Return Jan 28, 1201

"Reg. v. Curran and Others," Return ordered and presented Jan 27, 1157, 1200

Labourers (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Nov 26, 116

Labourers (Ireland) Acts Amendment (No. 2) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Nov 26, 108

Land Department (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Nov 27, 154

Read 2^o Dec 8, 710

Com. Dec 9, 768

Land Department (Ireland) [Salaries, &c.]

Instruction to Com. Dec 9, 784

Land Law (Wales) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 4, 640

Land Purchase Acts (Ireland) (Applications)

Return ordered Nov 28, 224

Land Purchase (Ireland) Acts (Default of Instalments)

Return ordered Dec 4, 639

Land Tenure (Ireland) (Arbitration)

Motion (Mr. S. Lefevre) Jan 30, 1404

Land Tenure (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 28, 184

Law Agents (Scotland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 110

Law and Justice and Police

Assizes—Late Sittings, Q. Mr. Pickersgill; A. The Home Sec. Feb 3, 1621

Corrupt Practices Act and Parliamentary Elections, Qs. Mr. Howorth, Mr. A. O'Connor, Mr. Joicey, Mr. Cobb; As. The Att. Gen. Jan 23, 900; Q. Mr. Labouchere; A. The Sol. Gen. Jan 26, 1026

Explosives Act—A Miner with Gunpowder, Q. Mr. Burt; A. The Home Sec. Jan 29, 1275

Firearms, Dangerous Use of, Qs. Mr. Talbot, Mr. J. Lowther; As. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 4, 519

First Offenders, Address for Return Feb 4, 1800

Hardwick, Catherine, Case of, Qs. Mr. Bradlaugh; As. The Home Sec. Dec 2, 343; Dec 8, 702

Hargan, Walter, Notice of Motion (Mr. J. Lowther) Dec 4, 542; Motion Dec 5, 681

Inquests—Bedford, The Late Duke of, Qs. Mr. Cobb; As. The Home Sec. Jan 22, 789; Feb 2, 1518; Qs. Mr. Cobb, Mr. Morton; As. The Home Sec. Jan 23, 893; Qs. Mr. Cobb, Mr. Pickersgill; As. The Home Sec. Jan 26, 1024

Intimidation at Plymouth—"Regina v. Curran and Others," Q. Mr. Howell; A. The Att. Gen. Jan 23, 900

Intimidation—"The Conspiracy and Property Act, 1875," Q. Mr. Fenwick; A. The Home Sec. Dec 4, 525

Juvenile Offenders, Q. Mr. Mather; A. The Under Home Sec. Dec 5, 644

"Kirk v. Connor," Address for Return Jan 28, 1201

Licensing—Tied Public Houses—"Keen v. Usher and Others, Limited," Q. Mr. J. Kelly; A. The Home Sec. Jan 30, 1389

Locket, Thomas—Stealing a Postman's Bag, Q. Mr. Newnes; A. The Home Sec. Jan 30, 1392

Law and Justice and Police—cont.

Middlesex Magistrates, Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Home Sec. Feb 3, 1616

"Mitchell v. Regina" (see title Army—Officers)

Northampton Meeting—Prohibition, Q. Mr. Bradlaugh; A. The Home Sec. Dec 2, 345; Address for Return Dec 4, 542

Penal Servitude—Legislation, Q. Mr. Leng; A. The Home Sec. Dec 4, 520

Pensions, Legal—Case of Mr. T. Cadman, Q. Mr. J. W. Sidebotham; A. The Sec. to Treas. Feb 13, 619

Petty and Quarter Sessions, Jurisdiction in, Q. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth; A. The Home Sec. Dec 4, 521

Police

Assisting the Police, Q. Mr. Brookfield; A. The Home Sec. Dec 4, 520

Chief Constable of Cardiganshire, Q. Mr. B. Rowlands; A. The Home Sec. Dec 1, 231; Q. Mr. S. T. Evans; A. The Home Sec. Dec 4, 522

Matrons at Police Stations, Q. Sir R. Fowler; A. The Home Sec. Dec 9, 756

Metropolitan Police (see title Metropolis)

Prisons

Chatham—Dynamite Prisoners, Q. Mr. J. O'Connor; A. The Home Sec. Dec 4, 532

Clerks, Q. Mr. Lawson; A. The First Lord of Treas. Dec 4, 536; Q. Mr. J. McCarthy; A. The Home Sec. Dec 8, 698

Probate and Divorce Court, Q. Mr. J. Kelly; A. The First Lord of Treas. Jan 27, 1154

Punishments, Scale of, Q. Obs. Lord Norton, Lord Herschell, Lord Chancellor Dec 2, 336

"R. v. Curran and Others," Address for Return Jan 27, 1157

Reformatory and Industrial Schools (see EDUCATION)

LAWSON, Mr. H. L. W., St. Pancras, W.

Army Pensions—Case of J. Higham, 1518

Metropolitan Water Supply, 762, 1397

Post Office—Savings Bank Department—Officers, 757

Prison Clerks, 536

LAWSON, Sir W., Cumberland, Cocker-mouth

Parliament—Business of the House, 38

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 1R. 149; 2R. 414, 502, 504, 505

LEA, Mr. T., Londonderry, S.

Bank Act, 125

Ireland

Litton, Mr. Justice—Death of, 166

Post Office—Mails, 129

Railways—County Donegal, 764

Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 728

Parliament—Business of the House, 38

Leaseholders Enfranchisement Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 102

Leaseholders (Ireland) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 106

LEES, Mr. E., Oldham
Army—Magazine Rifles, Res. 1678

LEFEVRE, Right Hon. J. G. Shaw, Bradford, Central
Ireland
Land Acts, Advances Under, 227
Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 140½, 1410, 1478, 1493
Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 724, 725
Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 474, 479, 508, 509
Sinking Fund, 705, 759

LENG, Mr. J., Dundee
Cattle, Foreign, Importation of, 236
Customs—Wine Duties, 1275
Merchant Shipping Act, 692
Navy—Crozet Islands—Missing Vessels, 697
Penal Servitude—Legislation, 520
Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 875
Railways
Regulation of, 1176
Servants—Hours of Labour, 790
Scotch and American Mails, 1291

LETHBRIDGE, Sir R., Kensington, N.
Ceylon—Military Expenditure, 346
Commercial Treaties, 346
Education—Latimer Road Board School, 699
Merchandise Marks Act, 699
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 293, 294, 295; Com. 1051, 1060, 1061, 1065, 1091

LEVESON-GOWER, Mr. G. G., Stoke-upon-Trent
Asiatic Turkey, Papers Relating to, 1021
Cyprus—Revenue and Expenditure, 237

Licensed Premises (Scotland)
Return ordered Jan 27, 1157

Licensing
Tied Public Houses—"Keen v. Usher and Others, Limited," Q. Mr. J. Kelly; A. The Home Sec. Jan 30, 1389

Licensing (Ireland) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Jan 30, 1500

LICHFIELD, Bishop of Presentation to Benefices Bill, 2R. 1613

Lichfield Cathedral Bill
1. Presented; Read 1^o * Nov 25, 32
2R.; Bill referred to Examiners Feb 3, 1614

Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889
Return ordered Jan 29, 1381

Lighthouse Illuminants (South Foreland Experiments)
Return ordered and presented Nov 25, 36

LIMERICK, Earl of
Tramways Order in Council (Ireland) (Athenry and Tuam Railway) Bill, 2R. 1385

Liquor Laws (Scotland) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 108

Liquor Traffic Local Veto Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 101

Liquor Traffic Local Veto (Scotland) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 114

Liquor Traffic Local Veto (Wales) Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 101

Literature, Science, and Art
British Museum—Hackney Carriage Stand, Q. Mr. J. Rowlands; A. The Home Sec. Jan 29, 1280
Natural History Museum—Electric Light, Q. Sir G. Campbell; A. The First Com. of Works Dec 5, 652; Q. Sir G. Campbell; A. The Sec. to Treas. Dec 9, 746
South Kensington Museum
Attendants' Pay, &c., Q. Mr. Whitmore; A. The Sec. to Treas. Dec 1, 228; Q. Mr. Wallace; A. The Vice Pres. Dec 4, 523
Plans for the Completion of, Qs. Mr. Bartley, Dr. Tanner; As. The First Com. of Works Jan 27, 1152

LLEWELLYN, Mr. E. H., Somerset, N.
Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 951
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Order for Com. 606, 607

LLOYD-GEORGE, Mr. D., Carnarvon, &c.
Mexico—Arrest of Officers of the "Seaforth," 1025
Tithes Bill, Com. 1056, 1539, 1540, 1542, 1543, 1545, 1573, 1574, 1598, 1602, 1732
Wales
Burial Scandal, 1281
Gwylwyr Sett Quarry, 646, 1146

Local Authorities (Scotland) Loans Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 109

Local Bankruptcy (Ireland) Amendment Bill
c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 4, 639

Local Government Board (England and Wales)County Councils

County Councils and Education. Q. The Marquess of Hartington; A. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 4, 528; Q. Mr. Bryce; A. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 4, 533

Pleasure Boats on the Severn. Q. Mr. G. Allsopp; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Nov 27, 126

Roads and Footpaths. Q. Sir J. Kennaway; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Nov 27, 120

Homerton Hospital (see title Metropolis)

Local Taxation, Relief of. Q. Mr. Oldroyd; A. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 5, 654

Public Roads—Barbed Wires. Q. Mr. Brunner; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Dec 2, 345

Registration of Deaths. Q. Mr. Bradlaugh; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Nov 27, 123

Vaccination—Clarendon Press—An Unvaccinated Lad. Q. Mr. Fenwick; A. The Home Sec. Feb 2, 1526

Local Taxation (Customs and Excise Duties) Act

Q. Colonel Hambro; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Feb 2, 1524

County Councils and Education (see Local Government Board)

Local Taxation (Exchequer Contributions) Returns

Q. Mr. Hobhouse; A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Nov 28, 159

LOCKWOOD, Mr. F., York

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour. Res. 944

London School Board Elections Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 111

London Taxation Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 103
2R.; Bill withdrawn Jan 26, 1128

London Water (Meter) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 105

London Water Supply (see Metropolis)

LORD ADVOCATE, The (see ROBERTSON, Right Hon. J. P. B.)

LORD CHANCELLOR, The (see HALSBURY, Lord)

LORD LIEUTENANT OF IRELAND—Chief Secretary to the (see BALFOUR, Right Hon. A. J.)

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (see CRANBROOK, Viscount)

LORD PRIVY SEAL (see CADOGAN, Earl)

LOTHIAN, Marquess of (Secretary for Scotland)

Fishery Board (Scotland) Bill. 1R. 690

LOWTHER, Right Hon. J., Kent, Isle of Thanet

Colonies—Fiscal Arrangements. 1622

Firearms—Increase of Licence Duties. 520

Law and Justice—Hargan, Walter. 512; Res. 682, 683, 684

Parliament—Business of the House. Res. 173, 175

LOWTHER, Mr. J. W., Cumberland, Penrith

Charity Commissioners

Christ's Hospital. 761

Lambeth Charities. 1288

St. George's Church, Botolph Lane. 657

MACARTNEY, Mr. W. E., Antrim, S.

Ireland—Land Tenure (Arbitration). Res. 1439

Pollen Fisheries (Ireland) Bill. 2R. 224; Com. 627, 1612

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill. 2R. 356, 442, 479

Seed Potatoes Supply (Ireland) Bill. Com. 677

Supply—Relief of Distress in Ireland. 554, 577, 580

MACLURE, Mr. J. W., Lancashire, S.E., Stretford

Solicitors' Magistracy Bill. 2R. 628, 888

MAC NEILL, Mr. J. G. S., Donegal, S.

Ireland—Crown Prosecutors—Appointment of Mr. R. Olphert. 707

MCARTHUR, Mr. A., Leicester

Portugal and the East African Slave Trade. 234

MCCALMONT, Captain J., Antrim, E.

Ireland—Mails. 1397

MCCARTAN, Mr. M., Down, S.

Ireland

Fair Rent Appeals. 539

"Harold," Wreck of. 538

Post Office

Mails. 129, 658, 753

Sunday Delivery of Letters. 539

Pollen Fisheries (Ireland) Bill. Order for Com. 629

MCCARTHY, Mr. J., Londonderry

Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Tipperary Prosecutions. 691

Distress—Land Commission. 708

Prison Clerks. 698

MCDONALD, Dr. R., Ross and Cromarty
 Scotland
 Corn Mills, 693
 Naval Reserve, 691
 West Highlands and Islands Commission,
 239

MCDONALD, Mr. P., Sligo, N.
 Trust Funds and Colonial Securities, 750

MCLAREN, Mr. W. S. B., Cheshire, Crewe
 Indian Councils (No. 2) Bill, 1616
 Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res.
 1007; Select Com., Res. 1721, 1722

MADDEN, Right Hon. D. H. (Attorney General for Ireland), *Dublin University
 Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 629, 1195

Ireland
 Criminal Law and Procedure Act
 Castlereagh, Arrest of Women at, 1631
 Long, Mr. 1530
 Nully, Mr. P. 1530
 Walsh, Mr. 165, 663, 706, 756, 1402
 Distress—Failure of Potato Crop
 Relief Works, 892, 1018, 1025, 1155,
 1531, 1532
 Seed Potatoes, 538, 1022
 Distress—Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act —Administration, Res. 1730

Education
 Educational Endowments — Rainey
 School, Magherafelt, Res. 633, 634,
 639, 640
 Teachers' Promotion, 788

Land Acts and Land Commission
 Decisions of Sub-Commissioners—
 Ennistymon Board of Guardians, 541
 Fair Rent Appeals, 540
 Land Purchase, 662, 1528, 1628
 Land Purchase Acts Returns, 897

Landlord and Tenant
 Donegal Evictions, 1014
 Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1443

Law and Justice and Police
 Cork Bankruptcy Court, 1630
 Crown Prosecutors—Appointment of Mr. R. Olphert, 707
 "Heffernan v. Carter," 533
 Jurors, 1296
 Police at Evictions, 1292
 Magistrates' Pensions, 1015

Miscellaneous
 Catholic Priests at Elections, 1015
 County Cess in Kerry, 1529

Railways—Ennis and Scariff, 538
 (Refer also to sub-heading District Relief Works)

Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 716, 739, 740

Pollen Fisheries (Ireland) Bill, Com. 1612

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts
 (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 474, 507, 508, 509, 511,
 512; Order for Com. 675

[cont.]

MADDEN, Right Hon. D. H.—cont.
 Seed Potatoes Supply (Ireland) Bill, Com.
 678
 Tramways Order in Council (Ireland)
 (Athenry and Tuam Railway) Bill, 709

MAHONY, Mr. P., Meath, N.
 Ireland—Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res.
 1478, 1489
 Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 727

Mail Ships Bill
 c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Jan 22, 792

Malay Peninsula
Reported Cession of, Q. Mr. De Lisle; A.
 The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Jan 27, 1140

MALCOLM, Colonel J. W., Argyllshire
 Navy—Charts and Surveys—Firth of Clyde,
 642

MAPLE, Mr. J. B., Camberwell, Dulwich
 Austria—Zone Fares on Railways, 236

MAPPIN, Sir F. T., *York, W.R., Hallamshire
 Post Office—Postal Facilities, 1519

MARJORIBANKS, Right Hon. E., *Berwick-shire
 Army—Magazine Rifles, 1022, 1151; Res.
 1631, 1635, 1669, 1682
 Parliament—Adjournment—Christmas Re-
 cess, Res. 770
 Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R.
 627

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister
 Bill
 c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 102

Marriage of Nonconformists (Attendance of Registrars) Bill
 c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 2, 351

MATHER, Mr. W., Lancashire, S.E., Gorton
 Law and Justice—Juvenile Offenders, 644

MATTHEWS, Right Hon. H. (Secretary of State for the Home Department),
*Birmingham, E.
 Army
 "Mitchell v. Regina," 529
 Royal Engineers—Petition, 527
 Church of England Revenue Returns, 231
 Friendly Societies—Music at Meetings, 763

Labour
 Bow Factory, Insanitary State of, 160
 Clarendon Press—An Unvaccinated Lad, 1526
 Factory and Workshop Act, 345
 Gas Strike — Government Supplying
 Labourers, 532

[cont.]

MATTHEWS, Right Hon. H. —cont.

Manchester Ship Canal—Number of Accidents, 749

Mines

Accidents—Inspectors' Reports, 1391

Coal Mines Act—Examiners, 1525

Employment of Workmen as Inspectors, 1391

Explosives Act—A Miner with Gunpowder, 1276

Secretary for, Res. 1180

Weighing Minerals, 531

Law and Justice and Police

Assizes—Late Sittings, 1622

Hardwick, Catherine, 343, 702

Inquests—Bedford, The Late Duke of, 790, 894, 1024, 1519

Intimidation—The Conspiracy and Property Act, 525

Licensing—Tied Public Houses—"Keen v. Usher and Others," 1890

Locket, T.—Stealing a Postman's Bag, 1392

Middlesex Magistrates, 1616

Northampton Meeting, Prohibition of, 345

Penal Servitude—Legislation, 520

Petty and Quarter Sessions, Jurisdiction in, 522

Police

Assisting the Police, 521

Metropolitan Police (see title Metropolis)

Prisons

Chatham—Dynamite Prisoners, 532

Clerks, 698

Metropolis

Hackney Carriage Stands at the British Museum, 1280

Police—Pay, &c. 530, 701

Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1517

Midland Railway Act, 1890, Evictions Under, 890

Reformatory and Industrial Schools, 1617

Reformatory and Industrial Schools Bill, 707

Religious Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 1746, 1747

Wales

Chief Constable of Cardiganhire, 232, 523

Llanaher—Alleged Burial Scandal, 1282

MAXWELL, Sir H. E. (A Lord of the Treasury), Wigton

Ireland

Mails, 1397

Shannon Navigation, 1298

MAYNE, Admiral R. C., Pembroke and Haverfordwest

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 314

Merchandise Marks Act (see Board of Trade)

Merchant Shipping (see Board of Trade)

Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 115

2R. Jan 27, 1200

Metropolis

City of London Parochial Charities (see Charity Commissioners)

Electric Lighting (see Board of Trade)

Hackney Carriage Stands at the British Museum, Q. Mr. J. Rowlands; A. The

Home Sec. Jan 29, 1280

Itinerant Musicians, Q. Mr. Jacoby; A. The Ch. of Exch. Feb 2, 1516

Metropolitan Asylums Board — Eastern Hospital at Homerton, Q. Mr. Pickersgill;

A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Jan 23, 896

Parks—Hyde Park, Skating in, Q. Mr. Keay; A. The First Com. of Works Jan 23, 899

Police

Chief Commissioner, Report of, Q. Mr. J. Rowlands; A. The Under Home Sec.

Feb 3, 1625

Increase of Pay, Address for Return Jan 26, 1127

Pay, Qs. Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. H. Vincent; As. The Home Sec. Dec 4, 530; Q. Mr.

H. Vincent; A. The Home Sec. Dec 8, 700

Valuation (Metropolis) Act, Q. Mr. Baumann; A. The Home Sec. Feb 2, 1516

Water Supply, Qs. Mr. Lawson; As. The First Lord of Treas. Dec 9, 762; Jan 30,

1397; Q. Mr. Causton; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 3, 1626

Metropolis Management Acts Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 27, 155

Metropolis Water Supply Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Jan 30, 1403

Metropolitan Asylums Board (see Metropolis)

Metropolitan Hospitals, &c.

Motion for Select Com. agreed to and Com. nominated Jan 23, 889

Evidence, &c. to be printed Jan 26, 1012

Metropolitan Water Companies' Charges Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 104

Ordered to be examined by Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills Jan 26, 1128

MEXICO

Arrest of Officers of the "Seaforth," Q. Mr. Lloyd-George; A. The Under Sec. for

Fn. Affrs. Jan 26, 1025

Midwives Registration Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 25, 224

Mines (see Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

Mines (Eight Hours) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 103

Mining Accidents Insurance (Scotland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 104

MONTAGU, Mr. S., Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel

Currency—Light Gold, 239

Gold Coinage Bill, 1618

Inhabited House Duty, 1617

Tower of London Wharf, 1618

MORGAN, Right Hon. G. Osborne, Denbighshire, E.

Llanaber—Burial Scandal, 1281

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 1R. 136;

2R. 275, 294, 295; Com. 1033, 1037, 1045,

1050, 1053, 1059, 1070, 1076, 1089, 1090,

1094, 1301, 1305, 1306, 1310, 1319, 1325,

1362, 1538, 1540, 1543, 1551, 1554, 1564,

1565, 1569, 1592, 1609

MORGAN, Mr. J. L., Carmarthen, W.

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 304;

Com. 1567

MORGAN, Mr. O. V., Battersea

Commercial Treaties with the Colonies, 1027

MORGAN, Mr. W. P., Merthyr Tydvil

Mines, Secretary for, Res. 1176

Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 594, 595

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com.

1107, 1603, 1605, 1606, 1608

MORLEY, Right Hon. J., Newcastle-upon-Tyne

Ireland

Criminal Law and Procedure Act—Administration, 1156, 1290

Distress—Relief Works, 1026, 1400

Land Purchase Acts, 131, 349

Parliament

Business of the House, 537, 744, 1801

Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 70

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 378, 421

Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 561, 562, 564, 580

Transfer of Railways (Ireland) Bill—Lords Amendts. con. 744

MORTON, Mr. A. C., Peterborough

House Duty and Income Tax, 752

Inquests—Bedford, The Late Duke of, 893

Lambeth Charities, 1287

MORTON, Mr. A. C.—cont.

Railways

Return Tickets, 1396

Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 966, 1724

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com.

1033, 1044, 1045, 1049, 1050, 1578, 1579, 1589

MOUNT-EDGCUMBE, Earl of

Archdeaconry of Cornwall Bill, 2R. 335

Parliament—Queen's Speech, Report, 333

MUNDELLA, Right Hon. A. J., Sheffield, Brightside

Chapel Royal, Whitehall, 1277

Education

Assisted Education, 536

Blind, Education of, 527

Christ's Hospital, 761

Perpetual Pensions, Res. 204, 205, 206

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 516

MURDOCH, Mr. C. T., Reading

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 927

Museums and Gymnasiums Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Dec 9, 767

National School Teachers (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 106

Natural History Museum (see Literature, Science, and Art)

Naval Reserve (No. 1)

Return ordered Dec 9, 765

Naval Reserve (No. 2)

Return ordered Dec 9, 766

NAVY

Ceylon—Military Expenditure, Q. Sir R. Lethbridge; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Dec 2, 346

Charts and Surveys—Firth of Clyde, Q. Mr. Bradlaugh; A. The Ld. Adv. Nov 28, 160; Qs. Colonel Malcolm, Mr. Bradlaugh; As. The First Lord of Admy. Dec 5, 642

Docks

Haulbowline, Q. Dr. Tanner; A. The First Lord of Admy. Jan 27, 1155

Portsmouth, Q. Mr. Labouchere; A. The First Lord of Admy. Jan 27, 1141

Lisbon—British Naval Hospital, Q. Sir E. Watkin; A. The First Lord of Admy. Nov 27, 123

Naval Prison at Leves, Q. Mr. T. H. Bolton; A. The First Lord of Admy. Jan 30, 1391

Officers—Lieutenants' List, Q. Captain Price; A. The First Lord of Admy. Dec 5, 642

[cont.

[cont.

NAVY—cont.

Ordnance Department

Armaments Vote—Report, of Committee on Public Accounts, Q. Mr. Duff; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 3, 1620

Magazine Rifles (see ARMY)

Royal Naval Reserve (Scotland)—Employment of by an Officer for Private Purposes, Q. Dr. R. McDonald; A. The First Lord of Admy. Dec 8, 691

Ships

"Barracouta," Q. Mr. Gourley; A. The First Lord of Admy. Jan 29, 1278

Crozet Islands—Missing Vessels, Q. Mr. Leng; A. The First Lord of Admy. Dec 8, 697

"Mohawk" and "Sandfly," Q. Mr. Gourley; A. The First Lord of Admy. Jan 29, 1278

"Polyphemus"—Report of Experiments, Q. Mr. J. B. Roberts; A. The First Lord of Admy. Jan 30, 1389

"Sans Pareil"—The 110-Ton Gun, Q. Mr. Gourley; A. The First Lord of Admy. Feb 2, 1515

"Serpent," Q. Mr. Gourley; A. The First Lord of Admy. Nov 27, 121

"Shannon," Q. Dr. Tanner; A. The First Lord of Admy. Jan 27, 1156

"Tyne," Q. Mr. Labouchere; A. The First Lord of Admy. Dec 5, 658

NEWNES, Mr. G., Cambridge, E., Newmarket

Law and Justice—Locket, Thomas, 1392

NOLAN, Colonel J. P., Galway, N.

Army—Magazine Rifles, 518; Res. 1650, 1675

Ireland

Criminal Law, &c. Act—Nully, Mr. P. 1530
Distress—Failure of Potato Crops
Relief Works, &c. 892, 1023, 1293, 1402, 1531

Seed Potatoes, 538, 1016

Distress—Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act—Administration, Res. 1727

Koch, Dr.—Discoveries, 1289

Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 738

Parliament

Business of the House, Res. 173

Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 97
Standing Orders, Select Com., Res. 1385

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 473, 474

Seed Potatoes (Supply) (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 135; Com. 677

Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 567, 592, 594, 596; Report, 680

Tramways Order in Council (Ireland) (Athenry and Tuam Railway) Bill, 2R. 710

Transfer of Land (Ireland) Bill, Com. 626

NORRIS, Mr. E. S., Tower Hamlets, Limehouse

Parliamentary Oath and Mr. Bradlaugh, Res. 1173

Northampton (Prohibition of Public Meeting)

Address for Copy of Correspondence Dec 4, 542

NORTHCOTE, Hon. Sir H. S., Exeter

Parliament

Mr. Bradlaugh and the Parliamentary Oath, Res. 1170

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 970

NORTON, Lord

Education Code, 685

Law and Justice—Punishments, Scale of, 336

O'BRIEN, Mr. J. F. X., Mayo, S.

Ireland—Distress—Relief Works, 132, 703

Occupiers' and Lodgers' (Metropolis) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Jan 23, 904

Occupying Tenants' Enfranchisement Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Nov 26, 109

O'CONNOR, Mr. A., Donegal, E.

Ireland

Army—Donegal Militia, 1629

Distress—Relief Works, 1398, 1532

Labourers' Cottages in Ossory, 1532

Parliamentary Elections—Corrupt Practices Act, 901

O'CONNOR, Mr. J., Tipperary, S.

Chatham Prison—Dynamite Prisoners, 532

Ireland

Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1441, 1469, 1475

Law and Justice—"Heffernan v. Carter and Tuohy," 134, 532

Parliament

Business of the House, 1802

Standing Orders, Select Com., Res. 1387

OLDROYD, Mr. M., Dewsbury

Local Taxation, Relief of, 654

O'NEILL, Hon. R. T., Antrim, Mid.

Ireland—Methylated Spirits, Trade in, 1013

Outlawries Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o Nov 25, 36

PACIFIC ISLANDS

Australasian Federal Council—British Trade, Q. Sir T. Esmonde; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Feb 3, 1621

PARKER, Mr. C. S., Perth

Parliament—Adjournment—Christmas Recess, Res. 774

[cont.]

PARKER, Mr. C. S.—cont.

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res.
949, 950
Scotland—Higher Education, Res. 1684, 1715

Parliament

LORDS—

MEETING OF THE PARLIAMENT Nov 15

The SESSION OF PARLIAMENT opened by Commission

ROLL OF THE LORDS—Delivered

Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech delivered by The LORD CHANCELLOR, 1

The Queen's Speech having been Reported by The LORD CHANCELLOR, an Address to
HER MAJESTY thereon moved by the Lord WINDSOR (the Motion being seconded by the Lord ARDILAUN) Nov 25, 5; Address agreed to, nemine dissente

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS
Reported Dec 2, 333

Chairman of Committees, The Earl of Morley appointed, nemine dissente, to take the Chair in all Coms. of this House for this Session Nov 25, 31; The Lord Chancellor appointed to take the Chair in the absence of the Earl of Morley Dec
9, 784

Committee for Privileges, Appointed Nov 25, 32

Sub-Committee for the Journals, Appointed
Nov 25, 32

Appeal Committee, Appointed Nov 25, 32;
Report Dec 9, 784

Committee of Selection, Appointed Jan 27, 1140

Standing Orders Committee, Appointed Jan
27, 1140

Business of the House

Q., Obs. Earl Granville, The Marquess of Salisbury Dec 8, 685; Jan 22, 785

Miscellaneous

House of Lords Offices, Select Com. appointed Jan 27, 1140

Stoppages in the Streets, Order to prevent, renewed Nov 25, 32

New Peers

Jan 22—The Right Honourable Sir Francis
Richard Sandford, K.C.B., created Baron Sandford of Sandford in the county of Salop; Sir Edward Cecil Guinness, Baronet, created Baron Iveagh, of Iveagh in the county of Down

Jan 29—The Right Honourable Sir James Hannen, Knight, President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High
Court of Justice, appointed a Lord of Appeal in Ordinary under the provisions of the Appellate

[cont.]

PARLIAMENT—LORDS—New Peers—cont.

Jurisdiction Act, 1876, with the dignity of a Baron for life by the style and title of Baron
Hannen of Burdock in the county of Sussex

Sat First

Dec 8—The Lord Cairns, after the death of his brother

Jan 23—The Lord Southampton, after the death of his father

Feb 2—The Lord Cottesloe, after the death of his father

Standing Committees

Standing Orders Relating to Motion for Select Com. and Com. nominated Jan 27,
1132; Report Feb 3, 1613

Took the Oath for the First Time

Jan 22—The Lord Carrington

Feb 3—The Lord Fitzhardinge

COMMONS—

Address in Answer to Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech

The Queen's Speech having been Reported by The DEPUTY SPEAKER: An humble
Address thereon moved by Colonel KEN-YON-SLANEY (the Motion being seconded by Mr. FORREST FULTON) Nov 25, 39

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS
Reported Dec 1, 240

Business of the House and Public Business

Statement by The First Lord of Treas. Nov
25, 37; Qs. Mr. Lea, Mr. Cremer, Sir
W. Lawson; As. The First Lord of Treas.
Nov 25, 37; Q. Mr. Kenny; A. The Chf.
Sec. Nov 28, 165; Res. Nov 28, 166;
Q. Sir J. Goldsmid; A. The First Lord of
Treas. Dec 4, 535; Qs. Mr. Bryce, Mr. T.
W. Russell, Mr. J. Morley; As. The First
Lord of Treas. Dec 4, 536; Statement by
The First Lord of Treas. Dec 8, 744; Q.
Mr. J. Morley; A. The First Lord of
Treas. Dec 8, 744; Q. Mr. Labouchere;
A. The First Lord of Treas. Jan 22, 791;
Q. Mr. Sexton; A. The First Lord of
Treas. Jan 26, 1030; Qs. Mr. H. H.
Fowler, Dr. Tanner; As. The First Lord of Treas. Jan 26, 1109; Qs. Dr. Tanner,
Mr. S. Rendel, Mr. S. T. Evans, Mr.
Labouchere, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr.
Dillwyn, Sir J. Swinburne; As. The Sec. to
Treas., The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 29, 1381;
Q. Mr. Cobb; A. The First Lord of Treas.
Feb 2, 1527; Statement by the First Lord of Treas. Feb 4, 1800; Qs. Mr. J. Rowlands, Mr. J. Morley, Mr. J. O'Connor; As. The
First Lord of Treas. Feb 4, 1800

Committees

Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms (House of Commons), Select Com. nominated Feb 2, 1612

[cont.]

PARLIAMENT—COMMONS—Committees—cont.

Privileges, Com. ordered Nov 25, 35
Public Accounts, Com. nominated; Papers, &c. ordered Feb 4, 1800
Selection, Com. appointed Jan 29, 1270

Members

Arrest and Imprisonment of Irish Members under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act—Letter Received by Mr. Speaker Nov 25, 33
Bradlaugh, Mr., and the Parliamentary Oath, Motion to Expunge from the Journals of the House the Res. of the 22nd of June, 1880 (Mr. Hunter) Jan 27, 115*

Miscellaneous

"Elections," "Witnesses," "Metropolitan Police," and "Votes and Proceedings," Orders and Res. Nov 25, 34
Journals, Order for Printing Nov 25, 36
Parliamentary Elections—Corrupt Practices Act, Qs. Mr. Howorth, Mr. A. O'Connor, Mr. Joicey, Mr. Cobb; As. The Att. Gen. Jan 23, 900; Q. Mr. Labouchere; A. The Sol. Gen. Jan 26, 1026
Parliamentary Electors in the Scotch Crofter Counties, Q. Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 2, 1515
Parliamentary Registration, Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The First Lord of Treas. Dec 4, 535
Reprints of Partly Considered Bills, Q. Mr. Roby; A. The First Lord of Treas. Feb 2, 1527
Speaker, Mr., Indisposition of, Mr. Courtney took the Chair as Deputy Speaker in the Absence of Mr. Speaker Nov 25 to Dec 9
Time of the House, Q. Mr. Bradlaugh; A. The First Lord of Treas. Dec 2, 349

New Members Sworn

Nov 25—Sir Charles John Pearson, Knight, Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews
 Henry John Roby, Esquire, South East Lancashire (Eccles Division)
 Jan 22—Sir John Pope Hennessy, County of Kilkenny (North Kilkenny Division)
 Jan 27—Christopher Furness, Esquire, Borough of the Hartlepoons
 Jan 30—Sir Frederick George Milner, Baronet, County of Nottingham (Bassetlaw Division)

New WritsDuring Recess

For South East Lancashire (Eccles Division), v. Honourable Alfred John Francis Egerton, Esquire, deceased
 For Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews, v. Moir Tod Stormonth Darling, Esquire, one of the Senators of Her Majesty's College of Justice in Scotland
 For Hartlepool, v. Thomas Richardson, Esquire, deceased

[cont.]

PARLIAMENT—COMMONS—New Writs—cont.

Dec '2—For Nottingham County (Bassetlaw Division), v. William Beckett, Esquire, deceased
 Dec 9—For Kilkenny County (Northern Division), v. Edward Mulhallen Marum, Esquire, deceased
 Feb 4—For Borough of Northampton, v. Charles Bradlaugh, Esquire, deceased

Parliamentary Papers

Distribution, Order for Select Com.; Com. nominated; Papers, &c. ordered Jan 26, 1127
Sessional Papers—Annual Index, Qs. Mr. Knowles; As. The Sec. to Treas. Dec 8, 700; Jan 22, 787

Petitions

Com. nominated Nov 26, 116; Reports Dec 4, 542; Feb 4, 1800

Private Bills

Standing Orders, Select Com. nominated Jan 30, 1385

Rules and Order of Debate (see Speaker, The)Sittings and Adjournments of the House

Christmas Recess, Statement by The First Lord of Treas. Dec 8, 707; Motion Dec 9, 770

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER

House of Commons

Cleaners (see title Government Contracts)
Communication with Libraries and Smoking Rooms, Q. Mr. R. Cooke; A. The First Com. of Works Dec 4, 526
Reading Room—Electric Light, Q. Sir J. Swinburne; A. The First Com. of Works Jan 26, 1014
Tea Room—Map of Proposed New Railways in Ireland, Q. Mr. P. Smith; A. The Chf. Sec. Dec 8, 704
Tea Room Table, Qs. Mr. Brunner; As. The First Com. of Works Nov 27, 120; Dec 4, 524

Parliamentary Elections Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 114

Parliamentary Elections (Votes of Seamen) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Dec 2, 351

Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 104

Parliamentary Voters' Qualification Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 114

Parliamentary Voters' Registration Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 104

Parliamentary Voters' Registration (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 105

PARNELL, Mr. C. S., Cork

Ireland—Criminal Law, &c. Act, Notice of Motion, 787

Parochial Boards (Scotland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 101

Payment of Members Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 112

PEEL, Right Hon. A. W. (see SPEAKER, The)

Pensions, Perpetual

Motion Nov 28, 185

(Refer also to sub-heading Pensions, under titles Army, Police, Post Office, &c.)

PETERBOROUGH, Bishop of

Children's Life Insurance Bill, 2R. 786, 787

PHILIPES, Mr. J. W., Lanark, Mid.

Pensions, Perpetual, Res. 209

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 445, 448

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, 525; Res. 972

PICKARD, Mr. B., York, W.R., Norman-ton

Mines, Secretary for, Res. 1178, 1182

PICKERSGILL, Mr. E. H., Bethnal Green, S.W.

Army—Woolwich Barracks, Theatrical Entertainments at, 1286

Civil Service—Writers, 1149

Homerton Hospital, 896

Law and Justice

Assizes—Late Sittings, 1621

Inquests—Bedford, The Late Duke of, 1024

Metropolitan Police, Pay of, 530

Post Office

Employés—Dismissed Postmen, &c., 751; Res. 210, 215, 216

Savings Bank Clerks, 788, 1021, 1148

Telegraph Messengers, 751

PICTON, Mr. J. A., Leicester

Africa

Gold Coast

Akoto Mamley, Case of, 235

Slave Trade, 234

King Ja Ja, 342, 644

Oil River Districts, Administration of, 343

PICTON, Mr. J. A.—cont.

Church of England—Revenue Returns, 230

Ireland—Post Office—Mails, 239

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 260;

Order for Com. 618; Com. 1033, 1042, 1335, 1544, 1551

West Indies—Tobago—Chief Justice, 232

Pig Iron Warrants Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 104

Places of Worship Enfranchisement Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 102

Places of Worship (Sites) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 27, 155

PLAYFAIR, Right Hon. Sir Lyon, Leeds, S.

Ireland—Congested Districts—Reports, 758

Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 588

PLUNKET, Right Hon. D. R. (First Commissioner of Works, &c.), Dublin University

Chapel Royal, Whitehall, 1277

Government Contracts

Birmingham Post Office, 651, 702

Cleaners in the Houses of Parliament, 1144, 1395

Government Offices—Messrs. Brass, 1150

Metropolis—Hyde Park, Skating in, 899

Natural History Museum—Electric Lighting, 652

Parliament—House of Commons

Cleaners in the Houses of Parliament (see Government Contracts)

Communication with Libraries and Smoking Room, 526

National Standard, 526

Reading Room—Electric Lighting, 1014

Tea Room Table, 120, 524

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 469

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 934, 943, 944

South Kensington Museum, Plans for the Completion of, 1153

Poisoned Flesh Prohibition Act (1864) Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 111

POLAND

Political Prisoners, Q. Sir J. Pope Hennessy;

A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Feb 4, 1802

Police (see title Law and Justice and Police, and Metropolis)

Police Forces (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 28, 184

4 D

Police (Metropolis) Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Jan 27, 1200Police (Metropolis)—Increase of Pay

Address for Return Jan 26, 1127

Pollen Fisheries (Ireland) Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 113Read 2^o Nov 28, 224

Com.—R.P. Dec 1, 332

Order for Com. Dec 4, 629

Com. Jan 26, 1110; Feb 2, 1611

Poor Law (England and Wales)Eviction of Miners, Q. Mr. Atherley-Jones;
A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Jan 27, 1147Hackney Board of Guardians—Eastern Hospital at Homerton, Q. Mr. Pickersgill;
A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Jan 23, 896Shardlow Union—Pauper Children and National School Fees, Q. Sir W. Foster; A. The Vice Pres. Dec 5, 654Tramps in Oakum Cages, Q. Mr. A. Thomas;
A. The Pres. Loc. Gov. Bd. Dec 2, 344

Workhouses, &c., Return ordered Dec 5, 666

Poor Law Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 27, 156Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 107Poor Law Workhouses, &c.

Return ordered Dec 5, 666

Poor Rate (Metropolis) Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 110PORTUGALAnglo-Portuguese Agreement*, Q. Mr. Buchanan; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affrs. Nov 28, 163*British Naval Hospital at Lisbon*, Q. Sir E. Watkin; A. The First Lord of Admy. Nov 27, 123*Slave Trade*, Q. Mr. A. M'Arthur; A. The Under Sec. for Cols. Dec 1, 234
(Refer also to title AFRICA)POST OFFICECentral Office—Accommodation*, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 8, 693*Colonial Letter Postage*, Q. Mr. Dixon-Hartland; A. The P.M. Gen. Nov 27, 129*India* (refer to that title, sub-heading Post Office)Ireland (refer to that title, sub-heading Post Office)MailsBridport*, Q. Mr. Brunner; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 5, 660*Great Western*, Q. Mr. Brunner; A. The P.M. Gen. Nov 27, 119Post Office—cont.MiscellaneousBible Classes Held in Reading and Dining Rooms, Q. Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 8, 694*Registered Addresses*, Q. Mr. Boulnois; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 1, 229*Single Letters by Railway*, Q. Mr. T. H. Bolton; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 23, 891OfficialsDischarged Postmen, &c.*, Debate on going into Com. of Supply Nov 28, 210; Q. Mr. W. Isaacson; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 8, 696; Q. Mr. Pickersgill; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 9, 751*Postal and Telegraph Service—Revised Schemes*, Q. Mr. Bradlaugh; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 9, 754*Provincial Officials*, Q. Earl Compton; A. The P.M. Gen. Nov 27, 124Post OfficesBirmingham—New Post Office—Building Materials*, Qs. Mr. S. Buxton; As. The First Com. of Works Dec 5, 650; Dec 8, 701*Postal Facilities—Bradfield, &c., Q. Sir F. Mappin; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 2, 1519Savings BankClerks—Grievances, &c., Q. Mr. Bradlaugh; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 1, 229; Q. Mr. Lawson; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 9, 759; Qs. Mr. Pickersgill; As. The Sec. to Treas. Jan 22, 788; Jan 26, 1021; Q. Mr. Pickersgill; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 27, 1148; Q. Mr. Labouchere; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 30, 1393*Male Sorters' Petition*, Q. Mr. J. Rowlands; A. The P.M. Gen. Feb 3, 1621*Scotland* (refer to that title, sub-heading Post Office)TelegraphsCompensation for Non-Delivery, &c.*, Q. Mr. Hobhouse; A. The P.M. Gen. Nov 28, 158*Messengers*, Q. Mr. Pickersgill; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 9, 751*Railways and Telegraphic Messages*, Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 29, 1279

Return ordered and presented Dec 1, 240

Telephones, Q. Dr. Cameron; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 8, 695*Wales* (refer to that title, sub-heading Post Office)Post Office Telegraphs

Return ordered and presented Dec 1, 240

POSTMASTER GENERAL (see RAIKES, Right Hon. H. C.)POWELL, Mr. F. S., WiganSchool Board for London (Superannuation) Bill*, 2R. 1111, 1197*Teachers' (Registration and Organisation) Bill*, 2R. 1196*Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill*, Com. 1591

POWER, Mr. P. J., Waterford, E.

Parliament—Adjournment—Christmas Re-
cess, Res. 771

Presentation of Benefices Bill

l. Presented; Read 1st Nov 25, 32
Read 2nd, and com. to Com. of the whole
House Feb 3, 1613

Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act (see SCOTLAND)

PRICE, Captain G. E., Devonport
Naval Lieutenants' List, 642

PRIME MINISTER (see SALISBURY, Marquess of)

Prisons (England and Wales) (see title
Law and Justice and Police)

Prisons Acts Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 26, 114

Prisoners (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 28, 105

Private Banks Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 26, 112

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 27, 155
Order for 2R. read, and deferred Dec 4, 627
Read 2nd, and Motion to refer Bill to Select
Com. Jan 22, 792

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill

Qs. Sir J. Goldsmid, Mr. Sexton; As. The
First Lord of Treas. Jan 27, 1154
Notice of Motion (Mr. J. P. B. Robertson)
Nov 25, 37

PROVAND, Mr. A. D., Glasgow, Black-friars, &c.

Railways
Accident Near Eastleigh, 118
Servants—Hours of Labour, 656, 895;
Res. 981
Scotland—Crofters' Commission, 896

Public Houses (Hours of Closing) (Scotland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 26, 115

Public Trustee Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Dec 1, 332

Public Trustee Bill

Q. Mr. H. Vincent; A. The Ch. of Exch.
Jan 27, 1144

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) [Advances]

c. Instruction to Com. Dec 8, 709
Com. Dec 9, 768

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 27, 137
2R. Dec 2, 351, 380, 386; Dec 3, 453
Order for Com. Dec 5, 667
Com. Dec 5, 676

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill

Qs. Mr. Keay; As. The Att. Gen. for Ireland,
The Deputy Speaker Dec 5, 661; Q. Mr.
Keay; A. The Ch. of Exch. Jan 26, 1017
Congested Districts, Reports, Q. Sir L. Play-fair; A. The Chf. Sec. Dec 9, 758
Notice of Motion (Mr. Balfour) Nov 25, 36
Sinking Fund, &c., Qs. Mr. Keay, Mr. S.
Lefevre; As. The Chf. Sec. Dec 8, 704;
Dec 9, 759; Qs. Mr. Keay; As. The Ch. of Exch. Jan 27, 1149; Feb 3, 1623

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 1890-91
[Sinking Funds]

Return ordered and presented Jan 30, 1500

Queen Anne's Bounty (see Government Securities)

QUEENSLAND (see AUSTRALIAN COLONIES)

"R. v. Curran and Others"

Return ordered and presented Jan 27, 1157,
1200

RAIKES, Right Hon. H. C. (Postmaster General), Cambridge University

Post Office
Bradfield Postal Facilities, 1519
Central Post Office Accommodation, 694
Colonial Letter Postage, 129

Ireland

Dublin, 1531
Ennis, 1298
Irish Lotteries, 663
Mails, 130, 559, 895
Tory Island—Telegraphic Communication, 893

Mails

Bridport, 660
Great Western, 119

Miscellaneous

Bible Classes Held in Reading and Dining Rooms, 694
Registered Addresses, 229
Single Post Letters by Railways, 891

Officials

Res. 213, 215, 216, 217, 221
Dismissed Postmen, 696, 751
Postal and Telegraph Service—Revised Schemes, 754
Provincial Officials, 124

RAIKES, Right Hon. H. C.—cont.

Savings Bank Department
Clerks—Grievances, &c. 229, 757, 1148, 1394

Mail Sorters' Petition, 1621

Scotland

American Mails, 1291

Mail Service to Stornoway, 1148

Pollokshields, 1278

Telegraphs

Messengers, 751

Non-Delivery, Compensation for, 158

Railway Messages, 1279

Telephones, 695

Wales—Blaenllecha Post Office, 697

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 323,
324, 325; Com. 1568

Railways (see Board of Trade)

Railway Companies Return Tickets
Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 112

2R. negatived Jan 27, 1198

Railway Servants (Tenure of Houses and Hours of Labour) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Jan 23, 903

Railway Shareholders (Licensing Sessions) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 27, 155

RANDELL, Mr. D., Glamorgan, Gower

Mines, Secretary for, Res. 1186

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 302;
Com. 1103, 1325, 1580, 1582, 1588

RASCH, Major F. C., Essex, S.E.

Army—Magazine Rifles, 1390; Res. 1650,
1670

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1353

RATHBONE Mr. W., Carnarvonshire, Arfon

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts
(Ireland) Bill, 2R. 428, 431

Rating of Machinery Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 103

Rating of Machinery (No. 2) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 103

Rating of Schools Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 111

REIMOND, Mr. W. H. K., Fermanagh, N.

Africa—King Ja Ja, 644

REED, Mr. H. B., Bradford, E.

Ireland—Catholic Priests at Elections, 1015

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 287

Reformatory and Industrial Schools Bill
Q. Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth; A. The Home
Sec. Dec 8, 707

Registration of Electors (Acceleration)
Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 115

Registration of Electors Acts Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 103

Registration of Firms Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Jan 22, 888

Registration of Voters (Scotland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 110

REID, Mr. R. T., Dumfries, &c.

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R.
840

Relief of Distress (Ireland) Acts (see Ireland—(Distress))

Religious Disqualification Removal Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 101

2R. put off for six months Feb 4, 1783

Religious Equality Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 103

RENDEL, Mr. Stuart, Montgomeryshire

Parliament—Business of the House, 1381

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 270,
324, 325; Com. 1039, 1552, 1564

RENTOUL, Dr. J. A., Down, S.

Ireland—Educational Endowments—Rainey
School, Magherafelt, Res. 637

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts
(Ireland) Bill, 2R. 409, 414, 416, 417

Returning Officers' Expenses Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 106

Rights of Way (Scotland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 28, 184

Rights of Way (Scotland) (No. 2) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Jan 26, 1127

RITCHIE, Right Hon. C. T. (President of the Local Government Board), Tower Hamlets, St. George's

Allotments Bill, 1145

District Councils Bill, 1290

Local Government Board

County Councils

Pleasure Boats on the Severn, 127

Roads and Footpaths, 120

Eviction of Miners, 1147

Public Roads—Barbed Wires, 345

Registration of Deaths, 123

[cont.]

RITCHIE, Right Hon. C. T.—cont.

Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Act, 1524
Local Taxation (Exchequer Contributions) Returns, 159
Metropolitan Asylums Board—Eastern Hospital at Homerton, 896
Poor Law—Tramps in Oakum Cages, 344

Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 102
Read 2^o Jan 28, 1201
Com.—R.P. Jan 29, 1380

ROBERTS, Mr. J. B., Carnarvonshire, Eifion

Navy—Ships “Polyphemus,” 1389
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 289;
Com. 1040, 1042, 1108, 1302, 1310, 1317, 1321, 1324, 1325, 1326, 1328, 1329, 1377, 1551, 1565, 1598, 1610

ROBERTSON, Mr. E., Dundee

Conspiracy Law Amendment Bill, 2R. 1223
Cyprus—Criminal Administration, 238
Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, Order for Com. 667, 670

ROBERTSON, Right Hon. J. P. B. (Lord Advocate), Bute

Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 655, 1276
Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act, 758
Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, Notice of Motion, 37; 2R. 792
Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1219

Scotland

Abernethy Round Tower, 1619
Clyde Navigation, 160
Corn Mills, 693
Crofter Commission, 656, 896
Education
Ardchattan and Muckairn School Board, 1019, 1523
Higher Education, Res. 1705
Electors in the Crofter Counties, 1515
Law and Justice and Police
Intimidation—Case of Robert Smith, 1524
Marine Police Force, 1018
Seed Potatoes for Ireland, 1016

ROBY, Mr. H. J., Lancashire, S.E., Eccles
Parliament—Reprints of Partly Considered Bills, 1527

ROCHE, Mr. J., Galway, E.

Ireland—Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1456

ROUND, Mr. J., Essex, N.E., Harwich
Tithe Bill, Com. 1564

ROWLANDS, Mr. J., Finsbury, E.

Electors' Registration (Acceleration) Bill, 706
Government Contracts—Messrs. Brass, 1151
Hackney Carriage Stands at the British Museum, 1280
Metropolis—Police—Chief Commissioner's Report, 1625
Parliament—Business of the House, 1801
Post Office
Officials, Res. 218
Savings Bank Department—Mail Sorters' Petition, 1621
Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Select Com., Res. 1725

ROWLANDS, Mr. W. B., Cardiganshire

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1026, 1095, 1107, 1305, 1320, 1378, 1544, 1584, 1585, 1592
Wales—Chief Constable of Cardiganshire, 231

ROWNTREE, Mr. J., Scarborough

Ireland—Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1447

Royal National Lifeboat Institution

Return ordered Feb 3, 1614

RUSSELL, Mr. T. W., Tyrone, S.

Ireland
Catholic Priests at Elections, 1014
Criminal Law, &c. Act—Tipperary Prosecutions, 691
Education
Board of National Education—Vacancy, 133
Educational Endowments—Rainey School, Magherafelt, Res. 629, 634
Fiscal Relations between Great Britain and Ireland, 1029
Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1415, 1417, 1426
Law and Justice—Jurors, 1296
Irish Land Bills, 228
Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 720, 721, 722
Parliament—Business of the House, 537
Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 387, 388, 421, 448, 505, 512; Order for Com. 671, 674
Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 586, 592, 573, 574, 575, 585

RUSSELL, Sir C., Hackney, S.

Conspiracy Law Amendment Bill, 2R. 1267

Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 111

Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Cornwall) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 114

SALISBURY, Marquess of (Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)

Ceylon—Arabi Pasha, 1501, 1502

Duration of Speeches in the House of Lords Bill, 2R. 688

Hares Preservation Bill, 2R. 335

Intermediate Schools, &c. Sites Bill, 2R. 334

Italy—Price of Bread, 336

Parliament

Business of the House, 685, 785

Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 23, 27, 31

Standing Committees, Standing Orders Relating to Select Com., Res. 1138

Portugal and England in Africa, 685

SALT, Mr. T., Stafford

Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Select Com., Res. 1720

SAMOA

Treaty, Q. Sir T. Esmonde; A. The Under Sec. for Fn. Affs. Jan 29, 1282

SANDYS, Colonel T. M., Lancashire, S.W., Bootle

Religious Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 1769

SAUNDERSON, Colonel E. J., Armagh, N.

Ireland—Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1429, 1433, 1434

Religious Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 1778, 1787

Savings Banks

Cardiff, Q. Mr. Howell; A. The Ch. of Exch. Jan 26, 1013

Chelsea, Q. Mr. Whitmore; A. The Ch. of Exch. Nov 27, 119; Q. Mr. Howell; A. The Ch. of Exch. Jan 26, 1012

School Board Elections (Scotland) Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 115School Board London (Superannuation) Billc. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 108

Order for 2R. Jan 26, 1111

Read 2^o * and com. to Select Com. Jan 27, 1197SCOTLAND, Secretary for (see LOTHIAN, Marquess of)

LORD ADVOCATE (see ROBERTSON, Right Hon. J. P. B.)

SCOTLANDArmy

Inchkeith Island, Q. Sir D. Currie; A. The Sec. for War Nov 28, 164

SCOTLAND—cont.Crofters

Crofters' Holdings—Commission, Q. Dr. Clark; A. The Ld. Adv. Dec 5, 656; Q. Mr. Provand; A. The Ld. Adv. Jan 23, 896

Electors in the Crofter Counties, Q. Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 2, 1515

Public Works, Q. Mr. J. Chamberlain; A. The First Lord of Treas. Dec 9, 762

Education

Ardchattan and Muckairn School Board, Qs. Mr. Caldwell; As. The Ld. Adv. Jan 26, 1018; Feb 2, 1522

Education and the County Councils, Q. Mr. Bryce; A. The Ch. of Exch. Dec 4, 534

Higher Education, Motion Feb 3, 1684

School Board Elections in the Crofter Counties, Q. Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 2, 1515

Educational Endowments (Anderson's Institution, Elgin), Answer to Address Dec 1, 240

Fisheries—Salmon Fishery Rights, Q. Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; A. The Sec. to Treas. Feb 2, 1514

Highlands and Islands Commission, Q. Dr. R. M'Donald; A. The First Lord of Treas. Dec 1, 239; Qs. Mr. Watt, Dr. Clark; As. The First Lord of Treas. Jan 29, 1288

Law and Justice and Police

Intimidation—Robert Smith, Q. Mr. Crawford; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 2, 1524

Marine Police Force, Q. Mr. Duff; A. The Ld. Adv. Jan 26, 1018

Licensed Premises, Return ordered Jan 27, 1157

Mines—Burnbank Colliery—Weighing Minerals, Q. Mr. C. Graham; A. The Home Sec. Dec 4, 531

Miscellaneous

Corn Mills, Q. Dr. R. M'Donald; A. The Ld. Adv. Dec 8, 693

Edinburgh Museum—Attendants' Pay, Q. Mr. Wallace; A. The Vice Pres. Dec 4, 523

Round Tower of Abernethy, Q. Sir J. Kinloch; A. The Ld. Adv. Feb 3, 1619

Seed Potatoes for Ireland, Q. Dr. Tanner; A. The Att. Gen. for Ireland Jan 26, 1022; Q. Colonel Nolan; A. The Ld. Adv. Jan 26, 1016

Navy

Charts and Surveys—Firth of Clyde, Q. Mr. Bradlaugh; A. The Ld. Adv. Nov 28, 160; Qs. Colonel Malcolm, Mr. Bradlaugh; As. The First Lord of Admy. Dec 5, 642

Royal Naval Reserve—Employment of by a Officer for Private Purposes, Q. Dr. R. M'Donald; A. The First Lord of Admy. Dec 8, 691

Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, Q. Mr. Esleumont; A. The Ld. Adv. Dec 5, 655

[cont.]

[cont.]

SCOTLAND—cont.

Post Office

Mail Service to Stornoway, Q. Mr. R. Heath; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 27, 1147
Pollokshields, Q. Mr. J. Wilson; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 29, 1277
Scotch and American Mails, Q. Mr. Leng; A. The P.M. Gen. Jan 29, 1291

Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act, Q. Mr. Buchanan; A. The Ld. Adv. Dec 9, 758

Railways

Regulation of Railways, Res. (Mr. Leng) Jan 27, 1176
Servants—Hours of Labour, Motion on going into Com. of Supply Jan 23, 904 (Refer also to title Board of Trade, sub-heading Railway Servants)
Strike, Q. Mr. Watt; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 23, 891; Q. Mr. J. Stuart; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 23, 902; Q. Mr. Buchanan; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 29, 1287

SEALE-HAYNE, Mr. C., Devon, Ashburton
Queen Anne's Bounty, 1619

Seed Potatoes (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 108
 Order for 2R. read and deferred Nov 27, 135

Seed Potatoes Supply (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Dec 4, 542
 Read 2° * and con. in Com. Dec 5, 676
 Con.; Read 3° * and passed Dec 8, 710
 l. Read 1° * Dec 8, 689
 Read 2° *; Standing Orders dispensed with; Com. negatived; Read 3° * and passed Dec 9, 745
 Royal Assent Dec 9, 745

Select Vestries

l. Bill, pro formâ, Read 1° * Nov 25, 5

SETON-KARR, Mr. H., St. Helen's
Army—Magazine Rifles, Res. 1672

SEXTON, Mr. T., Belfast, W.

Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 1195
 Ireland
Constabulary Force Fund, 1297
Distress and Relief Works, 1025, 1295
Fiscal Relations between Great Britain and Ireland, 1029
Post Office—Mails, 130, 660, 895
Shannon Navigation, 1298
Parliament—Business of the House, 1030
Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 1155
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 1R. 136

SHEEHY, Mr. D., Galway, S.

Ireland—Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1450

Sheriffs (Assizes Expenses) Bill

l. Presented; Read 1° * Jan 26, 1009

Sheriff Principal (Scotland) Abolition Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 115

Shop Hours Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Dec 1, 332

Shop (Weekly Half-Holiday) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 114

SIDEBOTHAM, Mr. J. W., Cheshire, Hyde
Pensions—Mr. T. Cadman, 1619

SINCLAIR, Mr. W. P., Falkirk, &c.

Ireland—Educational Endowments—Rainey School, Magherafelt, Res. 637
Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 731
Parliament — Adjournment — Christmas Recess, Res. 772
Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 845
Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 483, 484, 485

Slander of Women Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Dec 4, 629

Slaughter House, &c. (Metropolis) Act (1874) Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 106

Slave Trade (refer to titles AFRICA, and PORTUGAL)

Small Holdings Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 102

SMITH, Mr. J. P., Lanark, Partick

Parliament—Tea Room—Map of Proposed New Railways in Ireland, 704
Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 833
Scotland—Higher Education, Res. 1693

SMITH, Mr. S., Flintshire

India
Child Marriages, 841
Opium Traffic, 158
Out-Still Licences, 641
Police Force—Mr. W. M'Grath Drysdale 339
Pacific Islands—Labourers, 647
Parliament—Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 81, 82, 85
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 298

SMITH, Right Hon. W. H. (First Lord of the Treasury), Strand, Westminster
Africa — Emin Pasha Relief Expedition, Charges against the Members of, 87
Allotments, Labourers', 902, 1625
City of London Parochial Charities, 1030

[cont.]

SMITH, Right Hon. W. H.—cont.

- Civil Service—Clerks, 1153, 1627
 Colonies—Commercial Union—Proposed Imperial Conference, 1027
 Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill, Order for 2R. 628
 Education—Assisted Education—Legislation, 536
 Electors' Registration (Acceleration) Bill, 706
 Indian Councils Bill, 2R. 1611
 Indian Councils (No. 2) Bill, 1616
 Ireland
 Crimes Act—Administration, 1156, 1290
 Distress—Relief Works, 1295
 Koch, Dr.—Discoveries, Compensation for, 1289
 Law and Justice
 Hargan, Walter, Res. 683, 684
 " Mitchell v. Regina," 530
 Probate and Divorce Court, 1154
 Metropolitan Water Supply, 762, 1397, 1626
 Mines, Secretary for, Res. 1189
 Parliament
 Business of the House, 37, 38, 39, 535, 537, 744, 791, 1030, 1109, 1527, 1800, 1801, 1802; Res. 166, 168, 173, 175, 178
 Mr. Bradlaugh and the Parliamentary Oath, Res. 1171
 Parliamentary Registration, 536
 Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 65, 70, 71
 Reprints of Partly Considered Bills, 1527
 Sittings and Adjournment of the House, Res. 681
 Christmas Recess, 707; Res. 782, 783
 Speaker, Mr.—Death of Mrs. Peel, 664
 Time of the House, 350
 Pollen Fisheries (Ireland) Bill, Order for Com. 629
 Prison Clerks, 536
 Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 1155; 2R. 627; Order for Com. 886, 887
 Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) [Advances, &c.], Com. 768, 769
 Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 516; 2R. 451
 Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 1002, 1003
 Religious Disabilities Removal Bill, 2R. 1751, 1752, 1756, 1757
 School Board for London (Superannuation) Bill, 2R. 1111
 Scotland
 Crofters Districts—Public Works, 762
 Highlands and Islands—Commission, 239, 1289
 Seed Potatoes (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 135
 Solicitors' Magistracy Bill, 2R. 623
 Teachers' (Registration and Organisation) Bill, 1028
 Tithe Rent-Charge Commission, 902
 Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 332, 791; Order for Com. 1731
 Town Holdings, Com. 1154
 Tramways Order in Council (Ireland) (Athenry and Tuam Railway) Bill, 2R. 709

SMITH, Right Hon. W. H.—cont.

- Transfer of Railways (Ireland) Bill, Com. 626
 Weighing Machines, Stamping of, 708
Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis) Bill
 l. Presented; Read 1st Jan 26, 1009 Soldiers and Sailors Disabilities Removal Bill
 c. Ordered; Read 1st Dec 1, 332
SOLICITOR GENERAL (see CLARKE, Sir E.)
Solicitors and Apprentices (Ireland) Bill
 c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 26, 113
Solicitors' Magistracy Bill
 c. Ordered; Read 1st Nov 26, 112
 Order for 2R. Dec 4, 628; Jan 22, 887; Jan 23, 1008
South Kensington Museum (see title Literature, Science and Art)
SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. ARTHUR WELLESLEY PEEL), Warwick and Leamington
COMMITTEES
 When a Motion for the appointment of a Select Com. is preceded by a Preface which is in the nature of a separate Res., and does not come within the Order of Reference, the ordinary course would be to strike out the Preface and then move for the Select Com. The Terms of Reference will be for the House to judge Feb 3, 1715
MISCELLANEOUS
 Jan 27, 1143; Jan 29, 1384; Jan 30, 1489; Feb 3, 1716, 1726, 1732
RULES AND ORDER OF DEBATE
 When the House has passed a Res. that a certain Bill ought not to be brought in, a Motion cannot be moved to bring in that Bill until the Res. of the House has been rescinded Jan 27, 1176
 A Motion must be withdrawn before it can be brought up in an amended form Jan 27, 1175
SPENCER, Mr. E., West Bromwich
 Bank Act—£1 Notes, 125
 Tubercular Diseases—Professor Koch's Cure, 761
STANHOPE, Right Hon. E. (Secretary of State for War), Lincolnshire, Horn-castle
 Army
 Barracks
 Wellington
 Crimean Veterans at, 347
 Married Men's Quarters, 347
 Windsor Cavalry Barracks, 750

[cont.]

[cont.]

STANHOPE, Right Hon. E.—cont.

Medical Department, 700

Miscellaneous

Battery and Earthworks near Sunderland, 1148

Inchkeith Island, 165

Officers

"Mitchell v. Regina," 164

New Warrant—Senior Colonels, 126, 534

Pensions—Royal Warrants, 750

Ordnance and Manufacturing Departments
Magazine Rifles, 517, 648, 1151; R.s.
1634, 1655, 1657, 1666, 1669, 1680

Woolwich Arsenal—Discharge of Workmen, 649

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R.
858, 861, 862, 865

STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord

Hares Preservation Bill, 2R. 335

Intermediate Schools, &c. (Sites) Bill, 2R.
333

Italy—Price of Bread, 335

Steam Boilers Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 1, 332

Steam Engines and Boilers Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Dec 1, 332

STEPHENS, Mr. H. C., Middlesex, Hornsey
City of London Parochial Charities Act
(1883) (Central Scheme), Res. 1127

STEVENSON, Mr. F. S., Suffolk, Eye

Armenia, Papers Relating to, 128

Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 730

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 263,
265; Order for Com. 596, 599; Com.
1039, 1105, 1330, 1357, 1535, 1576

STEWART, Mr. M. J., Kirkcudbright

India

Opium Traffic, 1274

Police—Mr. W. M'Grath Drysdale, 340

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, 2R.
872

Roads and Streets in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 1215

Scotland—Higher Education, Res. 1702

STOREY, Mr. S., Sunderland

Purchase of Land and Congested Districts
(Ireland) Bill, 2R. 451

Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 583,
585, 586, 681

Transfer of Railways (Ireland) Bill, Com.
622, 625, 626

STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL, Lord

Smoke Nuisance Abatement (Metropolis)
Bill, 1R. 1009

Street Organs (Metropolis) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 103

Strikes (see Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

STUART, Mr. J., Shoreditch, Hoxton

City of London Parochial Charities Act
(1883) (Central Scheme), Res. 1115
Scotland—Railway Strike, 902

SULLIVAN, Mr. D., Westmeath, S.

Ireland—National Education—Teachers'
Promotion, 788

Sunday Closing (Wales) Act (1881)
Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 106

Superannuation (Officers of County Councils) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1^o * Nov 26, 113

SUPPLY

CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS—

IRELAND.

£5,000—Supplementary, Relief of Distress,
Com. Dec 4, 543; Report Dec 5, 678

Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland)

Return ordered and presented Jan 22, 791

SWINBURNE, Sir J., Staffordshire, Lichfield

Egypt—Water Supply, 753

Parliament

Business of the House, 1384; Res. 183

Reading Room—Electric Light, 1014

Supply—Ireland—Relief of Distress, 589,
595

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 791; 2R.
318; Order for Com. 601, 609; Com.
1030, 1031, 1033, 1045, 1054, 1057, 1061,
1064, 1068, 1069, 1074, 1077, 1078, 1087,
1106, 1301, 1375, 1549, 1551, 1561, 1562,
1564, 1602, 1609

TALBOT, Mr. J. G., Oxford University

Firearms, Dangerous Use of, 519

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com.
1056

TANNER, Dr. C. K., Cork Co., Mid.

Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 1195

Ireland

Distress

Relief Works, 1017, 1155, 1293, 1357

Seed Potatoes, 1022

Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1410
1489, 1496

Magistrates' Pensions, 1015

Navy

Haulbowline Docks, 1155

"Shannon," Repairs of, 1156

Koch's, Dr., Discoveries, 1289

(cont.)

TANNER, Dr. C. K.—cont.

Parliament

Adjournment—Christmas Recess, Res.
781

Business of the House, 1110, 1381; Res. 182

Pollen Fisheries (Ireland) Bill, Com. 1110

Railway Companies Return Tickets Bill, 2R.
1199

Solicitors' Magistracy Bill, 2R. 887

South Kensington Museum, Plans for the Completion of, 1152

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com.
1088, 1108

Teachers' Registration Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 107

Teachers' (Registration and Organisation) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Dec 5, 667

Order for 2R. Jan 26, 1110

Read 2° * and com. to Select Com. Jan 27, 1195

*Teachers' (Registration and Organisation)
Bill*

Q. Sir R. Temple; A. The First Lord of
Treas. Jan 26, 1028

Technical Instruction Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 106

Telegraphs and Telephones (see POST OFFICE)

TEMPLE, Sir R., Worcester, Evesham

Education Code, 703

Parliament—Queen's Speech, Address in Answer to, 92

School Board for London (Superannuation)
Bill, 2R. 1197

Suakin and the Soudan, 348

Teachers' (Registration and Organisation)
Bill, 1028; 2R. 1195

Tenancies Rating Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 110

Theatres, &c. (London) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 116

THOMAS, Mr. A., Glamorgan, E.

Poor Law—Tramps in Oakum Cages, 344

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 284,
303; Com. 1099, 1569, 1569, 1590

Wales

Blaenllecha Post Office, 696

Sale of Crown Property, 697

THOMAS, Mr. D. A., Merthyr Tydvil

Army—Magazine Rifles, 1624

Mines

Employment of Workmen as Inspectors,
1391

Inspectors' Reports, 1390

Secretary for, Res. 1193

THOMAS, Mr. D. A.—cont.

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Order for
Com. 612; Com. 1031

Wales—Aberaman Postmaster, 700

THRING, Lord

Custody of Children Bill, 2R. 1508

Tithes

Goods Liable to Distraint, Q. Mr. R.
Farquharson; A. The Pres. Bd. Trade

Feb 2, 1523

Royal Commission, Qs. Mr. H. Gardner;

As. The Pres. Bd. Trade Dec 4, 537;

Jan 26, 1029; Jan 30, 1396; Q. Mr.

Gardner; A. The First Lord of Treas.

Jan 23, 902

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery and Redemption Bill

c. Notice of Motion (Sir M. Hicks Beach) Nov
25, 86

Ordered; Read 1° Nov 27, 136

Read 2° Dec 1, 241

Order for Com. Dec 2, 452

Com. Dec 4, 596; Jan 26, 1030; Jan 29,

1299; Feb 2, 1532; Feb 3, 1731

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill

Q. Sir J. Swinburne; A. The First Lord of

Treas. Jan 22, 791; Q. Mr. R. Cooke; A.

The Pres. Bd. Trade Jan 29, 1288

Tithes (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 107

TOMLINSON, Mr. W. E. M., Preston

Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com.
1310

Town Holdings

Commission, Q. Mr. Buchanan; A. The First
Lord of Treas. Jan 27, 1154

Town Holdings Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 103

Towns Improvement (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Feb 3, 1731

Trade and Commerce (see title Labour, Trade, and Commerce)

Trade and Navigation

Return ordered and presented Jan 27, 1157

Trading Registration Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Feb 3, 1631

Tramways (Ireland) Act (1860)
Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Dec 9, 767

Tramways Order in Council (Ireland) (Athenry and Tuam Railway) Bill

- c. Ordered; Read 1° * Dec 8, 709
Read 2°; Com. *; Read 3° * and passed Dec 9, 770
l. Read 1° * Jan 22, 785
Read 2° and com. to Com. of the whole House Jan 30, 1385
Com. *; Report Feb 2, 1504
Read 3° * and passed Feb 3, 1614

Transfer of Railways (Ireland) Bill

- c. Ordered; Read 1° Nov 27, 154
Read 2° Dec 2, 452
Com. ; Read 3° * and passed Dec 4, 622
l. Read 1° * Dec 5, 641
Read 2° * and com. to Com. of the whole House; Standing Order dispensed with; Com.; Report; Read 3° * and passed Dec 8, 685
c. Lords Amendt. con. and agreed to Dec 8, 743
l. Returned from the Commons Dec 9, 745
Royal Assent Dec 9, 745

TREASURY—First Lord (see SMITH, Right Hon. W. H.)

TREASURY—Financial Secretary to (see JACKSON, Rt. Hon. W. L.)

TREASURY—Patronage Secretary to (see AKERS-DOUGLAS, Mr. A.)

Treaties of Commerce (see Colonies)

TREVELYAN, Right Hon. Sir G. O., Glasgow, Bridgeton
Ireland—Land Tenure (Arbitration), Res. 1496, 1497
Land Department (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 718
Supply—Ireland—Distress, 678
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, 2R. 329

Trust Companies' Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 27, 158 :

Trustee Savings Bank Bill

Q. Mr. Howell; A. The Ch. of Exch. Jan 23, 892

TURKEY

ARMENIA (see that title)

UNITED STATES (see AMERICA)

University Education (Ireland) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 105

Vaccination (see Local Government Board)

Valuation (Metropolis) Act (see Metro polis)

Vestrymen's Qualification Abolition Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Jan 30, 1404

VINCENT, Mr. C. E. H., Sheffield, Central

Alien Act, 1145
Colonies, Self - Governing — Commercial Arrangements, &c. 1020, 1027
International Industrial Conference at Madrid, 1526
Life-Saving Appliances, 657
Merchandise Marks Act, 346, 1147
Metropolitan Police—Pay, &c. 530, 700
Middlesex Magistrates, 1616
Parliamentary Registration, 535
Public Trustee Bill, 1144
Reformatory and Industrial Schools, 1616

VIVIAN, Sir H. Hussey, Swansea, District
Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill, Com. 1569

Voluntary Schools (Representative Management) Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Nov 26, 109

Volunteer Act (1863) Amendment Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Feb 4, 1799

Voters' Successive Occupation Bill

c. Ordered; Read 1° * Jan 23, 903

WADDY, Mr. S. D., Lincolnshire, Brigg
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 179
Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill, 2R. 515
Railway Servants—Hours of Labour, Res. 953

WALES

Cardiff Savings Bank, Q. Mr. Howell; A. The Ch. of Exch. Jan 26, 1013
Gwylwyr Sett Quarry, Qs. Mr. Lloyd-George As. The Sec. to Treas. Dec 5, 646; Jan 27, 1146
Llanaher—Alleged Burial Scandal, Qs. Mr. G. O. Morgan, Mr. Lloyd-George; As. The Home Sec. Jan 29, 1281
Police—Chief Constable of Cardiganshire, Q. Mr. B. Rowlands; A. The Home Sec. Dec 1, 231; Q. Mr. S. T. Evans; A. The Home Sec. Dec 4, 522

Post Office

Aberaman, Postmaster at, Q. Mr. D. Thomas Dec 8, 700
Blaenllecha Post Office, Q. Mr. A. Thomas; A. The P.M. Gen. Dec 8, 696

[cont.]